SOUTH ASIA RESEARCH

The Rigveda

The Earliest Religious Poetry of India

Volume I

Translated by

Stephanie W. Jamison
and
Joel P. Brereton

The Rigveda

SOUTH ASIA RESEARCH

Series Editor

Martha Selby

A Publication Series of

The University of Texas South Asia Institute

and

Oxford University Press

THE EARLY UPANIṢADS
Annotated Text and Translation
Patrick Olivelle

INDIAN EPIGRAPHY
A Guide to the Study of Inscriptions in Sanskrit, Prakrit, and the other Indo-Aryan Languages
Richard Salomon

A DICTIONARY OF OLD MARATHI
S.G. Tulpule and Anne Feldhaus

DONORS, DEVOTEES, AND DAUGHTERS OF GOD
Temple Women in Medieval Tamilnadu
Leslie C. Orr

JĪMŪTAVĀHANA'S DĀYABHĀGA
The Hindu Law of Inheritance in Bengal
Edited and Translated with an Introduction and Notes by Ludo Rocher

A PORTRAIT OF THE HINDUS
Balthazar Solvyns and the European Image of India 1740–1824
Robert L. Hardgrave

MANU'S CODE OF LAW
A Critical Edition and Translation of the Mānava-Dharmaśāstra
Patrick Olivelle

NECTAR GAZE AND POISON BREATH
An Analysis and Translation of the Rajasthani Oral Narrative of Devnarayan Aditya Malik

BETWEEN THE EMPIRES
Society in India 300 BCE to 400 CE
Patrick Olivelle

MANAGING MONKS
Administrators and Administrative Roles in Indian Buddhist Monasticism Jonathan A. Silk

ŚIVA IN TROUBLE
Festivals and Rituals at the Paśupatinātha Temple of Deopatan
Axel Michaels

A PRIEST'S GUIDE FOR THE GREAT FESTIVAL
Aghoraśiva's Mahotsavavidhi
Richard H. Davis

DHARMA
Its Early History in Law, Religion, and Narrative
Alf Hiltebeitel

POETRY OF KINGS
The Classical Hindi Literature of Mughal India
Allison Busch

THE RISE OF A FOLK GOD
Viṭṭhal of Pandharpur
Ramchandra Chintaman Dhere
Translated by Anne Feldhaus

WOMEN IN EARLY INDIAN BUDDHISM
Comparative Textual Studies
Edited by Alice Collett

THE RIGVEDA
The Earliest Religious Poetry of India
Translated by Stephanie W. Jamison and Joel P. Brereton

The Rigveda

THE EARLIEST RELIGIOUS POETRY OF INDIA

Translated by Stephanie W. Jamison
and
Joel P. Brereton

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

For Stanley, where it all began bṛ́haspate prathamáṃ vācó ágram
Ṛgveda X.71.1a

JPB and SWJ

For René, my life’s companion

JPB

In memory of my beloved husband (1933–2013)

SWJ

CONTENTS

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This translation exists because of Patrick Olivelle, who, some fifteen years ago or so at the annual meeting of the American Oriental Society in New Orleans in 1998, approached the two of us with a proposition: that we should undertake a quick translation of the R̥gveda for a general audience. Patrick's persuasive powers are well known, and we were intrigued and easily persuaded. Although the "quick" element of the proposition was not exactly fulfilled, we wish to thank Patrick abundantly for starting us on this path, which has provided both of us with the most sustained and satisfying intellectual experience of our lives, and for his constant encouragement and sage advice along the way.

That we could undertake this project at all is entirely due to our shared guru, Stanley Insler, with whom we first read R̥gveda in 1971. Stanley's combination of meticulous philology with inventive interpretation and imaginative reading, never accepting conventional wisdom without scrutiny—however many millennia the conventional wisdom has held—has been a constant inspiration to us. And not only is our general approach to the text entirely informed by his teaching and example, but many of our interpretations of particular passages first saw the light of day in his classes.

Over the years we have read R̥gveda with several generations of students, many of whom are now colleagues and friends, and other colleagues have read portions of our translation or discussed it with us, offering helpful and trenchant criticism and supportive encouragement. We cannot name them all, but among the many we wish to mention especially Jim Benson, Wendy Doniger, Harry Falk, Ben Fortson, Oliver Freiberger, Arlo Griffiths, Dieter Gunkel, Mark Hale, Hans Hock, Jan Houben, Joshua Katz, Jared Klein, Sasha Lubotsky, Jesse Lundquist, Craig Melchert, Chris Minkowski, Marianne Oort, Asko Parpola, Ted Proferes, Hanns-Peter Schmidt, Gregory Schopen, Martha Selby, Hartmut Scharfe, Oktor Skjaervø, Rupert Snell, George Thompson, Elizabeth Tucker, Brent Vine, and Jarrod Whitaker.

We wish to acknowledge also the financial and institutional support that we have received. The National Endowment for the Humanities supported this project through a Collaborative Grant in 2005 that allowed us to work more frequently together during a critical period in our work. Also, we wish to thank both the University of Missouri, which provided Joel a leave to begin this project (during the academic year 1999–2000), and the University of Texas at Austin, which gave him time to continue it (in the fall 2004).

We would also like to thank Oxford University Press and especially Cynthia Read for her continuing support of the project and her patience in awaiting its completion, as well as Charlotte Steinhardt at the Press and Jashnie Jabson, our Production Editor at Newgen Knowledge Works, Chennai, for their help in preparing the manuscript for publication. We want to extend special thanks to Katherine Eirene Ulrich, our skillful, vigilant, meticulous, and, above all, tactful copy-editor, without whose care many slips and infelicities would have remained in the finished version.

Finally, we wish each to give heartfelt thanks to the most significant person in our individual lives. Joel to René Campos, whose patience was often tried during the long period that I worked on this translation. I appreciate his efforts to enliven the parts of my life not given over to the R̥gveda and thereby to inform the part that has been. Stephanie to my husband, Calvert Watkins, who lived daily with this project for all those years, read innumerable drafts of many of the translations, and whose astounding range of knowledge about Indo-European languages and their poetic traditions and his fine-tuned sense of archaic poetry can be seen as the foundation of every word of my translations. I deeply regret that he did not live to see the translation in print.

A NOTE ON THE TITLE

Although throughout this book we use the more scholarly transliteration of the name of the text, R̥gveda, we have chosen to use the old-fashioned rendering Rigveda in the title of the book itself in order to avoid the problems that might arise from having a diacritic in the first letter of the title.

ABBREVIATIONS

*	indicates an emendation to the text
1st	first person
2nd	second person
3rd	third person
ABORI	Annals of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute
acc.	accusative
AiĀ	Aitareya Āraṇyaka
AiB	Aitareya Brāhmaṇa
ĀśvŚS	Āśvalāyana Śrauta Sūtra
AV	Atharvaveda
Aves.	Avestan
AVP	Atharvaveda Paippalāda
AVŚ	Atharvaveda Śaunaka
BD	Bṛhaddevatā
BSOAS	Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies
dat.	dative
EJVS	Electronic Journal of Vedic Studies
EVP	Études védiques et pāṇinéennes (Renou 1955–69)
fem.	feminine
HR	History of Religions
IIJ	Indo-Iranian Journal
JA	Journal asiatique
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JB	Jaiminīya Brāhmaṇa
JUB	Journal of the University of Bombay
KauB	Kauṣītaki Brāhmaṇa
Kl. Sch	Kleine Schriften
KS	Kāṭhaka Saṃhitā
KZ	Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung auf dem Gebiete der indogermanischen Sprachen
masc.	masculine
MBh	Mahābhārata
MDŚ	Mānava Dharma Śāstra
MSS	Münchener Studien zur Sprachwissenschaft
Nir.	Nirukta

nom.	nominative
OLZ	Orientalistische Literaturzeitung
PB	Pañcaviṃśa Brāhmaṇa
Pp.	Padapāṭha
R̥V	R̥gveda
ŚāṅkhĀ	Śāṅkhāyana Āraṇyaka
ŚāṅkhGS	Śāṅkhāyana Gr̥hya Sūtra
ŚāṅkhŚS	Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra
ŚB	Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa
SBE	Sacred Books of the East
sg.	singular
StII	Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik
TĀ	Taittirīya Āraṇyaka
TB	Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa
TS	Taittirīya Saṃhitā
Vālakh.	Vālakhilya
voc.	vocative
VS	Vājasaneyi Saṃhitā
VSM	Vājasaneyi Saṃhitā Mādhyaṃdina
WZKS	Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde Südasiens
Y	Yasna
ZDMG	Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft

The Ṛgveda: Introduction

India has a magnificent tradition of religious literature stretching over three and a half millennia, with a vast range of styles and subjects—from almost impersonal reflections on the mysteries of the cosmos, the divine, and humankind's relation to them to deeply intimate expressions of worship. This literature is justly celebrated, not only within the religious traditions that gave rise to the various works but around the world among people with no ties to those religious traditions. The R̥gveda is the first of these monuments, and it can stand with any of the subsequent ones. Its range is very large—encompassing profound and uncompromising meditations on cosmic enigmas, joyful and exuberant tributes to the wonders of the world, ardent praise of the gods and their works, moving and sometimes painful expressions of personal devotion, and penetrating reflections on the ability of mortals to make contact with and affect the divine and cosmic realms through sacrifice and praise. Thus, much of what will distinguish later Indian religious literature is already present in the R̥gveda. Yet, though its name is known, the celebration of the R̥gveda is muted at best, even within its own tradition, and, save for a few famous hymns, its contents go unnoticed outside of that tradition.

India also has a magnificent literary tradition, characterized in great part by sophisticated poetic techniques and devices and a poetic self-consciousness that glories in the transformative work that words can effect on their subjects. Again, the R̥gveda is the first monument of this literary tradition and at least the equal of the later literature. The exuberance with which the poets press the boundaries of language in order to create their own reflection of the complex and ultimately impenetrable mysteries of the cosmos and the verbal devices they developed to mirror these cosmic intricacies resonate through the rest of the literary tradition. Yet, again, the R̥gveda figures very little in standard accounts of Indian literature and is little read or appreciated as literature.

Thus the R̥gveda is not only the beginning but also one of the paramount expressions of both the religious tradition and the literary tradition, combining these two roles in a text that displays great variety, skill, and beauty. Surely it deserves a modern English translation that makes these riches available to a wider audience. Yet it does not have one; the only readily available complete English translation, the nineteenth-century product of R. T. H. Griffith, conceals rather than reveals the wonders of the R̥gveda and would (properly) discourage any sensitive reader from further pursuit of the text. Why this lacuna? The answer is quite simple: the R̥gveda is very long and very hard. Neither of these factors alone would necessarily hinder translation—both very long texts, like the Sanskrit epics, and very hard texts, like the Avestan Gāthās, are receiving their due—but the combination of the two has proved very daunting. We two translators, after some fifteen years of concentrated effort on the translation and more than forty years of living with and working with the text, can attest to the rigors of the task—but even more to its joys. And we feel privileged to have spent so much time in intimate contact with the poets who shaped such an extraordinary religious and literary achievement at the very dawn of the Indian tradition.

In the introduction that follows we try to give readers some grounding in the world and worldview of the R̥gveda and to provide enough information to approach the translation without undue bafflement. It is not meant as a comprehensive treatment of the many subjects touched on, but only a stepping stone to the text itself and the readers' direct experience of the hymns.

I. Who, What, Where, When?

A. VEDA AND R̥GVEDA

The R̥gveda is the oldest Sanskrit text, composed in an archaic form of the language, known as Vedic or Vedic Sanskrit. It is a collection of over a thousand poems, composed by a number of different poets over the course of some considerable period of time. The poems are primarily hymns praising various gods and ritual elements and procedures, designed to be recited during ritual performance; that is, they are liturgical compositions. However, they are also finely crafted and self-conscious literary productions of the highest quality.

As the first text in Sanskrit, the R̥gveda is somewhat isolated, and many of the difficulties of its interpretation stem from the fact that there are no parallel or closely contemporary texts. Yet, it is poised between two bodies of textual material that can contribute to its interpretation, and the characteristic features from these two types of texts, mingled uniquely in the R̥gveda, help account for its distinctive quality. On the one hand, it stands at the end of a long tradition of Indo-European and Indo-Iranian praise poetry, most nearly mirrored in the Old Avestan Gāthās attributed to Zarathustra. On the other, it stands as the earliest of the ritual texts collectively known as the Vedas and forms a part of the interlocking ritual system set forth in the Vedas.

There are four Vedas: the R̥gveda, Sāmaveda, Yajurveda, and Atharvaveda. The first three are the provinces of individual priests, who function together to perform the solemn rituals of the Vedic liturgical system, later, in the middle Vedic period, known as śrauta rituals. Each of those three Vedas also represents a different type of ritual speech. Thus, the R̥gveda belongs to the Hotar priest, who recites or chants the poetry; the Sāmaveda to the Udgātar priest, who sings the poetry to set tunes called *sāman*s. The vast majority of the verbal material in the Sāmaveda is borrowed from the R̥gveda. The Yajurveda is the realm of the Adhvaryu priest; his verbal product is the yajus, a short verbal formula that generally accompanies the physical actions that are the main task of the Adhvaryu. Each of these three priests is accompanied by other priests who share their principal functions. So in the later soma ritual, for example, the number of priests can be sixteen or seventeen. The Atharvaveda stands outside of this ritual system and consists primarily of hymns and spells of a more "popular" nature, often magical or healing. Despite its lack of connection to the solemn ritual, the Atharvaveda is especially important for R̥gvedic studies because it is linguistically the closest text to the R̥gveda and is thus the second oldest text in Sanskrit. The two texts also share a number of passages and hymns, although the Atharvaveda often varies the wording or order of verses. The R̥gvedic hymns found also in the Atharvaveda are often drawn from the younger layers of the R̥gveda.

We will treat the structure of the text in more detail below; here we will provide only the most general outline. The text consists of 1028 hymns divided into ten books or *maṇḍala*s (lit. "circles"), of varying lengths. The arrangement of the hymns within each maṇḍala and the arrangement of the maṇḍalas themselves attest strongly to the deliberate quality of the collection and organization of the hymns, as we will demonstrate below. Maṇḍalas II–VII are known as the "Family Books," each attributed to a different bardic family. Maṇḍala VIII contains smaller collections attributed to particular poets or poetic families, and has a somewhat aberrant character. Maṇḍala IX contains all and only the hymns dedicated to Soma Pavamāna, "self-purifying soma," the deified ritual drink at a particular moment in its ritual preparation. Maṇḍalas I and X were added to the collection later, though they both contain much that is contemporaneous with the linguistic and religious level of the core parts of the R̥gveda, as well as some more recent and "popular" material. Both I and X contain exactly 191 hymns, a synchronicity that was clearly not by chance.

B. DATE AND CULTURAL CONTEXT OF THE ṚGVEDA

As was mentioned above, the Ṛgveda is part of the long tradition of Indo-European praise poetry, composed and performed orally and deploying inherited set verbal formulae, on which the poets also ring changes. Thus, whatever date(s) we assign to the actual composition of the particular hymns found in the text, the temporal horizon of the Ṛgveda stretches a good deal further back, in that the poetic techniques and even some of its precise verbal realizations go back many centuries, even millennia.

The dating of the Ṛgveda has been and is likely to remain a matter of contention and reconsideration because as yet little has been uncovered in the material record or in the hymns themselves that allows us to date the period of the Ṛgvedic hymns. One attempt at dating begins with an absence. Since the Ṛgveda does not mention iron but does mention other kinds of metal, it is likely a pre–Iron Age, Bronze Age text. The dates at which iron appears in the archaeological record in South Asia differ in different parts of the subcontinent. For the northwest, which comprises the geographic horizon of the Ṛgveda, iron began to be manufactured around 1200–1000 BCE. The Ṛgvedic hymns, therefore, would have to have been composed no later than this period. However, iron is attested in the Atharvaveda. While the Ṛgveda is older than the Atharvaveda, there is no basis for assuming a substantial gap in time between the end of the Ṛgvedic period and the Atharvaveda. Therefore the date of the latest portions of the Ṛgveda is not likely to be very much earlier that 1200–1000 BCE. It is also likely that the period of the composition of Ṛgvedic hymns did not extend more than several centuries before this terminus ad quem. Witzel (in Jamison and Witzel 1992: 2 n. 2) has noted that the poets and kings mentioned in the *anukramaṇī*s (indices) and in the hymns themselves comprise perhaps five or six generations. Generously rounding these numbers, we can then place the period of the composition of the Ṛgvedic hymns sometime within the period 1400–1000 BCE or, even more approximately, within the second half of the second millennium BCE. At best these dates encompass only the hymns of the Ṛgveda as we have them. The poetic conventions on which the Ṛgveda was built are very much older, extending back to the Indo-Iranian period with roots into the Indo-European period. The Ṛgveda is only the surface of a very deep tradition.

While the date of the Ṛgveda remains problematic, the hymns provide information that helps identify the geographic area in which the hymns were composed. Above all, the rivers mentioned in the text help establish the place of the Ṛgveda. These rivers range from the Kabul and Kurram rivers in present-day Afghanistan to the Ganges in the east. Its center is the greater Punjab, the region of the Indus and its major tributaries. Following the likely internal chronology of the Ṛgveda, geographic references in the text suggest a movement from the northwest toward the east. Thus while the earliest parts of the Ṛgveda were likely composed in the northwest, in the latest parts of the text the area has extended further into the subcontinent, and its center has shifted toward Kurukṣetra, roughly the area of the modern state of Haryana.

One of the reasons that the Ṛgveda is difficult to date is that there is no material evidence that we can clearly associate with the people who composed the Ṛgveda, the people who called themselves Āryas. Nor would we expect very much material evidence, since the hymns make no mention of any permanent religious structures or enduring settlements. The Āryas formed instead a semi-nomadic pastoralist society, in which seasons of settlement alternated with seasons of migration. This migration likely contributed to the extension of the culture into new areas. The period of movement was also the season of conflict in the competition for land and the season of cattle-raiding, especially for younger males eager to acquire assets on which to establish their own livelihood. Cattle were the primary source of wealth, although the hymns also mention sheep, buffaloes, goats, and camels. Horses too were essential and prized, since they enabled the Āryas' mobility and contributed to their success in battle. Although the economy was fundamentally pastoral, the Āryas practiced some agriculture during the times of settlement; one hymn (IV.57) specifically celebrates agricultural divinities, and the plow is occasionally mentioned. The hymns refer to yáva "barley" or "field grain," which was used both for food and in the rituals. The Ṛgveda does not attest rice cultivation.

In addition to the absence of material remains, another difficulty in describing the cultural context of the Ṛgveda is that its hymns depict only a part of the religion and society at the period. First, the Ṛgveda represents the continuation of an elite tradition also attested in the Avesta and therefore quite ancient. As such, it reflects the religious practice only of the upper strata of Ārya society. Second, it is primarily a collection of liturgical hymns for use in the soma sacrifice, surely the most prestigious ritual of the period but still only one kind of ritual, representing a particular and limited set of religious concerns. Finally, the soma sacrifices were sponsored and performed by socially elite men, and they reflected the religious concerns of these men. The text did not directly address the religious lives of women or of other social classes nor indeed even other aspects of the religious lives of elite males. Thus, while the Ṛgveda is a sizable text and from it we can derive a great deal of information about the soma rite and about those who participated in it, we are still dealing only with a segment of Ārya religion and society. However, we can gather information on non-elite concerns and on the daily life and pursuits of the elite incidentally, often through similes or imagery modeling ritual elements and procedures or through the crediting of gods with activities also appropriate to humans, such as warfare.

Indirectly, we can also get some information about other aspects of religion. First, although the soma rite was primarily focused on the god Indra, already in the Ṛgvedic period it had begun to incorporate the worship of gods around whom independent ritual traditions existed. So, for example, the Aśvins were worshiped already during the Indo-Iranian period and in the Pravargya rite, which is not a soma ritual. But already in the Ṛgvedic period the Aśvins were recipients of soma, and by the time of the later Veda the Pravargya rite had been incorporated into the soma tradition. Moreover, especially in book X, there are hymns that address a variety of religious interests separate from those of the soma rite. There are funeral (X.14–16) and wedding (X.85) hymns. There are hymns against cowives (X.145), against rivals (X.166), against witchcraft (X.155), against miscarriage (X.162), and against disease (X.161, 163). There are hymns for the safety of cattle (X.169), for conception (X.183), and for successful birth (X.184). In short the R̥gveda already attests rites that address domestic and individual issues principally associated with the Atharvaveda. These hymns point to substantial ritual activity outside of the soma rituals.

C. WHAT DO THE HYMNS DO?

The overwhelming majority of R̥gvedic hymns have as their major aim to praise the god(s) to whom the hymn is dedicated and to induce said god(s) to repay the praise with requested favors. To a certain extent different gods receive different types of praise, but the praise generally focuses on the appearance, qualities, and power of the gods and on their remarkable deeds. Some divinities attract particular attention to their appearance: for instance, the seductive beauty of Dawn, the glittering ostentation of the Maruts, the endlessly fascinating transformations of physical fire and its divine embodiment Agni. Others, like the Ādityas, have few if any physical characteristics, but are more celebrated for their mental and moral qualities. The supernatural powers of almost all the gods receive abundant praise, though again the types of power lauded differ from god to god.

Their powers are actualized in their deeds, the recounting of which occupies a large portion of many R̥gvedic hymns. Some gods have a robust narrative mythology, and episodes from this mythology are constantly related or alluded to; the most prominent example is Indra with his catalogue of great victories over both divine and mortal enemies. Those without much narrative mythology tend to be credited with general cosmogonic deeds or with the regular maintaining and ordering of the world and its inhabitants.

This praise of divine powers and deeds is not a disinterested act, for the aim is to persuade or constrain the gods to mobilize these same powers on behalf of their worshipers and to replicate their great deeds in the present for the benefit of these same worshipers. In the all-pervasive system of reciprocity and exchange that might be termed the dominant social ideology underlying the R̥gveda, praise of the gods requires requital: they must provide recompense for what they receive from those praising them. Worshipers are not shy about specifying what they want in exchange: the good things of this world—wealth, especially in livestock and gold, sons, and a long lifespan—and divine aid in defeating opponents, be they enemies in battle or rival sacrificers. The sign that the praise has been successful is the epiphany of the god(s) addressed, so that many hymns urgently invite the dedicand(s) to journey to the particular sacrifice in which the poet is participating and then jubilantly proclaim the arrival of the god(s) at that particular sacrificial ground as the ritual is taking place.

This epiphany at the sacrifice brings us back to the liturgical role of the hymns, for it should never be forgotten that almost all the hymns in the Ṛgveda were composed to accompany the physical acts of the ritual, which are happening simultaneously with the recitation. But the word "accompany" here is too weak. The hymns are not merely verbal background music, as it were. As will be discussed further below, another important aspect of Vedic ideology is the belief in the power of the word: words make things happen. The physical actions of ritual alone would be insufficient; it is the skillfully crafted, properly formulated hymn, the verbal portion of the ritual, that makes the liturgical acts effective.

While the great majority of Ṛgvedic hymns have a liturgical form that obviously reflects the soma rite, there are examples in which this model is not evident. Among them are the ākhyāna or "narrative" hymns, as Oldenberg (1883, 1885) called them, which take the form of a dialogue between two or more figures. These hymns occur in the later portions of the Ṛgveda, especially book X. They include, for example, dialogues between the sage Agastya and his wife Lopāmudrā (I.179); between Yama and his twin sister Yamī (X.10); between the celestial Apsaras Urvaśī and her abandoned mortal husband Purūravas (X.95); among the monkey Vṛṣākapi, the god Indra, and Indra's wife Indrāṇī (X.86); and between Indra's dog, Saramā, and the tribe of Paṇis (X.108). It is possible that some of these hymns comment on the soma rite, but others were composed for different ritual purposes, which have to be surmised, if they can be surmised at all, from the contents of the hymns. Our introductions to individual hymns discuss possible applications. A few may represent individual or domestic concerns, such as the recovery of lost cattle (X.108); others may embody the differing viewpoints of ongoing ritual controversies (I.179) or provide a dramatic modeling of a particularly important ritual (the Horse Sacrifice in X.86) or the mythological underpinning for a series of hymns (X.10 for the following funeral hymns). An evergreen controversy concerns the form of the ākhyāna hymns. Oldenberg (1885) argued that the oldest type of epic composition mixed poetry and prose. The poetry principally consisted of the words spoken by characters in the narrative, and the prose provided the narrative context for the verses. This form is found in the Pāli Jātakas, the stories of the Buddha's former births, for example, in which the verses are considered canonical but the connecting prose is not. Oldenberg suggested that the ākhyāna hymns conformed to this type and that what we have preserved is a skeleton of canonical dialogue that originally had prose narrative attached to it. Oldenberg's theory has the advantage of explaining why these hymns are difficult to interpret and why even the speakers of particular verses are not readily identifiable. While we find the theory attractive, many scholars have found it unnecessary and understand these hymns to have been recited as they are transmitted to us.

There are also hymns that, though they may be ritually employed in the later Veda, were perhaps not composed for ritual use. Gonda (1978: 25–38) compares some of these hymns to medieval stotras: expressions of emotion, praise, and devotion to the gods. However, such functions do not preclude their application in rites, even if their original ritual context is not clear to us. A better possibility for non-liturgical hymns is the type that comments on the ritual and its meaning. Generally occurring in the latest strata of the Ṛgveda, these include X.129, the Nāsadīyasūkta ("that not existing did not exist"); X.121, the Hiraṇyagarbhasūkta ("Golden Embryo"); X.90, the Puruṣasūkta ("Hymn of the Man"); and I.164, the "Riddle Hymn" of Dīrghatamas. These are sometimes called the "philosophical" or "speculative" hymns of the Ṛgveda, but this is a misleading description, since they are not primarily abstract philosophic reflections on the nature of things. Rather, they are better viewed as forerunners of the Brāhmaṇa and Āraṇyaka texts that interpret the ritual in general, particular rituals, or aspects of the ritual. So, for example, X.90 comments on the sacrifice through the symbol of the "Man," which represents both the world and the sacrifice. X.121 concerns the royal consecration rite, and X.129 sets forth the creative power of knowledge and therefore the power of the poets and priests who possess it. In many of these hymns the meaning of the ritual is expressed in terms of a cosmogony or cosmology. While such hymns share many themes and draw upon common stores of symbols, there is not a single Ṛgvedic cosmogony or a single Ṛgvedic cosmology to which they refer. Rather, they represent imaginable worlds that explain why things are as they are. To force the hymns into the straitjacket of a unitary view of the world underestimates the power and originality of the poets who produced these cosmogonic and cosmological models.

D. THE POET

Who is the poet, and why is he composing poetry? The poets participate in an elaborate patronage system. They are hirelings, but of a very superior sort. As craftsmen of the word, their contribution to the success of the sacrifice that establishes and maintains the mutually beneficial relationship between men and gods is critical, and they serve the patrons, often royal patrons (whatever "royal" meant at this period), who arrange for and underwrite the sacrifice. The poet provides the praise poetry that the patron needs to put the gods in his debt, and he speaks on behalf of his patron, in making specific requests of the gods for goods and services. The poet's reward comes as a second-hand or indirect benefit of the success of his verbal labors: the patron should receive from the gods what he asked for, and he provides some portion of that bounty to the poet in recompense. This payment from his patron is sometimes celebrated by the poet at the end of his hymn, in a genre known as the dānastuti, literally "praise of the gift," in which the largesse of the patron—cows, horses, gold, women—is catalogued and glorified. Or, if it is less than expected or desired, scorned. The tone of the dānastuti is often teasing and jokey, and the language colloquial.

But the making of poetry is not simply a business proposition. Poets take great pride in their work and often reflect on their part in the poetic tradition and also on their ability to use the tools of the tradition in innovative and creative ways. They are self-conscious, naming themselves and addressing themselves, calling attention to their verbal tricks and achievements and their ability to bring fame and material success to their patrons and glory to their gods. Some poets have very distinctive poetic personalities, as we will have occasion to remark throughout the translation.

The R̥gvedic poet's social position and his role in the patronage economy was clearly inherited from Indo-Iranian and Indo-European times, and one of the closest parallels is found in ancient Greek, in the poetry of Pindar (5th century BCE), who was hired to celebrate the victors in the various Greek games and did so in verse as elaborate, finely crafted, and deliberately obscure as that found in the R̥gveda. For further on the Indo-European poet, see Watkins (1995).

E. STRUCTURE OF THE R̥GVEDA

The R̥gveda comprises 1028 *sūkta*s or hymns, which contain a total of slightly more than 10,500 verses and which are divided into ten maṇḍalas, or books, of uneven size. Within each maṇḍala there is a further division of the hymns into *anuvāka*s or "recitations" consisting of several hymns. The number of hymns in an anuvāka varies within a maṇḍala, and the number of anuvākas in each maṇḍala varies from maṇḍala to maṇḍala. As its name suggests, the anuvāka division was created principally to provide convenient units for memorization and recitation. Although this division is occasionally indicated in editions of the R̥gveda, we have not included it in the translation. There is a second division of the R̥gvedic corpus into eight *aṣṭaka*s, but this is a purely mechanical arrangement also created to facilitate memorization. In this latter division each of the eight aṣṭakas has eight *adhyāya*s, each adhyāya has thirty-three *varga*s, and each varga has five verses. Since unlike the division of the text into maṇḍalas, neither of these divisions reflects the contents of the R̥gveda, therefore we will use the division into maṇḍalas exclusively.

Invaluable work on the organization and history of the R̥gveda was done by Bergaigne (1886, 1887) and Oldenberg (1888: 191–270), ably summarized and amplified by Witzel (1995a, 1997). Following their work, the structure of the R̥gveda and the broad outlines of its compositional history are as follows. The core of the R̥gveda and its oldest part are the "Family Books," so called because the hymns in each maṇḍala are attributed to poets belonging to the same family lineage. These comprise Maṇḍalas II–VII. The family lineages are the following:

II Gr̥tsamada
III Viśvāmitra
IV Vāmadeva
V Atri
VI Bharadvāja
VII Vasiṣṭha

Within the R̥gvedic corpus, the six Family Books are generally ordered according to the increasing number of hymns in each successive maṇḍala. So Maṇḍala II contains the fewest number of hymns and VII the greatest. Within each Family Book the hymns are ordered first by deity. Thus the hymns to Agni come first, followed by those to Indra. After these collections are the hymns to other deities, generally arranged by the decreasing number of hymns to each deity within the maṇḍala. Within each deity collection the hymns are arranged by their length, beginning with the longest hymns. If two hymns are of equal length, they are ordered according to meter, with the hymns in longer meters placed before those in shorter meters.

The arrangement of the Family Books and their hymns, therefore, functions like an index. If you know the poet (and therefore the family of the poet), the deity to whom the hymn is addressed, the number of verses in the hymn, and the meter, then, in principle at least, you can locate the hymn within the collection. Perhaps for that reason, the oral recitation of a R̥gvedic hymn is traditionally preceded by the identification of the poet, deity, and meter. It is this kind of information that is provided by the anukramaṇīs or indices to the R̥gveda. Because the anukramaṇīs come from a later period, there has been some question about the value of their information for the R̥gvedic period. Some of the identifications of poets, in book X in particular, are derived from the content of the hymns and can be rather wonderfully fantastic. In that book, for example, there are hymns attributed to serpents (X.76 and 94), to the "Golden Embryo," Hiraṇyagarbha (X.121), to the god Indra (X.48–50), and to Yama (X.14) and Yamī (X.154), the first humans. Such identifications are not exclusive to book X. Among the possible composers of VIII.67 are listed Matsya Sāmmada, king of the sea creatures, and fish that have been caught in a net. Also, in the ākhyāna hymns and any other hymn in which the verses are supposed to be spoken by a god or a legendary being, the anukramaṇīs ascribe authorship to that god or being. Thus, the composition of the dialogue among the monkey Vr̥ṣākapi, the god Indra, and his wife Indrāṇī (X.86) is attributed to the three of them.

However, these creative identifications are much more the exception than the rule. Even though the anukramaṇīs were composed and redacted long after the R̥gvedic period, they are an invaluable resource, for, by and large, their identifications of the poets of hymns are plausible. The collections they mark by assigning groups of hymns to certain poets or poetic circles correspond to the organization of the R̥gveda and to verbal, metrical, and thematic connections among these hymns. The great majority of the roughly five hundred poets named in the anukramaṇīs also appear in Pravara lists of brahmin ancestors (Mahadevan forthcoming), which supports the plausibility of the anukramaṇī identifications. Therefore, the traditions transmitted in the anukramaṇīs can be a helpful guide in understanding relationships among hymns, in identifying collections of hymns, and in determining the relative ages of hymns.

Generally younger than the Family Books, Maṇḍala VIII largely comprises the hymns of two poetic traditions: that of the Kāṇvas (in 1–48 and 60–66) and that of the Āṅgirases (in 67–103). The hymns of the Āṅgirasa group are probably somewhat younger than those of the Kāṇva group. However, not all the hymns in either of these two groups are from Kāṇva or Āṅgirasa poets. Rather, both collections include hymns by poets who belong to other families and are known in other maṇḍalas. These hymns were probably added to book VIII because they were composed in forms and meters characteristic of the hymns of VIII. Both the Kāṇva and the Āṅgirasa collections in VIII consist of a large number of hymns whose verses are arranged in *pragātha*s or *tr̥ca*s, that is, in sequences of units (strophes) consisting of two or three verses. There are pragāthas and tr̥cas outside of VIII and non-strophic hymns in VIII, but because of the predominance of these structures in that book, pragātha and tr̥ca poetry of various poets was relocated into VIII. The significance of this collection is not entirely clear, although the marked forms of the hymns suggest that they or the priests who produced them may have had a distinct ritual function, and it is noteworthy that a large proportion of the R̥gvedic material borrowed into the Sāmaveda comes from VIII. It may be that the priests who created Maṇḍala VIII were, like the Sāmavedic priests, those who chanted R̥gvedic verses. The arrangement of hymns in VIII generally follows that of the Family Books: they are first organized by poet or poetic circle and then by deity. But the organization of the book is less transparent than that of the Family Books.

Maṇḍala I also consists of two collections. One, I.51–191, probably dates from around the time of the Kāṇva hymns of VIII, and the other, I.1–50, is slightly later than the Āṅgirasa hymns of VIII. The collection of I.51–191 consists of the hymns of nine groups of poets, organized according to the same principles as the Family Books. The collection of I.1–50 consists of hymns in six groups, each attributed to a single poet. Within each of these six groups, the hymns are collected by deity, but the six differ in their arrangement of the hymns within the deity collections. The groups of I.1–50 are also distinguished by the prevalence of hymns in gāyatrī meter and in pragāthas, like the hymns of VIII, while the hymns of I.51–191 are primarily in triṣṭubh and jagatī meter.

Maṇḍala IX is unusual, because it is a liturgical collection of hymns to Soma Pavamāna, the soma "purifying itself" as it runs across or through the sheep's wool filter. It includes hymns by poets already known from the Family Books as well as by later poets. The collection is dominated especially by poets from books I, V, and VIII. It was therefore created after the Family Books and contains hymns from various periods. Like the Family Books, it is arranged in groups according to meter and then within each metrical grouping, according to decreasing number of verses.

Maṇḍala X is a collection of hymns that belong to the youngest strata of the R̥gveda and forms a kind of appendix to the text. However, it shows organizational principles comparable to those we have seen in the other books. It consists of collections of hymns by individual poets, which are ordered according to the decreasing number of hymns in each collection or, when collections contain an equal number of hymns, according to the number of verses in the first hymn of the collection. By roughly the second half of X, the collections are reduced to single hymns by individual poets. Finally, there is a short and late supplement to the R̥gvedic collection, the Vālakhilya hymns, which are collected in VIII.49–59.

While this is the general organization of the text, there are many exceptions to these ordering principles. So, for example, we remarked above that the Family Books, II–VII, are ordered from the shortest to the longest. While this is generally true, it is not completely the case. Consider the list of the Family Books and the total number of hymns in each:

II	43 hymns
III	62 hymns
IV	58 hymns
V	87 hymns
VI	75 hymns
VII	104 hymns

Although we would have expected the sequence of maṇḍalas to show a steadily increasing number of hymns, instead book IV has fewer hymns than III and book VI fewer than V. In a similar fashion, hymns can appear out of order within the various groupings that make up both the Family Books and the other books of the R̥gveda. Such discrepancies have arisen through insertions of hymns and redactional combinations and divisions of hymns. These alterations occurred after the initial collection of the R̥gveda, when the order of books and hymns was established, and by the time or at the time of Śākalya's final redaction of the text around the middle of first millennium BCE. Attention to these discrepancies can be an effective tool in reconstructing the compositional history of individual hymns and of groupings of hymns, since they allow us to see where an alteration has occurred. Oldenberg (1888: 193–94) provides the following example. In a series of single hymns with decreasing numbers of verses, V.83 is a hymn to Parjanya of ten verses and V.85 is a hymn to Varuṇa of eight verses. Between the two is V.84, a hymn to Earth of three verses. Clearly the hymn to Earth is out of sequence and was likely inserted between the hymns to Parjanya and to Varuṇa. While the fact of its insertion is obvious, there are several possible explanations for how and why this occurred. For example, V.84 could be a later composition that was later added to the R̥gveda, or it could have been composed earlier but have been moved to its current place within the collection. In either case, this little hymn is actually a riddle depicting Earth during a violent storm and must have been felt as an appropriate pendant to the Parjanya hymn (see Jamison 2013).

II. History of the R̥gvedic Text

A. LANGUAGE AND COMPOSITIONAL TECHNIQUE

The R̥gveda was composed in an archaic form of Sanskrit that is richer in forms and less grammatically fixed than Classical Sanskrit, but essentially identical in structure. For further discussion of the language, see section VII below. The text was composed entirely orally and transmitted entirely orally for a very long time, probably several millennia. But it was a type of oral composition very different from what that designation now generally brings to mind in scholarly, especially Homeric, circles. It was not an anonymous floating body of infinitely variable verbal material (re-)composed anew at every performance, generated in great part from fixed formulae that formed the poet's repertoire. In contrast to the vast sprawl of epic, on which the usual model of oral-formulaic composition was formed and tested, R̥gvedic oral composition was small-scale and verbally complex. Though orally composed and making use of traditional verbal material, each hymn was composed by a particular poet, who fixed the hymn at the time of composition and who "owned" it, and it was transmitted in this fixed form thereafter.

R̥gvedic verbal formulae work very differently from those in epic composition. Rather than deploying fairly sizable, metrically defined, and invariant pieces—ready-made surface structures, in the felicitous phrase of Paul Kiparsky (1976: 83)—our poets seem to operate with deep-structure formulae. Invariant repetition is fairly rare, and when it occurs, the repeated formulae tend to be short, generally shorter than the pāda (= verse line) and not necessarily metrically fixed. But the poets often assume knowledge of an underlying formula, which seldom or never surfaces as such, but which they ring changes on—by lexical or grammatical substitution, scrambling, semantic reversal, and the like, confounding the expectations of their audience while drawing upon their shared knowledge of the underlying verbal expression. These deep-structure formulae tend to be shared across bardic families, and we can in fact sometimes identify cognate formulae in other Indo-European poetic traditions, especially in the Old Avestan Gāthās.

B. PRESERVATION AND TRANSMISSION

The structure of the R̥gveda points to several stages in the creation of the R̥gvedic text as we now have it. Collections of hymns were first made by the families of poets who produced them, and these early collections defined the various poetic traditions and helped train new poets within those traditions. At some point a unified consolidation was made of six family traditions, which formed the original collection of the Family Books, II–VII. As discussed above, the books were arranged from shortest to longest and the hymns of each book were organized according to the same principles. Then, probably at several intervals, the hymns of books I and VIII (except for the Vālakhilya hymns) were added, and book IX was assembled from hymns composed by poets of the other books of the R̥gveda and from hymns of younger poets. The last major additions to the collection were the hymns of book X.

We do not know the precise mechanism for the formation of the R̥gvedic collection or the circumstances that brought it about. There must have been some centralized authority or agency that could consolidate the different family traditions and impose a single set of organizational principles on their collections. Michael Witzel (cf. 1995a, 1995b, 1997, 2003) has suggested that this authority was first the Bharata tribe, as it attained hegemony over the other Vedic tribes during the R̥gvedic period, and then later the Kuru state, which arose around 1000 BCE. In his view, the initial collection and organization of the Family Books, the Kāṇva hymns of VIII, and the nine collections of I.51–191 occurred under the Bharatas, and the complete collection of the R̥gveda under the Kurus. These consolidations of the religious traditions supported the political consolidations of the Bharatas and of the Kurus and reinforced their rule by means of a unified religious practice approximating a state religion. The Kuru period saw the creation not only of the complete R̥gveda but also of the other *saṃhitā*s, and the fixation and canonization of Vedic sacrifices. The Vedic rites created at this time were composites, fashioned from different family traditions. They included extended recitations constituted of verses extracted from various parts of the R̥gveda and thus from various family traditions. The purpose of such composite rites was to create a ritual system that represented the unity of the Vedic tradition. This process is already apparent in late hymns of the R̥gveda itself (cf. Proferes 2003a). For example, R̥V IX.67 is a hymn to "self-purifying" soma. Rather than being the product of a particular poet or even a particular family of poets, it includes verses from poets representing the principal brahmin lineages. It reflects an attempt to create an "ecumenical" liturgy, as Proferes (2003a: 8) calls it, one in which all the major poetic traditions had a place.

The creation of the R̥gvedic Saṃhitā reflected a significant ritual change, since it marked an emphasis on liturgical appropriation and repetition of earlier material rather than, as in the R̥gvedic period itself, on the creation of new hymns. However, the tradition of R̥gvedic composition did not simply come to a halt at the close of the R̥gvedic period. The R̥gveda Khila (Scheftelowitz 1906) is a collection of hymns that do not form part of the Śākalya recension. Some of these hymns may go back to the R̥gvedic period, but most were likely composed in the following period, during which the hymns, chants, and recitations of the Atharvaveda, the Sāmaveda, and the Yajurveda were composed or assembled. The Atharvaveda itself also represents the extension of hymnic composition into a wider variety of ritual contexts, a process already visible in R̥gveda book X. Beyond the Veda, elements and techniques typical of R̥gvedic composition appear in later *praśasti*s, epic poetry, and even in kāvya (see Jamison 2007: chap. 4).

The R̥gveda did not remain unchanged after its collection. As described above, the collection of hymns was arranged according to definable principles, but the text of the R̥gveda we have does not always follow these principles. Most of the changes were made at an early period since they are reflected in all the versions of the R̥gveda that we have or that are described in later literature. These versions were the product of Vedic schools or *śākhā*s, which became the institutions through which the R̥gveda collection was preserved and transmitted.

The R̥gveda translated here is the R̥gveda of the Śākala school, established by Śākalya, a teacher of the late Vedic period. There were other schools that produced other recensions of the R̥gveda, although most of these other recensions are now lost. The Caraṇavyūha, a Yajurvedic Pariśiṣṭa, lists five R̥gvedic schools: Śākala, Bāṣkala, Āśvalāyana, Śāṅkhāyana, and Māṇḍūkāyana. Other sources give larger numbers of R̥gvedic schools. There are seven according to the Atharvaveda Pariśiṣṭa, and twenty-one according to Patañjali (ca. 150 BCE), although the last number reflects not the number of versions of the R̥gveda, but rather of schools that studied the R̥gveda. Of the five recensions mentioned in the Caraṇavyūha, the oldest may be the Māṇḍūkāyana, although little is known about it. The Bāṣkala school may have survived into the sixteenth century (Chaubey 2009: vii), and perhaps the Bāṣkala R̥gveda still exists somewhere in manuscript. But even without a manuscript, much is known about it from other texts. It probably dates to around the time of the Śākala recension and was close to the Śākala recension in substance. According to the Anuvākānukramaṇī, the Bāṣkala R̥gveda included the first seven hymns of the Vālakhilya, but rejected the other four, and after R̥V X.191, the last hymn in the Śākala recension, it had a second saṃjñāna hymn, or hymn of "agreement," consisting of fifteen verses. It also rearranged Maṇḍala I, so that the Kutsa collection (I.94–115) followed the Parucchepa collection (I.127–139). This rearrangement conforms better to the expected order of the collections that constitute Maṇḍala I and therefore may represent either an older tradition than that of the Śākala recension or a later correction made according to perceived principles. The Āśvalāyana R̥gveda has recently been published (Chaubey 2009). It was based on the Śākala recension, but includes an additional 212 verses, all of which are later than the rest of the R̥gveda. The Śāṅkhāyana R̥gveda was very similar to the Āśvalāyana R̥gveda. A sixth R̥gvedic school was the Śaiśirīya school, mentioned in the R̥gveda Prātiśākhya. Its recension again closely resembled the Śākala recension and indeed the Śaiśirīya school might have derived from the Śākala school or have been merged with it (cf. Bronkhorst 1982/83). It again contained a few more verses than does the Śākala recension. In short, the differences among the reported and attested recensions of the R̥gveda are very minor, consisting of variant ordering of some existing materials and the inclusion or not of a relatively few late verses. There seems no need to mourn the loss of these recensions.

These schools produced a saṃhitā text, that is, a continuous text of the R̥gveda that includes the phonological alterations that occur between words—a phenomenon characteristic of the Sanskrit language in general known as sandhi or "putting together." It is this basic form of the hymns that would have been recited in their ritual contexts. But in order to secure the text, these schools also produced other forms of the R̥gveda that supported its memorization. According to Patañjali, Śākalya not only created a recension of the saṃhitā text, but also a padapāṭha text. This latter text provides a grammatical analysis of the words of the R̥gveda by restoring the forms of the words before the application of the sandhi rules when the words are strung together. It shows the schools' interest not only in preserving and transmitting the R̥gveda, but also in understanding the text they transmitted.

This history gives us reason to be confident that the Śākala R̥gveda is close to the R̥gveda that was created at the beginning of the first millennium, even though the Śākala recension probably dates to some five hundred years later. We also have evidence for minor changes in the Śākala text itself. In the Śākala Padapāṭha, there is no analysis for six verses in the Saṃhitā: VII.59.12, X.20.1, 121.10, 190.1–3. They are probably missing from Padapāṭha analysis because they were not part of the text of the Ṛgveda at the time of the creation of the Padapāṭha, but were added to the Śākala text at a later period. Note again that these adjustments primarily occur in book X, the latest part of the Ṛgveda and apparently its most fluid.

When we say that the Śākala Ṛgveda is substantially the text created at the beginning of the first millennium BCE, we need to acknowledge one significant area in which the Ṛgveda recensions show demonstrable change since the collection of the Ṛgveda. This is in the phonetics of the text. The recitation of the Ṛgveda in different regions and times apparently reflected the different contemporary dialects and conventions of recitation in those regions and times. Such change is apparent in the Śākala recension in its handling of the phonological alterations that take place between words. The Śākala school imposed a further set of euphonic or sandhi rules on the text that developed during the centuries between the composition of the text and the Śākala recension. The result is that the saṃhitā text does not always reflect the metrical structure of the verses. In most cases, the changes are sufficiently regular that it is not difficult to restore the text to its metrical shape. For example, in the saṃhitā text the last verse of the first hymn of the Ṛgveda reads: I.1.9 sá naḥ pitéva sūnávé, 'gne sūpāyanó bhava / sácasvā naḥ svastáye. This hymn is composed in gāyatrī meter, so it ought to have eight syllables in each pāda. But the elision at the beginning of pāda b gives a line of seven syllables, and pāda c also apparently has seven syllables. Originally, the verse must have been recited without the elision in b: sá naḥ pitéva sūnáve, ágne sūpāyanó bhava. And in pāda c svastáye must have been recited quadrasyllabically su(v)astáye. While it is usually not difficult to restore the meter, that work has been done for us in the edition of the Ṛgveda by Barend A. van Nooten and Gary B. Holland (1994), which gives the metrically restored text of the Śākala recension.

These kinds of phonetic and euphonic changes were natural in the oral transmission of the text, more natural than the rigid oral preservation of the text after the Vedic period. Because such changes are natural, they were likely not deliberate alterations. More importantly, the reciters of the Ṛgveda did not deliberately change and, for the most part, did not change at all the order of the books of the Ṛgveda, the order of verses within hymns, the words of the hymns, or their grammar. There were a few—but relatively few—changes to the order of hymns, such as that reflected in the difference between the Bāṣkala and Śākala recensions in the order of Maṇḍala I. This early "freezing" of the text is very important and one of the characteristics that makes the Ṛgveda so valuable for understanding the linguistic, religious, and literary history of South Asia. The Ṛgvedic tradition has preserved a very ancient literature with extraordinary fidelity, with no grammatical or lexical modernization or adjustment of contents to later conceptual conditions. It could have been otherwise. In R̥gvedic hymns that also appear in the Atharvaveda, the latter text not uncommonly shows a different verse order, and in both Atharvavedic and Sāmavedic versions of R̥gvedic hymns there can be differences in wording and in grammatical forms. In these cases, with few if any exceptions, the R̥gvedic version of the hymn is the older, and the versions of the other Vedas are modifications.

Up to the creation of the recensions of the R̥gveda and long afterward, the transmission of the R̥gveda was oral. At some point, however, the R̥gvedic schools did produce manuscripts of the text. It is difficult to say when this occurred, but the transmission of the text likely remained exclusively oral at least until around 1000 CE. The oldest manuscript in the collection of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute collection dates only to 1464; the Sampurnanand Sanskrit University in Varanasi has an older R̥gveda manuscript from the fourteenth century—thus a gap of considerably over two millennia between the fixation of the text and our earliest written evidence for it. Even when these activities did begin to occur, copying and preserving manuscripts never displaced memorization of the text as the primary means of transmission of the R̥gveda until quite modern times.

C. INDIGENOUS COMMENTARIAL TRADITION

With regard to indigenous commentary, the situation of the R̥gveda differs markedly from that of standard Classical Sanskrit texts, in that there is no unbroken commentarial tradition that might preserve the understanding of the text by the authors and audience at the time of composition. Although we find implicit commentary on some parts of the R̥gveda already in later Vedic texts, it is clear that in many case this "commentary" is based more on adaptation, speculation, or fancy than on a direct transmission of the purport of the text, as when the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa (XI.5.1) sketches a narrative background for the Purūravas and Urvaśī dialogue (R̥V X.95) that distorts or misunderstands crucial portions of the hymn.

The first complete de facto commentary on the R̥gveda, dating probably from the late Vedic period, is Śākalya's Padapāṭha mentioned above, which simply consists of an effectively linguistic analysis of the continuous text (the Saṃhitāpāṭha) of the R̥gveda into individual words (*pada*s). Because of sandhi, an important and pervasive feature of the Sanskrit language whereby all words undergo significant phonological adjustment to adjacent words in context, the phonological restoration of the underlying pausal forms of words from the continuous reading is no mere mechanical operation, but presupposes a grammatical and semantic analysis of the text.

The Nighaṇṭu is a collection of difficult Vedic words probably made likewise in the late Vedic period. The Nighaṇṭu and the commentary upon this collection by Yāska in his Nirukta provide early lexical and etymological approaches to the R̥gveda, though understanding "etymology" in a synchronic, rather than our current diachronic sense.

Various indexes or anukramaṇīs to the Ṛgveda, also mentioned above, were compiled probably around the middle of the first millennium BCE, attributed to Śaunaka; these were not fully preserved. A comprehensive index, the Sarvānukramaṇī, attributed to Kātyāyana and dating perhaps to the mid-fourth century BCE but drawing on the earlier indexes, provides, for each hymn, the poet, the god(s) to which it is addressed, and the meter(s) in which it is composed. The Bṛhaddevatā, also attributed to Śaunaka, is in essence also an anukramaṇī, specifically an index to the deities of each hymn, but in expanded form, with a number of interesting narratives and legends interspersed in the dry sequential listing of hymns and their divinities.

None of these ancient tools and treatments remotely approaches the standard type of commentary familiar for later Sanskrit texts. For this the Ṛgveda had to wait until the medieval period. The most influential and lasting commentary on the text was made by Sāyaṇa in the fourteenth century CE in South India, although there were a number of pre-Sāyaṇa commentators, some of whose work survives in part. Sāyaṇa's work essentially superseded these earlier works, and remains enormously important in both indigenous and Western interpretations of the text: Max Müller's edition of the Ṛgveda includes Sāyaṇa's commentary, and Geldner's translation, for example, owes much to Sāyaṇa. It should be remembered, however, that Sāyaṇa is temporally closer to our own age than to that of the Ṛgveda, and he was writing in a very different geographical, political, and religious landscape from that of the Ṛgveda. It is therefore more useful to read Sāyaṇa not as a direct conduit of the "true meaning" of the Ṛgveda but as a scholar grappling with the same problems as modern interpreters, and bringing to bear all the intelligence and knowledge he can muster, just as we do.

D. WESTERN SCHOLARSHIP ON THE ṚGVEDA AND MAJOR RESOURCES

Because the transmission of the Ṛgveda has preserved the text remarkably well, we have a trustworthy and uniform text of the Ṛgveda. The published editions of the Ṛgveda differ in their presentation of the text, not in the text itself. The landmark edition of the Ṛgveda was that of Max Müller (1849–74), who published both the Saṃhitā and Padapāṭha text in devanāgarī script, together with Sāyaṇa's commentary. Before the completion of Müller's Ṛgveda, in 1861–63 Theodor Aufrecht published the text in Roman transliteration, together with selected Padapāṭha analyses. A second edition, the standard edition of Aufrecht's Ṛgveda, appeared in 1877. The Ṛgveda and Sāyaṇa's commentary were published again under the editorship of N. S. Sontakke (1933–51), together with the Padapāṭha. Also noteworthy is the aforementioned publication of the metrically restored version of the Ṛgveda text by Barend A. van Nooten and Gary B. Holland (1994).

The uniformity and reliability of the text of the Ṛgveda cannot be said of its translations, which vary considerably. The standard scholarly translation remains that of Karl Friedrich Geldner into German. This translation was published in full in 1951, but was complete in the 1920s and partially published in limited fashion then. Although it remains a remarkable philological accomplishment, whose worth we two translators have appreciated more and more over the years, it of course could not take account of the advances in Vedic scholarship over the last eighty years or so. Louis Renou (1955–69) was able to finish most of a French translation of the Ṛgveda, in a series of thematic publications, under the general title Études védiques et pāṇinéennes, organized by the divinity addressed rather than the order of the Ṛgvedic text. But he left undone substantial parts, notably the Indra and Aśvin hymns, and the later publications are rather sketchy. T. Ya. Elizarenkova (1989–99) completed a Russian translation of the text. Currently in preparation is a new German translation of the Ṛgveda under the direction of Michael Witzel and Toshifumi Gotō. The first volume of the Witzel-Gotō translation (2007), which covers Maṇḍalas I and II, has appeared, with the second volume scheduled for 2013.

Unfortunately, English has not been as well served as these other languages. Aside from anthologies, the English version that is in general use is R. T. H. Griffith's translation, which was first published in four volumes between 1889 and 1892, then in a revised edition in 1896, and then yet again in another revised edition, this time by J. L. Shastri, in 1973. Griffith's translation has been reprinted several times since 1973 and is available online (http://www.sacred- texts.com/hin/rigveda/index.htm). Sadly, this translation really does not deserve as many rebirths as it has had. Its philology was already dated when it was published, and the English style of the translation is cloying and almost unreadable. Now, well over a century later, it should have long since been superseded. There was at least one serious effort to do so. From the late 1940s until the early 1960s, H. D. Velankar steadily published English translations of the Ṛgveda, which were a decided improvement over Griffith's work (for a list of his translations, see the Bibliography). These were published as independent volumes dedicated to books II, V, VII, and VIII of the Ṛgveda and as collections of hymns to different deities published in the Journal of the University of Bombay. Partly because these translations are scattered, incomplete, and difficult of access, they have received less attention than they might otherwise have done. In addition to these complete or extensive translations of the Ṛgveda, several anthologies of Ṛgvedic hymns have appeared. In English, the most notable are those of Wendy Doniger O'Flaherty (1981) and Walter H. Maurer (1986). The principal problem with any such anthology is that translators understandably choose hymns that they think will be especially interesting for their readers and accessible to them. As a result, they tend to create a distorted view of the Ṛgveda that does not reflect the liturgical functions and scope of the text.

Both the partial and the complete translations just mentioned were fundamental for the present translation. In our introductions to individual hymns, we will often make reference to them, especially when they suggest interpretations of the text we deem particularly worthy of note. Rather than giving a fuller bibliographic reference, we will refer to them only by the last names of the translators. The exceptions are Renou's translations, for which we will give the relevant volume and page of his Études védiques et pāṇinéenes, and Velankar's translations, where again we will cite the specific source.

In addition to these translations, there are a number of other essential resources for translating and interpreting the R̥gveda. Among the older works of particular significance are the Wörterbuch of Hermann Grassmann (1872–75), whose presentation of the lexicon of the R̥gveda is somewhat antique but still very useful. Grassmann's work has now been complemented and in some respects superseded by Alexander Lubotsky's concordance to the R̥gveda (1997), which provides the verse-line context for R̥gvedic words. Among older works of significance, of particular note is Hermann Oldenberg's Noten (1909, 1912) on the complete text of the R̥gveda, whose insights remain remarkable even a century after they were published. Maurice Bloomfield's Rig-veda Repetitions (1916) is an invaluable resource for the study of R̥gvedic formulaic language and its variations, though it predates the discovery of oral-formulaic composition.

In the last fifty years or so, R̥gvedic scholarship has blossomed with studies that have significantly advanced our understanding of the language of the R̥gveda—its lexicon, morphology, and syntax—of its compositional techniques, and of its conceptual universe and ritual procedures and context. We cannot offer even a partial list of such books, let alone articles, since we would omit too many. We will mention only a few, those which were especially close at hand as we worked through the text and whose insights we have often adopted. Particularly important was Manfred Mayrhofer's etymological dictionary of Old Indo-Aryan (EWA 1986–2001) and his previous version (KEWA 1951–76), not completely superseded by the newer one. Other works include Salvatore Scarlata's study of nominal compounds ending in roots (1999) and Jared S. Klein's studies of Vedic particles and discourse structure (1985). One of the subjects in which there has been substantial progress just in the last decades has been the Vedic verbal system. The flood of monographs on the verbal system probably began with Johanna Narten's work on the s-aorist (1964), followed closely by Karl Hoffmann's influential study of the injunctive (1967). Other verbal subsystems treated more recently include the -áya-stems (Jamison 1983), the first-class presents (Gotō 1987), the intensive (Schaefer 1994), the perfect (Kümmel 2000), the desiderative (Heenen 2006), and the ya-presents (Kulikov 2012). All of these works, as well as many other and many shorter studies, have been of critical importance as we have worked our way through the text.

Finally, we wish to note one last development not just in R̥gvedic but in Sanskrit scholarship more generally. Among older scholars there was a tendency to deal with difficulties in a text by emending it. By the beginning of the twentieth century, however, scholars increasingly recognized that they could gain a much better understanding of the text by accepting the text as transmitted. This process is visible in Oldenberg's scholarship. Before the Noten, Oldenberg published translations of the Agni hymns of the first five books of the R̥gveda (1897). There he was willing to suggest text emendations to smooth rough spots in the hymns. By the time of the Noten, however, he had become much more apt to accept the text as it stands and to explore ways of accounting for that transmitted text. We too are committed to accepting the traditional text and more importantly to allowing the poetry of the R̥gveda to remain complex, elusive, jagged, unsettled, and even unsettling.

III. Power of the Word

A. WORDS, TRUTH, AND KNOWLEDGE

One reason for the intricacy of R̥gvedic poetry and the careful thought that the R̥gvedic poets put into it is the importance that Vedic culture attached to the spoken word and to the truth that it embodied. The elegantly formulated truth, spoken in a ritual context, was powerful. The word for "truth" is r̥tá, a crucially resonant word that, with some reason, some other translators have rendered "order" or "cosmic order." The term r̥tá essentially defines what a being or object is and what it does, and it structures the relationships of beings and objects with other beings and objects. By speaking these truths of essence and relationship, the poets could make the truths real and actual in the present. So, for example, the great Indra hymn, I.32, begins, "Now I shall proclaim the heroic deeds of Indra, those foremost deeds, which the mace-wielder performed. . . ." Why does the poet proclaim these deeds? It is not simply to honor the god, although his proclamation surely does do that. It is also to state the truth of these heroic deeds, so that these deeds will become real once again. As Indra once before smashed Vr̥tra, who was the symbol and epitome of all obstacles, so once again he will smash obstacles. Formulating the "truth" of Indra is part of what makes Indra real and present. Similarly, the story of Indra and the Vala cave is essentially a story of the power of the truth. According to this myth, Indra and the Aṅgirases opened the Vala cave and released the cattle and the dawns by the songs they recited. These songs were powerful because they contained the truth that the cattle were the dawns, and therefore, by singing this truth Indra and the Aṅgirases obtained both cattle and dawns. In X.108 the poet narrates part of the story of Indra and Vala and then states his expectation that the truth of his song, which is the truth of the Vala story, will bring cattle back to him: "Exchanging with the truth, let the cows come up, which Br̥haspati [=Indra] found hidden. . . ." Or again, in IX.113.2 the poet declares the soma is pressed "with real words of truth, with trust, and with fervor." That is to say, it is not just the physical pressing of the soma plant that produces soma juice. Soma is also created by the intensity of the priests, by their confidence in the effectiveness of their actions, and by the truth they speak about the soma and about the power of the soma to strengthen the gods and to give life to mortals. Words, commitment, and ritual all combine to make the soma real.

The product of the formulating of a truth, the verbal formulation itself, is the bráhman, and the poet who formulates truth is the brahmán. While the later ritual tradition will rely on ancient formulations of the truth passed down from the early

Vedic period, the contemporary religious system of the Ṛgveda required ever-new formulations of the truth. These new formulations would attract the gods and make them present at the ritual, and these new formulations would make the truth they expressed newly real. For this reason the work of the poet was essential, for only poets could continue to produce these new formulations. The poet needed to be a master of many skills, but of all the skills he needed, the one that was most essential was knowledge. The truths that the poets formulated were often hidden truths, founded on enigma and paradox. One such kind of truth was homological truth that connected objects across spheres, which will be discussed in the next section.

The importance of knowledge for the Vedic poets is underscored by the variety of words for the poets' thinking and its articulation in the hymns. The poets speak of their dhī́ or dhītí "insight" or "vision," matí or mánman "thought," and manīṣā́ "inspired thinking." The hymn and the understanding that gives rise to it are so closely related that the boundary between them becomes permeable, and the poets use words for thinking and knowing for the hymns themselves. In I.2.7, for example, the poet calls on Mitra and Varuṇa "who bring success to our ghee-covered insight (dhíyaṃ ghṛtā́cīm)," that is, to the hymn that is accompanied by offerings of ghee, or again, in VI.8.1 the poet offers Agni Vaiśvānara a "newer thought" (matír návyasī), which purifies itself (pavate) in the poet's mind and emerges in his speech.

B. HOMOLOGY

The Vedic mental universe is structured, in great part, by a web of identifications or equivalences among elements in the ritual realm, in the cosmic realm, and in the realm of the everyday. These homologies play an enormous role in the thought of the Brāhmaṇas and Upaniṣads, where knowing the hidden connections between apparently disparate elements, particularly the equivalences between cosmic and ritual elements, gives the knower some power to control the cosmic by manipulation of the ritual. In these later Vedic texts, such types of equivalences have a technical name—bandhu "bond, connection" (a word of course cognate with English "bind," etc.)—and the difference between the cosmic and the mundane system of equations is pervasive enough to be distinguished by technical terms: the cosmic level is called adhidaivam or adhidevatam, roughly "concerned with the divine," while the mundane is called adhyātmam, roughly "concerned with the person(al)." These two systems meet in and focus on the sacrifice, a controlled and orderly sphere of human activity, as a way of modeling the complex web of relationships that obtain in the two other realms, which are not under human control. The level of the sacrifice is called adhiyajñam "relating to the sacrifice."

Although the correspondences are not as systematically worked out and presented in the Ṛgveda as in those later texts, this way of thinking is just as pervasive in that text, though backgrounded: the poets assume that they share with their audience a web of associations, and this shared knowledge allows the poet to substitute one element for another without overt signaling. Thus, for example, the first rays of light at dawn are homologized to cows, as in the Vala myth discussed above, and therefore the goddess Dawn is called "the mother of cows" and images of ruddy cows overrun the hymns to Dawn. Cows also have a ritual association: milk is mixed with the soma juice after it is pressed, and so the soma hymns are filled with depictions of the soma (as bull) running toward or mixing with "the cows," that is, the milk. And cows are also homologized to waters, particularly the waters confined by Vr̥tra and released by Indra's killing of that demon.

Modern readers of the R̥gveda must try to internalize the many associations and identifications that formed the unconscious mental universe of the contemporary audience; otherwise almost every hymn in many of its parts will seem unintelligible or nonsensical. Other important homologies include that between the sun and the fire, especially the ritual fire, and, in general, the many associations between the various parts and procedures of the ritual and both cosmic and everyday elements. For example, the ritual itself, or the praise hymn specifically, is often identified with a chariot, and the crafting of poetry is homologized to chariot-making. Soma is often identified with a bull, but often otherwise with a horse, and the ritual preparation of the soma is equated with the grooming of this horse. Or he is a bird settling into his nest or a king embarking on conquest. The ritual ground itself is often identified with the cosmos, with the ritual fire a pillar connecting heaven and earth and any movement on the ritual ground implicitly compared to a vast journey across or around the cosmos. It is not possible here to list anything approaching all the important connections that underlie R̥gvedic poetry, though we will try to sketch many such associations in particular circumstances. But the reader must be alert to, and open to, this overall substitution principle, and also recognize that these homologies are not mere poetic embellishments, imagery for its own sake, but an implicit statement about the way things really are, the pervasive underlying connections unifying apparently disparate elements.

It is one of the poet's main jobs to find and articulate these hidden connections, and the theme of "secret names" and their discovery is an important one in the R̥gveda. Indeed, one of the great deeds attributed to Indra (as Br̥haspati) and to the poet-singers, the Aṅgirases, divine counterparts of the human poet—the splitting of the Vala cave and the release of the cows imprisoned therein—turns in some versions on discovering the cows' hidden names (e.g., IV.1.16, X.68.7). The training of a poet clearly involved both producing and solving quite recherché associations, and the genre of riddle displays these skills to great advantage.

C. THE WORDSMITHS

A number of different words are used to identify the workers in words, for which we use the cover term "poet." These different terms often in fact have the same referent, sometimes in the very same passage, but emphasize different aspects of verbal craftsmanship. The most important terms are brahmán, kaví, ŕ̥ṣi, and vípra. Although it is not always possible to draw fine distinctions among these words, and there remains considerable disagreement about their application (we two translators, for example, are not entirely agreed on the function of the kaví), the words do point to different types of relationships between the poet and his product and its source. As noted above, the brahmán is the "formulator," who discerns and puts into words the hidden truths that undergird reality. His product is a bráhman, a "sacred formulation." The term ŕ̥ṣi, generally rendered here as "seer," is especially applied to the famous seers of the past, single or as a group, and to current poets who consciously aspire to the status of their predecessors, and like other words for verbal craftsmen, it is also regularly used of gods, especially Agni and Soma. The vípra, a derivative of the root √vip "tremble," appears to be an "inspired poet" and contrasts with the kaví, the poet par excellence, but also the "sage poet," endowed with the knowledge embodied in poetic skill (kā́vya). The original sense of the word kaví and the function of the person so named is disputed; it has well-attested Iranian cognates, starting with Avestan kauui, whose sense diverges from its Vedic correspondent. We two translators have discussed these issues in separate treatments (Brereton 2004; Jamison 2007: chap. 4).

There are a few less well-attested terms, such as kārú here rendered "bard" or "praise-poet," the transparent agent noun stotár "praiser," as well as designations that seem more related to performance, such as jaritár "singer," vāghát "cantor" or "chanter," rebhá "husky-/raspy-voiced (singer)."

IV. Ritual

There have been a variety of approaches to the R̥gveda, by both ancient and modern scholars. Following the lead of the Br̥haddevatā, some interpreters have been concerned primarily with the myths and legends of the R̥gveda. Others have sought to understand the deities of the R̥gveda by exploring the meaning and derivation of their names. And as early as the later Vedic period, still others understood the R̥gvedic deities as the powers of the natural world or as symbols of microcosmic processes. But the R̥gveda is first of all a liturgical text. The great majority of its hymns were composed for rituals and, more specifically, for the soma rituals of their period. After the collection of the R̥gveda, its verses were adapted to the recitations and chants of the classical soma ritual and employed in a variety of other ritual contexts. Understanding the R̥gveda, therefore, first requires understanding the Vedic rituals and, above all, the soma ritual.

A. MODEL OF THE RITUAL

The ritual as depicted both in the R̥gveda and in the later Vedic texts treating the classical śrauta system (and indeed the much later pūjā of classical Hinduism) is modeled as a hospitality ceremony and festive meal, offered to the visiting gods. The poets eagerly invite the gods to journey to attend the sacrifice. When they arrive, they are greeted and provided with seats near the center of the action, on a special grass strewn on the ritual ground to make the ground more comfortable. This grass strew is called barhís and it has an exact cognate in Avestan barziš "cushion, pillow." In some hymns the horses pulling the gods' chariots, particularly Indra's two fallow bays, are unhitched and offered refreshment of their own. The gods are then offered a meal, that is, the oblations, generally consisting of ghee, little grain cakes, and, in the most important sacrifices, soma, and they are entertained while they eat, by the hymns of praise that constitute the R̥gvedic corpus. The end of this entertainment is often announced in the final verse of the hymn, and sometimes the gods are explicitly sent on their way back to heaven. Particularly nice examples of this envoi are found in I.61–63 and I.82, hymns designed to accompany the Hāriyojana or "Fallow-bay-yoking" oblation, the ritualized hitching up of Indra's horses for the return journey; in I.82.5–6 Indra is charmingly urged to go home to his "dear wife."

The "ritual ground" alluded to above is the sacralized space within which the ritual proceeds. It is not a permanent space dedicated to ritual performance, much less a building or temple; rather, judging from the evidence of the later śrauta texts, it is demarcated and sacralized for each performance. The space is defined especially by the presence of three ritual fires, the focal point of the sacrifice and the recipient(s) of the oblations. In the later texts these are the Āhavanīya (the fire "to be offered into") set to the east, the Gārhapatya ("householders' fire") to the west, from which the Āhavanīya is taken out and carried to the east, and the Dakṣiṇāgni ("southern fire"), and their locations and functions are precisely fixed. The R̥gveda does not attest these names for the fires, but it does often refer, though often obliquely, to the three fires of the ritual. Moreover, the god Agni and his physical representative, the offering fire, regularly receive the epithet puróhita "placed to the east/in front," appropriate to the removal of the Āhavanīya fire from the western Gārhapatya and its movement to the east. (The third word in the R̥gveda is in fact puróhitam I.1.1.) The poets sometimes seem to treat this movement as a sacred mystery (e.g., III.31.1–3), a fact that may point to the three-fire model as a ritual innovation of the pre-R̥gvedic period. There is no parallel to it in Avestan ritual, which uses only a single fire.

One aspect of the "entertainment of guests" model of Vedic sacrifice is the fear, constantly expressed, that the gods will choose to go to another party. The R̥gvedic sacrificers know that everyone in the larger sacrificial community follows much the same ritual calendar and therefore many competing sacrifices are taking place at the same time. The invitation to the gods often explicitly urges them to pass over other sacrifices and come to ours, and in order to make ours more attractive, we must provide the best hospitality, in particular the best entertainment in the form of exquisitely crafted and novel hymns.

An important feature of the "guest" model is the fact that it envisions and requires direct interaction between gods and mortals, on the mortals' turf—or rather on a space that has been rendered temporarily neutral through its sacralization—though it is on earth, the human realm, rather than in the gods' world, heaven. The interaction in turn requires epiphany in the technical sense: the gods must appear in person, as it were. The poets crave this epiphany and fear its failure to materialize. It is especially Indra whose epiphany they anticipate, and the fear that it may not happen also leads to the more general fear that Indra does not exist, a possibility that is often put in the mouth of doubtful "others."

There is another, more recessive model of sacrifice perceptible in the R̥gveda, especially in Agni hymns, whereby the offerings go to the gods in heaven, rather than requiring the gods to come to earth to receive them. The libations ascend on the smoke of the offering fire, an image conceptually close to the Homeric sacrifice. There seems to be no conflict in the minds of the R̥gvedic ritualists between these two models, and they are not exclusive to different groups of poets but can in fact occur in the same hymn; see, for example, the Agni hymn I.1, where the "guest" model dominates, with the gods' travel to the sacrifice explicit in verses 2 and 5, but the oblation's movement to the gods is alluded to in verse 4.

B. BASIC ELEMENTS OF THE RITUAL

Later Vedic texts give detailed descriptions of the soma rituals, which varied in length and complexity. The problem for the interpretation of the R̥gveda is that these classical rites were clearly not the same as the rites of the R̥gvedic period itself. While the classical rites drew on R̥gvedic traditions, they did not simply continue them. In the R̥gvedic period these rituals were probably much more variable, for even though their rituals were based on a shared inherited tradition, different priestly families performed the rites differently. For example, in the classical one-day soma rite, soma juice is pressed out of the soma plant and offered to various deities in the morning, at midday, and in the evening. But the third or evening pressing stands apart from the other two. While soma plants are freshly pressed in the morning and at midday, in the evening the soma is extracted from the already-mangled soma stems left over from the earlier pressings. Not only the soma preparation but also the overall character of the Third Pressing is different. It has a greater focus on the sacrificer and his wife, the gods of the Third Pressing form a less coherent group than those of the other pressings, and in general, the rites of the Third Pressing have the appearance of an appendix. It is possible that some family traditions did not have a Third Pressing and that, among those that did, the form of the Third Pressing was more fluid. Or again, in the Midday Pressing of the classical soma ritual, there are offerings to Indra alone and to Indra along with the Maruts. This form may represent a compromise between family traditions that offered soma only to Indra at this second pressing and those that also included the Maruts.

Variation in the rite also occurred over time. The R̥gvedic period itself extended through several generations of poets and priests, and the rites evolved during this period. In the classical soma ritual the sacrificer must be accompanied by his wife, who has her own ritual responsibilities (see Jamison 1996a). But in the R̥gveda, the wife of the sacrificer is very rarely alluded to and then almost exclusively in the younger parts of the text. Therefore the wife of the sacrificer may have been a late addition to the soma ritual, and indeed the Ṛgveda even offers evidence that her introduction may have been controversial, with some ritualists defending and others rejecting her presence in the rite (see Jamison 2011, forthcoming a, and forthcoming b). Ultimately, those who wished to include the sacrificer's wife won the day, for in the classical soma ritual her presence is required even if her ritual functions are limited.

The consolidation of the ritual tradition and the creation of the classical forms of the soma rite probably occurred after 1000 BCE, during the period in which the other saṃhitās were compiled. The innovations effected by this consolidation not only changed the form of the ritual, but also altered its very nature. Fundamental to the Ṛgvedic rite was the need for poets to create new formulations of the truth in order to attract the attention of the gods, to make them present at the rite, and to define their action. But in the later Vedic period, not only did the ritual offerings become increasingly standardized, so also did the ritual recitations and chants. Novelty and innovation were no longer primary values, but instead were supplanted by the ability to remember the old compositions. The compilation of the Ṛgveda reflects the need to preserve the poetry of the past in order to employ it within the ritual, for in the later Veda power resided not in the new formulation but in the ancient one. Or rather and more generally, power was understood as residing in the ritual performance as a whole and with the priests who carried out the rite. In later Vedic interpretation the ritual even came to exercise power over the gods themselves. The ritual became less an invitation to the gods and more a manipulation of them. One marker of this shift was the rise in the later Veda of Prajāpati, the Lord of Creatures. Prajāpati was the sacrifice itself, and his superiority to the other gods therefore symbolized the dominance of the sacrifice over the gods. Knowledge remained important: priests should understand the secrets of the rite that they performed. But the knowledge and skills of a poet did not have a place in the evolving ritual order.

Given the fluidity of the rites during the Ṛgvedic era, we cannot really speak of the Ṛgvedic soma rite, even though there were certainly common characteristics of the soma rituals performed throughout the period. Moreover, given the changes that occurred after the Ṛgvedic era, we cannot simply project the classical soma rites back into the Ṛgveda. While many technical ritual terms and elements were passed down from the Ṛgvedic period to the classical rites, these terms may not have had the same significance for the Ṛgveda that they do for the classical tradition. This is perhaps most obviously the case for the brahmán. In the later ritual the brahmán became the formal overseer of the ritual. In the Ṛgveda he was rather the poet who formulates the truth (further see Brereton 2004).

We have already noted that fire is at the center of the Vedic rites and that the three fires of the classical śrauta ritual model were likely present in the Ṛgvedic ritual. It is clear that already in the Ṛgveda the principal offerings were made into the fire, and the gods received them through this mediating force. It is no wonder, then, that the first hymn of the R̥gveda is a hymn to Agni, the god of fire, since his appearance ritually marked the beginning of the sacrifice, nor that Agni is the recipient of more hymns than any god but Indra.

Sacrifices were carried out by men performing a variety of priestly functions. In II.1.2 and II.5.1–8 Gr̥tsamada poets provide a list of seven priests, to which the Gr̥hapati "houselord," who is the primary beneficiary of the rite, is added as an eighth. Although the correspondence is not precise, Oldenberg (1917: 385) compares this list to a list of eight priests in the Avesta and argues that it reflects an old tradition that was still alive in the R̥gveda. In II.1.2 these seven priests are the Hotar, Potar, Neṣṭar, Agnīdh, Adhvaryu, Praśāstar, and Brahman. As Minkowski (1991: 113) points out, these seven essentially correspond to the classical list of priests in the *R̥tuyāja*s, the "sacrifices in turn" (which adds the Acchāvāka priest) and in the R̥tvigvaraṇa, the "choosing of priests," and to the priests who recite at the *Prasthitahoma*s, the "presented oblations." It is likely, therefore, that the list of seven does rest on a well-established tradition.

The Hotar was the principal priest, and the R̥gveda repeatedly mentions the "seven Hotars" (VIII.60.16; IX.10.7, 114.3; X.35.10, 61.1, 63.7) or the seven hótrāḥ "priestly functions" (X.17.11), by which it probably refers to the group of seven priests led by the Hotar. Although in the R̥gveda and in the later tradition, the Hotar is the priest who recites the hymns and is secondarily associated with the root √hū "call," his name originally meant the "pourer" (derived from the root √hu "pour"), which indicates that his ancient function was both to pour the offerings and to recite. In the R̥gveda he was likely often the composer of the hymns he recited as well. He is the one priest who has an exact correspondent in the Avestan tradition, the Zaotar, who already in the Gāthās of Zarathustra also composed and recited hymns.

On the basis of the likely analysis of his name, the Potar was the "purifier," likely a purifier of the soma (cf. TB I.4.8), but his R̥gvedic function is unclear. In the classical soma rite, the Neṣṭar, the "leader," is associated with the wives of the gods and the wife of the sacrificer. Judging from passages like IV.9.4, in the R̥gveda he had a connection with the former, which may have expanded to the latter with the introduction of the sacrificer's wife into the ritual. In the later tradition the Agnīdh or "fire-kindler" laid and tended the sacrificial fire, in addition to kindling it. He also acted as the primary assistant to the Adhvaryu, the "ceremoniant," the priest principally in charge of the ritual acts of the sacrifice. According to II.5.4 the Praśāstar, "director," is the priest who knows the "enduring commandments" (dhruvā́ vratā́ni) that govern the rite. He was likely the forerunner of the Maitrāvaruṇa priest of the later tradition, who gives the praiṣa or "command" for a particular ritual act to take place (Minkowski 1991: 118). And finally, there is the Brahman. According to Oldenberg (1917: 396), the Brahman in this list corresponded to the later Brāhmaṇācchaṃsin, an assistant to the Hotar who recited hymns in honor of Indra. Oldenberg may be right, but the Brahman in II.1.2 may have been the brahmán elsewhere in the R̥gveda, a composer and reciter of hymns. His liturgical functions were probably not so restricted as those of the Brāhmaṇācchaṃsin. Other passages contain partial lists of priests and mention priests who are not included among the seven of II.1.2, although for the most part their functions overlap those already described. One remarkable omission from the above lists of priests is a priestly title corresponding to the singers of the Sāmaveda. Nonetheless, there were singers at the R̥gvedic period, since especially those hymns composed in pragātha meters were likely chanted rather than recited. The Udgātar, later the principal priest of the Sāmavedic tradition, is mentioned as a singer of sāmans in II.34.2, and among those priests already mentioned the Potar may have chanted the Soma Pavamāna hymns of book IX. Also, it is possible that unlike the later tradition, in which singers were distinguished from reciters, R̥gvedic priests both chanted and recited according the requirements of the ritual.

A number of other terms describe the ritual participants and priests and their functions in the rites. While the exact role of the R̥gvedic kaví continues to be debated, he was linked to the production of poetry and to the mastery of esoteric knowledge expressed in his words. Our usual translation of kaví as "sage poet" attempts to capture these two sides of him. Since it has an Avestan cognate kauui, the term is an old one, and both the roles of the kaví and the kauui undoubtedly went through many changes in their long histories. Originally, however, the kaví/kauui may have had specific ritual functions within the forerunners of the Avestan and Vedic rites. Those functions may have complemented those of another figure, the uśíj, a term that also has an Avestan cognate, usig. Although anciently the uśíj/usig may have been a specific priestly office, the R̥gveda uses the term uśíj to describe various priests who tend the ritual fire. To give the sense of uśíj as a technical term for such a category of priests, we have translated it as "fire-priest." So then, likely reflecting a very ancient distribution of roles, the uśíj priests were masters of ritual action, while the kaví was the master of words and knowledge.

Thus, like other aspects of the R̥gvedic rites, the R̥gvedic priesthood was not fixed. For the R̥gveda we can better understand the names of priests as describing priestly functions rather than naming professional ritual specialists. Thinking of them in this way helps us understand why hymns use different names or vary the names. In a period before the rise of the priestly śākhās, there was less need for priests to have a determined or single identity. The same people who acted as priests in the ritual could be warriors or perform other social roles in other contexts.

C. SOMA RITUAL

As we have frequently had occasion to remark, most of the hymns of the R̥gveda were composed for the soma ritual. The central rite of this sacrifice was the preparation of the soma juice, which was then offered to the gods and shared among male participants in the rite. In the R̥gvedic period the stalks of the soma plant were probably placed on a stone and crushed using another stone or stones. The extracted juice was either transferred to a vessel that contained water and then poured through or onto a woolen filter to purify it. In either case the soma then ran into another vessel, in which it was mixed with milk. In the Agniṣṭoma of the classical tradition, there are three soma-pressings in a single day, although, as remarked above, this may not have been true for the whole R̥gvedic period or for all ritual traditions during the R̥gvedic period. The R̥gveda also knows the Atirātra or "overnight" form of the soma ritual, in which there are still three pressings on one day, but in which the rite continues across the night. The final offerings of the Atirātra are then made on the morning of the second day.

One of the perennial problems in R̥gvedic and Avestan studies has been the identity of the soma plant or its Iranian equivalent, the haoma plant. In the R̥gveda the effect of soma juice on both humans and gods is described by the verbal root √mad, roughly "exhilarate" or "elate." By these translations we mean that the soma juice invigorated those who drank it and heightened their senses in some fashion. We could be more precise about the effect of soma if we knew from what plant it was extracted. Early speculation that the soma juice was an alcoholic drink of some sort clearly missed the mark, since the preparation of soma does not allow for fermentation and √mad does not mean "intoxicate," if that implies drunkenness and not transport. Of the substantial number of possibilities proposed in more recent times, two have dominated the discussion. (For a review of the various theories, at least of the time of its writing, see Houben 2003.) The first is that the soma plant was a stimulant, and the most frequent candidate for that stimulant is one or another kind of ephedra. Although not original to him and defended by other scholars, the interpretation of soma as ephedra was argued with particular plausibility by Harry Falk (1989), largely on the basis of internal evidence in the R̥gveda. Also in favor of this hypothesis are the use of ephedra in Zoroastrian ritual even in modern times and the discovery of traces of ephedra at various sites of the ancient Bactrian-Margiana Archaeological Complex, a culture with apparent connections with Indo-Iranian culture. Neither of these discoveries confirms the ephedra hypothesis, and there have been and continue to be many critics of it. Another set of proposals envisions the soma as a hallucinogen. This argument was most famously put forth by Wasson (1968), who identified the soma plant as the Amanita muscaria, the fly agaric mushroom. Similarly Flattery and Schwartz (1989) argued that previous attempts to identify the soma/haoma plant had overvalued the Vedic evidence and undervalued the Iranian. On the basis of the latter evidence, their candidate for the soma plant was Peganum harmala, mountain rue, which also has psychoactive properties. Despite Flattery and Schwartz's admonitions, recent defenders of the view that soma was a hallucinogen have continued to focus on the internal evidence of the R̥gveda. For them √mad implies not so much stimulation as ecstasy or visionary experience. Stuhrman (2006), for example, cites the hymns' light imagery and the unexpected associations made by the poets to argue that these are best explained as reflexes of hallucinogenic experience.

This is not an issue that we can resolve, and we would leave it aside if we could. But the identification of soma affects the interpretation of some hymns and particularly the translation of the various forms of the root √mad. In general, we find more textual evidence to support the interpretation of the soma juice as a stimulant than as a hallucinogen. Neither the imagery of the poems nor the vision of the poets requires a hallucinogen to explain them. Our view of the hymns is that they are careful, often intricate compositions that attest to the skill and imagination of the poets. There is no need to assume the poets experienced the effects of a hallucinogen, and some reason not to do so. To explain what is bizarre and obscure in these hymns by pharmacology can inhibit the effort to see the underlying logic and intention of the hymns. While there is much that remains obscure in the R̥gveda, interpreters of the text have been able to make progress by the simple assumption that the hymns do make sense and that the poets did know exactly what they were doing.

D. OTHER RITUALS

In describing Vedic ritual we have thus far been discussing the soma sacrifice. But while the soma sacrifice dominates the R̥gveda, the collection includes hymns composed for other rites as well. One of the sub-rites of the classical soma ritual is the Pravargya, which according to most ritual sūtras is performed twice daily on the three days leading up to the soma-pressing day. At an earlier stage, likely represented by the R̥gveda, the Pravargya was an independent rite, which was only later incorporated into the soma tradition. Although the Pravargya is not mentioned by name in R̥gveda, the text refers to the rite at the center of the Pravargya, an offering to the Aśvins of gharmá, a mixture of hot milk and ghee, and the underlying verbal lexeme prá √vr̥j is used in ritual context.

A number of other hymns, especially in book X, also refer to a Rājasūya, a royal consecration rite, and other rites defining and affirming royal sovereignty. The central rite in the classical Rājasūya was the royal unction, in which water was poured on the king. This water conferred on the king royal power and authority. Again, the unction rite itself is not mentioned, but the symbolism of water as a substance that confers power on the king and over which a successful king must exercise power is very much part of the R̥gvedic tradition. While R̥gvedic kingship may have differed significantly from later kingship, other classical symbols of kingship also appear in the R̥gveda, such as the association of the king and the sun (cf. X.121) and the identification of king with Varuṇa and Indra, who represent two kinds of sovereignty (cf. IV.42).

The animal sacrifice, either as an independent rite or as a part of the soma sacrifice, is not very prominent in the R̥gveda and is generally alluded to by its paraphernalia, actions, and verbal accompaniment rather than treated directly. The most salient piece of equipment is the yūpa, the post to which the sacrificial animal is tied. The yūpa is celebrated in a single hymn, III.8, which is actually a composite of two parallel hymns, one appropriate to a single post for a single sacrificial animal, one to multiple posts for several victims. The hymn concerns only the preparation of the posts; there is no mention of the sacrificial victim(s).

One of the most dramatic actions in the later animal sacrifice is the threefold circumambulation of the victim by a priest, the Āgnīdhra, carrying a firebrand. When in some R̥gvedic hymns the ritual Agni is said to "go around," the reference seems to be to this circumambulation—though again the victim is mentioned barely or not at all (see esp. IX.92.6, 97.1, where soma's circling of the filter is compared to the Hotar's circling of "the fixed seats provided with [sacrificial] beasts"; see also I.173.3, VII.18.22, X.22.14). Elsewhere (VI.1.3, V.43.7) the first and most highly prized part of the sacrificial beast to be ritually offered in later śrauta ritual, the omentum, is alluded to, again without direct mention of the sacrificing of the animal.

The most significant representation of the animal sacrifice in the R̥gveda, albeit again indirect, is found in the litanies known as the Āprī hymns. In the later ritual the Āprī litany accompanied the fore-offerings of the animal sacrifice. The R̥gveda contains ten such hymns; in them a set series of subjects or key words—ritual personnel (e.g., Tvaṣṭar), qualities (e.g., "well kindled"), or equipment (e.g., ritual grass)—are treated in a fixed order, though with variable wording, generally in eleven or twelve verses. One of the pieces of equipment is the yūpa, the wooden post mentioned above, though under the epithet "Lord of the Forest" (=tree). But the actual sacrifice of an animal is never mentioned in these hymns; at best the victim is delicately referred to as an oblation.

There is also indirect reference to the animal sacrifice in mythological allusion to the Śunaḥśepa story, in which the young brahmin boy so named is almost offered up as a sacrifice to the gods, though he is rescued at the last minute. Although the story is best known from the very full narrative in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa (VII.13–18), his dramatic release is alluded to in the R̥gveda quite explicitly (see esp. V.2.7, also I.24.12–13).

Perhaps the most extravagant and dramatic ritual in the classical śrauta system is the great royal sacrifice, the Aśvamedha or Horse Sacrifice, to be performed by a king to consolidate or display his power. It involves letting a stallion roam at will for a year, accompanied by armed troops who fight the sovereigns of any territory into which the horse strays. When the horse returns at the end of the year, it is sacrificed, along with numerous other victims, with due pomp but also with almost unimaginably outlandish accompanying actions. At the climax of the ritual the chief wife of the king has sex (or simulated sex) with the just-slaughtered horse on the ritual ground, while the other queens and their female attendants circle around, singing and dancing and trading obscene jokes with the officiating priests. Two late R̥gvedic hymns (I.162–163) directly treat the Horse Sacrifice, although the later sexual extravaganza is either unknown to them or, more likely, delicately omitted from discussion. The first (I.162) describes the (literally) gory details of the sacrifice itself, while commending the sacrificed horse and all its gear to the gods, while the second (I.163) lavishly lauds the horse and identifies it with the sun on its journey to the gods. Moreover, if we are correct in our interpretation of X.86, the famous salacious three-way conversation among Indra, his wife Indrāṇī, and Indra's pal, the monkey Vṛṣākapi, this hymn is a burlesque or parody (though a serious one) of the Horse Sacrifice, with the monkey standing in for the horse-victim, Indrāṇī for the wife who must mate with the animal victim, and Indra for the king and sacrificer who stands by and watches this mating. This interpretation presupposes that the dramatic sexual aspect of the Aśvamedha was already present in the Ṛgvedic version of the rite and is simply not mentioned in I.162–163.

In addition to the rituals that will be codified in the later classical śrauta system, the Ṛgveda marginally treats rituals that will form part of the gṛhya, or "domestic," ritual system, primarily life-cycle rites. The Ṛgvedic treatments are almost exclusively found in late portions of the text, in Maṇḍala X, and often have parallels in the Atharvaveda. The funeral is treated in a series of hymns (X.14–18) in the Yama cycle. Of particular interest are X.16, which concerns the cremation fire and the actual burning of the dead man's body, and X.18, which describes the funeral service, the burial, and the return of those still living to their lives. Verses 7–9 of X.18 have attracted special attention because they appear to depict the widow of the dead man, first lying beside the dead man and then being recalled to life and to remarriage—thus suggesting that while the later institution of satī or widow burning is not attested in the Ṛgveda, the ritual representation of the widow's ceremonial death (though followed by ceremonial rebirth) could have provided a model for a more literal enactment. Many of the verses in this group of hymns are found also in the Atharvaveda funeral hymns, XVIII.1–4. Another hymn, X.56, describes the ascent of the body of the deceased by means of the cremation fire and its transformation into an immortal body in heaven (see Brereton forthcoming a).

A long and episodic hymn, X.85, is devoted to the wedding. Many of its verses are found also in the Atharvaveda wedding hymns and are utilized in the gṛhya sūtra protocols for the wedding ceremony. After a long mythological prologue, the hymn proceeds (sometimes in jumbled fashion) from the wooing of the bride-to-be to the journey of the newly married couple to the new home, with a very interesting (and barely comprehensible) treatment of the deflowering of the bride.

The Ṛgveda also provides a certain amount of evidence for the institution of the Svayaṃvara or bridal "self-choice" marriage, familiar to anyone who has ever studied first-year Sanskrit and read the Mahābhārata story of Nala and Damayantī, whose engagement took that form. Most of the Ṛgvedic evidence is mythological, as the archetypal divine bride in the text is Sūryā, daughter of the sun, who exercises her choice (see especially Jamison 2001), but there is also lexical evidence (see Jamison 2003) as well as incidental imagery, especially in Dawn hymns, of young girls in such a situation.

Pregnancy and birth, a major preoccupation in the later gṛhya material, is barely represented in the Ṛgveda. There is a charm for safe childbirth (X.184), which follows immediately on a brief dialogue between husband and wife attempting to conceive (X.183), and in a short series of hymns against disease we find one against the dangers of miscarriage (X.162). Maṇḍala V also contains a charm for safe child-birth embedded in an Aśvin hymn (V.78.7–10) and motivated by the mythological case of (the male seers) Atri and Saptavadhri, trapped in tight quarters like a child in the womb.

V. The Gods

A. NATURE OF THE GODS

The great majority of R̥gvedic hymns are dedicated to individual gods or to groups of gods. Following a classification articulated already in I.139.11, Yāska (Nir. VII.5) divided the gods into three categories: gods of the earth, gods of the mid-space, and gods of heaven. This simple scheme has the advantage of being clear and the disadvantage of being misleading. For while the R̥gvedic pantheon includes deities who represent the visible realities and powers of the natural world, it is not fully composed of such gods. A better starting place for most of the gods is their names. As we shall see, the R̥gveda attaches great importance to the names of gods. By invoking, varying, and meaningfully placing gods' names in their verses and by echoing the sounds of those names, the poets bring about the presence of the gods, their epiphany. More than in any other single feature, the essential nature of a deity is expressed in the god's name. The god is who the god is because the god obeys the truth embedded in that name. Thus the goddess Dawn is the Dawn because she adheres to the truth that she appears in the morning before the sun. The god Parjanya, Thunderstorm, is the Thunderstorm because he adheres to the truth that he sends the rain. To be sure, the meanings of the names of some gods, such as Viṣṇu, the Nāsatyas, or the Maruts, are unclear or controversial, and the names of other gods, such as the Aśvins ("Horsemen"), imperfectly represent their characters. By and large, however, the names of gods define their natures and actions. This is one reason that the gods of the R̥gveda can appear to be flat, since they generally lack the complex personalities that the gods of classical India possess. But there is considerable complexity in the relations among R̥gvedic deities, in the fusion and fission of deities, and in the dimensions of gods indicated by different names and epithets.

Starting with their names, we can classify gods according to their different spheres of action. This categorization will be porous, since some gods cross boundaries of domains and functions, and will be more orderly than R̥gvedic reality, but it gives an approximate shape to the R̥gvedic pantheon. There are at least five categories of divinities. First there are gods of nature, the powers that represent and govern natural phenomena and entities, such as Sūrya, the "Sun," Vāyu "Wind," Parjanya "Thunderstorm," Uṣas "Dawn," and Dyaus and Pr̥thivī "Heaven and Earth." With some exceptions, the names of these deities are also words for the phenomena they represent. So, for example, the word sū́rya can signify either the sun god or the sun itself, or, rather, it signifies both the sun god and the sun, since the two are not fully distinguished. However, these gods of nature do not act only within the natural sphere defined by their names, but enlarge their sphere of action on the basis of their natural characteristics. In I.115.1, for example, the Sun is called "the eye of Mitra, Varuṇa, and Agni," because the Sun, as he transits the sky, looks down upon the actions of human beings and observes whether they conform to the ritual and social principles governed by these other deities. In V.80.5 the light brought by the goddess Dawn disperses not only the physical darkness of night but also the "powers of darkness," the dangerous forces at work within the world. And according to V.83.9 the god Parjanya, Thunderstorm, not only shakes the world, but also smashes evildoers. Thus the principle of hidden connections and correspondences allows the gods of nature operate in other spheres in manners analogous to their natural functions.

A second category of divinity includes those defined by the social sphere in which they operate. The most prominent deities in this category are the three principal Ādityas: Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aryaman. As detailed below, these gods represent the different principles that define social relations, and they ensure that human beings act according to these principles. As the gods of nature have functions within the social world, so these gods of the social world also have functions within the natural world. They are associated with the sun, as illustrated by I.115.1, and Varuṇa especially governs the waters, granting them to those who uphold the principles he represents, withholding them from those who do not. In this way, the processes of the visible world become the assurance of the reality of the principles of the social world.

Still other gods are defined by an action or function that their names embody. Perhaps the most obvious example is Savitar, the "Impeller," who compels humans and other living beings to action or sends them to rest. Similarly, there is Tvaṣṭar, the "Fashioner," Viśvakarman, the "All-Maker," and various other minor "agent gods" as Macdonell (1897: 115) called them. Perhaps fitting into this category, albeit awkwardly, are the Aśvins, the "Horsemen." As the name of these two gods suggests, they characteristically drive their chariot, and their mobility is a significant part of what defines them. They ride to accomplish many purposes: to heal, to rescue, or even to facilitate marriage. As charioteers and riders, therefore, they move within a variety of places and spheres.

Fourth are gods who embody aspects of the ritual, a category dominated by the two gods who, except for Indra, are the most frequently invoked deities of the R̥gveda, Agni and Soma. Agni is the sacrificial fire and Soma the central offering at the principal sacrifice in the R̥gvedic tradition. The particular significance of the ritual gods is their accessibility to humans. Various gods can be present at the sacrifice, but Indra and other gods like Mitra and Varuṇa remain invisible. Gods like the Wind, the Dawn, or the Sun are perceptible, but they are distant or amorphous. Agni and Soma, however, are visibly, tangibly present, right in front of the priests and sacrificers, and their presence can be reliably brought about by human action. They are the representives of the divine within reach of humans, and therefore they can create the link between gods and humans upon which the life of both gods and humans depends. So, Agni is the messenger who conveys the gods to mortals (e.g., I.14.12, III.6.9, IV.8.2, VII.11.5), and he is the Hotar priest who brings humans' offerings to the gods (e.g., I.1.1, VIII.60.1, X.7.5). And likewise, Soma descends from heaven to the human world (IX.61.10, 63.27, 66.30) and, when offered by humans, goes from these humans to the gods (IX.25.4, 39.1).

The last category belongs to Indra, who stands apart from all the other gods. Although it might once have had other resonance, the word índra means only Indra, which makes it not quite unique but a still rarity among the names of gods. The greatest number of hymns, nearly a quarter of all the hymns of the Ṛgveda, are dedicated to him. This preeminence in the Ṛgveda is not surprising since the soma sacrifice is primarily a sacrifice to Indra. Indra and Vāyu are the first of the paired divinities who receive soma in the morning; Indra alone or with the Maruts receives soma at midday; and, at least according to some Ṛgvedic traditions, Indra and the Ṛbhus receive soma in the evening (cf. IV.35.7). Thus, even though the soma sacrifice gradually incorporated other rites and other gods, Indra and the offerings to Indra remained central to it.

B. DEVAS AND ASURAS

Beginning with the Vedic prose texts, one of the most enduring mythological structures is the perpetual conflict between Devas (devá being the Sanskrit word for "god") and Asuras, with the two (almost) balanced groups contending with each other in numerous myths and myth fragments in all sorts of situations. The Asuras are, as it were, the anti-Devas, with negative traits exactly corresponding to the positive ones possessed by the Devas. In the various combats depicted, the Devas always prevail, but only barely. This conflict continues to be prominent in the post-Vedic religious landscape, as in the well-known story of the churning of the ocean of milk in which the two moieties fight over the treasures churned up.

An apparent mirror image of this paired opposition is found in Old Iranian in the Avestan texts, where ahura, the direct cognate of Sanskrit ásura, is the title of the head of the pantheon, Ahura Mazdā "Lord Wisdom," and the *daēuua*s (exact cognate of Sanskrit devá) are the enemies of all that is good. Although it has always been tempting to superimpose the Avestan and middle Vedic situations upon each other, the Ṛgveda makes serious difficulties. There the term ásura is generally in the singular, used as a title ("lord") in a positive sense, and is often applied to divinities who are otherwise identified as Devas. A particularly striking example is found in VIII.25.4 where Mitra and Varuṇa are called Devas and Asuras simultaneously (devā́v ásurā "[the two] Devas, [the two] Asuras"). The Asuras as a defined group only begin to appear in the late Ṛgveda. For further discussion see Hale (1986). The history and significance of the Avestan/post-R̥gvedic mirror-image pairing of the two terms remain unclear.

C. VIŚVE DEVĀḤ

The term víśve devā́ḥ "all the gods" or "the All Gods" is common in the R̥gveda, and the Anukramaṇī identifies the divinity of a large number of hymns as víśve devā́ḥ. The term, both in its usage in the text and in its application to a hymn type, is employed in a number of different senses. On the one hand, it is a handy way to refer to the whole divine community, to ensure that no god has been left out of a generic eulogy or request for aid. In this usage the gods are not treated as individuals but as an undifferentiated group, opposed to mortals or, later, the Asuras (see just above). This group ultimately becomes conceived of as a sort of corporate entity, the All Gods. On the other hand, many Viśve Devāḥ hymns do not encompass the whole group, but name a series of individual gods, each one often allotted a single verse in a list hymn (e.g., VI.49). Here the phrase "all the gods" is a way of indicating that the hymn is not targeting a single god, as in the majority or R̥gvedic hymns, but selecting from the group. And finally a number of hymns with the Anukramaṇī designation "all gods" actually have very little to do with the gods at all, but contain meditations on the mysteries of the cosmos, of the sacrifice, or of the powers of poetry and ritual speech (see, e.g., I.105).

D. INDRA

As the preeminent god of the R̥gveda, Indra has a variety of roles. But first of all Indra is a warrior, upon whom depend the protection and prosperity of his worshipers. His weapon is the vájra, the mace. In later tradition, when Indra was reduced to a storm god, the vajra became a thunderbolt. But in the R̥gveda it was a weapon, which could be thrown at an enemy or smashed down upon him, and the principal means by which Indra asserted his power.

The foremost story of Indra in the R̥gveda is the narrative of the battle between Indra and Vr̥tra. Vr̥tra was a gigantic cobra, who was twisted around a mountain that enclosed the waters. In order for life to exist Vr̥tra had to be destroyed. Indra battled the serpent, alone, according to some hymns, or with the help of the Maruts or other gods, according to others. After a furious battle Indra killed Vr̥tra with his mace and smashed open the mountain, releasing the waters. This myth is occasionally merged with others, so that not only the waters but also the cattle and the sun emerge from the mountain. The name Vr̥tra means "obstacle," and one of the characteristic epithets of Indra is vr̥trahán, which can mean either "smasher of Vr̥tra" or "smasher of obstacles." There is little difference between these two interpretations, however, since Vr̥tra is the paradigm of all obstacles. To evoke Indra as the smasher of Vr̥tra, therefore, is to evoke him as the god who smashes all obstacles.

The narrative of the destruction of Vṛtra is associated particularly with the midday soma-pressing, which is dedicated to Indra alone or to Indra and the Maruts.

The Vala myth is the second great narrative of Indra and a complement to the Vṛtra story. According to this myth a group called the Paṇis captured the cattle and kept them trapped in the Vala cave. Indra opened the Vala cave and released the cattle and the dawns. Remarkable in this story is that Indra does not release the cattle using his mace as his weapon, but rather using the power of the truth in the songs he chants. Accompanying him and joining him in his chant are groups of priests, the Aṅgirases, sometimes along with the Navagvas or the Daśagvas. In this narrative, therefore, Indra is a priest-king rather than a warrior-king as he is in the Vṛtra myth. In his role as priest-king Indra is also called bṛ́haspáti, the "lord of the sacred formulation." Bṛhaspati appears not only as Indra, but also as a separate divinity alongside Indra. Gradually, as Indra and the Vedic king, who personifies Indra, progressively lose their priestly functions in the late Ṛgveda and in the later Vedic tradition, Bṛhaspati increasingly stands apart from Indra. As the Vṛtra story is connected with the Midday Pressing, so the Vala story was associated with the Morning Pressing, which takes place with the appearance of dawn. In the Ṛgvedic period the dakṣiṇā, the reward of cattle to the priests, was also given at the Morning Pressing. The cattle that come to the priests thus reflect the advent of the cattle and dawns in the world.

Although the two major mythological narratives with Indra as protagonist are the Vṛtra and the Vala victories, he figures in many other episodes—too many to mention here—which are often fragmentarily attested and poorly understood.

We may start with his parentage. Although the identity of Indra's mother is not clear, in the occasional mentions of her she is a vivid character—as in the snatches of dialogue between him and his mother in the famous birth hymn IV.18, where she tries to persuade him not to pursue an unnatural exit from her womb. Elsewhere she offers him soma to drink directly after his birth, soma that he stole from his father, named as Tvaṣṭar (III.48; also IV.18.3). And in an even more enigmatic snatch of dialogue (VIII.45.4–6 ≅ VIII.77.1–2) she seems to reassure the just-born Indra that he will ultimately prevail. As just noted, Indra seems to participate in a rivalry with his father, who may be Tvaṣṭar. The unnatural birth and the rivalry with the divine father are of course well-nigh universal attributes of "the hero"; the many prodigious feats attributed to Indra just after his birth are also typical of heroic biography.

Two minor but intriguing myths pit Indra against the two most important forms of celestial light, the Sun and Dawn. We find the merest allusions (primarily IV.30.8–11) to a puzzling episode in which Indra crushes the cart of Dawn and she runs away. Alluded to just a bit more (primarily V.29.5, 9–10; V.31.11; I.121.13) is the chariot race in which Indra bests the chariot of the Sun, apparently by tearing the wheel off his chariot. This latter myth is somehow connected with one that is better attested, though hardly better understood, in which Indra and a sidekick Kutsa drive on the same chariot, drawn by the horses of the Wind, to the house of Uśanā Kāvya (a name with a shadowy attestation also in Avestan mythology), to receive some aid or advice, preliminary to slaying Śuṣṇa, the often-mentioned opponent of Kutsa.

Indra has a number of other named adversaries. In one striking whiff of a narrative, Indra, aided by Viṣṇu in some versions, shoots a boar named Emuṣa, enabling him to acquire a special mess of rice porridge hidden in or behind a mountain (see esp. VIII.77; also VIII.69.14–15, I.61.7). This myth is further developed in Vedic prose. Another myth with more presence in later texts involves Indra's slaying of Namuci by beheading him (e.g., V.30.7–8). In the later versions Indra accomplishes this by trickery, and part of the trick (using the foam of the waters as weapon) is already mentioned once in the R̥gveda (VIII.14.13). The names of other victims of Indra include Śambara, Pipru, Dhuni and Cumuri, and Varcin, inter alia. The details of these battles are too sketchy to provide much in the way of narrative mythology.

Like a number of other gods, Indra has his characteristic draft-animals, and his are especially prominently featured in the text. His pair of fallow bays (hárī) conveys him everywhere, especially to and from the sacrifice. They have their own food offered to them at the sacrifice (roasted grain, see, e.g., III.35), and hymns were even devoted to a libation made when the pair was hitched up for the return journey after the sacrifice (see I.61–63). The mention of the fallow bays is sufficient to signal that Indra is present in the context, and hárivant "possessing the fallow bays" is a standing epithet of Indra.

E. AGNI "FIRE"

The word agní is both the common noun meaning "fire" and the name of the god who is deified fire. As with sóma (see below), it is often difficult to draw the line between these uses. The sacrificial system of the R̥gveda (and later Vedic texts), like that of the cognate Old Iranian Avestan texts, is focused around the ritual fire. The sacrificial ground is defined by the presence of sanctified fire(s), oblations are made into them, and the gods and priests gather round them. Thus, first and foremost, Agni is the god always present at our ritual performances and the immediate recipient of our offerings. He is the most prominent of the R̥gvedic gods after Indra, and all the Family Books and most of the smaller bardic collections open with their Agni hymns.

Agni as ritual fire is both recipient of oblations in his own right and the conduit of oblations destined for other gods, which are offered into the ritual fire. He is therefore regularly called the mouth of the gods, and his role as the middleman between the human offerers and divine recipients is often emphasized. The flames and especially the smoke of the fire carry the oblations to heaven, but also, perhaps more often, serve as a means for the gods to come to earth to our sacrifice: Agni is said to be the conveyor of the gods many, many times in the text. He is a middleman in another sense, as a god who nonetheless dwells intimately among mortals. For us he is both ally and messenger to the more distant gods, and since he is not one of us but a divinity, he is viewed as and often called our guest.

But the ritual fire is not the only form of Agni. The poets emphasize both the divine aspects of Agni and his purely physical form, often intermingling references to different forms of fire in the same hymn. As a god he is often identified with the sun, the celestial form of fire: blazing hot, shining bright, and appearing at the same time of day, namely dawn when the sun rises and the ritual fire is kindled. But the fire on our sacrificial ground is also clearly kin to the fire on our domestic hearth; indeed in later śrauta ritual the fire from which the other ritual fires are taken out is called the Gārhapatya or "householders' (fire)." Agni is therefore also praised for his contribution to daily life and the pleasures of home and family.

The potentially destructive aspects of fire are not forgotten, however. Many of the most inventive descriptions in Agni hymns are of the wild, uncontrollable rampages of forest fire, spreading across the land and "eating" everything in its path. We seek to harness this destructive power of fire, to turn it against our enemies and other threats to our safety, and Agni, sometimes with the epithet rakṣohán "demon-smasher," is urged to turn his relentless flames against opponents we name. A subtype of destructive fire is the funeral fire, the "flesh-eating" fire of cremation, which is both welcomed and feared (see esp. X.16).

The paradoxical nature of physical fire also provides some part of the god Agni's personal qualities. That fire is fueled by plants, especially wood, contributes to the belief that Agni lives concealed within the plants, even very juicy ones, until his birth. Agni also comes to be identified with a minor divinity going back to Indo-Iranian times, Apām Napāt "child of the waters," who was probably originally separate—a glowing fiery being concealed and nurtured in the waters, probably configured in part as lightning.

The creation or birth of the ritual fire from the kindling sticks, his parents, is a major subject in Agni hymns, with intricate descriptions of the first stirrings of flame and smoke as the friction of the kindling sticks produces sparks that finally catch. The just-born Agni is depicted as a tender babe, who quickly grows to become stronger than his parents and to devour the plants from which he was born.

Many aspects of Agni are expressed through the variety of names and epithets applied to him. Agni is Jātavedas as the fire established at the beginning of the rite that continues to its end. As an unbroken presence in the ritual, Agni Jātavedas also oversees the succession of generations, ensuring that a family's lineage will continue. Agni Vaiśvānara is the fire become the sun. As the sun, this fire sees everything and governs everyone. This form of Agni is especially associated with the king, who like the sun stands above and reaches all beings. The word vaiśvānará means the one "relating to all men." Agni is also Tanūnapāt and Narāśaṃsa. One or another of these names—or sometimes both (I.13.2–3)—appear in the Āprī hymns, which are recited in an animal sacrifice, and they both occur outside of the Āprī hymns as well. The word tánūnápāt describes Agni as the "son of himself," and nárāśáṃsa as the one "who embodies men's praise" of the gods. As Agni Kravyād, the "flesh-eating fire," Agni is the fire of the funeral pyre that consumes the body of the deceased and transports it to heaven. Mātariśvan is sometimes identified as Agni himself, but he is more properly the one who brought the fire from heaven.

Agni participates in almost no narrative mythology, in strong contrast to Indra. Besides the very sketchy account of Mātariśvan's theft of fire from heaven, there is one, ritually connected, tale—of Agni's flight from the sacrificial ground and his self-concealment in the waters, to avoid his ritual role as bearer of oblations to the gods. The gods find him in his hiding place and coax him back by promising him a share of the oblations. This myth is treated most fully in the late sequence X.51–53, but there are glancing mentions of it elsewhere. The story may have in part been generated by the conflation of Agni with the originally distinct divine figure Apām Napāt "Child of the Waters," on which see II.35.

F. SOMA

Like Agni, Soma is both a god and a crucial ritual substance, and the boundary between them is not always clear. As has already been discussed, the juice of the soma plant (whatever that may have been), pressed from the plant and elaborately prepared, is the chief offering of the most important complex of rituals, the soma sacrifice. This sacrificial substance and its ritual preparation go back to the Indo-Iranian period, since Avestan attests to the substance haoma, an exact cognate to Sanskrit sóma, and to its pressing and offering (see especially the so-called Hōm Yašt, Y 9–10). In both traditions the substance is also deified.

The "Soma Maṇḍala" of the R̥gveda, Maṇḍala IX, contains 114 hymns dedicated to Soma Pavamāna "Self-Purifying Soma." These hymns focus entirely on a single ritual moment, the pressing of the plant, the straining of the juice by pouring it over a sheep's fleece to trap the impurities (twigs and the like), the mixing of the juice first with water and then with milk, and the pouring into containers prior to offering it to the gods, especially Indra. These actions are often presented metaphorically, with Soma conceptualized as a king making a royal progress across the filter and into the cups, a progress that can be compared to the conquering of territory. Or as the Sun in his journey through the cosmos. Or, quite often, as a bull racing to mate with a herd of cows, who represent the milk with which the juice will be mixed. Soma is thus regularly presented as having agency in the many descriptions of the purification of the liquid.

Besides this dynamic deification especially characteristic of the IXth Maṇḍala, there is little narrative mythology involving the god Soma. The most important tale is the theft of Soma from heaven, where he was confined in a citadel guarded by an archer called Kr̥śānu. A falcon stole him and brought him to earth, successfully evading serious injury from Kr̥śānu's arrow, to deliver him to Manu, the first sacrificer. This exploit is mentioned a number of times in the text, but is most fully described in IV.26–27.

Though one characteristic of Soma in later texts, a commonplace already in middle Vedic, is his identification with the moon, this equation is only attested in the very late Ṛgveda. It is clearly found only in the Wedding Hymn (X.85), whose first verses depict the wedding of Soma and Sūryā, daughter of the Sun. The bridegroom Soma in this hymn has clear lunar qualities, which are distinguished from his identity as an earthy ritual substance.

G. ADITI AND THE ĀDITYAS

As a group, the Ādityas generally represent the powers that order human society. This function is most evident in the three principal Ādityas, Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman. In addition to these three, however, there are minor deities who are also called Ādityas—Dakṣa, Bhaga, and Aṃśa—and a number of other gods, such as Savitar and Sūrya, who may be called Ādityas when they exercise functions like those of the major Ādityas.

The Ādityas are sons of the goddess Aditi, whose name means "offenselessness" or "innocence." She embodies obedience to the principles of right social behavior that her sons represent. Later, the motherhood of Aditi becomes central to her identity and she becomes a mother to other deities.

The most prominent of the Ādityas is Varuṇa, whose name is related to vratá "commandment" and who therefore is the god of commandments. While all the major Ādityas are kings, Varuṇa in particular represents the authority of the king. In IV.42, as in the later Rājasūya, the king becomes both Varuṇa and Indra; that is, as Varuṇa, the king is a judicial authority governing the actions of his subjects, and as Indra, he is a leader in war. Accordingly, the divine acts of Varuṇa were often reflected in the functions of the Ṛgvedic king. Like the king, Varuṇa watches over his subjects by means of his spáśaḥ "spies" (e.g., I.25.13). One of the responsibilities of the king was to ensure the prosperity of his subjects by providing sufficient water for animals and crops. Therefore, the divine king Varuṇa brings rain (V.85.3–4) and controls the waters, causing them to flow according to his commandment (II.28.4). As the king orders the human world, so Varuṇa orders both the human world and the world at large: the moon and stars appear and disappear according to his commandment (I.24.10), and he makes a place and a path for the sun in the sky (I.24.8, V.85.2, VII.87.1, 5). The king maintained the social order by punishing wrong-doers, and, likewise, poets fear Varuṇa's anger and his fetters (pā́śāḥ), with which he binds those who violate his commandments (e.g., I.24.15, 25.21). Varuṇa is the master of the truth that governs the actions of things, as the king must be as well (II.28.6). Given that his kingship complements Indra's, we might have expected Varuṇa to have had a greater presence in the Ṛgveda than he does. However, the Ṛgveda emerged primarily from the soma rite, and the soma rite belongs to Indra. In the Ṛgvedic period there probably were other rites dedicated to Varuṇa or to Varuṇa and other Ādityas—there is such a rite in the classical tradition—but these left little trace in the Ṛgveda.

In most hymns Varuṇa is closely connected to Mitra, with whom he shares most of his royal functions. Unlike váruṇa, the meaning of mitrá is reasonably certain. A mitrá was an ally or an alliance, and Mitra is the god of alliances. While Varuṇa governs relations in which one person has authority over another, Mitra governs relations defined by mutual obligations. These two kinds of relationships overlap with one another, so it is not surprising that the functions of Mitra and Varuṇa likewise often coincide and that the two gods are so often paired. Only one hymn, III.59, is dedicated to Mitra alone. As the god of alliances, Mitra governs peace agreements between different people, ensuring that they will take their proper places (III.59.1, 5; cf. VII.36.2) and remain in them (III.59.6). When other gods have functions similar to Mitra's, they may be identified with him. In particular, Agni is sometimes called Mitra (e.g., III.5.4) or creates a mitrá, an alliance, when he appears at dawn. The alliance to which such passages refer is the sacrificial alliance between gods and mortals. Humans offer the truth in their hymns and offer soma, milk, ghee, and the like as their oblations. In this way, they empower the gods, and the gods in turn provide what is necessary for human life.

The last of the major Ādityas is Aryaman, the god of the customs of the Āryas. He therefore represents a third social principle, the customary rules that govern relations among Vedic tribes and peoples. This principle was especially essential in a society where the authority of the ruler would not have penetrated deeply into the daily lives or the households of his people. Among the spheres in which custom determined behavior was marriage, which created a new social bond between unrelated families. Since marriage depended on the recognition of custom, marriage fell within Aryaman's governance. While we have presented Aryaman as the god of customs, Thieme (1938, 1957) and other scholars following him have preferred to see Aryaman more narrowly as the god governing the rules of hospitality. In the absence of a state, the Vedic peoples needed to expect Ārya strangers to recognize and to act according to the customary norms of hospitality. Such norms were critical in creating the possibility of relations among Āryas and therefore in unifying them. Aryaman does not often appear apart from Varuṇa and Mitra and shares their broader roles in maintaining the natural as well as the social world.

Although relatively minor presences, three other gods, Bhaga, the god of fortune, Aṃśa, the god of the share, and Dakṣa, the god of (priestly) skill, are also called Ādityas. Bhaga ensures that people will receive an appropriate portion of the goods of life. He is often linked with Aryaman and with the expectation for the prosperity of a marriage. Aṃśa ensures that people will receive the share of goods owed them, and therefore he is concerned with inheritance. In both cases, the two gods bring goods to people according to their behavior and family identity, and that function brings them within the sphere of social principles represented by the major Ādityas. Like the major Ādityas, Dakṣa is also concerned with right behavior, but in his case, it is the skilled actions of sacrificers. For further on the Ādityas, see Brereton (1981).

H. SAVITAR

Sometimes linked to the Ādityas and especially to Bhaga is the god Savitar. He is the god who "impels" or "compels" beings—and these can include mortals, gods, animals, and objects. He especially acts at the beginning of night, when he sends beings to rest (cf. I.35.2, IV.53.3, VII.45.1). But he also commands the end of the night and the beginning of the day, when he brings forth the sun (I.35.9) and impels beings to action. Because he is associated with the night, he is also connected with the generation of offspring, who would be conceived during the night. Savitar is bright, with golden eyes, golden arms, and golden hands. He stretches out his arms in a gesture of command (II.38.2). Falk (1988: 17–22) reasonably suggests that his brilliance during the night and his outstretched arms point to the Milky Way as a manifestation of Savitar.

I. SŪRYA

If the Milky Way is the celestial embodiment of Savitar, Sūrya, the Sun, comes close to being that of Mitra and Varuṇa. The Sun is their eye, for his gaze is wide (VII.35.8) and falls on everyone (I.50.2). The Sun watches over the good and evil deeds of humans (VI.51.2, VII.60.2–3) and, so the poet hopes, declares the innocence of the sacrificers to Mitra and Varuṇa (VII.60.1, 62.2). The Sun is the felly that rolls toward Mitra and Varuṇa (V.62.2) or the chariot that the two gods set in heaven (V.63.7). Since he is so closely linked to the Ādityas, he himself is called an Āditya (I.50.13, 191.9; VIII.101.11). His link to the Ādityas is also a link to the king, who oversees his subjects the way that the Sun oversees all beings (X.121 and Proferes 2007: 137–41).

However, Sūrya is not associated exclusively with the Ādityas. He is a form of Agni, Agni Vaiśvānara, and the face of Agni. Not only the Ādityas (IV.13.2) or Mitra and Varuṇa (V.63.4), but also Varuṇa and Indra (VII.82.3), Agni (X.3.2), Soma (VI.44.23, IX.86.22), and Indra and Viṣṇu (VII.99.4) are said to have given birth to the Sun, to have caused him rise to heaven, or to have established his brilliance.

A number of images depict the movement of the sun through the heavens. The Sun flies through the air on a chariot pulled by seven horses or seven mares (I.50.8, 9, IV.13.3, V.45.9), or the Sun is a wheel pulled by only one horse, Etaśa (VII.63.2). The Sun is also the “reddish eagle” (V.77.3) or a falcon (V.45.9), or he flies like a falcon (VII.63.5). However, there are relatively few narratives concerning the Sun. One repeated but mysterious story is that Indra stole or tore off the wheel of the Sun. He did so in order to help his ally Kutsa in Kutsa’s battle against Śuṣṇa (I.130.9, 175.4, IV.30.4, V.29.10). What exactly Indra accomplished by doing this and how this helped Kutsa remain unclear.

J. UṢAS “DAWN”

Dawn is one of the few female divinities in the R̥gveda and the most prominent among them. Twenty-one hymns are dedicated to her alone (every maṇḍala but II, VIII, and of course IX containing at least one), many of them displaying high poetic artistry and beauty of imagery, and she is mentioned hundreds of times in the text. She also has an Indo-European pedigree, being cognate with the Greek goddess Eos and the Latin goddess Aurora.

The femininity of Dawn is one of her defining characteristics. She is generally depicted as a beautiful young woman, flirtatious and scantily dressed. Since she embodies the first light of day, she is gleaming and covered with bright ornaments, and her appearance thus strongly contrasts with that of her dark sister Night, a much less prominent goddess, though the ceaseless alternation of Dawn and Night is often remarked on. Her dispelling of the darkness and of fears of night is much appreciated, as she awakens and rouses everyone to their daily activities. Dawn is also, not surprisingly, associated with the god Sun, Sūrya, who is often depicted as following her as her suitor or husband. She is also said to be the mother or possessor of cows—the cows being the milky sky and rays of light at early dawn (see Watkins 1987 and 2009 for the Indo-European trope of "the milk of the dawn cows").

Her associations are not all positive, however. Because she heralds every new day, she reminds men of the unstoppable passage of time and of the aging process, as well as of the generations of men who used to view the dawn but have passed away. Dawn's daily rebirth as an ever-young beauty presents a cruel contrast to the human condition of change and decay. The poets also often reflect on the paradox that each Dawn is new but each is the same as the one before and the one that will come after.

The characteristics of Dawn mentioned above are reflections of the universal nature of dawn, but she also displays culturally specific qualities relating to Vedic ritual. Dawn ushers in the sacrificial day, especially the kindling of the ritual fire preparatory to the early-morning rites, and the interplay between the natural sources of light—dawn and the sun—and the man-made one—fire—is often described as complex and co-determined. Moreover, Dawn is regularly associated with wealth and its distribution to the sacrificial participants and is urged to give generously to them. This association between wealth and dawn has no naturalistic source, but arises from the fact that in R̥gvedic ritual the dakṣiṇās or "priestly gifts" were distributed to the priests and poets at the early-morning rites (rather than at midday, as in classical śrauta ritual).

Despite the vividness of her depiction, Dawn participates very little in narrative mythology, though there is a briefly alluded to (primarily IV.30.8–11) and extremely enigmatic tale in which Indra smashes the cart of "evilly angry" Dawn, and she runs away. Why Indra should turn against this emblem of benevolent femininity is unclear, but the story is also associated with Indra's stealing the wheel off the Sun's chariot, and both may have to do with the perturbation of regular temporal sequences.

K. VĀYU / VĀTA "WIND"

As his name indicates, Vāyu is an ancient god of the Wind, although verses to Vāyu that refer to the phenomenon of wind are somewhat rare and oblique. For example, the roar of Vāyu echoes the sound of the wind, his hundredfold (I.135.3) or thousandfold (I.135.1) team reflects the wind's speed, and the Maruts, who personify thunderstorms especially the monsoon storms, are born from his belly (I.134.4). Such characteristics show Vāyu's close connection to the wind, even though he does not represent the wind directly.

On the soma-pressing day, Vāyu is the first of the gods to receive the soma (I.134.1, 6; VII.92.1; cf. II.11.14), which he drinks unmixed (I.134.5, VII.90.1–2). But Vāyu also arrives with Indra on the same chariot, and the two of them share the first drink of soma. Just how both Vāyu and Vāyu and Indra have the first drink of soma is unclear, but, following a suggestion of Oberlies (1999: 155), perhaps Vāyu's first drink reflects soma's symbolic descent through the midspace as it is filtered, and the first drink of Vāyu and Indra is the first soma libation.

The ordinary word for the wind is vā́ta, and unlike Vāyu, the god Vāta closely reflects the character and activity of the wind. He goes shattering and thundering, raising the dust; he moves through the midspace and is the companion of the waters. The symbolic features of Vāta likewise reflect the wind. Vāta is the breath (ātmán) of the gods (X.168.4), and as the lifebreath, he is the father, brother, and companion of the man whom he makes live (X.186.1–3). Like the Sun and the Dawn, therefore, Vāta, the Wind, is completely transparent to the natural phenomenon to which his name refers.

L. AŚVINS

The Aśvins, the two "Horsemen," are old Indo-Iranian or even Indo-European deities who have been brought into the soma rite. They are also called Nāsatyas, a name of obscure meaning and etymology, found already in an ancient Near Eastern Hatti-Mitanni treaty dating from the fourteenth century BCE (in the form Na-ša-at-ti-i̯a) and in the Avestan cognate, Nā̊ŋhaiθya. It is probably the older name of this pair, with the lexically transparent aśvín originally an epithet. The Aśvins are connected with honey, mádhu, and while soma comes to be called "honeyed" and "honey," mádhu was likely in origin a different offering to the Aśvins. They are also connected with the Pravargya rite and the offering of gharma, hot milk. Because they are two, the Aśvins find a place particularly in the morning soma offerings, which are primarily dedicated to the dual divinities Indra and Vāyu and Mitra and Varuṇa. Reflecting their association with the Morning Pressing, the Aśvins appear in the early dawn: they come at the break of dawn (I.157.1, VII.72.4), follow the chariot of Dawn (VIII.5.2), or accompany the dawn (X.61.4). However, they also receive the last soma offerings in an Atirātra, or Overnight Soma Ritual. Therefore, even if they were secondarily grafted onto the soma rite, that graft was a strong one. They are the fourth most frequently invoked deities in the R̥gveda after Indra, Agni, and Soma.

As "horsemen," the Aśvins are chariot riders and drivers, rather than horse riders. Their chariot is an object of special attention for the poets. It is often threefold, with three chariot-boxes, three wheels, three turnings (I.118.1–2), and three wheel-rims (I.34.2). The sacrifice with its three soma-pressings is compared to a chariot, so the Aśvins' threefold chariot may represent the sacrifice. Their chariot is also swift—"swifter than a mortal's thought" (I.118.1) or than the wink of an eye (VIII.73.2). Their chariot is drawn by various animals including bulls, buffaloes, and horses, but also by birds (I.119.4), geese (IV.45.4), or falcons (I.118.4). Their chariot flies to many places and makes the Aśvins present in many spheres: in heaven, earth, and the sea, in the flood of heaven (VIII.26.17), among plants, and at the peak of a mountain (VII.70.3). The Aśvins' speed and mobility are essential for them, for they are gods who rescue people from various dangers and difficulties in various places and circumstances.

The story of the Aśvins that the poets mention most often is their rescue of Bhujyu, the son of Tugra, whom his father had abandoned in the sea (e.g., I.116.3). They also rescued Rebha from the waters, when he was bound, confined, and left for dead (I.112.5, 116.24, 119.6). They raised up Vandana (I.118.6), although exactly from what is not clear. They rescued Atri from an earth cleft (V.78.4) and from threatening heat (I.112.7). They found Viṣṇāpū, who was lost, and restored him to his father, Viśvaka (I.116.23, 117.7). They restored the youth and vigor of Cyavāna, who had grown old (I.117.13, 118.6; VII.71.5), and of the aging Kali (X.39.8). They brought Kamadyū, the daughter of Purumitra, to be a wife for Vimada (I.116.1, 117.20; X.39.7, 65.12) and gave a son to Vadhrimatī, a woman "whose husband is a steer" (I.116.13, 117.24; X.39.7, 65.12). They restored the sight of Ṛjrāśva, who had been blinded by his father (I.116.16, 117.17, 18). They replaced the lost foot of the mare Viśpalā with a metal shank (I.116.15) and made the cow of Śayu give milk (I.116.22, 117.20, 118.8). They gave a swift, white horse to Pedu (I.116.6, X.39.10), and they set a horse's head on Dadhyañc, the son of Atharvan, in order for him to reveal the honey to them (I.116.12). Not only do they arrange marriage or bring a child to a marriage, they themselves wed or woo Sūryā, the daughter of the Sun. While sometimes the husband of Sūryā is Soma (X.85) or Pūṣan (VI.58.4), elsewhere she chooses the Aśvins as her husbands (I.119.5, IV.43.2, 6, VII.69.3–4) and rides with them on their chariot (I.116.17, VIII.8.10).

What the Aśvins do has been relatively uncontroversial. Why they do it and what is their character have been more difficult questions. Early scholars tried to place them in the natural world: Yāska cites interpreters who understood them to be heaven and earth, day and night, and the sun and the moon. Such interpretations have been largely and rightly abandoned. Early on, Western scholars observed their similarity and therefore possible genetic relationship to the Greek Dioskouroi. Both pairs ride or drive horses; both are young men (koũroi in Greek, yúvānā in Sanskrit); both are sons or, in the case of the Aśvins, perhaps grandsons of Heaven (divó nápātā); both rescue people in trouble; and both are called twins. Focusing on the last characteristic, Zeller (1990) sought to show that the Aśvins' acts reflect above all the fact they are twins. So, for example, she explains their concern with sexuality and rescue as partly due to their birth. Because they have one mother but two fathers, they themselves are endowed with a greater sexual potency, and because one of their fathers is mortal, they are closer to humans and inclined to help them. The circumstances of their birth are not very clear in the R̥gveda, however, and it is not certain that they were often considered twins or that their twinship was their central feature. Along somewhat similar lines, Oberlies (1993) suggests that the Aśvins as dual divinities can extend between opposites. They are essentially gods of the intermediate sphere, who facilitate movement between spheres: between childlessness and birth, death and life, old age and youth, non-marriage and marriage, and so forth. This is a reasonable explanation of the Aśvins, which might be extrapolated from the R̥gvedic evidence, but it is not expressed in it.

M. MARUTS

The Maruts are a troop of male gods. Though they lack individual identities, they are quite prominent as a group: over thirty hymns are dedicated to them alone and several more to them in conjunction with Indra, and they are frequently mentioned elsewhere. Their character has both naturalistic and social aspects. On the one hand, they are the embodiments of the thunderstorm, especially of the monsoon, and many of their aspects reflect this natural phenomenon: like lightning, they are brilliant and flashing, bedecked with ornaments and glittering weapons; like thunder, they are excessively noisy on their wild chariot journeys, causing the earth to shake with fear, bending the trees and even the mountain; like thunderclouds, they are shape-shifting and sometimes clothed in gray; and they are accompanied by floods of rain. The terror they inspire is more than balanced by the fructifying rains they bring. All these physical aspects of the Maruts often inspire the poets to vivid and imaginative language.

As a social phenomenon, the Maruts represent the Männerbund, an association of young men, usually at a stage of life without significant other social ties (such as wife and children), who band together for rampageous and warlike pursuits. The violence of the thunderstorm is akin to the violence of these unruly age-mates, raiding and roistering. It is not unlikely that Vedic society contained and licensed such groups among its young men, given the frequent warfare depicted in the R̥gveda, and the divine Maruts provide the charter for this association and behavior.

The Maruts are not, however, entirely without social ties. Their parentage is clear, though the manner of their birth problematic and disputed—and often alluded to as a mystery. Their mother is a dappled cow, Pr̥śni, who can display androgynous characteristics and behavior; their father is Rudra, and they are often themselves referred to as Rudras. Moreover, they have a female companion, Rodasī. When the word ródasī appears in the dual number, it refers to the two world-halves, but as a singular (also accented rodasī́) it is the name of the Maruts' consort, a beautiful young woman who accompanies them on their chariot. Their normal location in the midspace between the two world-halves is presumably responsible for her name.

Perhaps the Maruts' most important companion is Indra, for whom they serve as a sort of posse: marútvant "accompanied by the Maruts" is one of Indra's standing epithets. Their major role in dynamic mythology was to provide support and encouragement to Indra before the Vṛtra battle, an episode also treated in Vedic prose narratives. But, according to one of the most striking hymns in the Ṛgveda, I.165, a dialogue among Indra, the Maruts, and the seer Agastya, Indra disputed the extent of their aid at that time. In this hymn Indra and the Maruts argue over their respective rights to a sacrifice offered by Agastya; Indra asserts his rights in part because he claims the Maruts abandoned him to fight Vṛtra alone, though elsewhere in the Ṛgveda (and later) there is no doubt about their supportive role in that combat.

This mythological contretemps has its reflection also in ritual, in fact to a ritual change occurring during the Ṛgvedic period. Although in some of the Family Books Indra alone is the recipient of the offering at the Midday Pressing, in Maṇḍalas III and VI, in scattered mentions elsewhere, and in the classical śrauta ritual, the Maruts share the Midday Pressing with Indra. The tense negotiations among Indra, the Maruts, and the sacrificer Agastya in I.165 and I.170–171 suggest that the change in recipients of the midday oblation was a contested topic for Ṛgvedic ritualists and the inclusion of the Maruts needed and was given mythological underpinning.

N. HEAVEN AND EARTH

One of the most remarkable and satisfying phrasal equations across the older Indo-European languages is that of Vedic dyaúṣ pitā́ "father Heaven" with Greek Zeus Pater and Latin Jupiter, thus attesting to a deified paternal Heaven for Proto-Indo-European as well as the older daughter languages. Ironically perhaps, the Vedic god, the meaning of whose name is still transparent and lexically additive, is far less important in the Vedic pantheon than his correspondents in the Classical languages, where the original semantics have become attenuated or have disappeared entirely.

In the Ṛgveda, Heaven as a divinity is generally paired with the female Earth, who is frequently referred to as "mother," with the two a complementary parental pair. They are normally grammatically joined in a dual dvandva compound (dyā́vā-pṛthivī́), and several hymns are dedicated to this couple. If Heaven and Earth are the archetypal parents, who are their progeny? This is mentioned less than one might expect, but in a few hymns it is clearly stated that the gods are their children and especially the Sun. A less beneficent aspect of Heaven's fatherhood is found in a myth, obliquely but vividly referred to a few times in the Ṛgveda (I.71.5, 8; X.61.5–7) and told more clearly in Vedic prose (though with Prajāpati substituting for Heaven)—namely his rape of his own daughter.

Heaven and Earth also give shape to and encompass the cosmos, providing a safe enclosure within which life can flourish. The separation of the two to create this space is the primal cosmogonic moment, and Indra's accomplishment of this separation by propping them apart is endlessly celebrated.

O. TVAṢṬAR

The meaning of Tvaṣṭar's name is fully transparent: he is the "Fashioner," who "adorned all the creatures with their forms" (X.110.9) and who knows all living things (IV.42.3). But his role is more complex than his name might imply. He is the father of Indra (III.48.2–4, IV.18), whom Indra displaced and from whom Indra stole the soma (III.48.4). On the other hand, Tvaṣṭar fashioned Indra's distinctive weapon, the mace, for him (I.32.2, V.31.4, VI.17.10, X.48.3). Tvaṣṭar is also sometimes called the father of Agni (III.7.4), and he is the god who has begotten offspring (III.55.19; cf. III.4.9). His role as a father perhaps explains his close relationship with the Wives of the Gods (I.22.9, 161.4; II.1.5, 31.4, 36.3; VII.35.6), with whom he is ritually joined.

P. R̥BHUS

In some forms of the soma sacrifice, the three R̥bhus have a significant role as principal soma recipients in the Third Pressing. But despite that role, they have a limited presence in the R̥gveda itself. Only ten hymns are dedicated to the R̥bhus, together with one other that invokes the R̥bhus along with Indra. Nonetheless, despite their decidedly low profile in the R̥gveda, their principal actions emerge clearly. The R̥bhu hymns repeatedly return to five great deeds for which the R̥bhus are famed. They took a soma cup made by the god Tvaṣṭar and fashioned it into four cups (III.60.2; IV.33.5, 35.2, 3, 36.4). They made a chariot, sometimes identified as the chariot of the Aśvins (I.20.3, 111.1, 161.3; IV.33.8). They created the two fallow bay horses of Indra (I.20.2, 111.1; III.60.2; IV.33.10, 34.9, 35.5). They fashioned a cow, or made a cow give milk, or carved up a cow (I.20.3, 110.8, 161.7, 10; IV.33.4). And lastly, they rejuvenated their aging parents (I.20.4, 110.8, 111.1; IV.33.3, 35.5, 36.3). Significantly, as a result of these creative acts, the R̥bhus are said to have attained immortality or to have become gods.

Their skillful acts are essentially priestly, and their great deeds reflect ritual acts or, more specifically, ritual acts at the Third Pressing. The four soma cups they created are the cups of the four principal soma-drinkers: Indra and the three R̥bhus. As mentioned above, the Aśvins' chariot can represent the sacrifice, and therefore the chariot they made could be the sacrifice in general. The creation of the fallow bays of Indra is reflected by a special soma offering in the Third Pressing that marks the departure of the two horses of Indra. The cow over which they work may represent the soma stalks from the previous soma-pressings, which are pressed again at the Third Pressing. The R̥bhus cause these depleted "cows" to release even more milk, which is the soma juice. Their last deed, the rejuvenation of their parents, is more mysterious, but it might represent the return or "rejuvenation" of the Aśvins at the end of the sacrifice in an Overnight rite or it could reflect the rejuvenation of the sacrificer and his wife, since the fertility of the sacrificing couple is a theme of the Third Pressing. For a more detailed discussion of the acts of the R̥bhus and their meaning, see Brereton (2012).

Q. PŪṢAN

Although Pūṣan is a minor god in the R̥gveda, with only eight hymns dedicated to him alone and several more shared with more prominent divinities (Indra and Soma), his idiosyncratic characteristics and the special diction used in his hymns attract more than his share of attention to him. Of the bardic families, only the Bharadvājas of Maṇḍala VI favor this god; they dedicate five hymns to him (VI.53–56, 58) with a further one to Pūṣan and Indra (VI.57) and a significant portion of the composite hymn VI.48; the three other hymns exclusive to him are found in I and X.

The characteristics ascribed to him are humble and somewhat countrified: his draft-animals are goats, his tools generally an awl and a goad, his food of choice is porridge, and the skills he deploys for us are especially the protection of the roads and the finding of lost articles, particularly cattle. The level of discourse is often colloquial and lively, though he is occasionally celebrated in a register more appropriate to loftier divinities.

One striking feature does not fit this profile: Pūṣan in several passages is said to be the husband or consort of Sūryā, the daughter of the Sun, who is the archetypal bride in the R̥gveda, and he is also said to be the lover of his sister and the wooer of his mother (VI.55.4–5), though this apparent incest provokes no blame. The tangled family relations thus alluded to are not treated in any detail, so we are left with only tantalizing clues.

R. VIṢṆU

In the middle Vedic period, Viṣṇu became a central figure as the embodiment of the sacrifice itself and therefore of a power that can exceed even the might of the gods. In classical India, of course, he finds an even greater destiny. There is little sign of those futures of Viṣṇu in the R̥gveda, since it has only a half dozen hymns dedicated to Viṣṇu or to Indra and Viṣṇu (I.154, 155, 156; VI.69; VII.99, 100). Viṣṇu appears alongside Indra fairly often, especially in his battle with Vr̥tra (IV.18.11, VI.20.2, VIII.100.12), and he is also Indra's partner and ally generally. The only acts that are especially his are his three strides or three steps. With these strides Viṣṇu encompasses the earth, and with his third step he disappears into a realm where none can follow (I.155.4–5). Or he enters into heaven where there is the "wellspring of honey," the source of soma (I.154.5), or the highest cattle-pen (III.55.10). He is therefore the god who is wide-ranging (urugāyá) and wide-striding (urukramá). The purpose of his strides is to create space and a place for people to live and move (I.155.4, VI.49.13, VII.100.4). This purpose could explain Viṣṇu's close connection with Indra in the fight with Vṛtra, since Vṛtra represents what confines and hinders, and Viṣṇu's strides what opens and frees. The strides of Viṣṇu in the Ṛgveda anticipate the strides that Viṣṇu takes as Vāmana, the dwarf avatar of classical Hinduism, and also in the middle Vedic literature Viṣṇu as the sacrifice is a dwarf (ŚB I.2.5.5). However, there is no direct evidence that Viṣṇu already has the form of a dwarf in the Ṛgveda.

S. RUDRA

Although Rudra, under his euphemistic epithet Śiva, "the kindly one," has, of course, an extraordinarily great future in classical Hinduism, in the Ṛgveda he has a very circumscribed role, with only three complete hymns dedicated to him. He has two major and complementary characteristics: on the one hand, he is fierce and malevolent, with an often inexplicable anger that needs to be appeased; on the other, he is a healer, who controls the remedies for disease. He is also, as noted above, the father of the Maruts, who are much more prominent in our text.

T. SARASVATĪ AND THE RIVERS

Another divinity with a great future ahead but little prominence in our text is the goddess Sarasvatī. Again the Ṛgveda provides little or no evidence for her later role as patron of learning and the arts, though a number of scholars have attempted to find it. Instead she is celebrated, in the three hymns dedicated to her and in other mentions in the text, simply as a physical river with a powerful flow, which is sometimes destructive but which also provides fecundity with its fructifying waters. Other rivers are also praised in the Ṛgveda, especially the Sindhu in a hymn dedicated to the rivers in general.

U. VĀC "SPEECH"

One last goddess should be mentioned, Vāc or deified Speech (a noun with feminine gender). Although this goddess figures in a number of mythological narratives in the middle Vedic period, and although she ultimately seems to have become conflated with Sarasvatī, thus amplifying the status of both goddesses, in the Ṛgveda she appears as a clear personage very rarely, most prominently in a late hymn (X.125), which is a 1st-person self-praise (ātmastuti) spoken by Vāc herself.

VI. Ṛgvedic People and Society

A. ṚGVEDA AS HISTORY

A number of scholars have treated the question of the historical background of the Ṛgveda and to what extent we can extract historical information from the names of kings and peoples, the events they are depicted as participating in, and the place names where these events are depicted as occurring or where the kings and their retinues are depicted as living. We do not intend to enter into these issues and will simply make global reference to the many works of Michael Witzel (e.g., Witzel 1995a, 1995b), who has been especially active in discussing these questions in recent decades.

We will only note here that the Ṛgveda contains a large number of certain or likely personal names (see Mayrhofer 2003). Besides the poets and their ancestors, many of the names belong to royal patrons and are therefore especially common in dānastutis. Some kings have a presence outside of dānastutis, however; particularly noteworthy are the Tṛtsu or Bharata King Sudās ("Good Giver"), the victor in the famous Battle of the Ten Kings treated in VII.18, whose forces also crossed a formidable barrier of rivers, as depicted in the dialogue hymn III.33, and King Trasadasyu, whose Royal Consecration may form the subject of the dialogue hymn IV.42. Others belong to human enemies of the poet and his group, whose defeat the gods (generally Indra) aid our side in effecting, or to clients of various gods, especially the Aśvins, who receive help from these divine patrons. Needless to say, the "reality" of those named, especially in the last two groups, cannot be ascertained.

B. ĀRYAS, DĀSAS, AND DASYUS

The people of the Ṛgveda refer to themselves as Āryas, which probably meant the "civilized" ones or something similar. Under this term they define their own group as the people who sacrifice to the gods, who adhere to Vedic customs, who speak Indo-Aryan languages, and who in other ways identify themselves with Vedic culture. They also refer to themselves as mā́nuṣa and mānavá, the "sons of Manu" or the "peoples of Manu," for the legendary Manu (mánu simply means "man") was the one who first instituted the sacrifice and was therefore the founder of Vedic religious culture. They also called themselves the "five peoples" (páñca jánāḥ, carṣaṇáyaḥ, or kṛṣṭáyaḥ), who lived in the "five directions" (páñca pradíśaḥ)—the cardinal directions and the center—or in the five lands (páñca bhū́mā; cf. Proferes 2007: 62). Corresponding to this world of five peoples in five lands, the Ṛgveda also mentions five major Ārya tribes or tribal federations—the Pūru, Yadu, Turvaśa, Anu, and Druhyu—who can, at one time or another, be allies or enemies of each other. Even these major tribes may not have been stable social units, and they are not the only social groupings mentioned in the Ṛgveda. Including the major tribes, Witzel (1995a: 313) lists around thirty social groups named in the Ṛgveda, but notes that it is not clear which of these were extended families or clans or tribes or confederations.

The primary social units that made up larger tribal units were the víś. There has been much discussion about how to characterize the víś (cf. Proferes 2007: 15–16). Generally speaking, scholars either see the víś as a "clan," which was composed of related lineages, or a "settlement" of a kinship group. The former emphasizes the perceived relation of the people belonging to the víś; the latter, their shared locality. We have translated víś as "clan," although our primary intention has not been to adjudicate between these two views but to find a consistent translation. The head of the clan was the viśpáti, the "clanlord," who led his clan and represented it within larger social units, such as a tribe. The clan was itself composed of different extended families, themselves led by a gr̥hápati or dámpati, a "houselord." Sacrificers generally came from the ranks of these clanlords and houselords. Larger social units composed of several clans were led by a rā́jan, a "king" or, as others prefer, a "chieftain," who was chosen from among the viśpatis by the viśpatis of the clans that formed these units. These groups of clans then formed parts of larger tribes or confederations, also led by a king. The R̥gvedic saṃrā́j or "sovereign king" was likely a king whose rule included other social units that also had their kings. The saṃrā́j was differentiated from the svarā́j "independent king," who ruled without interference from other lesser or greater rulers. While there is good reason and good evidence to believe that kings were selected by clanlords or lesser kings, there is also evidence for the lineal descent of kings, at least of the kings of major tribal confederations (cf. Witzel 1995a: 330, 336).

The nature of a king's rule was also affected by cycles of settlement patterns. Periods of fixed settlement (kṣéma) alternated with periods of movement (yóga, lit. "yoking up"). During the former the clans tended their cattle and raised crops, more or less in peace, in more or less fixed habitations. During the latter they traveled into new areas to gain new lands or to take cattle from other clans or tribes, or they confronted others moving into their territories. These two periods of settlement and movement may have been fixed according to the seasons of the year. In periods of mobilization the clans were governed by a king who could lead them in battle. This king was an embodiment of Indra, a war-king, a svarā́j, who required obedience from his subjects. During times of settlement the king was an embodiment of Varuṇa or of Mitra and Varuṇa, who maintained the peace among his people. He could be a saṃrā́j, who ruled, perhaps more loosely, over other rulers. The "war-king" and the "peace-king" might have been two different people, but more likely these represent two roles that a king might or must play. According to our understanding, in IV.42 King Trasadasyu is both Indra and Varuṇa, the king both in war and in peace.

The Āryas fought among themselves, but their enemies were often groups of non-Āryas, called Dāsas or Dasyus, who may, or may not, have been non-Indo-Aryans. The opposition between Āryas and Dāsas or Dasyus was not an unbridgeable divide. There are many people, clans, and tribes in the Veda who have names without likely Indo-European derivation. Witzel (1999: 359–60) gives a "fairly comprehensive list" of Vedic "tribal and (some) clan names" that includes names from the R̥gveda. Of these he counts twenty-two that are non-Indo-Aryan names. The evidence is rough, but it suggests that at some point in their histories these people had adopted Vedic culture and had become part of the Ārya community. The distinction between Āryas and Dāsas or Dasyus, therefore, was essentially a cultural and political one. The Dāsas and Dasyus were people who had not adopted or not yet adopted the customs and behaviors of the R̥gvedic Āryas and therefore were not part of the Ārya community. Exactly who the Dāsas and Dasyus were—as opposed to who they were not—is a more difficult problem. They must have been people and cultures either indigenous to South Asia or already in South Asia—from wherever or whenever they may have come—when the carriers of R̥gvedic culture and religion moved into and through the northwest of the subcontinent.

According to the evidence of the R̥gveda the Dasyus are regularly the enemies of the Āryas, and the poets repeatedly ask the gods' help against them. R̥gveda X.22.8 lays out the character of the Dasyu according to the R̥gvedic poets. He is akarmán "of non-deeds," that is, he does not perform the sacrificial rites. He is amantú "of non-thought" because he does not know the truths formulated in the Vedic hymns and therefore is unable to articulate these truths. He is anyávrata, one "whose commandments are other" than the commandments of the gods. And he is ámānuṣa "no son of Manu" and therefore one who does not belong to the Vedic peoples. The Dasyus are not only other than the Āryas, they are hostile to the Āryas. The poets accuse them of having cunning tricks or wiles (māyā́, IV.16.9, VIII.14.14, X.73.5) that they use against the Āryas, and they call on the gods, especially Indra but also Agni and Soma, to strike the Dasyus down (VI.29.6), drive them off (V.31.7), or blow them away (I.33.9, X.55.8). Such Dasyus are human, although some of them may have been demonized humans or beings on the way to becoming demons.

There is a great degree of overlap between Dasyus and Dāsas, since both names can be used of the same beings (I.103.3, IV.28.4, V.30.9). Like the Dasyus, the Dāsas are also humans and usually they are enemies of the Āryas. Indra destroys them (IV.30.15, 21;VI.20.10, 47.21, X.120.2) and their fortresses (II.20.7, IV.32.10). However, the use of Dāsa in the R̥gveda is more complex than that of Dasyu. Since the greatest enemy of Indra, Vr̥tra, is a Dāsa (I.32.11, II.11.2, IV.18.9) but not a Dasyu, the Dāsas apparently penetrated further into the nonhuman realm as demonic beings. Such a nonhuman Dāsa occurs also in X.99.6, where Indra "subdued the mightily roaring Dāsa with his six eyes and three heads." However, dāsá can mean "servant, slave" already in some R̥gvedic passages. According to VIII.56.3, a man named Dasyave Vr̥ka, "Wolf to the Dasyu," has given to the poet "a hundred donkeys," "a hundred wooly ewes, a hundred slaves (dāsá), and garlands beyond that" (cf. also VII.86.7, X.62.10). These *dāsá*s were obviously not enemies of the Āryas, at least not as long as they were subordinate to them. The R̥gveda also shows less insistence on the Dāsas' cultural difference from the Āryas than on the Dasyus'—Dāsas are not described as akarmán, amantú, anyávrata, ámānuṣa, and the like. However, the poets sharply distinguish between Āryas and Dāsas (V.34.6, VI.25.2, X.86.19) and worry that the Dāsas have wealth that should belong to Āryas (II.12.4). Yet they also can have ties to the Āryas. In VIII.46.32, a dānastuti verse, the poet mentions a wealthy Dāsa named Balbūtha Tarukṣa, from whom he says he received a hundred camels. Although Balbūtha's name is not Indo-Aryan and although he is called a Dāsa, he had apparently employed the poet, presumably to compose hymns and to sacrifice for him. Therefore, he must have had one foot in Ārya culture, if not quite in the Ārya community.

In summary, the Dasyus and Dāsas are overlapping categories of peoples opposed to the Āryas, and the poets call on the gods to defeat them for the sake of the Āryas. However, sometimes Dāsas may have been rivals to the Āryas or may even have been at the fringes the Ārya community rather than inevitable enemies of Āryas. For a thorough discussion of the attestions of dásyu, dāsá, and dā́sa in the R̥gveda and later Vedas, see Hale (1986: 146–69). The above summary is very much indebted to Hale's work, but Hale is inclined to see a racial distinction between the Āryas and the Dasyus or Dāsa that is not justified by the evidence.

C. SOCIAL AND POLITICAL ORGANIZATION

The R̥gveda is the product of an elite segment of society, and it no doubt reflects only a small part of even elite religious life. For example, the life-cycle rituals that are so important in the late Vedic period, chronicled in the gr̥hya sūtras, are only tangentially treated in the R̥gveda, and we get only glimpses of the dharmic prescriptions that later ordered daily life, as preserved in the *dharma sūtra*s of the late Vedic period and the *dharma śāstra*s that followed them. The religious beliefs and practices of the non-elite are completely absent from the text, except perhaps in obscure and slighting references to practices that do not conform to R̥gvedic standards.

Outside of the religious sphere we have almost no direct evidence of social or political organization and very little information about how people, ordinary or elite, spent their days. We learn a little about the various trades plied by members of society, mostly by way of incidental similes or poetic images. Most of what we learn in this sphere is about stock-raising, since the cow and the bull are both such powerful symbols in the poetry. We also learn a bit about the leisure pursuits of the elite, especially dicing and horse racing.

All of this is to say that it is unwise to use the evidence of the hymns uncritically to speculate on Vedic society. Not only does the text concern a very small percentage of the population, but even in that population its focus is very narrow. Moreover, everything we learn is shaped by the pragmatic purpose of the hymns as well as by the poetic sensibilities of their composers. Nonetheless, we can venture some very general remarks about social organization.

There is no evidence in the R̥gveda for an elaborate, much-subdivided, and overarching caste system such as pertains in classical Hinduism. There is some evidence in the late R̥gveda for the fourfold division of society into *varṇa*s, the large social classes so prominent in the later legal texts. But even this system seems to be embryonic in the R̥gveda and, both then and later, a social ideal rather than a social reality. The clearest evidence for it is found in the so-called Puruṣasūkta or "Hymn of the Man" (X.90), in which the body parts of the Ur-man correspond to the four varṇas, hierarchically arranged (vs. 12): the brahmin is his mouth, the kṣatriya (there called rājanya) his arms, the vaiśya his thighs, and the śūdra is produced from his feet. But this hymn is generally considered to have been a quite late addition to the text, perhaps to provide a charter myth for the varṇa system after it had taken more definite shape. Otherwise, the late R̥gveda provides some evidence for the beginnings of a formal contrast between brahmaṇic and kṣatriyan powers; for example, in the final verses of VIII.36 and VIII.37, which are identical save for bráhmāṇi "priestly formulations" in VIII.36.7 and kṣatrā́ṇi "lordly powers" in VIII.37.7; the hymn preceding this pair contains a tr̥ca (VIII.35.16–18), in which each of the three verses calls for blessings appropriate to one of the three upper varṇas (though they are not named as such).

The rest of the R̥gveda does attest to a division of labor and complementary and reciprocal relationship between rā́jan "kings" (whatever form this kingship took at this period) and the poets and priests who performed their sacrifices and composed the accompanying poetry (as well as the secular royal encomia whose existence we can posit though we have no direct evidence for them [see Jamison 2007: chap. 4, esp. 146–48]). This poet–patron relationship is especially on view in the dānastutis that were already discussed above. The status and pursuits of the "producers" or vaiśyas are barely and glancingly alluded to in the text, primarily in similes and the like.

We might here spare a few words for the creatures who are otherwise invisible in the social and political structures, namely women. As is quite common for ancient societies, we don't know much, but the few female figures that appear in the text tend to be quite vivid. Given their general absence from the R̥gveda, females appear disproportionately as speakers in dialogue hymns—both divine and semi-divine figures such as Indrāṇī, wife of Indra (X.86) and the Apsaras Urvaśī, once married to the mortal Purūravas (X.95), or human or semi-human women such as Lopāmudrā, wife of the legendary seer Agastya (I.179), or Yamī, the first (almost) mortal with her twin Yama (X.10). The females in these hymns are quite outspoken, usually about sex, and their male conversation partners tend to look weak and helpless in comparison. For possible linguistic features of women's speech as represented in the R̥gveda, see Jamison (2008a, 2009b, 2009c).

But none of these female speakers is depicted as a real, contemporary woman, and what we know of that class is extremely limited. Beautiful sexy women are sometimes recorded by the poet as a particularly appealing feature of the gift celebrated in his dānastuti, and Dawn is often compared to everyday women—either good, eager wives or not-so-good, eager courtesans. One must make allowance for male fantasy at this period, as in so many others. Mothers are tenderly described, but in generic fashion, and we also learn something about the contracting and solemnizing of marriage, both in the wedding hymn (X.85) and in the numerous mentions of the wedding of Sūryā, daughter of the Sun, which appears to have been of a Svayaṃvara ("self-choice") type, familiar from later Sanskrit literature, particularly the weddings of Damayantī and Nala and of Draupadī and the Paṇḍava brothers in the Mahābhārata.

The Anukramaṇī attributes a few hymns to females, for example XIII.91 to Apālā Ātreyī and X.39–40 to Ghoṣā Kākṣīvatī, but these ascriptions are derived from the personnel depicted in the hymn itself. There is no reason to assume that the poet was female in these cases. A particularly egregious example is the attribution of the very interesting X.109 to Juhū Brahmajāyā, or "Sacrificial Ladle, Wife of Brahma [/ the brahmin]," based on the appearance of both those terms in the text.

Although there is no real evidence for female poets, there is evidence in the late R̥gveda for women in a ritual role, that is, as Sacrificer's Wife (patnī). This is a standard and required role in the classical śrauta ritual of the middle Vedic period (discussed extensively in Jamison 1996a), and it appears to be a ritual innovation, much disputed, in the late R̥gveda (see discussion in Jamison 2011 and forthcoming a and b).

VII. Language and Poetics

A. GRAMMATICAL STRUCTURE AND LANGUAGE USE

Sanskrit is an inflectional language with an especially rich morphology, and most of the grammatical information that is carried in English by word order and by separate elements such as prepositions and auxiliary verbs is coded in Sanskrit on the word itself. R̥gvedic poets glory in their grammar and are skillful in exploiting not only the many distinctions it provides but also grammatical ambiguities and neutralizations of grammatical distinctions. Moreover, since basic information, such as the identity of the grammatical subject and object, is coded on the word, the poet is free to use word order for rhetorical purposes, placing particularly significant words in emphatic positions such as initial in the verse line. When possible, we have tried to reproduce these effects, but all too often, given the very different structure of English, the result of a well-intentioned effort to follow the Sanskrit word order is at best awkward and artificial, and at worst unintelligible. This is discussed further in section VIII below.

Even the briefest sketch of Vedic grammar would be out of place here. We refer the interested reader to Jamison (2004b) for a very skeletal account and to any standard Sanskrit reference grammar for more details. Macdonell's Vedic Grammar for Students (Macdonell 1916) is admirably clear and informative, and the classic Sanskrit reference grammar is Whitney (1889). However, in some of the hymn introductions we do make reference to certain grammatical facts, and some of these we will mention here. The Sanskrit noun has eight grammatical cases, expressing most of the syntactic relations pertaining in a sentence, including subject (nominative case), direct object (accusative case), possessor (genitive case), and so on. The noun also has three numbers, singular, dual, and plural, and three genders, masculine, feminine, and neuter. The verb is even more complex. Its basic unit is a nine-member grid of three persons (1st [I/we], 2nd [you], 3rd [he, she, it, they]) and three numbers (matching those of the noun) of the subject of the verb form (Table I.1).

TABLE I.1. Sanskrit Verb Forms.

I	we two	we (all)
you (sg.) ["thou"]	you two	you (all)
he, she, it	they two	they (all)

This basic unit is deployed in a plethora of tenses and moods, including at least three ways to express the past tense (the imperfect, aorist, and perfect tenses). Of these three, the aorist is often used to express the immediate past (in English, "has [just] done" vs. "did") and is therefore frequently encountered in ritual situations, in which the poet announces a sacrificial act as just completed (like the kindling of the fire) or a poem just composed. The verbal system also has a special category called the injunctive, which has no formal marking for tense or mood and therefore can be employed in a variety of functions—an ambiguity that the poets often exploit.

Such is the structure of the language in general. We should now consider how the poets utilized their language and what stylistic choices they made among the many possibilities afforded them by the grammar. We should first remark that the language we encounter in the R̥gveda was almost surely not the standard everyday idiom of the poets themselves. Instead, they composed in a deliberately archaic and deliberately elevated register appropriate to the poetic tradition they belonged to and the solemn nature and high sacred purpose of their hymns. Such reaching for the archaic and the elevated is common across religious traditions; one need only glance at modern prayer books and liturgies, even those supposedly updated to reflect contemporary language, to encounter the same phenomenon. The problem with regard to the R̥gveda is, of course, that we possess no control sample of the "standard everyday" language of the poets, though occasional forays into a lower register as well as phonological and morphological forms embedded in the text that show developments characteristic of later forms of Sanskrit and Middle Indo-Aryan give us some hints of what everyday language might have been, and the language of the only slightly later text, the Atharvaveda, may be closer (though certainly not identical) to what the poets spoke "at home."

Although most of the R̥gveda is couched in very-high-register language, the poets sometimes, sometimes quite abruptly, slip into what appears to be a colloquial, even slangy, register—a switch that almost always has a dramatic purpose. These passages are especially found in dānastutis, which are often filled with puns, often obscene, and obscure terms, and characterized by "popular" phonological and morphological forms. When women's speech is represented in the text, it also appears to belong to a lower register, and the technical terms of Vedic pastimes like dicing and horse-racing and occupations like stockbreeding and agriculture introduce us to lexical levels different from the high style of praise poetry and again presumably closer to ordinary language. Not surprisingly, it is harder to determine the meaning and reference of the words in these low-register passages than those in the elevated discourse that generally prevails in the R̥gveda, and many of our translations of such passages are provisional. Insofar as possible we have tried to signal the change in register by using more idiomatic and slangy English. (Needless to say, our translations of these parts will soon be dated. Such is the fate of slang, both now and in antiquity.) For further discussion of low register in the text, see Jamison (2008a, 2009b, 2009c).

The poets' manipulation of language was not limited to change of register. The most significant and salient feature of the poets' relationship to language is their deliberate pursuit of obscurity and complexity. The strong privileging of obscurity is found in all aspects of R̥gvedic poetry, and we will mention only a few aspects here. To begin with mythology, the poets seldom (we would venture to say never) relate a myth fully and in chronological order; instead they shatter the narrative line by ignoring chronology, omitting key plot elements, and obsessively focusing on a few moments, alluding briefly and obliquely to the myth and deliberately failing to identify the actors in the myth. The same is true for ritual: well-known steps in ritual procedure (like the kindling of the fire or the mixing of soma with milk) are shrouded in metaphor and figurative language and do not always appear in their ritual order. The fondness for riddles and enigmas, to be discussed below, places the puzzle-to-be-solved at the heart of the intellectual and poetic enterprise.

And so it is also with their use of language. The poets push their syntax to the limits of intelligibility (and, at least for us, sometimes beyond) by permutations of word order, radically breaking up constituents and scattering their words through a verse, omitting key constituents (like the direct object or even the verb), and violating expected case frames and other grammatical conventions. They delight in confecting variant morphological forms, and the vocabulary they use is simply enormous relative to the size of the text: Grassmann's lexicon of the R̥gveda is a very fat volume, with 1685 pages of lemmata—a giant word-hoard, full of rarities and hapax legomena, slang and colloquialisms. Determining the meaning and reference of R̥gvedic words has always been one of the greatest challenges in Vedic studies, going all the way back to the indigenous lexicographer Yāska in the mid-first millennium BCE. Even words that are continued into later Sanskrit often have radically different values in the R̥gveda from their later representatives. (Especially cogent examples are the resonant terms dharma(n) and brahma(n), which cannot be read with their later values.) But many words simply do not appear in later Sanskrit or in Middle-Indo-Aryan. Much help is given by cognates in other Indo-European languages, especially closely related Avestan, and from Indo-Iranian and Indo-European root etymologies. But of course cognates and root etymologies are not always a reliable guide to synchronic semantics, as meaning changes over time and space, and some words are simply isolated, attested only once (the technical term for this is hapax, or more fully hapax legomenon) or only a few times in non-diagnostic contexts. We have often signaled such words in the introductions to individual hymns, although we generally give at least a provisional translation. Again, the poets clearly revel in their lexical riches, employing what seem like dozens of synonyms and near-synonyms for key concepts (like "shine" or "sing") and seeking out rarities and archaisms.

Why is obscurity so highly prized in the R̥gvedic aesthetic? On the conceptual level it has to do with the audience—or the most important members of the audience—as well as the target of the composition, namely the gods. The aim of the poets is to praise the gods at the sacrifice. But it can't be just any praise, tired repetitions of already hackneyed formulae—for the gods are connoisseurs. They of course already know their own fine qualities and formidable deeds, and they have attended countless sacrifices where these have been recounted. In order to ensure that the gods will come, and keep coming, to our sacrifice, not that of some competing sacrificer, we have to trick out the same underlying material—"you are great, and your deeds and gifts are great"—in ever novel fashion, with imagery and turns of phrase to embellish and transform the same underlying message. For, as prose texts not too much later than the R̥gveda regularly say, "the gods love the obscure" (or literally, what is "out of sight"). Thus it is the gods' taste for the recondite that shapes the humans' poetic products. The poets regularly boast that they are producing "a new hymn"—for example, in the felicitous phrasing of III.31.19, "I make new (the hymn) born of old" (návyaṃ kr̥ṇomi…purājā́m). This statement indirectly draws attention to another reason for the prizing of obscurity: the poets are working in an old tradition, and each poet takes pride in making something new using inherited techniques.

It is the "born of old" feature that gives the answer to a question we have only implicitly posed: if the poets are pushing their language to the very limits, how can it be intelligible? It is because of the very stereotyped and limited nature of the subject matter and the shared universe of discourse among the poets, the human audience, and the putative divine audience. Everyone knows the great deeds of Indra or the step-by-step procedure for purifying the soma juice, and they can recognize their plain outlines under the fancy-dress embellishments and recherché conceits in which the poet has clothed them. The audience can complete a truncated phrase with the proper missing word because the full phrase is always in their heads. They can unscramble the syntax and rechronologize the narrative and identify the mythic actors indicated only by masking pronouns. A wider range of poetic subjects would in fact have constrained the poets' verbal exuberance, because they could not so fully have relied on the unconsciously shared background knowledge of their hearers. For us this background knowledge is hard and consciously won and will be forever incomplete, but we must try to read the poems with an awareness of the performance context in which they would have been received.

B. HYMN TYPES AND STRUCTURING DEVICES

There is no single, universally applicable template to which all, or even most, R̥gvedic hymns conform. At best we can state the uselessly vague obvious: most hymns praise a god or gods, often with reference to their attributes and deeds, and explicitly or implicitly request goods and services from the divinities in return for this praise. This exchange is often effected during the sacrifice at which we hope they are present, either because they are part of the sacrificial paraphernalia (like Agni and Soma) or have come as invited guests. Within these extremely loose parameters, the poets take many different approaches, often emphasizing one element of the overall program while backgrounding or ignoring others. Indeed sometimes even the "praise" portion of the overall genre "praise hymn" seems to have been entirely elided. Because of the multifarious nature of the hymns, we have provided an introduction to each individual hymn, describing its particular preoccupations and structures and its particular deployment of shared tropes and themes. In what follows here, we will first just pick out a few especially common tropes that can dominate single hymns—this is a representative, not exhaustive selection. We will then discuss formal devices that provide structure to whole hymns. Our underlying assumption throughout is that hymns should be approached as hymns, not as mere unordered collections of loosely linked verses, and that it behooves the investigator to seek structure and coherence even when the hymn seems on the surface to lack them.

In hymns that do roughly conform to the sacrificial model just outlined, we can single out two salient aspects, which sometimes carry all or most of an entire hymn: the invitation and the journey. Many hymns begin with an invitation to the god to come to our sacrifice, and some hymns make this invitation the focus of the whole. Many other hymns focus on the god's journey to the sacrifice (e.g., VII.24)—the hitching up of horses and chariot, the progress from heaven through the midspace and across the earth, often passing over other sacrificers on the way (see, e.g., III.35). The epiphany of the god, his arrival at our ritual ground, can be the climax of the hymn (for a superb example of this genre, see the Marut hymn I.88). Not surprisingly, the invitation and the journey are often combined in a single hymn.

The progress through the sacrifice, itself a kind of journey, is also a frequent organizational device. Sometimes this organization is quite precise, as in the hymns that follow an ordered series of oblations, like the Praügaśastra (I.2–3), the R̥tugrahas (I.15, II.36–37), or, especially, the Āprī litany of the Animal Sacrifice, ten versions of which are found scattered through the R̥gveda. More often the ritual progress is less formalized—for instance, the dawn sacrifice, first signaled by the approach of the goddess Dawn, the rising of the sun, and the kindling of the ritual fire, followed by the arrival of the gods who receive the offerings at the Morning Pressing, especially Vāyu, Indra, and the Aśvins, and the distribution of the priestly gifts or dakṣiṇās (see, e.g., VII.78).

A favored verbal conundrum, the riddle, not infrequently furnishes the subject matter for whole hymns, in which each verse provides a puzzle, to which the answer may or may not be given within the verse itself. The most famous example of this is I.164, an All God hymn frequently referred to as "the riddle hymn," but many other hymns have the same basic structure—for example, "the weapon hymn" (VI.75) and the delightful All God hymn VIII.29. Numerology is often an important part of these riddle hymns. Riddle hymns are generally formally structured as lists (see below).

A number of hymns, especially, although not exclusively, late hymns, reflect on the nature or performance of the ritual and the functions of poets and priests. The Puruṣasūkta just mentioned anticipates the interpretations of the sacrifice in the Brāhmaṇas, for the "man" whose parts become the world represents the sacrificial offering (X.90.6) or the sacrifice itself (cf. X.90.7). A few hymns (e.g., IV.5, VI.9) take as their subject the poet's meditation on the craft of poetry and on his acquisition of it, and R̥gveda X.129 links the creativity of poets to the creation of the world. Again anticipating comparable discussion in the Brāhmaṇas, still other hymns enter into debates about the performance of the sacrifice. In telling the story of Agastya, the Maruts, and Indra, for example, R̥igveda X.165, 170, and 171 appear to defend traditions that favor offering soma to both Indra and the Maruts at the Midday Pressing instead of to Indra alone as some traditions held. Likewise, R̥igveda X.109 provides justification for including the Sacrificer's Wife in the sacrificial performance and thereby defends against critics of her inclusion, such as the poet of VIII.33. Although later employed in the ritual, such hymns apparently had a meta-ritual function and were probably composed for an extra-ritual context.

Another famous category of R̥gvedic hymns is the dialogue or ākhyāna type, already mentioned above, in which two or more speakers, generally divine or semi-divine, trade verses with each other, often in a fraught or agonistic fashion. Generally one of the speakers is a female, and sexual tension is on display—as in the dialogue between the legendary seer Agastya and his wife Lopāmudrā (I.179), the twins and first humans Yama and Yamī (X.10), or the three-way discussion among Indra, his wife Indrāṇī, and a monkey (the Vr̥ṣākapi hymn, X.86).

Such are a few of the thematic organizing principles of R̥gvedic hymns. At least equally important are various formal means of organizing hymns or parts of hymns. As one of us has treated this at some length in several publications (see especially Jamison 2007: chap. 2; also 2004a, 2006), we will provide relatively brief discussion here.

One of the simplest and most effective ways to impose structure is by repetition, a procedure that the poets constantly employ. It can be as straightforward as repeating the same word (often a personal pronoun such as "you" or the name or epithet of a god) at the beginning of every verse (e.g., forms of the 2nd sg. tvám in II.1); Sanskrit grammar facilitates such patterned repetition because its elaborate case system allows flexible word order, and therefore whatever their grammatical function, key words can be positioned in initial position. The poets often introduce complications into their repetitive schemata. Sometimes a repetitive pattern takes awhile to become established in a hymn, with the first few verses providing several variants that settle down into a frozen pattern somewhat later (see, e.g., I.112); conversely, strict repetition earlier in the hymn may loosen up in the last verses (e.g., II.1, in its final verses 15–16). Moreover, many cases of repetition consist not of a single repeated word, but of several (such is actually the case with II.1, where the pronoun tvám is followed by vocative agne), and the pattern may be established on the basis of grammatical categories, not simply words (e.g., PREVERB PRONOUN...).

Mention should also be made here of refrains. In some hymns every verse ends with a repeated phrase, which is often the length of a full pāda (e.g., III.55), a hemistich, or even longer (see VIII.36, in which only the first pāda of a six-pāda verse contains new material; similarly VIII.37 and to a lesser extent VIII.35), but can be shorter (e.g., the famous refrain of II.12 "he, o peoples, is Indra," which occupies the last [post-caesura] six syllables of a triṣṭubh line). Sometimes the refrain is syntactically integrated into the verse in some parts of the hymn and not in others (e.g., I.96). Sometimes some or all subdivisions of the hymn have refrains; for example, in the tr̥ca hymn VIII.12 the last four syllables of the final pāda of each verse form a refrain, syntactically integrated in the verse, and each tr̥ca has a different refrain. (In the translations we will generally mark refrains with a preceding dash.) A special type of refrain is the family or clan signature: in some of the Family Books many of the hymns (in the right meter) end with a pāda that marks the hymn as a product of that bardic family—for instance, the Gr̥tsamada refrain of Maṇḍala II, "May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes," found at the end of most, though not all, of the trimeter hymns of that book.

In addition to repetition of a single word or phrase in every verse, or almost every verse, repetitions can knit one verse to another in a chain, a procedure we might call concatenative repetition. There a word or phrase from one verse will be repeated in the next verse; then a different word from that verse will be repeated in the following one, and so on through the hymn (see, e.g., I.85, VI.55, X.84).

As was noted above at the mention of riddles, hymns are frequently structured as lists, with each verse representing a separate item in the list. This structural principle is well suited to All God hymns, many of which treat a series of gods, one per verse (see, e.g., VI.49). Another common application of the list model is in the recounting of a series of divine deeds. A number of Aśvin hymns have this shape, with each verse treating a different (and often quite obscure) rescue or kindly act for a series of named persons (e.g., the Aśvin hymns of Kakṣīvant, I.116–119). Many list hymns are reinforced, their list shape called attention to, by syntactic parallelism and by repetition. For example, the famous Indra hymn II.12 consists of a series of definitional relative clauses ("[he] who. . . ") recounting deeds and attributes of Indra, with each verse ending with a main clause refrain: sá janāsa índraḥ "he, o peoples, is Indra." A list by itself is undramatic and has no built-in trajectory toward climax, but the R̥gvedic poets are adept at finding ways to inject forward momentum into the static list pattern. For example, VIII.29, already mentioned, is a riddle hymn in which each verse refers to a different god or gods; the list builds on increasing numbers, from "one" (six verses) to "two" (two verses) to "some" (one verse), by way of "three" (once explicitly, once implicitly). The rising number leads toward climax, while the strict placement of each number in second position in the verse provides a rigid list skeleton.

A different kind of repetition is found in the well-known and often discussed phenomenon of ring composition (see, e.g., Watkins 1995: 33–37 and passim, with further literature). In ring composition the beginning and end of a poem or of a unified section therein is marked by repeating at the end, either verbatim or, more usually in the R̥gveda, a variation on, material found at the beginning. In the R̥gveda this generally involves the reappearance of lexical items or derivational variants of them, or phrases with partial agreement. For example, in the Agni hymn I.59, verse 1 contains the phrase víśve amŕ̥tāḥ "all the immortals" while the last verse (7) describes Agni with the bahuvrīhi compound viśvákr̥ṣṭiḥ "belonging to all (human) communities." The repetition of víśva- "all" provides the ring, and the contrastive nouns it modifies (immortals, [human] communities) express Agni's role as mediator between gods and men. The word víśva- is not otherwise found in the hymn, except in the derivative vaiśvānará, an epithet of Agni meaning "belonging to all men," a form of which occurs in every verse. The ring thus reinforces the message implicit in the epithet. Ring composition frequently demarcates smaller segments in a larger hymn, and paying attention to these clues often allows us to make structural sense of apparently sprawling hymns.

The term "ring composition" focuses attention on the beginning and end of the section demarcated, but a particularly elaborate form of ring composition instead defines and focuses on the center of the section. We call this the "omphalos" (navel) structure (see Jamison 2004a as well as 2007: 80–89). Here a series of concentric outer and inner rings isolate the middle verse or verses, which contain the mystery or the message of the hymn and are often phrased in mystical and complex fashion. Good examples of omphalos hymns include the famous cosmogonic hymn X.129 (see Brereton 1999), enigmatic compositions like I.105 and X.28, dramatic presentations like the Vasiṣṭha-Varuṇa hymn VII.86, and hymns like VII.76 whose content is relatively conventional but which nonetheless show formal omphalos structure. Omphalos structure is also prominent in the Old Avestan Gāthās and has been more discussed there (though not by that term) than the corresponding phenomenon in the R̥gveda (see Jamison 2007: 86–89 with references).

We might make brief mention here of initial and final verses as especially privileged sites in the architecture of a hymn, though they are not "structuring devices" per se. The first verse often poses a problem or sets the theme that the rest of the hymn will seek to work out. Probably the most famous Indra hymn, I.32, begins índrasya nú vīryā̀ṇi prá vocam "Now I shall proclaim the heroic deeds of Indra," after which the poet does just that—though it must be admitted that he only relates one of them, the Vr̥tra battle. Final verses can be of two types, integral to the hymn or extra-hymnic. The latter includes the clan refrains discussed above. A different type of extra-hymnic verse is what we might call the meta-summary. The poet often ends his hymn with an announcement of what he has just done, often expressed in the aorist of the immediate past and breaking the mood of immersion in the divine world. For example, the final verse of the exquisitely crafted Indra hymn I.61, which is full of praise for Indra's deeds and attributes, begins with the brisk hemistich, "Thus have the Gotamas [the poet's poetic clan] made you sacred formulations for the 'Fallow-bay-yoking' (oblation),... o Indra." The sacrifice is complete, their job is done, and they point out their achievement to the god to spur his benevolence as they return to the mundane world. Final verses that are integral to the body of the hymn often subtly break patterns established earlier in the hymn to bring the composition to a climax. Such for example is the final verse (10) of VIII.29, a hymn mentioned several times above. Other examples are discussed in Jamison (2007: 79–80 and passim).

One last technique to be mentioned, "poetic repair" (Jamison 2006), is not a structuring device but a method for producing forward momentum. The poet sets a problem—lexical, syntactic, or thematic—earlier in the hymn and then "repairs" this problem later in the hymn by substituting the expected word, syntactic construction, or thematic element for the problematic one. The audience is thus first put off-balance by a disturbance in the poetry and then rebalanced when the superficial solecism is fixed. An audience used to this type of repair will build expectations that propel them through the poem.

C. IMAGERY, METAPHORS, AND SIMILES

The Ṛgveda is rich in imagery: the procedures of sacrifice, the exploits of the gods, the activities of men, and the elements and functioning of the cosmos are constantly presented in images of something else, images based on similarity and parallelism. On the formal level by far the most common way of expressing these images is in a simile—the most common poetic device in the Ṛgveda, as it is in Classical Sanskrit poetry. Although to Indologists the dominance of the simile may seem too predictable to be worth noting, in fact this is one of the features of Ṛgvedic style that looks forward to the classical era, and seems to represent something of a break from the stylistic parameters of the poetic tradition from which Ṛgvedic practice emerged. The Avesta contains very few similes—none in the Old Avestan Gāthās to which the Ṛgveda is otherwise so akin—and the so-called "Homeric simile" of ancient Greek epic, with its elaborately imagined world expressed in verb phrases, is structurally very different from the Sanskrit simile.

Both in Vedic and in Classical Sanskrit poetry the simile is essentially nominal: that is, in a syntactic structure nominal elements are compared with each other, while the verb is held constant. An English example would be "Indra attacked the enemy, like a lion a sheep," where the verb "attack" serves for both frame and simile, while Indra=lion and enemy=sheep provide the comparisons. In a case language like Sanskrit both "Indra" and "lion" will be coded as nominative case, and "enemy" and "sheep" as accusative. Neither Vedic nor Classical Sanskrit regularly has similes of the type "Indra attacked the enemy, as a lion devours a sheep," with two different clauses constituting the comparison and a difference in verb. The "like" of the English example has overt expression in Sanskrit as well: by iva or ná in the Ṛgveda, and just iva in Classical Sanskrit. For further on the structure of the simile and the ways that Ṛgvedic poets exploit it, see Jamison (1982).

Although the simile is ubiquitous in the Ṛgveda, it is not the only vehicle of imagery in the text. Implicit identifications of disparate elements are another inescapable stylistic feature, and, as was discussed above, regularly recurring identifications (bandhus)—the fire as sun, the chariot as sacrifice, and so forth—provide the conceptual structure of the Vedic cosmos. Thus, poetic style coincides here with the shared notions of the world that shape "the Vedic mind." However, in making identifications the poets do not confine themselves to these shared and stable associations, but often make bold and superficially puzzling equations. Decoding the shared features that allow such equations to be made is one of the intellectual challenges that the poets posed to their own audience and that engages us, and often eludes us, to this day.

Although the poetic foundation on which the Ṛgveda rests was an ancient one, the imagery of its poems comes from the immediate world of its poets. As already remarked, the Ṛgveda is fundamentally a collection for the soma rite in which Indra is the principal deity. Indra is a warrior, and therefore images of battle, war, contest, and conflict provide the background for a great many Ṛgvedic hymns. In the IXth book, for example, the ritual process of creating soma can represent a war campaign by King Soma. The dripping of soma as it is pressed is the beginning of Soma's attack or raid. The flow of soma over the woolen filter and into the soma vessels is the destruction of Soma's enemies. With the mixing of soma with milk, Soma wins cows and other goods and distributes them to his subjects, who are the sacrificers (cf. Oberlies 1999: 167–206).

Other items associated with war and periods of mobilization also loom large in the poems, perhaps none more than the chariot. The chariot was one of the most visible cultural symbols of the Āryas, for it was likely unique to them among the peoples of ancient South Asia, and it was critical to their success in battle and their mobility. In Ṛgvedic poetry the chariot becomes the hymn that travels to the gods or the sacrifice that brings the gods (II.18.1). When they perform the ritual or compose the hymns, priests become the fashioners of the chariot (I.61.4, V.2.11), and just as a chariot brings booty from war or a winning chariot the prize of a race, the sacrifice carries goods from the gods to humans (X.53.7). In I.129.1 Indra is asked to lead a chariot that is both an actual, racing chariot and a metaphorical chariot, the sacrifice. The chariot is also the vehicle of the gods, by which they come to the sacrifice. Distinctive animals pull the chariots of different gods: the two fallow bay horses of Indra, the dappled mares of the Maruts, the mares of the Sun, the ruddy cattle of Dawn, the goats of Pūṣan.

More abstractly, the imagery of war is also implicit in the frequent symbols of expansion and confinement. This imagery is most evident in the principal Indra stories. Vṛtra represents what hinders and blocks, and when Indra kills Vṛtra, he shows himself to be the power that can destroy any other obstacles to life and prosperity. The Vala cave enclosed and entrapped the cattle, and Indra must break open

Vala to free the cows, the dawns, and the light. Finding open and well-watered pasture lands was essential for the Āryas, since their cattle, horses, and other livestock depended on them. The second half of IX.113 is a poetic vision of heaven, where there is "inexhaustible light" (7) and "youthfully exuberant waters" (8), where one moves "following one's desire" (9), and where there is "independence and satisfaction" (10). It is the heavenly vision of a pastoral people, longing for a place of freedom and abundance.

Pastoral imagery dominates R̥gvedic poetry at many turns. Cows are everywhere, especially as the symbols and substance of wealth. The attention of the gods, which will bring rewards to humans, is a cow (II.32.3), and rain is milk from heaven (V.63.5). In II.34.8 the Maruts are compared to a cow, since they "swell" with rain, the way cows swell with milk. In VI.45.7 Indra, as the god who inspires poetic formulations, is a cow whose milk is the hymns. Or again, in VIII.1.10 Indra is both the milker of the cow and the cow whose milk is "refreshment" for sacrificers. Speech is a cow that gives the forms of speech as her milk in VIII.110.10, and in X.64.12 the insight that the gods have given the poet should swell like a cow with milk. VI.48.11–13 combines several images of the cow, beginning with an actual cow, whose milk is the milk that is mixed with soma but including also the cow that represents poetic inspiration and prosperity. In X.133.7 prosperity brought by the gods is a cow giving her milk "in a thousand streams." The dawns, which are linked with the dakṣiṇā, the sacrificial reward, and with riches more generally, are cows (IV.1.16, 52.2–4).

While the poets have particular fondness for cows, male animals too figure significantly in the hymns. Bulls and buffaloes embody strength and virility, and therefore they represent mighty gods, potent sacrifice, and strong men. Agni is a bull with a strong neck (V.2.12), horns (V.1.8), and a powerful bellow (X.8.1). In V.40.1–4 the bull-like pressing stone and bull-like soma are prepared so that the bull Indra will join together with his bulls, the Maruts. Indra is "the bull overcoming the powerful, the tempestuous king, smasher of Vr̥tra, soma-drinker" (vs. 4). Parjanya, the Thunderstorm, roars like a bull (V.83.1), has the powers of bull (vs. 2), and pours his fertilizing streams as a "bullish stallion" (vs. 6). Indeed, anything associated with their ideal of masculinity is likely to be bull-like for the R̥gvedic poets.

The cultural role of horses—racehorses and warhorses—was obviously central to the Āryas and, as a result, so was their poetic role. Agni is praised like a steed (III.22.1), for he is a horse that brings rewards (I.27.1). When he is kindled, he is a hungry horse, which breaks free of his enclosure (VII.3.2). Soma is a racehorse groomed by the fingers of the priests and running over the woolen filter (IX.6.3, 5; cf. 13.6). The waters too are like racehorses that should run forever (IV.3.12). A sacrificer harnesses himself to the sacrifice like a horse (V.46.1), and the sacrifice is brought to success like a horse (IV.10.1). The significance of the horse is perhaps most obvious in the Dadhikrāvan hymns, IV.38–40. Dadhikrāvan was likely the actual horse of King Trasadasyu, but Dadhikrāvan also represents the rule of the Pūrus, the tribe to whom Trasadasyu belonged, and the sun, which can represent the king. Similarly, in X.178, Tārkṣya is a protective deity of chariot drivers and perhaps a deified racehorse himself.

Although the poets are focused on pastoral life and the herd animals they know best, wild animals also occasionally appear in Ṛgvedic hymns (see Jamison 2008b). Birds are frequently mentioned (I.164.21; X.80.5, 123.6), especially since the gods fly like birds (I.166.10). Unlike other birds, the falcon is not only fast but also can be trained. Mythologically the falcon is particularly significant, since it brought the soma from heaven to Manu (IX.48.4, IV.26–27). The wolf is a recurring symbol of lurking danger (I.42.2, 105.11, 18, 120.7; II.28.10), as is the snake (VII.38.7). The most dangerous creature of all is Vṛtra, who is a gigantic cobra (I.32). More benignly, the inseparable Aśvins are compared to a pair of cakravāka ducks (II.39.3), and in I.64 the Maruts are not only bulls and buffaloes, but they also roar like lions and devour trees like elephants. Perhaps the broadest array of animals appears in X.28, which is built around various animal fables (also Jamison 2008b).

Various human pursuits play significant roles in poetic imagery. The poets frequently mention weaving (e.g., I.115.4), which is similar to the intricate patterns of hymn composition and sacrifice (VI.9.2–3, X.101.2, 130). This is an inherited Indo-European trope. Given the pastoral symbolism elsewhere, it is not surprising that cattle-tending is a major source of poetic imagery. Indra is like a herdsman who separates his flocks from those of others (V.31.1; cf. VI.19.3). The poet too can be a herdsman driving his praise to Indra (VI.49.12). Or we have the reverse image: in VII.18.10 enemies run helter-skelter like cows without a herdsman. In addition to animal husbandry, the Āryas also raised crops, such as barley, but agricultural imagery does not figure much in the Ṛgvedic poetry. Again, the reason may be the connection of the soma rite to Indra and to the period of mobilization (yóga). In the period of settlement (kṣéma), agriculture would have had a larger role.

D. RIDDLES

Much of the Ṛgveda is enigmatic, not only because of our distance from the time of its creation, but also because the poets meant it to be enigmatic. They valued knowledge, especially the knowledge of the hidden connections (the bandhus discussed above) between the visible world, the divine world, and the realm of ritual. They embedded that knowledge in hymns that were stylistically tight and elliptical, expressively oblique, and lexically resonant. As a result, many hymns of the Ṛgveda can appear to us as riddles. However, there are also hymns purposefully composed to cloak their subjects or to withhold them until late in the hymn. In the later Veda the ability to solve the riddles they pose became a formalized demonstration of the knowledge of the priests taking part in the sacrifice. In the Ṛgveda the riddle hymns challenged the interpretive ability of their hearers and demonstrated the cleverness of their poets.

One kind of riddle hymn is represented by V.47. Through its first six verses, it describes various deities but does not name them. The descriptions point toward various gods, but never so plainly that hearers could be sure of their interpretations. At the very end of the hymn, in its last verse, the poet twists his strategy and in the very first pāda names the gods he addresses, gods who may or may not be among those he described earlier. The clarity of that last verse throws into greater relief the difficulty of the preceding verses. The poet of VIII.29 uses exactly the reverse strategy. This is a list hymn, in which each of its verses identifies a god or gods by attributes or behavior, but not by name. In this hymn, however, the identity of the gods it describes is not mysterious at all—or is not until the last verse. At that point, when the confidence of hearers to interpret the hymn would be greatest, the poet presents a real riddle, in which the identity of the subject is not at all clear. In III.55 the riddle of the identity of the gods described in its verses points toward an even deeper mystery. This mystery is laid out in its refrain: it is that the many gods share a single lordship (asuratvám ékam).

Other poets treat the sacrifice as a mystery. In X.114 the poet describes the constituents of the sacrifice in symbols that make the identification of those constituents difficult or impossible. It leaves the sense that the sacrifice can be penetrated only so far, that it is beyond full understanding, except, perhaps, for poets who create such hymns. Another characteristic of X.114 is that each of its verses contains a number—small numbers at the beginning (2, 3, 4, 1), larger numbers toward the end, and an ironic plural of the word for "one," éke "such ones," in the last verse. Other hymns employ numerical riddles, in which a number is key to their solution, if there is a solution. One of the most obscure hymns in the R̥gveda is X.27. Verse 15 describes the convergence of numbered groups of heroes, none of whom are identified. There are seven who come from the south, eight from the north, nine from the west, and ten from the east, but we are left to puzzle about the significance of these numbers and directions.

Perhaps the most famous riddle hymn in the R̥gveda is I.164, a very long poem (52 verses, one of the longest hymns in the R̥gveda) that moves in different directions as it unfolds. The hymn makes both implicit and explicit reference to Vedic ritual, including rites other than the soma ritual. In referring to these rites, the hymn suggests hidden links between ritual objects and acts, realities and processes of the natural world, and constituents and functions of the human body. These hidden connections continue to be hidden, for while we can see the general pattern of the hymn, the interpretation of its specific elements often remains difficult, and many competing solutions have been offered. This is, of course, often the case with these riddle hymns.

E. METRICS

The most conspicuous and ubiquitous formal feature of the R̥gveda is meter. The hymns are composed in a variety of meters, but all of the meters are syllable-counting and quantitative. That is, they consist of lines containing a fixed number of syllables, arranged in patterns of "heavy" and "light" syllables (the "quantity" referred to by the term "quantitative"). Heavy syllables contain a long vowel (a class that includes e and o) or diphthong or a short vowel followed by two consonants (which need not belong to the same word) and are symbolized in Western analysis by a macron (¯). Light syllables contain a short vowel followed by, at most, a single consonant and are symbolized by a breve (˘). (Aspirated consonants [those written with two roman letters, the second of which is h, e.g., th] count as single consonants.) The final syllable of a line is metrically indifferent and symbolized by x. The distinction between heavy and light metrical syllables simply formally enshrines patterns inherent in the language itself, where various linguistic processes are sensitive to distinction in syllable weight and the difference between short and long vowels is lexically and morphologically crucial.

This type of metrical structure was inherited from the Indo-European poetic tradition, most clearly evident in ancient Greek meter, especially the Aeolic meters utilized by Sappho and Alcaeus, which are also syllable-counting and quantitative; these Aeolic meters have long been considered cognate to Vedic meter. The meter of the Old Avestan Gāthās is also closely akin: though the quantitative aspect has been lost, Gāthic lines have a fixed number of syllables.

R̥gvedic meter is also identical in its structural principles to most of the meters encountered in Epic and Classical Sanskrit (with the exception of the ārya and related types). The major difference between Vedic meter and Classical Sanskrit meter has to do with the regulation of quantities. In the earlier parts of the line R̥gvedic meter has relatively unfixed quantities; it is only toward the end of a line (the cadence) that the quantity of each syllable is fixed (especially in trimeter meter, on which see below). By contrast, most Classical Sanskrit literary meters regulate the quantity of each syllable in the line; in other words, the relative flexibility of R̥gvedic meter has become frozen. The exception is the eight-syllable epic anuṣṭubh, or so-called "śloka" meter—the overwhelmingly predominant meter in the two great epics and the workhorse meter of non-literary Classical Sanskrit verse texts such as Manu's lawcode—whose quantities are precisely fixed only in the second half of each line.

R̥gvedic meters are generally divided into "dimeter" and "trimeter" types. The former consists of eight-syllable lines, which can be conveniently considered to consist of two equal segments, with the second half tending more toward fixed quantities, generally in an iambic pattern. However, it is important to keep in mind that there is no fixed caesura (word-break) in dimeter meter, and even the four cadential syllables are not rigidly fixed in quantity. Trimeter meter is more complex. It generally consists of lines of either eleven or twelve syllables (triṣṭubh or jagatī respectively), characterized not only by a fixed cadential sequence of four (triṣṭubh) or five (jagatī) syllables but also by a strong caesura after the first four or five syllables in the line. The caesura and the cadence thus effectively divide the line into three parts—the opening (the first 4–5 syllables before the caesura), the "break" (the 2–3 syllables following the caesura), and the cadence.

Examples of the three most common types of lines, dimeter, trimeter (triṣṭubh), and trimeter (jagatī) follow, with heavy and light syllable scansion given below the text. We have provided two examples each for the trimeter lines, one with four-syllable opening and three-syllable break, one with five-syllable opening and two-syllable break.

Dimeter

eight-syllable dimeter
I.1.1a agním īḻe puróhitam
- ˘ - - ˘ - ˘ x

Note the iambic rhythm of the last 4 syllables.

Trimeter

Trimeter cadences:

triṣṭubh: - ˘ - x
jagatī: - ˘ - ˘ x

Note that twelve-syllable jagatī can be seen as a one-syllable extension of triṣṭubh, with an extra light syllable inserted right before the end, resulting in a five-syllable cadence. The structure of the rest of the line is the same.

eleven-syllable trimeter: triṣṭubh—opening of four
I.32.1a índrasya nú vīrıyāṇi prá vocam
- - ˘ ˘ | - ˘ - - ˘ - x

The obligatory caesura (word break) after the opening is marked by a slash; the break is three syllables (- ˘ -) and is not followed by a caesura, while the cadence is the proper triṣṭubh one (- ˘ - x).

eleven-syllable trimeter: triṣṭubh—opening of five
I.32.1b yā́ni cakā́ra prathamā́ni vajrī́
- ˘ ˘ - - | ˘ ˘ - ˘ - x

Note that the rhythms of the openings of the two triṣṭubh lines are quite distinct. Here the break is two syllables (˘ ˘), and the cadence the same as the previous line.

twelve-syllable trimeter: jagatī—opening of four II.1.16b ágne rātím upasr̥jánti sūráyaḥ
- - - ˘ | ˘ ˘ ˘ - ˘ - ˘ x

The opening is different from either of the triṣṭubh openings above; the break is three shorts (˘ ˘ ˘), unlike the short/long/short (- ˘ -) three-syllable break of the quoted triṣṭubh line. The cadence is the standard jagatī five-syllable one (- ˘ - ˘ x).

twelve-syllable trimeter: jagatī—opening of five II.1.16c asmā́ñ ca tā́ṃś ca prá hí néṣi vásya ā́
- - ˘ - - | ˘ ˘ - ˘ - ˘ x

Yet another opening pattern. The two-syllable (˘ ˘) break is identical to that of the triṣṭubh with opening of five, as shorter breaks have fewer possible patterns. The cadence is the standard jagatī cadence. Note that though there happens to be a word break between the break and the cadence in this line, it is not an obligatory one, and in fact none of the other three trimeter lines quoted shows a word break at this position.

The lines just described are called pādas, a term we will employ throughout this work. A R̥gvedic verse (r̥c) consists of a group of pādas, generally three or four, though meters with fewer than three pādas or more than four are also found. Lower-case roman letters are used to refer to the pādas in a verse (so, e.g., "5b" will refer to the second pāda in the fifth verse of a hymn). Again, we will regularly use this shorthand in identifying lines. There is another significant division within the verse: the hemistich or half-verse. In four-pāda verses this consists of two two-pāda units; in three-pāda verse, the first two pādas are considered the hemistich, with a single pāda following.

The most common dimeter meter is gāyatrī, a collection of three eight-syllable pādas. Approximately one quarter of the R̥gveda is composed in this meter. The other common dimeter meter is anuṣṭubh, which contains four such eight-syllable lines and is the ancestor of the Epic and Classical śloka mentioned above. The most common trimeter meter, in fact the most common meter in the R̥gveda, is triṣṭubh, which accounts for approximately 40% of the text. It consists of four eleven-syllable pādas, while jagatī likewise consists of four pādas, though of twelve syllables each. Jagatī is the third most common meter, after triṣṭubh and gāyatrī. Besides these mono-type meters, some hymns are composed in what are referred to in general as "mixed-lyric meters," whose verses consist of combinations of eight- and twelve-syllable pādas. There are a number of different combinations, each with a different name. (For details, see especially the table of meters in van Nooten and Holland 1994, referred to below.)

The details just given are not relevant only to professional metricians, for the rhetoric and semantic structure of the R̥gveda are strongly driven and shaped by meter. Syntactic constituents often occupy single pādas, for example, and metrical boundaries (the beginning and end of the line, as well as the position immediately after the caesura) are favored sites for positioning emphatic elements. The hemistich is a particularly salient unit, dividing the verse into syntactic and semantic halves. In fact, we have discovered that it is almost always possible, and generally desirable, to render the hemistich division in English—that is, to translate the first half and the second half of the verse as separate units. This is reflected in the physical layout of our translation, with the second hemistich starting a new line. It is remarkable how faithful it is possible to be to the Sanskrit hemistichs without significantly compromising the English. (The hemistich division is less important and more often syntactically breached in gāyatrī, since the division results in uneven parts: two pādas followed by one, but even in gāyatrī the third pāda is often independent of the first two.)

The verse is the most significant unit in a R̥gvedic hymn—hence the name R̥g-veda, or Veda of verses (r̥c). It is almost always a self-contained syntactic construction, and even when that construction is not entirely independent syntactically (e.g., when it is a relative clause, dependent on a main clause in a verse following or preceding), it will be internally unified. There are almost no examples of syntactic enjambment between verses. This focus on the internal unity and syntactic independence of the verse is continued in later Sanskrit poetry, where it reaches its defining limit in so-called muktaka verses or single-verse poems.

Nonetheless, some hymns are structured into larger groupings of two to three verses, which are sometimes referred to as "strophes." The tr̥ca or "triplet" is the most common such grouping, consisting of three verses, generally in gāyatrī, though other meters are also found. Sometimes the tr̥ca unit is strongly defined by shared lexicon or a shared refrain, or by parallel syntactic structures, or by a common theme; other tr̥cas have only the faintest signs of unity in rhetoric or content. Quite long hymns can be built from these three-verse units, which are especially common in Maṇḍala VIII and, as Oldenberg argued (1888: 119–40), were the special province of the Udgātar (singer) priest. Many of these strophes were borrowed into the Sāmaveda, whose principal priest in classical śrauta ritual was the Udgātar and one of whose major textual sources is R̥igveda VIII. The other major strophic type is the pragātha, consisting of two verses in two different types of "mixed lyric" meters. The usual combination is br̥hatī (8 8, 12 8) and satobr̥hatī (12 8, 12 8). Again, pragāthas are especially common in the VIIIth Maṇḍala and frequently taken over into the Sāmaveda. Thus the standard types of multi-verse groupings tended to provide the lyric or sung portion of the ritual, as against the recited portions associated with the Hotar priest.

A brief and clear account of R̥gvedic meter is given in Macdonell (1916: appendix II). For full details see Arnold (1905). Oldenberg's Prolegomena (1888) is invaluable both for his detailed treatment of the meters of particular hymns and sets of hymns and for his discussion of the historical implications of metrical details. Van Nooten and Holland (1994) provide a hymn-by-hymn metrical commentary in somewhat lapidary style, as well as a table of R̥gveda meters as identified in the Anukramaṇī (pp. xiv–xvi), which should be consulted for the names and characteristics of meters not explicitly discussed here.

VIII. Translation Principles

A. SANSKRIT INTO ENGLISH: PROBLEMS AND SOLUTIONS

As has been repeatedly emphasized above, the R̥gveda is a poetic text, structured by intricate meters, driven by rhetorical principles based on this metrical structure, and crafted by skillful poets for a poetically aware audience. Nonetheless, we have chosen to translate the text into prose, not verse—for several reasons. First and perhaps most important, we are not poets, and we would dishonor the highly trained and highly inventive poets of the Ṛgveda by translating their artful creations into bad English verse. Moreover, the structures of the English language and of English verse are entirely different from those of Vedic Sanskrit. Since English lacks the elaborate morphology of Sanskrit, it is not as possible in English, without awkwardness or, indeed, loss of sense, to use word order for rhetorical rather than syntactic purposes. The stress-counting principle that regulates English blank verse and the end rhyme characteristic of much English poetry are alien to Ṛgvedic poetry. Thus the English poetry that resulted from a verse translation would not replicate in any of its most salient features the structures of Ṛgvedic poetry.

We have, however, tried to retain the verse structure as much as possible. All the translations reproduce the verse divisions found in the hymn, and within verses the hemistich boundary is also always marked, with the second hemistich beginning a new line. In fact, as noted above, it has almost always been possible to translate hemistichs as units without breaching the boundary—an indication of how strong a compositional element the hemistich was for the poets.

Translators who are also poets might succeed in rendering the Ṛgveda (or parts thereof) into poetry that captures the spirit and flair of the original, but such rendering would perforce (or so we think) distort or reinvent the literal meaning of the text. This is of course a perfectly acceptable translational strategy—some think it is the only acceptable strategy: that a literal translation is a fundamental betrayal of the original. But we have chosen to hew as close to what we consider the literal meaning of the text and its constituent words as we can. The text is multivalent, and over the millennia it has received multiple, often incompatible, interpretations. By translating the text literally, we hope to leave the interpretive opportunities open for the readers, inviting them to participate in the act of interpretation though providing as much guidance as we can.

As was also noted above, the everyday language of the Ṛgvedic poets was almost surely not identical to the language they used in their hymn compositions. They may well have spoken a form of early Middle Indo-Aryan—judging from some Middle Indic phonological features found in the hymns—or at the very least a more stripped-down form of Sanskrit, with the limitations on morphological categories and variant forms found in middle Vedic prose and in Epic and Classical Sanskrit. Since they were therefore composing in a deliberately archaic style, we have aimed for a fairly formal and old-fashioned English style on both the lexical and the syntactic levels, with occasional whiffs of the archaic. (For example, one of us often translates the morphologically opaque archaic frozen form śám with the equally opaque English "weal," to capture its linguistic isolation; the other of us prefers "luck," which does have the advantage of conveying more sense to the modern English reader.)

The poets were, however, quite aware of linguistic registers, and are capable of making wrenching shifts from, for example, the high-register solemnity of most of their production to slangy and sometimes obscene humorous banter. (See, for example, Indrāṇī's discourse in X.86, which lurches from shockingly explicit vulgarity [especially from a goddess] to the highest of high styles.) Such passages are especially common in dānastutis. When we have been able to identify low-register vernacular passages, we have attempted to render them into a similar English register.

One feature where we have deliberately avoided English archaism is in the translation of the 2nd-person pronouns, singular versus plural (and dual)—rendering all of them with "you," although it would occasionally have been useful to disambiguate between singular and plural. In part this is an English stylistic choice: a consistent distinction between "thou/thee" and "ye/you" quickly becomes wearisome for the reader. But it would also produce a misleadingly archaic impression; the distinction between the singular and plural [/dual] 2nd-person pronouns remains a feature in Sanskrit throughout its history, and, though the dual was lost, the singular-plural distinction was also a feature of Middle Indo-Aryan. Therefore this same distinction in Vedic Sanskrit carried no stylistic weight at all; it's simply an unremarkable feature of the grammar, and the obsolete English "thou" would distort the effect of the text.

An area where the balancing act between R̥gvedic style and English intelligibility most tests the translator is in the placement of words. The R̥gvedic poet may set a word at the beginning of a verse or hemistich to draw special attention to it, or hold back words until the end of the verse to surprise his audience or cause them to change their expectations about the meaning of the line. He may position identical or similar elements in the same place in a sequence of verses in order to build larger rhetorical units or to emphasize the similarity of ideas in the verses, or may scramble elements that underlyingly belong together in order to produce a mosaic effect, whose contours only become clear over time. In short, the poet can use the placement of words in order to unfold his ideas in a particular and deliberate way. The freer word order that an inflected language and a shared poetic diction allow gave the poets flexibility in arranging their verse. Our translation does not aspire to be poetic, and our medium is the highly uninflected English language. Nonetheless, we have been reluctant to surrender all attempts to follow the poets' positioning of elements, and have tried to follow the order of words and ideas as well as we can, especially in cases where the verbal positioning seems to make a particular rhetorical or conceptual point. The result is an English that is not quite natural. Apart from preserving the structure of the verse and the unfolding of ideas, there are other advantages we see in adopting this style. It reminds readers that the R̥gveda is elevated and solemn poetry, and it signals that even for the composers and their audience the language of the R̥gveda was not everyday speech and the expression of ideas in the text was not designed to be direct and pellucid. A translation into a too fluent and colloquial English would produce a very misleading impression of the original. We hope that this style of translation will slow readers enough to allow them to sense the style of the original, while not rendering the English too impenetrable.

One of the features of almost all previous translations of the text, as well as the scholarly paraphernalia, like dictionaries, that have supported these translations, is that the lexical range in the translation language is very narrow and tends toward the abstract, the general, and the overlapping. It's a standing joke among Vedicists that all verbs mean "shine," "sing," "speed," or "give"; all adjectives, "bright" or "swift"; all nouns, "praise." This monotony contrasts sharply with the variety and color of the R̥gveda's Sanskrit. As we have already noted, Grassmann's lexicon of the R̥gveda is enormous compared to the size of the text (there must be somewhere in the digital world a metric for evaluating lexical diversity per text size). The "sing/speed/shine" translational style severely flattens this lexical richness. It is as if all the verbal exuberance of Shakespeare were squeezed into the neo-classical spareness of a French dramatist like Racine.

This habit not only robs the translation of its verbal diversity but, perhaps more important, of its metaphorical content. Translators are usually not semantically wrong when they translate a verb as, say, "shine," but they are often translating the underlying sense of a metaphor rather than the more vivid, and often more jarring, image evoked by a more precise word. To give a single example, there is a verbal root √ribh that seems literally to mean "croak," "creak," "rasp," "squawk"—used, for example, of the sound of a creaky wagon, or of a crackling fire. It is also frequently used of poets and praise-singers, and a nominal derivative of it, rebhá, is regularly applied to poets. But—no surprise—the standard rendering in current translations and dictionaries is "singer"—German "Sänger"—and this certainly correctly identifies the referent of the word. But the particular voice quality, perhaps "hoarse" or "husky," is sacrificed to making a fluent and easily interpreted translation—not scaring the horses, as it were, by suggesting that the singers were anything but mellifluous.

The twentieth century saw much progress in limiting and pinpointing the meaning of many R̥gvedic words, and in appreciating their position in linguistic register (e.g., solemn and hieratic vs. colloquial vs. technical vs. unmarked and general). Incorporating these results makes for a much more vivid text, but also a "spikier" one, with unsettling or discordant images or juxtapositions of concepts. To return to the √ribh example just given, a translation like "hear the poet as he rasps" (VIII.37.7) is more likely to take the reader aback than "hear the praise-singing poet" (Geldner's "den lobsingenden…"), but a simile in a passage also containing this verb, IX.97.57 "the poets squawk like birds of prey," supports the less easy interpretation. In that passage Geldner's attempt to rescue it so radically attenuates the phrase that it becomes close to incomprehensible: "the seers become audible like vultures" ("werden die Seher lautbar wie die Geier").

In our translation we have aimed, again, for the literal, and sometimes discordant, sense of the word—even if the literal sense was a dead metaphor for contemporary speakers. We have, in fact, no way to determine whether a metaphor was dead or alive at the time of composition, and in any case, even if at the time of composition it was dead, it had been previously a metaphor with real poetic heft. On the other hand, we have not been able entirely to follow the austere and chaste principle of Bergaigne and Thieme—to translate a particular word always in the same way, no matter what the context. Attempts to do so often produce unintelligible English, whereas some adjustment to context aids the reader to grasp the sense. Thus our translation has been a balancing act between the flattening effect of rendering the underlying sense as opposed to the literal surface and a too principled adherence to a single literal meaning for every word regardless of context.

In representing the spikier and more difficult style that we see in the R̥gveda, in contrast to the translation tradition that has attempted to smooth out the difficulties, fill in the gaps, and aim for clarity above all, at the expense of the literal meaning and obscure style of the original, we have been aided by the sheer chance of the age we live in. As the discussion above has repeatedly suggested, newer ways of looking at the text have the unintended result of making the text "harder." The images are more striking but also more obscure; the lexicon is more specific but the combinations of words therefore less harmonious; the ritual underpinnings cannot be glossed over, however bizarre and "unpoetic" the actions depicted may seem. We think the result is truer to the spirit of the text than the easy flow of older translations and also truer to our age. It must have been difficult to appreciate the polished obscurities of R̥gvedic verse before the twentieth century enshrined deliberate difficulty in poetry as a preeminent sign of serious verbal art. So Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot begat our poets Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra, in a paradoxical reversal of the paternal relationship that a R̥gvedic bard would relish.

Stylistically the R̥gveda is a dense and compact text. This results from at least two factors. On the one hand, the elaborate morphology of Sanskrit allows a parsimony of words, as opposed to the diffuse nature of a language like English. To choose one example, this from the Atharvaveda (III.20.8): the two-word clause áditsantaṃ dāpayatu necessarily translates into at least eleven English words: "Let him cause the man not wishing to give to give." There is no way to reproduce the verbal spareness of Sanskrit in a language like English, which needs a plethora of function words to render the less assertive moving parts of Sanskrit morphology.

But in addition to the purely linguistic aspect, we must reckon with the narrow shared universe of discourse in the text. We have previously discussed the formulaic nature of R̥gvedic rhetoric. The shared deep-structure verbal formulae and the shared knowledge of the nature of R̥gvedic gods, rituals, and religious principles and beliefs allow the poets to refer to such knowledge with a kind of verbal shorthand—truncated or twisted formulae, brief and recherché allusions, and so forth. Deliberate ellipsis is an important stylistic feature of the text, with the audience invited and expected to fill the ellipsis.

These issues present the translators with at least two problems (in addition to figuring out what is actually going on). First, to try to reflect the density of the text in a language that is not well adapted to this style—a balancing act throughout the translation. Second, to determine when to supply material not found in the particular context, and what to supply. Although we began the translation with the determination to supply nothing not found in the passage itself, this principle came to seem not only unworkable but also contrary to the practice of the poets, since they often rely on shared knowledge to allow their contemporary audience to "fill in the blanks" of allusive expressions. But we have tried to avoid the regrettable tendency of some translators to supply material without any methodological controls. Instead, supplied material in our translation is either generated from material recoverable from the passage itself (e.g., verbs or nouns in the same or adjacent verses) or from parallel phrases elsewhere in the text. Here the study of the parallel passages adduced by Geldner in his notes has been absolutely crucial for our interpretation, as well as other types of parallel phraseology, the discovery of which has been much aided by Lubotsky's R̥gvedic Word Concordance (1997). We have thus attempted to allow the poets and the verbal connections they have forged to determine what a passage needs for completion, rather than simply to follow our own whims and a common-sense notion of what has been omitted, since "common sense" is a culture-specific quality.

Most of the material we have supplied has been placed in parentheses, in order to indicate that it is the result of our extrapolation and is not found explicitly in the text itself. Although parenthetical additions can sometimes be distracting, the possibility of misleading readers about what is actually there and what is not, in a text where almost nothing can be taken for granted, seemed to us a sufficient danger to require major additions to be overtly signaled. However, some supplied material has been silently slipped into the text proper, especially necessary English function words that lack obligatory Sanskrit counterparts. For example, Sanskrit does not obligatorily supply definite or indefinite articles ("the" vs. "a[n]") and in fact does not have either category as a separate grammatical marker. But English requires them and we have supplied them; this often forces a choice on the translators as to whether a noun is indefinite ("a horse") or definite ("the horse"), but in most such cases of ambiguity we have considered it a kindness to the reader not to indicate the uncertainty with parentheses. Likewise for possessive pronouns: Sanskrit regularly does not overtly mark pronominal possession ("his horse") where English does, and in cases where the possessor seems fairly clear we have often supplied the possessive without parenthetical marking. We also regularly supply pronouns for repeated objects and the like, of the type "praise you and beseech you" rather than "praise you and beseech (you)," unless the construction and meaning are unclear or disputed. And, since Sanskrit does not have mandatory surface subjects because the verb encodes the person and number of its subject, while English requires subjects to be expressed, we have had to supply pronominal subjects, which has required us on occasion to choose the gender of the subject ("he" vs. "she" vs. "it"). Occasionally too, while the elliptical style of the R̥gveda might not repeat a verb or other crucial word in proximate clauses, good English often must do so. In these cases we have repeated the crucial word without indicating the absence of this repetition in the Sanskrit text.

A rarely used sign in our translations is the asterisk (*), which indicates that the translation rests on an emendation. Since we seldom resort to emendation, the asterisk will be encountered only occasionally.

B. FORMAT OF THE TRANSLATIONS

Perhaps the most unusual feature of our translation is our decision to avoid the use of footnotes entirely. We did not begin with that idea, but several considerations led us to it. First, the notes in Geldner's translation, especially the parallels he cites, are full and informative, and interested readers should consult them: knowledge of German is not required for tracking down the parallels. Further, this translation will appear approximately coincident with the new Witzel-Gotō translation into German, which contains annotations to verses that build on Geldner's work. Yet another set of similar annotations seemed to us unnecessary and redundant.

Second and more important, however, this decision reflects our view of the text. One of the aims of this translation is to demonstrate that the hymns are unified, structured compositions and not merely collections of single verses randomly collected into hymns. Our emphasis on the integrity and structure of R̥gvedic hymns, on the idea that the sūkta is the essential compositional unit, is to us the most persuasive reason to avoid footnotes, endnotes, or running commentary. If we were to invite readers to turn away from the progress of the hymn toward notes of one kind or another, we would risk causing them to lose precisely the thing we most want our readers to have, the sense of the hymn as a compositional whole.

The starkness of our presentation is softened by several different strategies, corresponding to different types of problems the text presents. First and most important, we provide introductions to each hymn. These introductions treat the overall structure of the hymn, its theme or themes, the development of the hymn, and any special features it may have—special features being defined as whatever strikes the translators as particularly noteworthy. These include intertextual connections with other R̥gvedic hymns, especially in the oeuvre of the same poet, spectacular rhetorical flights or poetic devices, marked metrical features, out-of-the-ordinary ritual procedures or models of rituals, little-known myths, interesting twists on well-known myths, and so forth. We also discuss the conformity or nonconformity of the hymn to the expected patterns of organization in the maṇḍala or hymn collection when relevant—where verses or even whole hymns have been added and hymns have been combined, divided, or relocated. Such changes reflect the compositional history of the text and may be important for the interpretation of the hymn.

On the other hand, the discussions in the introductions generally do not treat technical linguistic details, except insofar as they impact the reader's experience of the hymn. However, we do not apologize for regularly mentioning grammatical features of the hymn in such cases: the poets were, among other things, expert grammarians and often deployed particular linguistic forms to subtle semantic ends. To remain in ignorance of this linguistic dimension of the hymns is to miss many of their most striking effects.

In the introductions we usually do not engage with the considerable secondary literature on the hymn or the variant interpretations of other translators and commentators, including Sāyaṇa. Although study of this material has deeply affected our reading of the text, a detailed discussion of how and why we differ from other interpretations would swell our already long work to unmanageable proportions.

We know of no other R̥gveda translation that systematically provides such introductions for every hymn, rather than just for the famous or the famously difficult hymns. We hope that these introductions will give readers sufficient guidance to proceed through the hymn without getting unduly mired in the difficult parts. We also hope that the introductions will make clear how very different R̥gvedic hymns are from one another, even when they are "about" the same subject, and will counter the general assumption that the liturgical material in the R̥gveda, which of course makes up the greater part of the text, is monotonously the same throughout. Quite the contrary: the poets obviously sought novelty not only in individual details of imagery and wording but also in their overall approach to well-worn topics, and they thought out innovative ways to frame such topics. Even the sixty-seven gāyatrī hymns to Soma Pavamāna that occupy the first half of the IXth Maṇḍala and are extremely narrowly focused on a very few steps of ritual procedure manage an astounding amount of variety within these metrical and topical limits. In fact, they might serve as a textbook of how a R̥gvedic poet deploys his skills to produce multiple, very different versions of a simple and single message.

A second type of aid we provide to readers relates to a major stumbling block they will encounter in approaching the translation directly: while the original audience of the R̥gveda would have been able to identify the referent in a particular verse on the basis of characteristic epithets, defining actions, or habitual associations, our readers will not have the cultural knowledge that the poet and his audience shared. Therefore, in many cases in which such references may not be clear to our readers, we have inserted brief bracketed identifications to situate the reader with as little fuss as possible. We have kept such bracketed additions to a minimum, since we assume that the general introduction will familiarize our readers with common epithets, characteristics, and tropes, and therefore identifications of the type "Vr̥tra-smasher [=Indra]" will be unnecessary. These bracketed additions are to be differentiated from material in parentheses, supplied from context and necessary to complete the syntactic construction of the verse, as was discussed immediately above. We should note that identifying every stray referent and decoding every cryptic image, either in the introduction or the bracketed insertions, would prove to be unduly distracting—not to mention sometimes impossible—and readers are encouraged to let the momentum of the poetry carry them across these little perplexities. Some bracketed additions signal possible double meanings (puns or double references) of single words, expressions, or constructions in the text; the alternatives will be separated by a slash.

Occasionally, for hymns in which density of reference or deliberate obscurity makes each verse a challenge to decode and appreciation of the hymn as a whole depends on following the unfolding of its cryptic train of thought, we will provide a verse-by-verse exegesis in the introduction to the hymn. Again, we have kept such discursive treatment to a minimum—not only for considerations of space, but also on principled grounds: the R̥gveda is, first and foremost, poetry, and detailed paraphrase is a terrible crime to commit against poetry. It is especially a crime against this poetry, where verbal execution, rhetorical ingenuity, and deliberate complexity are central to its poetic style.

The heading of each hymn will provide the maṇḍala and hymn number, followed, in parentheses, by its "Grassmann number." Grassmann's R̥gvedic lexicon did not make use of the usual numbering system of maṇḍala plus hymn, but through-numbered the entire text without regard to maṇḍala (or aṣṭaka) divisions. Although this number will be irrelevant for most readers of the translation, for those who use the translation in conjunction with the Sanskrit text and the various relevant reference works, including Grassmann's lexicon, the Grassmann number will facilitate cross-reference. (The Grassmann numbers for the first maṇḍala are not supplied, as they are identical with the hymn number in that maṇḍala.) The deity (or other element) who is the dedicand of the hymn follows the Grassmann number in the first line, almost always according to the Anukramaṇī, except when the Anukramaṇī's identification is plainly fanciful or wrong. On the next line is the poet, again as given by the Anukramaṇī; the third line gives the number of verses in the hymn, the meter(s), and strophic arrangement, if there is one.

C. HYMN DISTRIBUTION BY TRANSLATOR

At the beginning of this project, we two translators each took primary responsibility for approximately half the hymns of the R̥gveda and produced first and usually second drafts of them. As the project continued, we consulted with each other at every turn, passed hymns back and forth, and read each other's translations critically. In the end, however, the final version of each hymn became the responsibility of a single translator. The division of those final versions is as follows:

Maṇḍala I
JPB: 1, 24–25, 32, 46–47, 116–120, 157–158, 161, 164–165, 170–171
SWJ: 2–23, 26–31, 33–45, 48–115, 121–156, 159–160, 162–163, 166–169, 172–191

Maṇḍala II
JPB: 11–24, 27–28, 39
SWJ: 1–10, 25–26, 29–38, 40–43

Maṇḍala III
JPB: 1–7, 9–29, 58–60
SWJ: 8, 30–57, 61–62

Maṇḍala IV
JPB: 33–37, 42
SWJ: 1–32, 38–41, 43–58
Maṇḍala V
JPB: 1–28, 62–78, 85
SWJ: 29–61, 79–84, 86–87
Maṇḍala VI: SWJ
Maṇḍala VII
JPB: 1–17, 48, 50–52, 60–74, 82–89
SWJ: 18–47, 49, 53–59, 75–81, 90–104
Maṇḍala VIII: SWJ
Maṇḍala IX: SWJ
Maṇḍala X
JPB: 71–72, 81–82, 90, 108, 121, 129–130
SWJ: 1–70, 73–80, 83–89, 91–107, 109–120, 122–128, 131–191

Volume I

I

Maṇḍala I

The first maṇḍala of the R̥gveda is also, in part, one of its later additions, as was discussed in detail in the general introduction. Like Maṇḍala X, it consists of 191 hymns, which belong to two different strata of the text. The first fifty hymns, attributed to six different groups of poets, constitute the later stratum. They are primarily in dimeter meter, sometimes arranged in tr̥cas, and the Kaṇva affiliation of a number of the poets connects this section with Maṇḍala VIII.

1–11	Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra (etc.)
12–23	Medhātithi Kāṇva
24–30	Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
31–35	Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
36–43	Kaṇva Ghaura
44–50	Praskaṇva Kāṇva

For the most part the poetry is not particularly inspired and has a narrow liturgical focus, especially in the first few collections. The major exception is the brief series attributed to Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa, all in trimeter meter. This sequence contains one of the most famous hymns in the R̥gveda, I.32, the clearest treatment of the Indra-Vr̥tra myth and a poetic masterwork, as well as I.33, less celebrated but displaying equal poetic skill.

The second and far longer part of Maṇḍala I (51–191) consists of hymns attributed to nine groups of poets:

51–57	Savya Āṅgirasa
58–64	Nodhas Gautama
65–73	Parāśara Śāktya
74–93	Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
94–115	Kutsa Āṅgirasa (etc.)
116–126	Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
127–139	Paruchepa Daivodāsi
140–164	Dīrghatamas Aucathya
165–191	Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi

A number of these poets have quite distinctive stylistic personalities and thematic preoccupations, and their collections contain some of the most glorious poetry in the R̥gveda. Some of the hymns are quite famous (e.g., I.164, the "riddle hymn";

I.179, the dialogue between the seer Agastya and his impatiently amorous wife Lopāmudrā), but there are many treasures to be unearthed among the lesser known hymns. We refer the reader to the introductions to the various hymn collections and their individual hymns.

The first ten hymns of the R̥gveda are attributed to Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra, with I.11 ascribed to his son or descendant Jetar Mādhuchandasa. After the opening hymn to Agni and two hymns (2–3) to the deities of the Praügaśastra litany, the remainder of the hymns are addressed to Indra, most of them relatively simple and without notable features.

It is of course appropriate that the whole R̥gveda collection should begin with a hymn to the deified ritual fire as the focal point of the sacrificial system. This hymn in its relative simplicity and its clear exposition of Agni's ritual role seems almost to have been chosen for this prominent position for pedagogical purposes. It certainly continues to serve such purposes in the modern West, where it is generally the first hymn a student of the R̥gveda encounters and from which the mysteries of Vedic Sanskrit grammar—accents, subjunctives, unexpected long vowels, variant nominal forms, and so on—and of Vedic ritual are absorbed. It is therefore not surprising that it is often assumed to be typical of R̥gvedic Agni hymns, but this is emphatically not the case: elsewhere in the R̥gveda Agni hymns often display especially contorted syntax and complex imagery and glory in enigma and paradox. The choice of this particular Agni hymn to open the R̥gveda thus seems even more purposeful against the background of more standard treatments of Agni.

I.1 Agni

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
9 verses: gāyatrī

As Oldenberg (1897) has noted, the first verse of this hymn was apparently the first verse of the R̥gveda already at the time of the composition of X.20–26, a collection that also begins agním īḷe. The two hymns that follow, I.2 and I.3, together invoke the principal deities of the three soma-pressings in a day-long soma rite. This hymn forms an appropriate opening for them, since the sacrifice is instituted first by the placement of fire, although the sacrificial fire here is not just the fire of the soma rite, since in verse 7 the poet speaks of revering the fire every day.

Here, as in other hymns to Agni, the poets praise him as the deified Fire of the sacrifice, who moves between the divine and human realms. Agni is a god, and yet he is also the visible fire, accessible to humans. As both god and element, Agni is "placed to the fore" (vs. 1) because the principal fire of the sacrifice is placed in the east of the sacrificial area and because the god Agni leads the appearances of the other gods of the rite. He is a divine priest, who carries the offerings and praises of the human priests to the gods and who brings the gifts of the gods to mortals. Saussure describes this hymn as a "versified paradigm of Agni," since it begins by mentioning the god's name in various cases as the first word in the first pāda of the first five verses: accusative, nominative, instrumental, dative, and again nominative (Elizarenkova 1995: 153). Displaying one of the verbal tricks R̥gvedic poets delight in, this pattern is broken by modification at the beginning of verse 6, which opens yád aṅgá, the latter word being a particle that is also a scrambling of the god's name. The same verse ends with an epithet of Agni in the vocative, aṅgiraḥ, likewise a phonological scrambling of his name. The vocative agne is also found in three of the last four verses (vs. 8 is the exception). This structure not only displays the artfulness of the poet, but perhaps also suggests the various forms of the sacrificial Fire that are analogous to the many grammatical forms of the word "fire."

1. Agni do I invoke—the one placed to the fore, god and priest of the sacrifice, the Hotar, most richly conferring treasure.
2. Agni, to be invoked by ancient sages and by the present ones—he will carry the gods here to this place.
3. By Agni one will obtain wealth and prosperity every day, glorious and richest in heroes.
4. O Agni, the sacrifice and rite that you surround on every side—it alone goes among the gods.
5. Agni, the Hotar with a poet's purpose, the real one possessing the brightest fame, will come as a god with the gods.
6. When truly you will do good for the pious man, o Agni, just that of yours is real, o Aṅgiras.
7. We approach you, o Agni, illuminator in the evening, every day with our insight, bringing homage—
8. (You), ruling over the rites, the shining herdsman of the truth, growing strong in your own home.
9. Like a father for a son, be of easy approach for us, o Agni.
   Accompany us for our well-being.

I.2 Vāyu (1–3), Indra and Vāyu (4–6), Mitra and Varuṇa (7–9)

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This and the following hymn constitute what is later called the Praügaśastra, the "yoke-pole-tip recitation," which is the second recited litany in the morning soma-pressing. In classical śrauta ritual the śastra consists of seven sets of three verses or

tr̥cas. In the recitation each triplet of verses is preceded by an introductory nivid, a brief declaration of the deities invoked in the recitation. Recitations typically combine verses from different hymns, or they may require that the form of the R̥gvedic verses be recast, but in this case the nivids need only be added to produce the recitation. These two hymns, therefore, are already fit for the classical performance of the soma ritual.

As Insler (2002) has shown, the sequence of gods in I.2–3 represents the sequence of gods who receive cups of soma during the soma-pressing day. The rite reflected in the hymns was neither a version of the soma ritual represented in the Family Books of the R̥gveda nor that of the classical ritual, although it comes fairly close to the latter. Rather, these two hymns represent a transitional period in the development of the soma rite as it moved toward its classical form.

In the R̥gvedic rite, Vāyu was the first of the gods to receive the soma and therefore the first tr̥ca of I.2 is dedicated to him. In the classical rite, the recipients of soma at the Morning Pressing are, for the most part, dual divinities. The first pair is Indra and Vāyu, to whom our second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) is dedicated, and the second pair is Mitra and Varuṇa, addressed in our third tr̥ca (vss. 7–9).

In I.3 the first tr̥ca is dedicated to the two Aśvins, who are the third set of dual divinities at the classical Morning Pressing. In the classical rite there are also morning offerings to Indra and to the All Gods. Those gods are mentioned in the next two tr̥cas (Indra, vss. 4–6; the All Gods, vss. 7–9), but at the time of the composition of these hymns, these verses probably refer to the midday and evening rites rather than to the morning offering.

In most of the Family Books of the R̥gveda, Indra alone is the principal at the Midday Pressing, though especially in Maṇḍala III there is evidence that the Maruts have joined Indra as dedicands, as in the classical rite. The Maruts are not mentioned in our hymn, however, and were probably not a part of the soma rite for which these hymns were composed. Although the R̥bhus and Indra were the principal recipients of soma at the Third Pressing for most of the R̥gvedic period, the R̥bhus are absent from this hymn, indicating that, as also in the classical rite, they had already all but disappeared from the soma rite. Rather, in this hymn and in the classical rite, there is a soma offering to the All Gods in the evening. This association of the All Gods with the Third Pressing must be fairly old, since the Brāhmaṇa texts refer to the Third Pressing as vaiśvadevyam "belonging to the All Gods." The last tr̥ca (vss. 10–12) of I.3 is to Sarasvatī, who does not receive an offering in the Third Pressing at the classical rite and has only a limited presence in the R̥gveda. However, she likely did receive soma at the Third Pressing in the period of this transitional rite.

For further on this śastra and the order of divinities addressed, see the other hymns with this structure, I.23 and II.41, as well as I.139 in part. It is not clear why the śastra has been split into two hymns just in this case.

The actual content of the two hymns is quite simple. In I.2 the first two tr̥cas to Vāyu and Indra and Vāyu respectively announce that the soma has been pressed and urge the gods to come to our sacrifice. The tr̥ca to Mitra and Varuṇa is slightly more interesting, in that it mentions the frequently conjoined notions of "insight"

(dhī́), "skill" (dákṣa), and "resolve" or "purpose" (krátu), the three elements necessary to conceive and carry out an action.

1. O Vāyu, lovely to see, drive here! Here are the properly prepared soma juices.
   Drink of them! Hear our summons!
2. O Vāyu, with their hymns the singers sing you here—they who have pressed soma, who understand the (ritual) days.
3. O Vāyu, your nourishing stream infusing (the soma) is going along for the pious man—the broadly spreading (stream) for soma-drinking.

4. O Indra and Vāyu, here are the soma-pressings: come near with delight, for the soma drops are eager for you.
5. O Vāyu and Indra, you take note of the pressings, you two rich in prizewinning mares.
   Drive right here at speed.
6. O Vāyu and Indra, drive right here to the appointed place of the soma-presser, swiftly and according to our insight right to the point, you superior men.

7. I call upon Mitra of refined skill and Varuṇa, who cares for the stranger, the two who send our ghee-covered insight to its goal.
8. By truth— o Mitra and Varuṇa, strong through truth, touching truth—you have attained your lofty purpose.
9. The two sage poets, Mitra and Varuṇa, powerfully born, having a wide dwelling place, furnish us effective skill.

I.3 Aśvins (1–3), Indra (4–6), All Gods (7–9), Sarasvatī (10–12)

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
12 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

See the introduction to the preceding hymn. This hymn is the continuation and conclusion of the Praügaśastra and follows the order of divinities discussed in the introduction to I.2. As in I.2, the contents are fairly banal—urging each god or divine group to come and enjoy our sacrificial offerings.

In both I.2 and I.3 the tr̥cas contain internal repetitions that unify them, though these unifying devices are of an elementary type. There are also less apparent linkages between tr̥cas created by verbal repetitions in the last verse of one tr̥ca and the first of the next. So, for example, I.2.6c and 7c mention our "insight" (dhī́). The last pāda (c) of I.3 begins ā́ yātam and 4a has ā́ yāhi "drive here," both imperatives to the same root. And 6c and 7c refer to sutá "pressed soma," though there is no obvious link between the third tr̥ca of I.3 and the last one to Sarasvatī.

1. O Aśvins, quick-handed lords of beauty, in the sacrificial refreshments find your delight, you two providing many enjoyments.
2. O Aśvins of many wondrous powers, you superior men with powerful insight, you holy ones, cherish our songs.
3. O wondrous Nāsatyas, the soma-pressings of the man who has twisted the ritual grass are seeking you.
   Drive here, o you who follow the course of the Rudras [=Maruts].

4. O Indra, drive here!—you of bright radiance. These soma-pressings here are seeking you, the ones purifed in full measure by delicate (fingers).
5. O Indra, drive here!—roused by our insight, sped by our inspired poets, to the sacred formulations of the cantor who has the pressed soma.
6. O Indra, drive here!—thrusting yourself onward to the sacred formulations, o possessor of fallow bays.
   Take delight in our pressed soma.

7. O helpers, supporters of the peoples, you All Gods—come here as pious ones to the pressed soma of the pious man.
8. The All Gods crossing the waters—come here to the pressed soma!— like ruddy (cows) to good pastures.
9. The All Gods—unfailing, undeceiving, (with the byword) "come, don't go!"— enjoy the ritual offering as its conveyors.

10. Let pure Sarasvatī, providing prize mares along with prizes, be eager for our sacrifice, bringing goods through her insight.
11. The impeller of liberal gifts, taking note of good thoughts, Sarasvatī has received our sacrifice.
12. Her great flood does Sarasvatī reveal with her beacon.
    She rules over all insights.

I.4 Indra

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

As Bergaigne (1889: 182) points out, the hymns I.4–9, all dedicated to Indra, all in gāyatrī, and all attributed to the same Vaiśvāmitra poet, form the texts on which the Brāhmaṇācchaṃsin priest, an assistant of the Hotar, draws for supplementary verses at the Morning Pressing.

This particular hymn consists of three tr̥cas and a final summary verse (10); the first and last tr̥cas are fairly conventional. In the first (vss. 1–3) the poet calls on Indra to come to our sacrifice and consume our soma. In the last (vss. 7–9) the poet again offers Indra soma and recounts Indra's past deeds inspired by his soma-drinking, with hopes for similar future exploits.

The middle tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) is a different matter and displays some anxiety about the poet's exclusive focus on Indra—"putting all his eggs in one basket," in the English idiom. In verse 4, immediately after the peremptory command to Indra, "come here!" the poet orders himself (or another person?) to "go away!"—to seek out Indra and inquire who he [=Indra, in our view] favors as a comrade, in an indirect question with a curious mixture of direct and indirect syntax. The question is also rhetorical: the poet expects Indra to favor him, and in verses 5 and 6 he defends the exclusive partnership against unnamed cavilers, by asserting that having Indra alone on his side is a good bargain. The defensive tone of this tr̥ca may seem an odd feature of the first full hymn to Indra in the R̥gveda, but it does strike a note that we will meet again and again in the collection—the worried hope that Indra will indeed choose to attend our sacrifice and that he will extend his help to us alone.

1. The one who assumes a good form for help—like a good milk-cow for a cow-milker—
   do we call upon every day.
2. Come here to our pressings. Drink of the soma, soma-drinker.
   It's a rich man's exhilaration that gives cows.
3. Then might we know your favors up close.
   Do not look past us—come here!

4. Go away! Ask Indra, spirited and indestructible, attentive to poetic inspiration, who is your choice from among your comrades.
5. And let scorners say to us, "You have missed out on the rest in placing your friendship in Indra alone."
6. But (even) a stranger—(indeed all) the separate peoples—would say we have a good portion, o wondrous one.
   (For) we would be in the protection of Indra alone.

7. Bring the swift to the swift—(bring soma), the glory of the sacrifice, causing exhilaration to men, exhilarating our comrade [=Indra] in its flight.
8. Having drunk of this, o you of a hundred resolves, you became the bane of obstacles.
   You helped the prizewinner to the prizes.

9. We incite you, the prizewinner, to the prizes, o you of a hundred resolves, to win the stakes, Indra.

10. He who is a great stream-bed of wealth but easy to cross, the comrade of the soma-presser—to him, to Indra, sing!

I.5 Indra

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī

A generally unremarkable hymn, with the usual offering of soma and praise to Indra in return, we hope, for help and favor. The favors especially desired are help and support in battles and raids and the victory prizes won in them (see vss. 3–4, 9–10), and the hymn ends (vs. 10) on a slightly worried note, with a reference to our enemies among men.

Structurally, the hymn divides into two halves. In the first (vss. 1–5), the poet addresses his fellow priests, commanding them to sing the songs, pointing to the prepared soma, and declaring what Indra can do. In the second half (vss. 6–10) he turns to Indra himself, reminding the god what the offerings will do for him. The birth of Indra (vs. 6) refers not only to his ancient birth but also to his appearance at this sacrifice. The single day in which he achieves his full strength is the sacrificial day, so that by the end of the day, he has the power to help the sacrificers.

1. Here—come here—sit down: sing forth to Indra, o comrades, whose vehicles are praise songs—
2. To the first among many, having control of desirable things, to Indra when the soma is pressed.
3. Will he be here for us at our hitching up (for war), he for wealth, he in plenty?
Will he come to us with prizes of victory?
4. He whose two fallow bays his rivals do not obstruct in the competition or in combats—
to him, to Indra, sing!
5. These pure [=unmixed] pressed soma drinks go in pursuit of the soma-drinker, and those mixed with curds.
6. You were born and were grown strong in a single day to drink the pressed soma, for preeminence, o Indra of good resolve.
7. Let the swift soma drinks enter you, o Indra, who long for song.
Let them be weal for you, the discerning one.

8. The praises have strengthened you, you the recitations, o you of a hundred resolves.
   Let our songs strengthen you.
9. Providing his imperishable help, Indra should win this prize of a thousand—he in whom are all manly powers.
10. Let mortals not plot deception against our bodies, o Indra, who long for song.
    Having control of it, keep away the deadly weapon.

I.6 Indra (1–3, 10), Maruts (4, 6, 8–9), Indra and Maruts (5, 7)

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī

A disjointed and episodic hymn. The Anukramaṇī ascription of the verses to a combination of Indra and the Maruts is reproduced in the above heading, but it is almost certainly wrong—though the confusion generated by the hymn makes the error pardonable. The Maruts do not appear to figure in the hymn at all, and, though Indra does, there are other divine figures in some of the verses assigned to him. As often, the hymn jumps back and forth from 2nd- to 3rd-person reference and from past to present time, but in this case the jumps are particularly disorienting and the overall structure hard to discern.

Modern attempts at interpretation generally begin with the Vala myth and the main divine personages therein, Indra and the Aṅgirases, his singer-assistants in this myth. The myth is most clearly alluded to in verse 5, the central verse (especially if vs. 10 is considered to be a mere variant of parallel vs. 9), and we may see here an interesting structural contrast to the omphalos hymn: instead of embedding the mystery in the middle verse and leading up to and away from it with clearer material, the poet here may have designed the middle verse as the key to the many questions posed by the diffuse fragments surrounding it and a motif in which to integrate them.

In any case verse 5 presents us with Indra finding the hidden cows within a stronghold with the help of an unnamed group, who must be the Aṅgirases. In our view this myth does provide the thematic backdrop for the whole hymn and is alluded to directly (or as directly as it gets) also in verses 6 and 8. But most of the rest of the hymn treats the ritual re-creation of Indra's releasing the dawns from the Vala cave—namely the rising of the sun, the kindling of the ritual fire, and Indra's journey to the early-morning sacrifice, and the most enigmatic verses refer, in our view, to Agni—not, as in other interpretations, to the sun or to Indra.

A brief and tentative synopsis: the first two verses, parallel in structure, depict the simultaneous hitching up of the sun (vs. 1) and Indra's chariot (vs. 2) for their respectively daily journeys. These verses are set in the present moment. Verse 3 is structurally paired with verse 7 in the architecture of the hymn; both are addressed to an unidentified 2nd sg. referent—in our view Agni, who is kindled at dawn (vs. 3) at the same time as Indra arrives at the sacrifice (vs. 7). Verse 3 is set in the mythic past, perhaps at Agni's first kindling by the Aṅgirases, an event also presented in verse 4, while verse 7 returns us to the present. (Verse 3 also contains an absolutely baffling 2nd plural vocative, "o young men," embedded within a verse with entirely 2nd singular reference. Short of emendation, there is little to be done with it, though it may refer to the plural subjects of verse 4, the fire-priests, who kindled the embryonic Agni.) Verse 5 provides the Vala-myth clue, and the remainder of the verses meld a mythic account of the rituals of dawn with reference to the ritual of the present moment.

1. They hitch up the coppery, ruddy (sun) that circles around the ones [=stars?] standing still.
   The lights are alight in heaven.
2. They hitch his beloved fallow bays to his chariot on opposite sides, the bold pair of sorrels, conveyors of the superior man [=Indra].
3. You young men—making a beacon for that without beacon and an ornament for that without ornament, you [=Agni] were born together with the dawns.
4. Certainly, just after that they once again roused his embryonic state [=kindled the fire] according to his nature, acquiring for themselves a name worthy of the sacrifice.
5. Along with the (ritual-)conveyors [=Aṅgirases] who break even the stronghold, o Indra, you discovered the ruddy (cattle) even though in hiding.
6. As those seeking the gods (bellow) their thought, the songs have bellowed to the finder of goods, great and famous.
7. Since you [=Agni] will come to sight along with Indra, having joined together with the fearless one,
   (you two are) the delighting pair who share the same luster.
8. Together with the irreproachable, heaven-bound (Aṅgirases), the battler chants mightily, together with Indra's beloved troops.
9. From there or from the luminous realm of heaven come here, o earth-circling one.
   The songs converge on him.
10. We beseech Indra for gain from here, the earthly realm, or from heaven, or from the great airy space.

I.7 Indra

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī

A relatively simple praise of Indra, focused especially on his possession of the mace (vss. 2c, 3c, 7b) and his help in battles and contests (vss. 4–6). Indra's mythological exploits receive cursory treatment in verse 3. A more insistent theme emerges toward the end, with an accumulation of loaded terms for potentially rival groups of people: kṛṣṭīḥ "communities" (8b), carṣanīnā́m "domains" (9a), páñca kṣitīnā́m "the five peoples" (9c), jánebhyaḥ "men" (10b), culminating in the hope that Indra will leave those rivals behind and become exclusively ours.

But one can say that the real focus of the hymn is Indra's name. The poem, especially its first half, is characterized by the insistent repetition of the name, with "Indra" as the first word in verses 1–5 and also in verse-internal lines 1b, 1c, 2c, and 5b. After verse 5, the poet noticeably pauses in verses 6–8, using the name only once. Even so, that one occurrence, which is in 7b, is in a marked position as the middle word of the middle line of the middle verse of this three-verse section. This pause or break accents the reappearance of the name twice in rapid succession at the beginning of 9c and 10a. Thematically, the emphasis on the name of Indra underscores the poet's desire that the person of Indra, independent of all else, be present at his sacrifice.

Verse 6 contains a somewhat obscure request that Indra "uncover yonder pot." "Yonder pot" probably refers to anything distant that contains what the poet and his people want or need. A reasonable parallel is VIII 23.29bc, tváṃ no gómatīr íśaḥ, mahó rāyáḥ sātím agne ápā vṛdhi "Uncover for us refreshments consisting of cows and the winning of great weath, o Agni," with the same 2nd-sg. imperative ápā vṛdhi "uncover" and a desirable object.

1. Just to Indra have the singers bellowed aloft, to Indra the chanters with their chants, to Indra their voices.
2. Indra, close-linked with his two fallow bays, (is mounted) on the two yoked by speech;
   Indra is the golden wielder of the mace.
3. Indra made the sun mount in heaven for the long view.
   He propelled apart the rock with the cows (inside).
4. O Indra, help us when prizes and stakes of thousands (are set), as the mighty one with mighty forms of help.
5. Indra do we call upon when the stake is great and Indra when it's small, our mace-wielding yokemate amid obstacles.

6. You bull who give in every way, uncover yonder pot for us, since you are one who cannot be repulsed.
7. The praises of mace-wielding Indra that go higher at every thrust—
   I cannot get enough of good praise for him.
8. Like a bull his herds, the buffalo rouses the communities with his might, since he is the master who cannot be repulsed.
9. Indra, who alone has control over the settled domains and their goods, and over the five people,
10. Indra do we summon for you from the men all around.
   Let him be exclusively ours.

I.8 Indra

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī

The first part of the hymn (vss. 1–4) asks Indra for help in battle and for the wealth (both material and in manpower) to make success in combat possible. With Indra's help, the sacrificer and his men become almost aspects of Indra himself. As he is the "smasher of obstacles," so they will "keep obstacles hemmed in." They take up Indra's mace (vs. 3) and become his "hammers," which smash their enemies. They acquire Indra as their yokemate (vs. 4).

The second part (vss. 5–10) celebrates the extent of Indra's power and the benefits it brings to the men who attain him and it. This theme is first expressed relatively straightforwardly (though with suppressed syntactic connection) in verses 5–6. But in verse 7 Indra's vastness is conveyed by a striking image, syntactically untethered, where his cheek and his gullet are compared to the wide, swollen sea. This image introduces the final three verses (8–10), each of which begins evā́ hí "in just this way, in the same way." In our view the underlying "same" is Indra's vast extent—both physically, in the images of verse 7, and metaphorically, in the immense liberality (vs. 8) and help (vs. 9) he bestows on us. The final verse (10), though introduced with the same expression, turns to our obligations to Indra, and, again by implication, it is suggested that our praises of Indra are as vast as his gifts to us.

The hymn is characterized throughout by chaining between verses, often not overtly marked.

1. O Indra, bring wealth here—winning, conquering, ever overpowering, highest—for our help—
2. (Wealth) by which we will keep obstacles hemmed in, hemmed in by bare-knuckled fighting, hemmed in (by fighting) on horseback, when we are helped by you.

3. O Indra, helped by you, might we, as your hammers, take up your mace; might we conquer our opponents completely in the fight.
4. With champion archers, with you as our yokemate, Indra, might we overcome those doing battle.
5. Great is Indra, and now let the greatness for the mace-wielder be (even) beyond (that).
 Like heaven in its extent is his capacious power
6. (For those) who have attained (him)—either superior men in the clash or at the winning of offspring or inspired poets seeking (him) through insight.
7. His cheek, the best soma-drinker, which swells like the sea—his gullet (which is) like the wide waters…
8. Just the same is his liberality—copious, great, conferring cattle, like a ripe branch for the pious man.
9. Just the same is your help, o Indra—extensive for one like me, present in an instant for the pious man.
10. In the same way those things beloved of him, praise song and recitation, are to be proclaimed, for Indra to drink the soma.

I.9 Indra

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
10 verses: gāyatrī

The "message" of this hymn is the standard one: Indra is urged to drink of our soma and enjoy our praise songs and in return to provide us with the usual good things. This relation of reciprocity is nicely conveyed stylistically by complementary paired repetitions. For example, in verse 2 Indra is to be "sent surging" to the soma (2a), while the same verb is to be supplied for the soma's movement to Indra (2b). Though this verb √sṛj is an unusual choice to describe Indra's locomotion, it is a standard idiom applied to soma's progress, especially in the Soma Maṇḍala (IX). (See here also the songs sent surging in verse 4.) Similarly "spur on" in verses 5–6 with "us" once as goal (vs. 5) and once as direct object (vs. 6), and verse 10 where both Indra and the chant directed to him are characterized as "lofty," after two occurrences of "lofty" applied to fame (vss. 7–8).

For readers interested in comparative Indo-European poetics, the most notable feature of the hymn is an instance of the famous, but relatively rare, formula "imperishable fame" (śrávaḥ… ákṣitam) in verse 7, where the two words are found in separate pādas (b and c). The resonance of this formula and the concept behind it may account for the near-exact repetition of the "place fame in us" expression in verses 7–8.

1. Indra, come! Reach exhilaration from the stalk with all its soma-joints.
   (You are) the great one, superiority (itself) by reason of your power.
2. Send him [=Indra] surging to the pressed soma, and (send) the exhilarator [=soma] (surging) to Indra, who seeks exhilaration, the doer to him who does all things.
3. O you of the lovely lips who govern all domains, reach exhilaration through the exhilarating praise songs here at these soma-pressings.
4. Our songs have been sent surging to you, Indra. They have reared up toward you—not (yet) pleasured, they (have reared up) toward the bull, their husband.
5. Spur on your bright benefit entirely in our direction, o Indra—the benefit worth wishing for:
   just yours will be the farmost and foremost.
6. Spur us on then for wealth, so that we acquire vehemence and glory, o powerfully brilliant one.
7. Place in us, o Indra, broad and lofty fame, accompanied by cattle and victory prizes,
   lifelong and imperishable.
8. Place in us lofty fame and brilliance that best wins a thousand, and refreshments by the cartload.
9. (We are) singing with songs to Indra, the goods-master of goods, the one worthy of verses, who will come to the call for help.
10. To him who is at home at every soma-pressing, to the lofty one, the stranger himself chants a lofty, lusty (chant) to Indra.

I.10 Indra

Madhuchandas Vaiśvāmitra
12 verses: anuṣṭubh

Oldenberg (1888: 226) remarks on the idiosyncratic arrangement of the Madhuchandas hymns (1–11) and on the location of this and the following hymn in particular. Contrary to the usual arrangement, the gāyatrī hymns of this collection (1–9) are placed as a group together before these final two hymns in anuṣṭubh.

Though the hymn displays the usual reciprocal balance between what we offer to Indra and what we ask him for, the poet focuses more on the verbal offerings we make than on the soma. Songs, praise hymns, and recitations are mentioned in verses 1, 3–5, 9, 12—with a bit of thematic ring composition linking the first verse and the first half of the last one (12ab).

As in the last hymn (I.9) reciprocal actions are posited of Indra and his worshipers. For example in verse 4ab Indra is ordered to respond to our verbal praises by verbal actions of his own. In 4cd/5ab we first command Indra to strengthen us and our ritual, and then we produce a recitation meant to strengthen Indra in turn. We both urge him to enjoy our companionship (5d) and beg him to give us his (6a). The most ingenious example of reciprocal action is found in verse 7, in the ambiguous form tvā́dātam. The topic is the Vala myth and the glory that accrues from opening the Vala cave and driving out the cows. Indra of course is the major actor in this myth, and tvā́dātam íd yáśaḥ can be interpreted as "(that) glory is acquired only by you" (based on the idiom ā́ √dā "take, acquire"). But Indra also shared the action with the Aṅgirases, and the myth is also often reinterpreted as engaging human priests in its ritual re-enactment, so that the same phrase can also mean "(that) glory is given only by you" (with the simplex √dā "give"). Either interpretation is morphologically, grammatically, and contextually possible.

There is otherwise little remarkable about the hymn, though in several verses the poet echoes passages found elsewhere, which he twists to a different, sometimes opposite meaning (cf. 7b with III.40.6, 8b with I.176.1, and 9ab with VII.32.5).

1. The singers sing to you; the chanters chant their chant.
   The formulators (of sacred speech) hold you up like a roof-pole, o you of a hundred resolves.
2. When he has mounted from peak to peak and has seen much to be done, then Indra perceives his purpose, and the ram stirs with his flock.
3. Hitch up your long-maned fallow bays, the two bullish ones filling their girthbands;
   then proceed to the hearing of our songs, o soma-drinking Indra.
4. Come to our praise songs. Cry out to them, applaud them, and bellow to them.
   Together with us, good Indra, make our formulation and our sacrifice strong.
5. A strengthening recitation is to be proclaimed to Indra who provides many fulfillments, so that the able one will take pleasure in our soma-pressings and in our companionship.
6. Just him do we beg for companionship, him for wealth, him for an abundance of good heroes.
   He is the able one, and he will be able for us—Indra who distributes the goods.
7. Easily opening (the pen), easily driving out (the cows)—(that) glory is acquired [/given] only by you, Indra.

Open the pen of the cows; show your generosity, o possessor of the stone.

8. Since both world-halves together cannot budge you when you show your mettle, you will conquer the waters along with the sun. Shake loose the cows for us.

9. You of listening ear, listen to our call: now accept my songs.
Indra, make this praise song of mine closer even than your yokemate.

10. Since we know you as the best of bulls, who listen to calls when prizes (are at stake), we call for the help of the best of bulls, the help that best wins a thousand.

11. O Indra, (god) of Kuśika, finding exhilaration, drink our pressed soma.
Lengthen our lifetime anew; make the seer the winner of a thousand.

12. Let these songs surround you on every side, o you who long for songs.
Let strengths accompany the one whose lifetime has been strengthened; let enjoyments be enjoyed (by him).

I.11 Indra

Jetar Mādhuchandasa
8 verses: anuṣṭubh

Attributed to a descendant of Madhuchandas, the poet of I.1–10, this relatively simple hymn has little distinctive about it. Several famous deeds of Indra are mentioned (Vala verse 5, Śuṣṇa verse 7), and our praises and Indra's countergifts are celebrated. These general themes are similar to those found in the Indra hymns of the ancestral Madhuchandas.

The poet is fond of etymological figures: "best charioteer of charioteers" (1c), "the conqueror who is not to be conquered" (2d), "with your tricks... the tricky..." (7a), and the probably etymologically unrelated but phonologically similar máṃhate maghám "grants the bounty" (3d).

1. All the songs have strengthened Indra, expansive as the sea, the best charioteer of charioteers, the lord of prizes and the lord of settlements.

2. In comradeship with you who control the prizes, o Indra, let us not fear, o lord of power.
We keep crying out to you, the conqueror who is not to be conquered.

3. Many are the gifts of Indra; his forms of help do not become exhausted when he grants to his praisers the bounty of a prize consisting of cattle.

4. He was born as a splitter of strongholds, a youthful poet, possessed of immeasurable power.
Indra is the sustainer of every deed, the much-praised wielder of the mace.

5. You uncovered the opening of Vala filled with cattle, o possessor of the stone.
   Before the fearless one [=Vala?], the gods, though being pushed back, came to your aid.
6. I came back with your gifts, o champion, announcing (them) to our boundary river.
   O you who long for songs, the bards have approached me: they know of this (act) of yours.
7. With your tricks, Indra, you brought down tricky Śuṣṇa.
   The wise know of that (act) of yours. Raise up their fame!
8. The praise-songs have cried out to Indra, who holds sway by his might, whose gifts are a thousand or even greater.

I.12–23 are attributed to Medhātithi Kāṇva, also supposedly the poet of some verses in the early hymns of Maṇḍala VIII, a predominately Kāṇva book, as well as the second hymn of the Soma Maṇḍala (IX.2). The Medhātithi First Maṇḍala hymns here are all in gāyatrī meter, save for some stray verses in I.17 and 23. They are dedicated to a variety of deities; in fact, each hymn has a different divinity or set of divinities. The poet has a particular penchant for dedicands in pairs (Indra and Varuṇa I.17, Agni and the Maruts I.19, Indra and Agni I.21) or groups (Viśve Devāḥ I.14, R̥bhus I.20, variety of divinities I.13, 15, 22–23), and in the group hymns a high proportion follow particular ritual litanies: Āprī (I.13), R̥tugrahas (I.15), Praügaśastra (I.23).

The style and contents of these hymns are for the most part elementary, even banal, and there is generally a strong focus on purely ritual matters, to the virtual exclusion of description, mythological references, praise, and even requests for aid and gifts. In short, a poetically uninspiring collection, but the information it gives about the early shape of later ritual litanies is valuable.

I.12 Agni

Medhātithi Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī

This simple hymn has a high proportion of pādas repeated from other hymns, and in some ways seems to have been assembled rather than composed. It touches on the standard characteristics and roles of Agni: messenger, priest, and poet, conveyor of the gods to the sacrifice, and protector and benefactor of men. There is essentially no description of fire; the focus is entirely on the ritual.

1. Agni we choose as messenger, the Hotar affording all possessions, very effective for this sacrifice.

2. Agni after Agni they always invoke with invocations as the clanlord, conveyor of the oblations, dear to many.
3. Agni, convey the gods here, as soon as you are born, for the man who has twisted the ritual grass.
   You are the Hotar, to be reverently invoked by us.
4. Awaken the eager ones, when you travel on your mission, o Agni.
   With the gods sit here on the ritual grass.
5. O shining one whose oblation is ghee, burn against those who do harm, o Agni, against demonic beings.
6. By Agni is Agni kindled—poet, houselord, youth, conveying the oblation, with the sacrificial ladle in his mouth.
7. Praise Agni, the poet whose ordinances hold true at the ceremony, the god who banishes afflictions.
8. The lord of the oblation who honors you as his messenger, o god Agni, for him become a helper.
9. The possessor of the oblation who seeks to win Agni to pursue the gods, to him be merciful, o pure one.
10. O pure, shining Agni, convey the gods here to us, right up to our sacrifice and oblation.
11. Being praised with our newer song, bring us wealth, a refreshment made of heroes.
12. Agni, with your blazing flame, along with all the invocations to the gods, enjoy this praise of ours right now!

I.13 Āprī

Medhātithi Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī

This is the first Āprī hymn to be encountered in the R̥gveda of the ten in the text. In these hymns, associated with a litany during the Animal Sacrifice, a set series of subjects or key words (here italicized) is treated verse by verse, in fixed order but with variable wording. This particular Āprī hymn is a much less elaborated version than some exemplars of this form; in this hymn the default model verse is a bare mention of the topic as object of the phrase "I invite" (vss. 3, 7, 8, 10, 12). Description is minimal and for the most part predictable.

1. Well-kindled, o Agni, convey the gods here to us, to the man offering the oblation,
   and perform sacrifice, o pure Hotar.
2. O Tanūnapāt, make our sacrifice full of honey and make it be among the gods
   today, to be pursued, o poet.

3. Narāśaṃsa, the dear one, I invite here to this sacrifice, the honey-tongued preparer of the oblation.
4. O Agni, on the best-naved chariot convey the gods here when you are solemnly invoked.
   You are the Hotar, installed by Manu.
5. Strew in due order the ritual grass with ghee on its back, o inspirited ones, where the sighting of the immortal (host) (will be).
6. Let them gape open—the Divine Doors, increasing through truth, inexhaustible—today and now for sacrifice.
7. Night and Dawn, well-ornamented, I invite to this sacrifice, to sit here on this ritual grass of ours.
8. The two well-tongued poets, the Divine Hotars, I invite.
   Let them perform this sacrifice for us right here.
9. Iḍā, Sarasvatī, Mahī, the three goddesses who are joy itself—let them sit, unfailing, on the ritual grass.
10. Here I invite foremost Tvaṣṭar who provides all forms.
    Let him be ours alone.
11. Release, o Lord of the Forest, the oblation to the gods, o god.
    Let the display of the giver be outstanding.
12. With the svāhā-cry perform the sacrifice for Indra in the house of the sacrificer.
    There do I invite the gods.

I.14 All Gods

Medhātithi Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī

Though this hymn is dedicated to the All Gods, its focus is on Agni's role in conveying the gods to the sacrifice and serving as the mouth and tongue through which they drink the oblations (see esp. vss. 7–8). The All God theme is cleverly introduced in the first verse by parceling out the phrase "with all these gods," a word at the beginning of each pāda (an effect clumsily reproduced in translation), and an enumeration of some of the most important of the gods is given in verse 3, But otherwise (save for mention of Indra and Vāyu, the recipients of the first soma offering, in vs. 10) the gods are an undifferentiated group and backgrounded to Agni.

The poet does not forget his own, however. He mentions his kin-group, the Kaṇvas, twice (vss. 2, 5) as the ritualists preparing the sacrifice.

1. With these, o Agni, hither to friendly service, to hymns—with all (of them), for soma-drinking—with the gods, come and perform sacrifice.
2. The Kaṇvas have called to you; they hymn your insightful thoughts, o inspired poet.
With the gods, o Agni, come hither.
3. Indra and Vāyu, Bṛhaspati, Mitra (and Varuṇa), Agni, Pūṣan, Bhaga, the Ādityas, the Marutian flock (have the Kaṇvas called).
4. The drops are brought forward for you (all)—the invigorating, exhilarating droplets of honey sitting in the cups.
5. Seeking aid they solemnly invoke you, (o Agni)—the Kaṇvas with their twisted ritual grass and their oblations, as they make fit preparations.
6. Ghee-backed, yoked with mind are the draft-horses that draw you and the gods here to drink the soma.
7. Those (gods) deserving the sacrifice, strong through truth—bring them here along with their wives, Agni.
Make them drink of the honey, you of good tongue.
8. Those who deserve the sacrifice, who are to be invoked, let them drink with your tongue of the honey, when the vaṣaṭ-call is made, o Agni.
9. The inspired poet, the Hotar, will convey all the gods awakening at dawn hither from the luminous realm of the sun.
10. With all (the gods), o Agni, with Indra and with Vāyu, drink the somian honey according to the ordinances of alliance.
11. As the Hotar installed by Manu, Agni, you sit at the sacrifices.
So perform this rite for us now.
12. O god, yoke the ruddy (mares) to your chariot, the fallow bays, the chestnuts.
Then with them convey the gods hither.

I.15 Ṛtudevatāḥ (Sequential Deities)

Medhātithi Kāṇva
12 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn has a precise ritual application: it accompanies a series of ritual offerings (Ṛtugrahas "sequential cups") made in a fixed order to a fixed sequence of gods by a similarly fixed sequence of priests, roughly matched in function to the gods they serve. (See, e.g., Eggeling Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa 2: 319 n. 1.) The same sequence is found in the two hymns II.36–37, which together are entirely parallel to this hymn. (See further remarks in the introductions to those hymns.) The divine order and the priestly counterparts are the following. (The priests are not all mentioned by title in this hymn, but those not bracketed are found in II.36–37.)

1.	Indra	Hotar
2.	Maruts	Potar
3.	Tvaṣṭar	Neṣṭar
4.	Agni	Agnīdh
5.	Indra/Bṛhaspati	Brahman
6.	Mitra and Varuṇa	Praśāstar
7.	Wealth-Giver	Hotar
8.	Wealth-Giver	Potar
9.	Wealth-Giver	Neṣṭar
10.	Wealth-Giver	[Achāvāka, in later ritual]
11.	Aśvins	[2 Adhvaryus, in later ritual]
12.	Agni Gṛhapati	[Yajamāna, in later ritual]

It will be noted that cups 7–10 are dedicated to the same divinity, "Wealth-Giver," Draviṇodā(s), a vague figure defined only by his name who is not on the same level as the other gods, and the associated priests simply repeat the initial order. It has been convincingly argued by Renou (1950 [1978]) that as the word ṛtú was reinterpreted from merely "sequence, turn" to "season," the number of divinities in this litany was increased to twelve to match the months of the year by the insertion of a simple placeholder. For further on the ritual and its transformation see, inter alia, Minkowski (1991: 81–89).

1. O Indra, drink the soma in your turn. Let the drops enter you, the invigorating ones finding their home there.
2. O Maruts, drink in your turn from the cup of the Potar. Purify the sacrifice, for you are the ones of good drops.
3. Welcome our sacrifice; o Neṣṭar [=Tvaṣṭar], along with the Wives (of the Gods), drink in your turn, for you are the conferrer of treasure.
4. O Agni, convey the gods here; make them sit in the three wombs.
 Attend on them; drink in your turn.
5. O Indra, from the Brahman's largesse drink the soma according to your turns, for only your comradeship cannot be brought to ruin.
6. You two, o Mitra and Varuṇa of steadfast commandments, have attained skill difficult to trick and the sacrifice in your turn.

7. As for the Wealth-Giver of wealth—those with the pressing stones in their hands in the ceremony solemnly invoke the god at the sacrifices.
8. Let the Wealth-Giver give us goods that are famed.
We shall win these for ourselves among the gods.
9. The Wealth-Giver desires to drink: pour and set it forth;
send it from the Neṣṭar's cup by turns.
10. When we sacrifice to you, o Wealth-Giver, the fourth time by turns, then become a giver to us.
11. O Aśvins, you who have luminous fire and blazing commandments, drink the honey in your turn, you whose vehicle is the sacrifice.
12. Through your lordship in the house, o companion, you are leader of the sacrifice in your turn.
Sacrifice to the gods for the one who seeks the gods.

I.16 Indra

Medhātithi Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī

This is nothing more than an extended invitation to Indra to come to the sacrifice, with a tempting menu of offerings and praises. One might say about this hymn that it makes reading the Ṛgveda seem easy; it also makes it seem not worth the trouble.

1. Let the fallow bays convey you here, the bull to drink the soma—those with the eye of the sun (convey) you, Indra.
2. Here are the roasted grains, bathing in ghee; the fallow bay pair will convey Indra here right to them in the best-naved chariot.
3. Indra we invoke early in the morning, Indra as the ceremony advances, Indra to drink of the soma.
4. Come up here to our pressed soma, Indra, with your shaggy fallow bays, for when it is pressed we invoke you.
5. Come here to this praise of ours, up to this pressing here when it is pressed.
Drink like a thirsty buffalo.
6. Here are the pressed soma drops on the ritual grass.
Drink them, Indra, for might.
7. Here is the foremost praise for you; let it be most availing, touching your heart.
So drink the pressed soma.
8. To every pressing when it is pressed Indra goes for exhilaration, the Vṛtra-smasher, to drink the soma.

9. Fulfill this desire of ours with cows and horses, o you of a hundred resolves.
   Very attentive, we will praise you.

I.17 Indra and Varuṇa

Medhātithi Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī

Like Medhātithi's other hymns, this address to Indra and Varuṇa is elementary in contents: the poet calls upon those gods to aid him and give him lavish gifts in exchange for hymns. The two gods are addressed together, and there is no mention of the distinctive qualities of either god. Only in verse 5, the middle verse, are the gods separated, and even there the structures in which they appear are parallel and colorless. In contrast to the predictable and banal contents, the syntax of the hymn is surprisingly problematic. There are a number of ellipses that cannot be reliably filled (see, e.g., the parenthetic additions in verses 3–6) and syntactic clashes that are difficult to rationalize (e.g., in verse 4, whose translation skates over some of the problems). The poet may have been trying to inject some surprise into a tired poetic assignment.

1. I choose the aid of Indra and Varuṇa, the sovereign kings.
   They will be gracious to such as us.
2. For you two are the ones who come for aid to the call of an inspired poet like me, and are the upholders of the settled domains.
3. Satisfy (us) according to our desire from your wealth, o Indra and Varuṇa.
   We beseech you two for closest (friendship).
4. For we would like to be (part) of the powers of you two, of your favors that grant victory prizes.
5. Indra is (master?) of (favors) that grant thousands, Varuṇa of (riches) worth proclaiming.
   Their resolve becomes worthy of hymns.
6. With the aid of just those two might we win and secure (the winnings).
   And might there be a surplus.
7. Indra and Varuṇa, I invoke you two for brilliant bounty.
   Make us victors.
8. Indra and Varuṇa, just now, while our poetic insights are striving to win you two, extend shelter to us.
9. Let that lovely praise reach you two, Indra and Varuṇa, which I invoke, which you bring to fulfillment as your joint praise.

I.18 Brahmaṇaspati [Lord of the Sacred Formulation] (1–3), Brahmaṇaspati, Indra, and Soma (4), the Same with Dakṣiṇā (5); Sadasaspati [Lord of the Seat] (6–8), Sadasaspati or Narāśaṃsa (9)

Medhātithi Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn falls into two parts: verses 1–5 concern Brahmaṇaspati (in part in conjunction with other gods), 6–9 Sadasaspati. Though Brahmaṇaspati is a well-established divinity and an allo-form of the even better established Bṛhaspati, Sadasaspati "Lord of the Seat" occurs only here (and once elsewhere, in Medhātithi's oeuvre, in the variant epithet sádaspáti used of the dual divinities Indra and Agni, I.21.5). Thus "lord of the seat" is not a separate divinity, but the functional descriptor of another god. In our view the god in question is Agni, and the hymn balances the two major constituents of the sacrifice: the verbal portion overseen by the Lord of the Sacred Formulation and the physical portion embodied by Agni, the Lord of the (Ritual) Seat and the conduit for oblations to the gods.

The first part actually says little about the mastery of verbal powers—except by repeating the name Brahmaṇaspati and, strikingly, by calling on that god to make the unnamed poet "a Kakṣīvant," one of the most skilled of Ṛgvedic poets, to whom I.116–126 are ascribed. (Unfortunately, Brahmaṇaspati did not succeed in effecting this transformation, at least judging from the banality of Medhātithi's preserved poems.) Otherwise these first five verses call on the god to help and protect us, especially from hostile speech (vs. 3). Perhaps because the epithet "Lord of the Seat" is a sort of riddle, the second part of the hymn is more explicit about the activities of the divinity who has this title, and the descriptions in verses 7 and, especially, 8 make Agni the clear referent. The final verse (9) begins with another epithet, Narāśaṃsa, also used of Agni elsewhere, as is the adjective "most extensive" (because of the spreading of his smoke), and the final phrase "like one besieging the seat of heaven" can refer to the rising of this smoke toward the sky, taking the oblations with it.

Though, as is generally the case with Medhātithi's work, the phraseology of the hymn is not particularly impressive, and it contains a number of phrases borrowed from other hymns, the complementarity of the two parts and the handling of the riddling second half make this a more pleasing composition than some of the others in this group.

1. O Lord of the Sacred Formulation, make him a possessor of soma, a sounding [/sun-like] one, (make him) a Kakṣīvant, who is (also) descended from fire-priests.
2. He who is rich, who smashes afflictions, while finding goods and increasing prosperity, let him accompany us, he who is powerful.
3. Let not the (male)diction, the malice of the grudging mortal reach us.
   Guard us, Lord of the Sacred Formulation.

4. That hero is certainly not harmed whom Indra, whom the Lord of the Sacred Formulation, whom Soma urges on—(though he is) mortal.
5. O Lord of the Sacred Formulation, (protect) him; let Soma and Indra (protect) the mortal:
Let the Priestly Gift protect (him) from difficult straits.

6. The Lord of the Seat, infallible, dear and desirable to Indra,
I have besought for wisdom as our gain.
7. Without whom the sacrifice even of one attentive to poetic inspiration does not succeed, he drives the team of insightful thoughts.
8. Then he brings to success the preparation of the oblation; he advances the ceremony;
he goes with the libation to the gods.
9. "Praise of men" [/Narāśaṃsa], the boldest, most extensive one did I see—like one besieging the seat of heaven.

I.19 Agni and the Maruts

Medhātithi Kāṇva
9 verses: gāyatrī

The divinity pairing in this hymn—the fire-god Agni and the stormy troop of Maruts—is an uncommon one and makes little mythological sense and little sense in R̥gvedic ritual (though in later śrauta ritual there is an Āgnimāruta śastra recited in the Third Pressing). In fact the pairing exists in this hymn only in its refrain; the first two pādas of each verse are directed at one or the other: Agni in verses 1, 2, and 9, the Maruts in vss. 4–8. All of the Marut verses are structured as definitional relative clauses beginning with yé "which ones, those who," following the model of hymns like II.12, and the contents are typical Marut themes. Verse 3 is a curious exception, for pāda b names the All Gods (or "all the gods") though in a context and with a predicate (pāda a) appropriate to the Maruts—and beginning with the same yé. Medhātithi also identifies the Maruts with the All Gods elsewhere (I.23.10).

1. Toward this pleasing ceremony you are called, for its protection.
– With the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
2. For no god nor mortal is beyond the will of you who are great.
– With the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
3. Those who know the great airy realm, the All Gods without deceit—
with the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
4. Those who chanted the chant, the strong ones, unassailable through their strength—
with the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.

5. Those who are resplendent, of terrible form, of good dominion, caring for the stranger—
   with the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
6. Those who as gods sit in the luminous realm of the firmament, in heaven—
   with the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
7. Those who make the mountains swing, across the undulating sea—
   with the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
8. Those who stretch with their reins across the sea with their strength—
   with the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.
9. Toward you I dispatch the somian honey, for you to drink first.
   – With the Maruts, o Agni, come hither.

I.20 R̥bhus

Medhātithi Kāṇva
8 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn works briskly and efficiently through the marvelous feats accomplished by the R̥bhus, a trio of craftsmen, originally mortal, who attained immortality and a share in the sacrifice by their skilled work. This last achievement is stated clearly in the final verse (8; see also 2c, 5), while verses 2–6 enumerate the separate actions that led to it. Several features give shape to the basic list structure of the hymn. The name of the divine dedicands appears only once, in the exact middle of the hymn (vs. 4c), and the adjective "best conferring treasures" of 1c is opened out into its phrasal syntactic equivalent "confer treasures" in verse 7, providing a loose ring.

1. This praise here has been made for the godly breed by the inspired poets by mouth—
   a praise that best confers treasures.
2. Those who fashioned for Indra with mind the two fallow bays yoked by speech,
   they attained the sacrifice through their labors.
3. They fashioned for the Nāsatyas an earth-circling, well-naved chariot;
   they fashioned a juice-yielding milk-cow.
4. They whose mantras come true, who aim straight—the R̥bhus—made their parents young again through their toil.
5. Your exhilarating drinks have united with Indra accompanied by the Maruts
   and with the kingly Ādityas.
6. And this beaker of the god Tvaṣṭar new produced you made again into four.

7. On us, on the soma-presser confer treasures, three times seven, one after the other, for good lauds.
8. The conveyors secured and by their good work shared in the sacrificial share among the gods.

I.21 Indra and Agni

Medhātithi Kāṇva
6 verses: gāyatrī

Though Indra and Agni are joint recipients of a certain number of R̥gvedic hymns, they do not form a natural pair (though they do receive a joint offering of soma in the later śrauta ritual, the Aindrāgnagraha), and the hymns to them rarely rise above the commonplace—as is true also for this one.

The first four verses are invocation, calling the two gods to the sacrifice and promising them praise and soma. The two interior verses (2–3) use the lexeme prá √śaṃs "proclaim, eulogize," which is later specialized for royal panegyric (the praśastis of classical inscriptions, etc.), and it may have some of that tone here as well. (For royal associations of the lexeme in the R̥gveda, see Jamison 2007: 146–48.) In verse 3 the object of the praśasti is the word mitrá; unlike most commentators, we do not believe that this refers to the god Mitra, but rather to the abstract "alliance" that Mitra embodies, a sense that would be appropriate to an official and royal context. The alliance we wish to proclaim may be (as we have translated it here) the alliance between the two gods, joining two distinct aspects of Vedic religion, though it could also be their alliance with us.

Verses 5–6 then suggest what these allies can do for us; the final verse is introduced by the pregnant phrase "by this truth," characteristic of the later satya-kriyā or "truth-formulation." Here it presumably refers to the whole preceding hymn as an expression of truth.

1. I call Indra and Agni here. For those two alone we desire a praise hymn.
   They are the best soma-drinkers of soma.
2. Proclaim them at the sacrifices; embellish Indra and Agni, o men.
   Sing to them in songs.
3. We call these two to proclaim their alliance; we call them, Indra and Agni, the two soma-drinkers, to drink soma.
4. Those two, though formidable, we will call near to this pressing pressed here.
   Let Indra and Agni come right here.
5. As great lords of the seat, Indra and Agni, crush the demonic force.
   Let the voracious ones be without offspring.
6. By this truth be watchful over the footprint of discernment [=ritual ground].
   Indra and Agni, extend (us) shelter.

I.22 Various Gods (Aśvins 1–4, Savitar 5–8, Agni 9–10, Gods 11, Indrāṇi, Varuṇānī, Agnāyī 12, Heaven and Earth 13–14, Earth 15, Viṣṇu or Gods 16, Viṣṇu 17–21)

Medhātithi Kāṇva
21 verses: gāyatrī

The Medhātithi group ends with two lengthy hymns to a variety of divinities: the ascriptions of the Anukramaṇī are reproduced above. As Oldenberg points out (1888: 224–25; Noten ad loc.), both hymns can easily be broken down into smaller hymns, which then conform to the principles of arrangement in the Saṃhitā. The clear changes of divinity support the division of this hymn into smaller units, although Oldenberg's divisions do not altogether match those of the Anukramaṇī; Oldenberg's are clearly superior: 1–4, 5–8, 9–12, 13–15, 16–18, 19–21.

Like the immediately preceding hymn, the first sections of this one are primarily devoted to invocation of the various gods: the Aśvins in verses 1–4, Savitar in 5–8. In a slight variation on this theme, in verses 9–12 Agni is called upon to bring Tvaṣṭar and the Wives of the Gods to the sacrifice; this divine group figures in a number of minor rites in the Soma Sacrifice (especially the Third Pressing) and elsewhere. The next three verses (13–15) concern Heaven and Earth; the middle verse (14) is the only truly enigmatic one in the hymn. The final six verses (16–21) consist of two tr̥cas to Viṣṇu, which, both by the principles of arrangement and by their phraseology, should be considered two separate hymns. There is no obvious reason, either ritual or mythological, for collecting these particular short compositions in a single super-hymn. As Oldenberg argues, the grouping and order seem to be entirely mechanical.

1. Awaken the two who hitch up early in the morning. Let the Aśvins come here,
   to drink of this soma.
2. Those two possessing a good chariot who are the best charioteers, both gods who touch heaven,
   the Aśvins we invoke.
3. The honeyed whip that is yours, Aśvins, that has a liberal spirit—with that mix the sacrifice.
4. For it is not even a little distance from you, when you come in your chariot
   to the house of a man with soma, Aśvins.

5. I call upon golden-palmed Savitar for help.
   He, through his divinity, is attentive to the track.

6. Praise the Child of the Waters, Savitar, for help.
   We desire his commandments.
7. We call upon the apportioner of goods, of brilliant bounty, on Savitar, whose eye is on men.
8. Comrades, sit down here: Savitar is now to be praised by us.
   The giver beautifies his bounties.

9. Agni, convey the eager Wives of the Gods here, and Tvaṣṭar, for soma-drinking.
10. Agni, youngest one, convey the Wives here for help, and Hotrā Bhāratī, Varūtrī, Dhiṣaṇā.
11. Let the goddesses, Wives of superior men [=gods], attend upon us greatly with help, with shelter—those with unclipped wings.
12. Here I call upon Indrāṇī, Varuṇānī for well-being, upon Agnāyī for soma-drinking.

13. Let the great ones, Heaven and Earth, mix this sacrifice for us.
    Let them carry us through with their support.
14. The inspired poets lick the ghee-filled milk of this very pair [=Heaven and Earth] with their poetic insights, in the firm footstep of the Gandharva.
15. Earth, become comfortable, a place to settle down, not sweeping men away.
    Extend to us widespread shelter.

16. Let the gods help us from there whence Viṣṇu strode out from the earth through the seven domains.
17. Viṣṇu strode out this (world); three times he laid down a step:
    (this world) is concentrated in his dusty (step).
18. He strode three steps, Viṣṇu the undeceivable cowherd, founding the foundations from there—

19. Behold the deeds of Viṣṇu: from (the place) where he watches over the commandments,
    the partner in yoke with Indra, 20. That is the highest footstep of Viṣṇu. The patrons always behold it stretched out like the eye [=sun] in heaven.
21. That do the inspired poets, admiring and wakeful, kindle—
    the highest footstep of Viṣṇu.

I.23 Various Gods (Vāyu 1, Indra and Vāyu 2–3, Mitra and Varuṇa 4–6, Indra Marutvant 7–9, All Gods 10–12, Pūṣan 13–15, Waters 16–23ab, Agni 23cd–24)

Medhātithi Kāṇva
24 verses: gāyatrī, except puraüṣṇih 19, anuṣṭubh 20, 22–24, pratiṣṭhā 21, arranged in tr̥cas

Although the principles of hymn arrangement strongly suggest that this twenty-four-verse hymn is a composite, consisting of eight individual tr̥cas, the situation is quite different from the previous hymn, I.22, where the collection was dictated merely and mechanically by the number of verses in each segment, without a particular ritual application. Here the separate tr̥cas follow the order of a structured recitation in the Morning Pressing, later called the Praügaśastra. Other instances of this litany are found in R̥gveda I.2–3 and II.41, and to some extent I.139; for a detailed discussion of the Praügaśastra see the introduction to I.2.

This hymn varies somewhat from the standard Praügaśastra, which has the following divinities in the following order: Vāyu (1), Indra-Vāyu (2), Mitra-Varuṇa (3), Aśvins (4), Indra (5), the All Gods (6), Sarasvatī (7). This hymn lacks the Aśvins in position 4, but in position 5 Indra, instead of being alone, is accompanied by the Maruts, and though the following tr̥ca (vss. 10–12) is ascribed by the Anukramaṇī to the All Gods, it is dominated by the Maruts. Since offering to Indra with the Maruts is made only in the Midday Pressing, and to the Aśvins in the Morning Pressing, perhaps this version of the litany is shifting its focus to the Midday Pressing and to the ritual innovation that extended offering to the Maruts, rather than just Indra, at that pressing. (See further discussion in the introduction to I.165.) Pūṣan is also added after the All Gods (position 6), and instead of the divine river Sarasvatī in position 7 we find the functionally similar Waters.

The first three verses to the waters (16–18) bring the Praügaśastra proper to an end. The last six verses (19–24) are a supplement, in a somewhat Atharvan style, treating the waters as healers and removers of transgressions. These functions of the waters bring to mind the "Final Bath" or avabhr̥tha in classical śrauta ritual, in which the sacrificer and his wife wash each other at the conclusion of the sacrifice, and these verses may have been included in this hymn in order to encompass the entire soma-pressing day, from the first offering to Vāyu to the final cleansing. The middle four verses of this sequence (20–23) are also found in a hymn to the waters, X.9.6–9, and the introductory and final verses here (19 and 24) may have been added to create two triplets for this tr̥ca hymn.

As in other of Medhātithi's hymns, the actual contents are fairly simplistic, consisting primarily of invocations to the various gods and invitations to the soma-drinking. Perhaps the most interesting sequence is the tr̥ca to Pūṣan (vss. 13–15), who finds the hidden king and is urged to drive him here "like lost livestock." Most commentators identify this king as Soma, but the thematics and phraseology—particularly the notion of finding and returning a hidden deity—are much more characteristic of Agni, and we have interpreted these verses in that way. Whether the king is Agni or Soma, however, it is not clear what this snatch of myth is doing here in this hymn, though Pūṣan's ability to locate lost cows is proverbial.

1. Sharp are the soma drinks—come here. Here are the pressings mixed with milk.
   Vāyu, drink those set forth.
2. Both gods who touch the heaven, Indra and Vāyu, do we call,
   to drink of this soma.
3. Indra and Vāyu, mind-swift, do the inspired poets call for help—the thousand-eyed lords of insight.

4. Mitra do we call and Varuṇa, for soma-drinking—the two born with refined skill.
5. Those who through truth increase by truth, the lords of truth, of light, these two, Mitra and Varuṇa, do I call.
6. Varuṇa will become a helper, as will Mitra with all forms of help.
   They will make us well rewarded.

7. We call Indra accompanied by the Maruts here for soma-drinking.
   Along with the troop let him reach satiety.
8. Having Indra as chief, the Maruts as troop, and the gifts of Pūṣan, o gods, all of you, hear my call.
9. Smash Vr̥tra, you of good drops [=Maruts/All Gods], with Indra and his might as yokemates.
   Let no defamer hold sway over us.

10. The All Gods we call, the Maruts, for soma-drinking, for they are strong, with Pr̥śni as their mother.
11. The thundering of (you) Maruts, like that of victors, goes boldly, when, o men, you drive in beauty.
12. Born out of the laughing lightening, from there let them help us;
    let the Maruts be merciful to us.

13. O Pūṣan, glowing one—the buttress of heaven [=Agni?] with his glittering ritual grass—drive him here like lost livestock.
14. Pūṣan the glowing has found the king [=Agni], hidden, laid in hiding, with his glittering ritual grass.
15. And with drops (of ghee) he will keep driving along to me the six yoked (flames), as if plowing a grain(field) with oxen.

16. The motherly ones [=waters], siblings, go along the ritual roads of those who perform the rites, mixing the milk with honey.

17. Those (waters) yonder that are close to the sun, or with whom the sun is—let them propel our rite.
18. The goddess Waters do I call upon. Wherever our cows drink, to the rivers an oblation is to be made.

19. Within the waters is deathlessness, in the waters healing, and (it is right) to glorify the waters.
    O gods, become prizewinners.
20. "Within the waters," Soma said to me, "are all healing remedies, and Agni who is weal to all." And the waters are healing for all.
21. O Waters, fully grant healing and protection for my body and (for me) to see the sun for a long time.

22. O Waters, carry this away, whatever trouble is in me—whether I have committed deceit or I have cursed—as well as untruth.
23. O Waters, today I have followed (you). We have united with your sap.
    Full of milk, come here, o Agni. Merge me with luster.
24. Merge me with luster, Agni, with offspring, with long life.
    The gods should know this (hymn?) of mine; Indra should know it along with the seers.

As Oldenberg (1888: 225) observes, I.24–30, the Śunaḥśepa hymns, like the preceding Medhātithi hymns (I 12–23), generally follow the organization of the hymns of Maṇḍala VIII. He argues that irregularities in the placement of I.25, 27, and 30 can be explained if these hymns are composites of several hymns.

The story of Śunaḥśepa, the putative poet of these hymns, appears in Aitareya Brāhmaṇa VII 13–18 and Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra XV 17–27. According to the story, King Hariścandra had begged Varuṇa for a son and promised that if Varuṇa gave him one, he would sacrifice his son to the god. A boy, Rohita, was born to Hariścandra, but the king managed to delay the sacrifice of his son until Rohita reached adulthood. When the king could no longer avoid the inevitable sacrifice, he told Rohita that he was to be sacrificed to Varuṇa. But Rohita refused to be the sacrificial victim and departed the kingdom. As a result Hariścandra was struck by dropsy in punishment for not performing the sacrifice.

In his travels Rohita eventually came upon a poor brahmin named Ajīgarta, who sold his son Śunaḥśepa to Rohita to be a substitute sacrificial victim. Rohita returned with Śunaḥśepa and Varuṇa accepted the substitution of Śunaḥśepa for Rohita. But when Śunaḥśepa was bound to the stake and was about to be killed, he appealed to the gods by reciting I.24.1 to Prajāpati, the god Ka (cf. 1a kásya "of which (god)?" and 1c káḥ "who?"), 24.2 to Agni, 24.3–5 to Savitar, 24.6–15 and I.25 to Varuṇa, I.26 and 27.1–12 to Agni, 27.13 to the All Gods, I.29 and 30.1–16 to Indra, 30.17–19 to the Aśvins, and 30.20–22 to Dawn. Each time Śunaḥśepa recited a verse, one of his bonds was loosened and Hariścandra's belly became smaller. With the last verse Śunaḥśepa was free of his bonds and Hariścandra was free of disease.

Although I.24 refers directly to Śunaḥśepa and to his rescue by Varuṇa, the story of Śunaḥśepa in the form in which it told in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa does not fully correspond to that at the basis of any of the hymns in this collection. Probably closer to the R̥gvedic version is that alluded to in the Yajurveda. Taittirīya Saṃhitā V 2.1.3 and Kāṭhaka Saṃhitā XIX 11 say simply that Śunaḥśepa had been seized by Varuṇa but then rescued himself from Varuṇa's bonds.

I.24 Agni, Savitar, and Varuṇa

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
15 verses: triṣṭubh 1–2, 6–15; gāyatrī 3–5

This hymn consists of three sections in alternating meters, with each section devoted to a different god. The first two verses in triṣṭubh invoke Agni, then verses 3–5 in gāyatrī address Savitar, and finally the remainder of the hymn, once more in triṣṭubh, is dedicated to Varuṇa. Despite this variation the hymn is a coherent composition and not a composite of three hymns wielded together (cf. Oldenberg 1888: 226 n.). Formal evidence for its unity is that Aditi, the goddess who represents Innocence or Guiltlessness, appears in verses 1 and 2 and then again in the last verse, verse 15, creating a ring.

Apparently the poet and his people have been afflicted in some way. In the later Veda dropsy is associated with Varuṇa, and so it could be this or another disease that troubles the sacrificers. The poet believes that the cause of their affliction is that Varuṇa is angry with them for some offense they have committed (cf. vs. 11) and therefore has "bound" them in the bonds of misery.

The first god invoked is Agni, whose presence introduces the ritual that addresses the plight of the sacrificers. The poet already signals the purpose of his hymn and rite by asking which god will return his people to Aditi, to the "Guiltlessness" that the goddess embodies. Aditi is the mother of the Ādityas, and therefore reference to her leads to mention of the poet's own mother and father. The poet implies that because of some offense he might die before his father and mother. That would be tragic and unnatural, since children should not predecease their parents.

There follow the three verses to Savitar, which also mention the god Bhaga "Fortune." Both Savitar and Bhaga are Ādityas, so the poet is still moving toward Varuṇa, the greatest of the Ādityas. In verse 3 the poet asks Savitar for a "portion" (bhāgá) of the wealth that Savitar can bring, and this leads in verse 4 to mention of the god Bhaga. In verse 4 the priest performing the rite appears to embody Bhaga because he attains adveṣáḥ "freedom from hostility." This "hostility" represents everything that stands in the way of the life and prosperity of the poet, but it also prefigures the anger of Varuṇa, from which the poet hopes for release. The presence of Savitar, who is associated with night, might also suggest that the rite for which the hymn was composed took place in the evening. In verse 10 also the poet refers to the constellation of Ursa Major and to the moon. But Varuṇa's rule is not restricted to the night, since the poet also says that Varuṇa creates the path for the sun (vs. 8). In verse 7 too the crest of the nyāgrodha or banyan tree, which sends down aerial roots, may refer to the sun. This would explain the description of these aerial roots as "beacons" that take root within humans as the light of inspiration (7c). In verse 12a the rule of Varuṇa over both night and day is reflected in the truth spoken to the poet at night and by day. It is a truth toward which the poet's own intuition—perhaps that light received from Varuṇa—has struggled (12b).

However, the poet's concern is not as much with the cosmic roles of Varuṇa as it is with the bondage Varuṇa has inflicted on the poet and his people. The poet looks back to Śunaḥśepa as an example of someone who was bound and then released by Varuṇa. He even merges his own bonds and the bonds of Śunaḥśepa: in 13d the poet's plea to Varuṇa to "release the fetters" refers to Śunaḥśepa's bonds and to the present bonds that afflict him. Once free of those bonds, the poet will be restored to guiltlessness, under the protection of the commandment of Varuṇa (vs. 15).

1. The dear name of which god, of which of the immortals, shall we recall?
   Who will return us to great Aditi [/Guiltlessness]? I would see my father and mother.
2. We will recall the dear name of the god Agni, of the first of the immortals.
   He will return us to great Aditi. I would see my father and mother.

3. O god Savitar, master of desirable things, we implore you for a portion, o you who ever give.
4. For also the one who is Fortune [/Bhaga], laboring correctly for you ahead of reproach, has received freedom from hatred in his hands.
5. We would reach upward to (a portion) of that apportioned by Bhaga through your help, in order to take hold of the head of wealth.

6. Yet not even birds flying yonder have attained your rule, power, or fervor, nor have these waters moving without blinking, nor those [=the gods] who confound the wind's formless mass.
7. In (the airy realm) without a base, King Varuṇa of purified skill firmly holds the crest of the (nyāgrodha) tree on high.
   They [=its trunks] reach downward, their base above. They should be set down as beacons within us.
8. Since King Varuṇa made a broad path for the sun to follow, he has created two feet for the footless (sun) to give it support, and he exorcises even what pierces the heart.

9. A hundred healers are yours, o king, a thousand. Let your favor be broad and deep.
   Drive dissolution far away into the distance. Release from us even the guilt we have created.
10. Yonder Bears [=stars of Ursa Major], set on high, are visible at night; they have gone somewhere else by day.
    The commandments of Varuṇa cannot be cheated: the moon goes at night, earnestly looking around.
11. Extolling you with my formulation, I implore this of you; with his offerings the sacrificer hopes for this:
    Become no longer angry now, Varuṇa! O you of wide fame, do not steal away our lifetime!
12. They say to me just this at night, this by day; my intuition looks out here from my heart toward this:
    The one whom Śunaḥśepa called upon when he was seized, let him, King Varuṇa, release us!
13. Since Śunaḥśepa, seized and bound in three stocks, called upon the Āditya, King Varuṇa should set him loose. Let him—the knowing one, never cheated—release the fetters.
14. We beg to appease your anger by our acts of reverence, Varuṇa, appease it by our sacrifices and offerings.
    Holding sway, o attentive lord and king, you will loosen for us the guilt we have created.
15. Loosen above the uppermost fetter from us, o Varuṇa, below the lowest, away the midmost.
    Then under your commandment, o Āditya, we would be without offense for Aditi [/Guiltlessness].

I.25 Varuṇa

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
21 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tṛcas

Oldenberg suggests that the first four tṛcas of this hymn (vss. 1–12) originally formed one hymn, and the last three (vss. 13–21), a second one. One indication of this division is that verse 12 reads like a concluding verse. Thematically, however, the two parts of the hymn both emphasize the sovereignty of Varuṇa, and the hymn as a whole begins (3a) and ends (19b) with an appeal for his mercy. So if this is a composite hymn, it is nonetheless a coherent one.

One repeated pattern in this hymn is the movement from Varuṇa's distance, which can mark his displeasure, to his closeness. The first tṛca, for example, fears the offense that the poet might have given Varuṇa and the anger of the god. In the second the poet speaks of his songs, which will dispel the god's fury, and his hopes that he will bring Varuṇa near (5). He concludes that Mitra and Varuṇa are never far from one who serves them (6c). The closeness of Varuṇa is again the theme of the fifth tr̥ca (vss. 13–15), which opens the second part of the hymn. Varuṇa first appears in majesty, wearing the mantle of a king (13a), but at the same time, like a king, he is also very near. His spies are everywhere (13c) and no deceit or evildoing escapes his attention (14). The last verse of the tr̥ca combines his majesty and his presence. In verse 15 the poet repeats ā́ "here" three times at the end of each of its three pādas, culminating in the unexpected and dramatic assertion that Varuṇa's glory is "right here within our bellies." We understand the presence of Varuṇa's glory in the belly as signifying the radical closeness of Varuṇa, but there are other ways of interpreting it. The reference to "bellies" has led Geldner, for example, to understand this as a healing hymn for dropsy, a disease associated with Varuṇa. The final plea for release from fetters, which occurs also as the last verse of I.24, offers support for this interpretation. Nevertheless, we regard it as unlikely. It does not suit the context of verse 15, and the fact that verse 21 is the final verse of the preceding hymn implies that it is a formal conclusion, not a critical thematic statement.

The same movement from distance to proximity also occurs in the sixth tr̥ca. In its first verse (16) the poet says his insights go far away, looking for Varuṇa; in its last (18) the poet sees Varuṇa and his chariot here on earth. The middle verse is obscure, although in one way or another it describes the movement of the god and the poet toward one another, since the poet asks the god to come to an agreement with him. The "honey" the poet serves is probably not soma, even though soma is often called "honey" or "honeyed." Since the poet begins the tr̥ca with a reference to his "insights," the honey in verse 17 is more likely his song, for speech also can be "honeyed" (cf. I.78.5). More difficult is the honey that is brought to the poet by the god. Perhaps it is the rain, which can also be "honey" (III.62.16, V.69.2ab), and perhaps too the waters and the rain are the visible signs of Varuṇa's presence that the poet sees according to verse 18. Varuṇa's control over the rain is an aspect of his kingship: compare VII.49.3, "In the middle of which king Varuṇa travels, looking down upon the truth and falsehood of the peoples, / those, clear and pure, that drip honey—let those waters, goddesses, help me here."

1. Even if every day we confound your commandment, o god Varuṇa, as clans (do their king's commandment),
2. Do not subject us to your deadly weapon when you are enraged, nor to your fury when you are angry.
3. For your mercy we would unbind your thought (from such anger), like a charioteer a horse that has been tied, by our songs, Varuṇa.

4. For my fury-dispelling (songs) fly afar to seek a better thing, like birds toward their nests.
5. When will we attract broad-gazing Varuṇa—the superior man, glorious in his rule—to gain his mercy?
6. The two [=Mitra and Varuṇa] have attained just that (rule) in common. Keeping watch, they do not keep to a distance for the pious man who upholds their commandments.

7. He who knows the track of birds flying through the midspace, knows the (courses of the) boats, since he belongs to the sea.
8. He whose commandments are upheld knows the twelve months and their offspring [=the half-months];
he knows the one that is born afterward [=the thirteenth month].
9. He knows the trail of the wind—of the broad, towering, and lofty (wind);
he knows those [=the Maruts] who sit upon it.

10. He whose commandments are upheld, Varuṇa sat down among the dwelling places, for the sake of his universal kingship—he whose resolve is strong.
11. From there, watchful, he looks upon all (deeds), unmistakable (to him)— both those done and those that must be done.
12. Of strong resolve, the Āditya will make for us easy paths throughout the days.
He will extend our lifetimes.

13. Wearing a golden mantle, Varuṇa dons his cloak.
His spies have seated themselves all around.
14. The god whom those inclined to deceit do not try to deceive, nor do the deceitful ones among men, nor do the hostile plotters, 15. And who has created glory here for himself—and not by halves!—among the sons of Manu, right here within our bellies.

16. My insights go afar, like cows going after pasture-lands, seeking him of broad gaze.
17. Let us two now again come to an agreement as soon as (your) honey has been brought here to me,
(for me) to serve up my own dear (honey) like a Hotar.
18. Now I see him, lovely for all to see; I see his chariot upon the earth.
He enjoys these songs of mine.

19. Now hear my call, Varuṇa, and today have mercy.
    It is you whom I desire, seeking help.
20. You, wise one, rule over all, both heaven and earth.
    Listen in response to my entreaty.
21. Release above the uppermost fetter from us, unbind away the midmost, (loosen) below those lowest, in order for us to live.

I.26 Agni

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
10 verses: gāyatrī

On the surface this is a simple and straightforward Agni hymn, in part assembled from pre-made phrases, but in its development it traces an argument below the surface that leads to some surprising conclusions. The argument begins in verse 3 by drawing attention to the mutuality of relationships (friend–friend, comrade–comrade), even of those between hierarchically arranged pairs (father/son). The poet then points out the comradeship between us and Agni (vs. 5), which leads to the balanced construction of verse 7, again emphasizing the mutual relationship between us and Agni: he is dear to us and we to him. That this relationship is also hierarchical is gently implied by identifying him as our clanlord. By picking up the final term in verse 7, the multivalent word svagní, which can mean both "having good fires" and "having good Agni," and deploying it, again in a balanced construction, in verse 8, the poet subtly shifts to making the gods our partners, not merely Agni, who has become merely the token of this relationship between us and the gods. The hierarchical distance has been increased, but only step-by-step. The climax (however underplayed) comes in verse 9, which calls for mutual encomia (práśasti) between mortals and immortals—in other words, it demands that immortals produce praise for us, as we do for them. The word práśasti is a charged one, referring to the formal praise of kings as well as gods (see Jamison 2007: 146–48; see also I.21 above). Though the conceptual development of the hymn is quite uninsistent, and the simple rhythms of the gāyatrī meter can lull the audience into inattention, the end result, when examined, is quite radical.

1. Put on your garments, you partaker of the sacrificial meal and lord of nourishments,
   and so perform this rite for us.
2. Take your seat as our Hotar, worthy to be chosen by our thoughts and heaven-bound speech, o youngest Agni.
3. For a father always sacrifices on behalf of his son, a friend on behalf of his friend,
   a comrade worth choosing on behalf of his comrade.

4. Let Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman, who care for the stranger, take their seats here on our ritual grass, as if (on that) of Manu.
5. O ancient Hotar, rejoice in this (ritual grass) and in our comradeship; listen well to these songs here.
6. For even when we sacrifice to god after god in unbroken succession, it is just in you that the oblation is poured.
7. Let him be our dear clanlord—the delighting Hotar worthy to be chosen; let us be dear (to him) and (so) possess good fires.
8. Since the gods have good Agni (among them) and established him as a choice thing for us, we consider ourselves to possess good fires [/Agni].
9. So then, of us both, mortals (and immortals), o immortal one, let there be encomia each for the other.
10. O Agni, along with all the fires, take delight in this sacrifice and in this speech, o young (son) of strength.

I.27 Agni (1–12), Gods (13)

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
13 verses: gāyatrī, except triṣṭubh 13

This second Agni hymn in the Śunaḥśepa collection is longer than the first (I.26), and is therefore likely to be a composite. This conjecture is supported by the metrical evidence, in that verses 1–6 and 10–12 are in trochaic gāyatrī, while the intervening verses 7–9 have no trochaic pādas. These three verses (7–9) are also thematically unified by a focus on a mortal, aided by Agni, who seeks a prize.

The rest of the hymn is more diffuse in content and surprisingly awkward in phraseology. The final verse (13), in triṣṭubh, makes no mention of Agni and may have been tacked onto this already loosely structured assemblage because its signature word námas "reverence" matches the last word of the first hemistich of verse 1, námobhiḥ "with reverences."

1. (This is) to extol you, Agni, with reverences—you bringing choice things [/long-tailed] like a horse, ruling over the rites completely.
2. Might the son (of strength) by his strength, very kindly, of broad advance, become our benefactor.
3. Both from afar and from nearby, from the mortal who wishes ill protect us always, you who last a whole lifetime.
4. This, our winnings, our newer song, you shall proclaim among the gods, o Agni.

5. Give us a share in the furthest prizes, in the midmost ones; seek mastery over the closest good thing (for us).
6. You are the apportioner, o bright-beamed one. (As if) on the wave of a river, in the nearness and all at once you stream for the pious man.
7. The mortal whom you will help in battles, o Agni, whom you will spur on to the prizes, he will hold fast to unfailing refreshments.
8. No one will circumscribe anything of his, o overpowering one:
there is a prize worthy of fame (for him).
9. Let him, belonging to all domains, be the one who overtakes the prize with his steeds.
Together with the inspired poets let him be the winner.
10. Awake and sing! Bring this about: for the one worthy of sacrifice for every clan, for Rudra [=Agni], a praise song that is beauty to be seen.
11. Let him who is great without measure, much glittering but possessing a beacon of smoke, urge us on to insight and to the prize.
12. Like a rich clanlord, let the divine beacon listen to us along with our hymns—Agni of lofty radiance.
13. Reverence to the great ones and reverence to the small; reverence to the young and reverence to those advanced (in years).
Let us offer sacrifice to the gods if we will be able. Let me not twist away the laud for one more powerful in my direction, o gods.

I.28 Indra (1–4), the Mortar (5–6), the Mortar and Pestle (7–8), Prajāpati Hariścandra or the Soma-Pressing Hide (9)

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
9 verses: triṣṭubh 1–6, gāyatrī 7–9

This brief and somewhat racy hymn has attracted a great deal of scholarly attention. Most scholarly treatments are more or less in agreement with Geldner's interpretation, signaled already in his title "Die vereinfachte Somapressung" (The Simplified Soma-Pressing). In this interpretation the hymn depicts an abbreviated soma-pressing done at home, on the spur of the moment and without formality, by a sacrificer and his wife, using normal household implements, the mortar (ulū́khala) and pestle, to pound the soma stalks. The participation of the wife occasioned the slightly salacious comparisons between the pounding and sexual intercourse. A woman, presumably the wife, is mentioned explicitly once, in a word play that implicitly compares her regular movements in wielding the mortar with rhythmic sexual movement (vs. 3).

Despite the weight of scholarly opinion, we consider this literal interpretation quite unlikely, because the precious and prized substance soma, the focus of the most elaborate non-royal rites, can hardly have been used for a slapdash, playful domestic entertainment. Instead, this hymn should be considered together with a number of others in the late R̥gveda in which women figure in controversial or contested roles (e.g., I.179, X.10, X.102, X.109). In our view (see Jamison 2011, forthcoming a, forthcoming b, in addition to background in 1996a), the late R̥gveda saw the introduction of a new ritual model, in which the Wife of the Sacrificer participated in the ritual along with her husband and the other male functionaries. This innovation was, we believe, being bitterly debated by theologians in this period, and the debate can be discerned beneath the surface of such hymns.

This particular hymn alludes to the new ritual model incorporating the Sacrificer's Wife by presenting the solemn soma-pressing as if it were a domestic procedure, utilizing tools to be found in every kitchen, the proper domain of the Wife. An implicit identification between domestic paraphernalia and that of solemn ritual is found already in the first verse, where the standard high-ritual word for the pressing stone (grā́van) is juxtaposed with that for the domestic mortar (ulū́khala). (See also Atharvaveda IX.6.15 with the same identification: yā́ny ulūkhalamusalā́ni grā́vāṇa evá té "the mortar and pestle—they are the pressing stones," in a hymn that systematically presents a series of such statements.) The final verse (9) returns to technical terms for soma equipment in solemn ritual (camū́ "cup"; pavítra "filter"; gór ádhi tvací "upon the hide of the cow"), thus affirming that a real soma sacrifice has indeed been performed. Perhaps the most important technical term in that verse is śiṣṭá (in the sandhi sequence úc chiṣṭám < úd + śiṣṭám; cf. later úcchiṣṭa "leftover"): in later śrauta ritual the Wife is particularly active in the Third Pressing and the soma offered there is "left-over" soma. We thus see the ritual notion of the "leftover" already associated with the Wife here.

Since one of the aims of introducing the Sacrificer's Wife into ritual was to inject sexuality and fertility into the previously sterile realm of sacrifice, the double-entendres throughout the hymn have a (semi-)serious purpose. As often with sexual phraseology, the exact intent is sometimes difficult to figure out (e.g., vs. 6).

And what does our poet think about the new model? Although treating the soma-pressing as if it were a cooking demonstration might seem to debase and desolemnize it, the cheerful tone and the reassuring presence of Indra, the consummate soma-drinker (who also seems to favor the introduction of the Wife in other hymns), appears to indicate approval of the ritual innovation.

1. When the pressing stone with its broad bottom becomes erect in order to press,
   you, Indra, will keep gulping down the mortar-pressed (soma drops).
2. When the pair of pressing boards are formed like two buttocks, you, Indra, will keep gulping down the mortar-pressed (soma drops).
3. When the woman puts her best into thrusting back and forth, you, Indra, will keep gulping down the mortar-pressed (soma drops).

4. When they bind the churning stick on both sides like reins to control it, you, Indra, will keep gulping down the mortar-pressed (soma drops).
5. For even though you are hitched up in house after house, little mortar, here speak most brilliantly, like the drum of victors.
6. And, o lord of the wood [=pestle?], the wind blows through your top.
   So then, press the soma for Indra to drink, o mortar.
7. These two [=mortar and pestle? / jaws of the soma press?] gain by sacrifice and are the best prizewinners, since they keep pulling apart above, chewing the stalks like a pair of fallow bays.
8. Today, you two lords of the wood, towering, with the towering pressers press our honeyed (drink) for Indra.
9. Bring what is leftover up into the two wooden cups. Send the soma surging into the filter.
   Put it down upon the hide of the cow.

I.29 Indra

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
7 verses: paṅkti

The last three pādas of each five-pāda verse in this hymn constitute a refrain begging Indra to give us hope of acquiring abundant livestock. The refrain fits well in the first two verses, but then the hymn takes an odd turn, expressing increasing hostility toward a variety of unidentified or unidentifiable (see the near hapaxes in vss. 6–7) beings, while continuing to hope blandly for cows and horses in the refrain. The hymn is reminiscent of the "sleep charm" (VII.55), though the latter is more benign in intent, and I.29 also has an Atharvan cast.

1. Even when we are devoid of hope, as it were, o you true drinker of soma, give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o powerfully generous Indra.
2. O you of the (lovely) lips, you potent lord of prizes—with your wondrous skill give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o powerfully generous Indra.
3. Put to sleep the two of opposite appearance [=birds of ill-omen?]; let those two females sleep unawakening.
   – Give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o powerfully generous Indra.

4. Let them sleep who offer no gifts, but let your gifts be awake, o champion.
   – Give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o
   powerfully generous Indra.
5. Pulverize the donkey braying in that evil way, o Indra.
   – Give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o
   powerfully generous Indra.
6. Along with the female kuṇḍr̥ṇācī [=bird of ill-omen?] the wind will fly far away from the woods.
   – Give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o
   powerfully generous Indra.
7. Smash every howler; crush the female kr̥kadāśū [=another bird of ill-omen?].
   – Give us hope for resplendent cows and horses in the thousands, o
   powerfully generous Indra.

I.30 Indra (1–16), Aśvins (17–19), Dawn (20–22)

Śunaḥśepa Ājīgarti
22 verses: gāyatrī, except triṣṭubh 16, arranged in tr̥cas

The first five tr̥cas (vss. 1–15) are dedicated to Indra, with the following verse (16), in a different meter, serving as a summary verse for this, the major part of the hymn. There follow one tr̥ca (vss. 17–19) dedicated to the Aśvins and one (vss. 20–22) to Dawn. All of these gods are, of course, associated with the rituals of early morning.

Although the contents of the hymn are fairly standard—praise and invitation to the gods and requests for their help and gifts—the syntax can be fussy and tricky. See especially the final tr̥ca to Indra (vss. 13–15), whose structure and import are not entirely clear. The portion of the hymn devoted to Indra focuses especially on the mutuality of our relationship as his comrades (see esp. vss. 6–12), and the theme of prizes and prize contests is prominent as well.

1. As (we) seek the victory prize for you, with (soma) drops I sprinkle Indra like a blood-red (horse)— most bounteous (Indra) of a hundred resolves.
2. The (soma), which is a hundred pure (draughts) or a thousand mixed with milk,
   flows here as if into the deep.
3. When they come together for the exhilaration of the tempestuous one, just by that in his belly
   he acquires an expanse like the sea.

4. This (soma) here is yours: you rush to it like a dove to its nest.
   I shall also solemnly proclaim this speech of ours.

5. You whose praise song it is—o lord of bounties, o hero whose vehicle is songs—let your liberality be extensive.
6. Stand erect to help us at this prize-contest, o you of a hundred resolves.
Let us make pledge to each other at the other (contests).

7. At every hitching up (for battle), at every prize-contest we call to the more powerful one—as his comrades (we call) to Indra for help.
8. Surely he will come—when he will hear it—with his thousandfold forms of help, with the victory prizes, to our call.
9. Following the (custom) of your ancient house, I call upon the excellent man, powerful in opposition, upon whom your father before called.

10. We hope for you, o much-called-upon granter of all requests, o good comrade for the singers—
11. O soma-drinker among us (well-)lipped soma-drinkers, o mace-wielding comrade among (us, your) comrades.
12. Just so let it be, o soma-drinker; o mace-wielding comrade, make it just so as we wish for you to want it.

13. Let there be rich (refreshments?) bringing powerful prizes for us for our joint exhilaration in company with Indra—(refreshments) with which we, rich in livestock, might reach exhilaration.
14. As one like you, o bold one, obtained in person for the praisers, being implored (by them), you fit out (the refreshments) (as you) fit an axle between two wheels, 15. When you fit out your friendship and fit out the desire of the singers, o you of a hundred resolves, with your abilities, (as you fit) the axle.

16. With his (horses) constantly snorting, bellowing, and panting, again and again Indra has conquered the stakes.
He of wondrous skill (has given) us a golden chariot—he the winner for us to win (it)—he has given it to us.

17. O Aśvins, drive here with your drink providing powerful refreshment and accompanied by horses (along your circuit) that brings cows and gold, o wondrous ones.
18. For your immortal chariot, (always) taking the same route, speeds upon the sea, o wondrous Aśvins.

19. You two anchored (one) wheel of your chariot on the head of the inviolable (bull);
    the other speeds around heaven.

20. Which mortal is to enjoy you, o immortal Dawn, you fair-weather friend?
    To whom will you come near, far-radiant one?
21. For we have brought you to mind from both near and far, o you, dappled bright and ruddy like a mare.
22. Come here with these prizes, o daughter of heaven.
    Lay wealth as a foundation for us.

The next five hymns (31–35) are attributed to Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa, and include one of the most famous hymns in the R̥gveda, I.32, the great Indra-Vr̥tra hymn, and several that deserve more fame than they have, especially I.33, a mirror-image companion piece to I.32.

I.31 Agni

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
18 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8, 16, 18

A rigid verse-initial sequence provides an obvious skeletal structure for this hymn: each of the first fifteen verses opens with tvám agne "you, o Agni" (or minor variants thereupon). The remaining three verses (16–18) maintain the second-position vocative agne, but place other items in first position—a typical loosening of structure toward the end of a hymn.

Superimposed on this strict repetition is a less insistent structure of thematic ring composition. The opening of the hymn (vss. 1–4) treats the primal installation of Agni in the sacrifice, a theme reinforced by the word prathamáḥ "first" stationed after the first two words in verses 1–3. Demigods and legendary ancestral mortals are named in these verses, and some of them return in verse 17, the last verse before the summary verse (18), in which Agni is explicitly urged to perform the same actions for us as he did for them in earlier times. In between is the ritual here-and-now. Verses 5–8 detail the aid that Agni gives to a devoted priest in the ritual. In verses 9–11 Agni's relationship to his worshiper is depicted more expansively: he is a father to us with all of a father's care, but, in a paradox much loved by Vedic bards, Agni is also a son, both of the kindling sticks (vs. 9) and of the priests who wield those sticks (vs. 11). Verse 11 connects the primal creation of Agni treated at the beginning of the hymn with the current ritual, in which Agni is the son of "a father as trifling as me."

The remainder of the hymn (esp. vss. 12–15) begs for Agni's protection for the sacrificer and his group, and continues the themes both of Agni's paternal care (vss.

14, 16) and the weakness and unworthiness of those he cares for (vss. 13–14). The poet cleverly uses this acknowledged weakness to his advantage by asking Agni to forgive and forget what we have done wrong in the ritual (vs. 16). There follows the ring-compositional reminiscence of Agni's primal installation (vs. 17). As often, the final verse (18) is somewhat extra-hymnic, in that it sums up the hymn that precedes with an introductory formula, eténa... bráhmaṇā "through this sacred formulation," designed to simulate Agni's favor.

1. You, Agni, the first Aṅgiras, the seer, the god, became a kindly comrade of the gods.
   Under your commandment were born the sage poets working with their know-how—the Maruts with glinting spears.
2. You, Agni, first and best of the Aṅgirases, as sage poet you tend to the commandment of the gods, extending to all creation, wise, (and though) having (just) two mothers, lying down in so many places for Āyu.
3. You, Agni—first become manifest to Mātariśvan; with a display of your good resolve (become manifest) to Vivasvant.
   The two world-halves trembled at the choice of (you as) Hotar. You tolerated the burden; you sacrificed to the great ones, o good one.
4. You, Agni, made heaven bellow for Manu, for Purūravas; for him of good action [=sacrificer? priest?] you act (even) better, when through your swelling in your two parents [=the kindling sticks] you are set free. They [=priests] have led you here to the east, then again to the west.
5. You, Agni, a bull increasing prosperity, should be celebrated by the (priest) who holds up the offering spoon, who knows his way around the poured offering and the vaṣaṭ-cry—you who, throughout your single lifetime, seek to attract the (divine) clans at the beginning (of the sacrifice).
6. You, Agni, in fellowship at the ceremony safely bring the man on the twisting turns (of the ritual "racecourse") to the end, o unbounded one, you who—at the contest of champions, at the crucial turn, when the stake (is set)—even with just a few you smash the greater in the clash.
7. You, Agni, establish that mortal in highest immortality for fame day after day, you who, yourself thirsting, create refreshment for both breeds [=men and gods] and a pleasurable meal here for the patron.
8. You, Agni—for us to win the stakes, make our bard glorious while you are being praised.
   Might we bring to fulfillment the (ritual) act through a new (poetic) worker. O Heaven and Earth, along with the gods—help us.

9. You, Agni, in the lap of your two parents, the god wakeful among the gods, o faultless one—become body-creator [=father] and (fatherly) solicitude for our bard. You, lovely one, have strewn every good thing here.
10. You, Agni, are (fatherly) solicitude, you a father to us. You are creator of vitality; we are your kin.
   Riches in hundreds, in thousands converge on you, the well-heroed protector of the commandment, o undeceivable one.
11. You, Agni, did the gods create as the first Āyu for Āyu, as the clanlord of Nahuṣa.
   Iḍā they created as instructress of mankind: that the son [=Agni] is born of a father as trifling as me [=sacrificer].
12. You, god Agni—along with your protectors, watch over our benefactors and ourselves, o you to be extolled.
   You are the guardian over the lineage of offspring and cattle, unblinkingly watchful in accord with your commandment.
13. You, Agni, are kindled as intimate protector, four-eyed, for the worshipful one who lacks even a quiver, you who, with the bestowed oblation, for nourishment safe from wolves even for the weak, win this mental spell (for him) with your mind.
14. You, Agni, (are kindled as protector) for the cantor chanting far and wide. What is the highest legacy worth seeking—that you win (for him).
   Even of the feeble you are called (fatherly) solicitude and father. You instruct the simple, (instruct) the quarters, as the one who knows better.
15. You, Agni, like (well-)stitched armor, protect all around the man whose priestly gift has been proffered.
   Whoever (as host), serving sweet food, providing a comfortable place in his dwelling, performs the sacrifice of a living thing, he is the very measure of heaven.
16. This (ritual) breach of ours, Agni—make it forgotten; make us forget this way which we have come on from afar.
   You are friend, father, solicitude for those offering soma, a whirling creator of seers for mortals.
17. As (you did) for Manu, o Agni, as for Aṅgiras, o Aṅgiras, as for Yayāti, as (you did) earlier, o flame, drive here to your seat; convey hither the heavenly folk; make them sit on the ritual grass and, you, perform sacrifice to the beloved.
18. Through this sacred formulation, o Agni, keep growing strong—the one that we have made for you by skill or by knowledge.
   And lead us forth toward a better state; join us with your benevolence conferring prizes.

I.32 Indra

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This justly famous hymn tells of Indra's most significant victory, his triumph over Vr̥tra and the release of the waters, in perhaps the clearest treatment of this primal myth in the R̥gveda. Vr̥tra was a gigantic cobra who lay coiled around a mountain within which all the waters were entrapped. In his battle with Indra, Vr̥tra spread his "shoulders," his cobra's hood, and struck at Indra with his fangs, but Indra finally killed Vr̥tra with his mace, broke open the mountain, and let the waters pour out. They then flowed to Manu (vs. 8), who was the first sacrificer, and by implication to his descendants. Vr̥tra's name means "obstacle," and this victory over "Obstacle" is therefore paradigmatic for Indra's victory over all obstacles.

Despite the relative clarity of the treatment of the Vr̥tra battle, the hymn has a curious structure, obsessively circling around and alternately focusing in on and drawing back from the moment of dramatic confrontation between the adversaries. After the initial verses of summary and the preliminaries to the battle (vss. 1–4), the next three verses (5–7) depict the battle, and it is portrayed as extremely one-sided, with the overconfident Vr̥tra overmatched from the beginning and decisively smashed by Indra. (The signature verb of the first section of the hymn is √han "smash, smite.") Defeated and dismembered, Vr̥tra lies there (the signature verb of this section is √śī "lie") with his mother, and the released waters flow over them (8–11). After this interlude the hymn returns to a new description of the battle (12–13), which in this reprise is depicted as far more of an even match. Vr̥tra strikes at Indra with his fangs and deploys various natural forces against his adversary. This more equal battle is encapsulated in the perfectly balanced construction índraś ca yád yuyudhā́te áhiś ca "when Indra and the serpent fought each other. . . " (13c). It is unclear why the first triumphalist account has been revised to the more ambiguous, less glorious version—though both, of course, end with Vr̥tra's defeat.

The most mysterious part of this hymn is the conclusion. Vr̥tra is dead, and even his mother Dānu has been killed, so there is no possibility of a new Vr̥tra. And yet Indra apparently becomes terrified and flies across the rivers "like a frightened falcon." Perhaps this puzzling ending is related to the second version of the battle, in which Indra does not have quite the unchallenged heroic role that he plays in the first version. The poet does not explain but in the last verse simply returns to a praise of Indra as victor and king.

1. Now I shall proclaim the heroic deeds of Indra, those foremost deeds that the mace-wielder performed:
   He smashed the serpent. He bored out the waters. He split the bellies of the mountains.
2. He smashed the serpent resting on the mountain—for him Tvaṣṭar had fashioned the resounding [/sunlike] mace.

Like bellowing milk-cows, streaming out, the waters went straight down to the sea.

3. Acting the bull, he chose for his own the soma. He drank of the pressed soma among the Trikadrukas [=the Maruts?].
   The generous one took up his missile, the mace. He smashed him, the first-born of serpents.
4. When you, Indra, smashed the first-born of serpents and then beguiled the wiles of the wily ones, then, giving birth to the sun, the heaven, and the dawn, since that time you have surely never found a rival.
5. Indra smashed Vr̥tra [/Obstacle] the very great obstacle, whose shoulders were spread apart, with his mace, his great weapon.
   Like logs hewn apart by an axe, the serpent would lie, embracing the earth [/soaking the earth (with his blood)].
6. For, like a drunken non-warrior, he challenged the hard-pressing great hero whose is the silvery drink [=soma].
   (Vr̥tra) did not withstand the attack of his weapons. His mouth destroyed by the shattering blow, he whose rival was Indra was completely crushed.
7. Handless and footless, he gave battle to Indra. (Indra) smashed his mace upon his back.
   A steer who tried to be the measure of a bull, Vr̥tra lay there, flung apart in many places.
8. *Delivering themselves to Manu, the waters go over him like a split reed—lying in that way.
   Those very ones whom Vr̥tra in his greatness once surrounded—at their feet lay the serpent.
9. The strength of Vr̥tra's mother ebbed; Indra bore his weapon down upon her.
   The mother was above; the son below: Dānu lies like a milk-cow with her calf.
10. In the middle of the turning posts of the never-standing, never-resting (waters), his body sank down.
    The waters move widely over the private parts of Vr̥tra. He whose rival was Indra lay there in the long darkness (of death).
11. The waters stood still—their husband was the Dāsa; their herdsman, the serpent—hemmed in like the cows by the Paṇi.
    What was the hidden opening for the waters—that Indra uncovered after he smashed Vr̥tra.
12. You, Indra, then became the tail of a horse when he struck his fangs at you—you, the god alone.
    You conquered the cows, and, o champion, you conquered the soma. You set loose the seven rivers to flow.

13. Neither the lightning nor the thunder, neither the mist nor the hail that he scattered repelled (Indra) for him.
    When Indra and the serpent fought each other, the generous one achieved victory also for (all) later times.
14. Whom did you see, Indra, as the avenger of the serpent when fear came into your heart after you smashed him, and when you crossed over the ninety-nine flowing rivers, like a frightened falcon through the airy realms?
15. Bearing the mace in his arms, Indra is the king of him who travels and of him who is settled, of the horned and the hornless.
    And just he alone as king rules over the different peoples: like a rim the spokes of a wheel, he encompasses those.

I.33 Indra

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn to Indra follows directly upon what is probably the most famous R̥gvedic hymn to Indra, I.32, which is entirely focused on the Vr̥tra battle, and it is attributed to the same poet. The second of the pair, I.33, has attracted far less attention than its famous sibling, which is a pity, for its poetry is often stirring, and it also provides a complementary companion piece to I.32. While I.32 pits Indra against a demonic adversary in single combat, in a world in which humans and their concerns are entirely absent (save for the poet's introduction "I proclaim" in vs. 1 and the celebration of Indra's kingship in the final vs. 15), the human world and human strife are the core of I.33. This focus on the human is clear from the beginning of the hymn. The poet exhorts himself and his fellows to go right up to Indra and demand goods from him (vss. 1–3). The interaction between god and mortals lacking in I.32 is thus immediately established in I.33.

The center of the hymn (vss. 4–10ab, in our view) describes a pitched and desperate conflict between human moieties, in which Indra intervenes on the side of the good. Thus, unlike the battle in I.32, where the contestants are unequally matched from the start (though a more equal match-up is depicted in the second version of the conflict), in I.33 the clashing sides begin in balance, having separated from each other (vs. 4cd) in order to fight each other. At issue is fundamental social organization: sacrificers versus non-sacrificers (4d, 5b), who lack the *vratá*s ("commandments," 5d) that bind the sacrificers. The non-sacrificers are several times identified as dásyu (4a, 7c, 9d, curiously always in the singular), and so this hymn may depict the conflict between indigenous peoples and the infiltrating Ārya. However, the non-sacrificers may instead be Ārya following different customs, with Dasyu simply a nasty insult hurled at a larger kin-group that deviates from the social behavior of the R̥gvedins. Their mutual departure in opposite directions from a single place (4c) may argue for the latter view: these are not foes who encountered each other as one group expanded into the territory of the other, but apparently a once unified group that split. (Verse 18 of the difficult hymn X.27 is phraseologically close to this verse, and suggests even more strongly that the groups have split over doctrinal matters.) Also in favor of this view is the fact that the poet tends to treat the hostile sides in balanced constructions, sometimes allotting alternating pādas to each (e.g., vs. 6, where in our view 6a describes the enemies, 6b the Navagvas who are ordinarily clients of Indra, with 6cd returning to the enemies) or in bipartite phrases (e.g., 7a "those wailing and those laughing"). Indra quickly takes the side of the sacrificers, "the presser and the praiser" (7d), and his aid proves decisive—though not before the poet produces some striking images, for instance, of the enemies girdling themselves in earth, perhaps a reference to their wounding or death, while Indra's own side is clothed with the sun (vs. 9).

After this substantial and sustained treatment of this dramatic human conflict and Indra's part in it, the rest of the hymn turns into a sort of catalogue of allusions to other triumphs of Indra, not all of which are clear. Verse 10d must surely depict the Vala myth, but the vájra ("mace") of 10c does not fit that myth well and may be a glancing reference to the Vr̥tra battle, which seems to be treated, though without naming Vr̥tra, in verse 11, and by name in verse 13. Other enemies are defeated in verse 12, including one, with the curious name Ilībiśa, known only from here, and other clients are aided in verses 14–15. The final half-verse of 15 may return to the massed enemies of the central part of the hymn, though that view cannot be strongly supported.

1. Come on! Let us go up close to Indra, seeking cattle. Will he increase his solicitude for us?
   With no one to hinder him, will he perhaps then turn his distant intention toward us for this wealth, for cattle?
2. I fly close to the unopposable giver of wealth, like a falcon to its delightful dwelling, doing homage to Indra with my best chants, the one who is to be invoked by praisers on his journey.
3. Fully armed, he has laden himself down with quivers; he herds together the cows of the stranger, of whomever he wishes to.
   Keep poking out valuable things in abundance, Indra—don't be a niggard, (at a distance) from us, you strengthened one.
4. For you smashed the wealthy Dasyu with your deadly weapon, going it alone, (though accompanied) by your assistants [=Maruts?], Indra.
   From the high plain they went apart in opposite directions; the non-sacrificing old codgers made their departure.
5. They just twisted their heads off, Indra—the non-sacrificers contending with the sacrificers.
   O strong horse-possessing (chariot-)mounter, when (you came) forth from heaven, you blasted those who follow no commandment in the two world-halves.

6. They wished to battle the army of the faultless one; the Navagva peoples marshaled themselves.
   Like castrated bullocks battling with a bull, they seemed to go away from Indra along slippery slopes.
7. You set them to fighting, those wailing and those laughing, on the far edge of the dusky realm, Indra.
   From heaven on high you sent fire burning down on the Dasyu; you favored the recitation of the presser and the praiser.
8. Having made for themselves a girdle from the earth, adorning themselves with a golden amulet, (though) urging themselves on, they did not overtake Indra. He clothed his spies with the sun.
9. When, Indra, you coiled around both worlds on all sides with your greatness,
   (you blasted) at the heedless ones with (the aid of) those who pay heed; you blasted forth the Dasyu with (the aid of) those who create sacred formulations, o Indra—
10. (The Dasyu) who did not reach the end of heaven, of earth, who did not hem in the wealth-giving (Indra) with their magical wiles.
    The bull Indra made his mace his yokemate. He milked the cows out of the darkness with light.
11. In accord with his autonomous power the waters flowed; he grew strong in the middle of the navigable ones.
    With a single-minded thought, with a most powerful blow Indra smashed him [=Vr̥tra?] to high heavens.
12. He pierced down through the fastnesses of Ilībiśa; he split apart horned Śuṣṇa—Indra.
    As much endurance, as much strength (as remained to you), bounteous one, (using that,) with your mace you smashed the rival who sought battle.
13. Goal-directed, he set out against his rivals; with the sharp bull he split apart the strongholds.
    He made Vr̥tra collide with his mace—Indra. He advanced his own thinking, exulting all the while.
14. You aided Kutsa, Indra, in whom you took pleasure; you furthered the bull Daśadyu as he did battle.
    Stirred up by hooves, the dust reached heaven. Śvaitreya stood up to conquer the superior men.
15. You aided the hornless bull in the Tugriyan (battles), the Śvitriyan cow at the conquering of dwelling places, bounteous one.
    They have made a long delay, just staying here. You have laid low the possessions of those who behave as rivals.

I.34 Aśvins

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
12 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 9, 12

This hymn has a simple and very insistent organizing principle: the number three. The Aśvins, of whom there are, of course, two, are urged to perform various actions three times a day, using equipment, especially their chariot, that has numerous triple features. The particular ritual reason for the glorification of three must be the three soma-pressings, but this ritual application is not made clear until verse 8. If, as we have argued, the Third Pressing is a ritual innovation in the Ṛgveda, a hymn devoted to extolling it is not surprising.

The hymn falls into two unequal parts, each ending with a triṣṭubh verse (vss. 1–9, 10–12). In the first part the number three is especially celebrated, though the number is not absent in the second part (see vss. 11 and 12). The last three verses invite the Aśvins to drink the soma and to offer us rewards in return. Despite the metrical punctuation and the change in emphasis in the brief second part, there is no reason not to consider this hymn a unity.

From the grammatical point of view, the hymn contains what many scholars (including us) take as a precious archaism, the single occurrence of the phrase sū́re duhitā́ "daughter of the Sun" (vs. 5d), preserving in sū́re the sandhi of final -as of the genitive sū́ras* as -e before a dental in close phrasal sandhi. (For general discussion of this phenomenon, see Jamison 2010.) It perhaps escaped modernization because the focus of the hymn was not on the mythological marriage of Sūryā, daughter of the Sun, and she is only mentioned because of the incidental fact that the chariot she mounted had three standing places.

1. Three times today take cognizance of us. Extensive is your journey and your giving, o Aśvins.
   Because clasping you is like clasping on a garment in winter, become ones who can be clasped by men of inspired thought.
2. Three wheel-rims are on your honey-bringing chariot; all know the spoor of the soma through and through.
   Three props have been propped up to take hold of; three times by night you drive, Aśvins, and three times by day.
3. Three times on the same day, you concealers of fault, three times today equip the sacrifice with honey.
   Three times, Aśvins, make prize-giving refreshments swell for us, through the evenings and the dawns.
4. Three times drive your circuit, three times to the folk who follow your commandment; three times do your best as if threefold for the one who pursues (his ritual duties) well.
   Three times bring delight, Aśvins; three times make nourishment swell for us, like (a cow) that never runs dry.

5. Three times bring wealth to us, Aśvins, three times to the divine conclave; and three times aid our insights.
   Three times (bring) good fortune and three times acclamations for us. The daughter of the Sun mounted your chariot with its three standing places.
6. Three times, Aśvins, give us heavenly remedies, three times earthly ones, and three times those from the waters.
   Succor and luck and lifetime bring to my little son, and threefold shelter, you lords of beauty.
7. Three times, day after day, Aśvins, deserving the sacrifice, reach around the earth in its three parts.
   You Nāsatyas as charioteers travel over the three distant realms, like breath blowing over the pastures.
8. Three times, Aśvins, along with the rivers with their seven mothers the three (soma) troughs are prepared and the oblation is made threefold.
   Floating above the three earths, you guard the fixed vault of heaven, through the days, through the nights.
9. Where are the three wheels of your triply turning chariot, where the three seats which are in the same nest [=chariot box]?
   When is the yoking of the prizewinning donkey, with which, Nāsatyas, you drive up to the sacrifice.
10. Come here, Nāsatyas: the oblation is being poured. Drink of the honey with your honey-drinking mouths.
    For Savitar impels your chariot, earlier than dawn, glittering, full of ghee, for truth.
11. Drive hither, Nāsatyas, with the three times eleven gods, here to honey drinking, Aśvins.
    Extend our lifetime; sweep away our maladies; repel hatred; come into partnership (with us).
12. Aśvins, with your triply turning chariot, bring wealth in good heroes our way.
    You two who listen I keep calling to for help. Be there to strengthen us at the winning of prizes.

I.35 Savitar (except Agni, Mitra and Varuṇa, Rātrī, and Savitar 1)

Hiraṇyastūpa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 1, 9

After an initial verse invoking several gods, Savitar becomes the sole focus of the hymn—Savitar primarily in his role as god of the evening, as was already suggested by the invocation of Night in verse 1c. The first part of the Savitar portion (vss. 2–5) describes the beauty of Savitar's chariot and his journey through the night sky. During this journey he (and his horses, vss. 2 and 5; see also 7–8) survey the creatures and the larger cosmos in which they live, and in the second part of the hymn (vss. 6–9) we learn what was seen. These verses enumerate the parts of the cosmos and sketch its dimensions. This section is presented as mystical instruction (see esp. vs. 6d), which raises cosmic questions (vs. 7cd), especially about what happens to the sun during the night that Savitar is presiding over. The anxieties raised by the absence of the sun are put to rest by Savitar's ability to pervade the whole realm (vs. 9), and the hymn ends with an invitation to the god to come to us along his well-maintained route through the midspace (vss. 10–11).

1. I invoke Agni first, for well-being; I invoke Mitra and Varuṇa here, for help.
   I invoke Night, who brings to rest the moving; I invoke god Savitar, for aid.
2. Turning hither through the black realm, bringing to rest the immortal and the mortal, with his golden chariot Savitar the god drives here, gazing upon the creatures.
3. The god drives on a downward slope; he drives on an upward one; he drives with two resplendent fallow bays, he who is worthy of the sacrifice.
   God Savitar drives hither from afar, thrusting away all obstacles.
4. (It is) covered over with pearls, having every beauty, with golden yoke-pins, lofty—his chariot has bright-beamed Savitar mounted, (he) worthy of the sacrifice, having assumed his own power throughout the black realms.
5. The dusky (horses) with white feet have looked out across the peoples, while drawing his chariot with its golden forepole.
   The clans, all the creatures ever abide in the lap of divine Savitar.
6. There are three heavens: two are the laps of Savitar, one is the hero-vanquishing one in the world of Yama.
   Like a chariot (wheel) on the axle-pin, the (creatures) have taken their place on his immortal (foundations?).—Whoever will perceive this, let him declare it here.
7. The eagle has surveyed the midspaces—the lord possessing profound inspiration, who gives good guidance.
   Where now is the sun? Who perceives it? To which one of the heavens does his rein extend?
8. The eight humps of the earth he has surveyed, the three wastelands three wagon-treks (wide), the seven rivers.
   Golden-eyed god Savitar has come hither, establishing desirable treasures for the pious man.

9. Golden-palmed Savitar, whose boundaries are distant, shuttles between both, both heaven and earth.
   He thrusts away affliction; he pursues the sun; he reaches to heaven through the black realm.
10. The golden-handed lord of good guidance, of good grace, of good help—let him drive in our direction.
    Repelling demons and sorcerers, the god has taken his place facing evening, while being hymned.
11. Your age-old paths, Savitar, dustless, well-made in the midspace, along these easily passable paths (come) to us today. Both guard us and speak on our behalf, o god.

The next eight hymns (I.36–43) are attributed to Kaṇva Ghaura, and the Kaṇva family is named a number of times in this sequence. It is noteworthy that this collection does not contain a hymn to Indra. However, there are three hymns (I.37–39) to the Maruts, Indra's regular companions, and the following hymn, I.40, is dedicated to Brahmaṇaspati. Indra figures prominently in that hymn and is in fact identified with Brahmaṇaspati in it.

For the most part the style of these hymns is uncomplex but nicely balanced.

I.36 Agni

Kaṇva Ghaura
20 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

Long but relatively straightforward, this hymn first celebrates the communal fire belonging to a number of clans, as Proferes argues (2007: 31), uniting them in common action (vss. 1–3). The poet then cites a divine precedent for joint kindling of the fire (vs. 4) and assigns Agni various social roles: priest, householder, and messenger (vs. 5), an almost trifunctional structure. Verses 7–8 conflate mortals and gods in their expansion of territory and defeat of opposing forces, and the next series of verses also mingle legendary and current mortals in their relation to Agni.

The mood of the hymn changes with verse 13. There follow a number of peremptory commands to Agni, for help and, especially, protection from and destruction of enemies, interspersed with mentions of help that Agni offered to previous mortal clients. The more militant verses are reminiscent of X.87, dedicated to Agni Rakṣohan ("Demon-Smiter"), although the latter hymn is more inventive than this one.

1. We appeal for you with well-spoken speeches to the youthfully exuberant (fire) of the many (peoples), of the clans that serve the gods, to Agni—just the one whom the others (also) reverently invoke.

2. The peoples have installed Agni, the increaser of might. Bringing oblations, we would do honor to you.
Become today our benevolent helper here when prizes (are at stake), o comrade.

3. We choose you as messenger, as the Hotar who affords all possessions.
Since you are great, your flames range widely; your radiant beams touch heaven.
4. The gods Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman kindle you, their primordial messenger.
With you, o Agni, that one wins every stake—the mortal who ritually serves you.

5. You are the delighting Hotar, the lord of the household, and the messenger of the clans.
In you are gathered together all the enduring commandments that the gods made.
6. Just in you who bring good fortune is every oblation poured, o youngest Agni.
Benevolent toward us today and in the future, sacrifice to the gods for masses of good heroes.

7. Bringing homage, they reverently approach him, their sovereign king, just so.
With their oblations the sons of Manu kindle Agni, after they have crossed beyond failures.
8. Smashing their Vr̥tra [/obstacle], they crossed over the two world-halves and the waters and made for themselves a wide place for peaceful dwelling.
The bull [=Agni], brilliant when bepoured, came to be at Kaṇva's side; the horse [=Agni] whinnied at the cattle-raids.

9. Sit together (with us): you are great. Blaze as the best at pursuing the gods.
Let loose your beautiful red smoke in every direction, o lauded Agni, partaker of the ritual meal—
10. Whom the gods installed here for Manu as the best sacrificer, o conveyor of the oblation, whom Kaṇva (and?) Medhyātithi (installed) as the winner of stakes, whom Vr̥ṣan [/the bull], whom Upastuta [/the praised] (installed).

11. Agni whom Medhyātithi (and?) Kaṇva kindled from truth, his are the refreshments that shine forth; him do these verses (make strong) and him, Agni, do we make strong.
12. Give fullness of wealth, o autonomous one, for you have friendship among the gods, o Agni.
You rule over a prize worthy of fame. Have mercy on us: you are great.

13. Stand upright to help us, like god Savitar, upright as the winner of the prize when we vie with (other) cantors with their ornaments in invoking (you).
14. Upright, protect us from narrow straits with your beacon. Burn up every devourer.
   Make us upright to move and to live. Find favor for us among the gods.

15. Protect us from the demon, o Agni. Protect us from the malice of the enemy.
   Protect from the man who does harm or who seeks to smash us, o youngest one with lofty beams.
16. As if with a deadly weapon, smash asunder our enemies and whoever deceives us, o you of scorching fangs.
   The mortal who sharpens himself throughout the nights, let that cheat not be master of us.

17. Agni gained good heroes en masse, and Agni good fortune for Kaṇva.
   Agni helped Medhyātithi—as did Mitra (and Varuṇa) [/the two allies]—and Agni (helped) Upastuta in winning.
18. With Agni we call Turvaśa and Yadu from afar, also Ugrādeva.
   Agni, our force against the Dasyu, led Navavāstva of the lofty chariots and Turvīti.

19. Manu installed you, Agni, to be a light for the people, each and every one.
   Born of truth, you shine when grown strong [/sprinkled] in the company of Kaṇva—(you) to whom the communities bring reverence.
20. The dazzling, hard-charging flames of Agni, terrifying like (wild beasts), are not to be confronted.
   (Burn) the demonic forces, the sorcerers forever—burn up every devourer.

I.37 Maruts

Kaṇva Ghaura
15 verses: gāyatrī, probably organized in tr̥cas

Typical Marut themes fill this hymn: their glittering beauty (lightning), their noise (thunder), and their boisterous character, which strikes fear in both animate and inanimate nature. The mystery of their birth, also a common feature of Marut hymns, is mentioned glancingly in verse 9. The language is uncomplex, but as in many Marut hymns it is energetic and visual, and it often has a conversational tone, as in the depiction of thunder in verse 13 as the Maruts talking among themselves as they travel.

1. To the playful Marut troop, unassailable beauty on a chariot, sing forth, o Kaṇvas—
2. Who, together with their dappled (mares) and their spears, their axes and unguents, were born having a radiance of their own.
3. As if (it were) right here, the whip in their hands is heard, when they wish to speak.
   On their journey they direct the glittering (lightning) downward.

4. To the spirited tempestuous troop of flaring brilliance sing your sacred formulation given by the gods.
5. Proclaim the prized bull among the cattle—the playful Marut troop.
   It has grown strong on the juice in the jaw (of the soma press).
6. Which of you is the highest, o superior men—you shakers of heaven and earth,
   since you shake them like the end (of a garment)?

7. The tribe of Manu crouches down before your journey, your formidable battle fury;
   the mountain, the peak bends down—
8. At whose drives, at whose journeys the earth, like a clanlord grown old,
   trembles in fear.
9. Because their birth was secure, (they had) the energy to come out from their mother,
   the power that now as before follows them.

10. And these sons (of Rudra) have erected their songs (like) race-course posts on their drives, bellowing and bending their knees for their journey.
11. Also this child of mist [=cloud]—long, wide, not negligible (in size)— do they stir forth with their journeys.
12. O Maruts, since you have the strength, you have stirred up the peoples and stirred up the mountain-peaks.

13. When the Maruts go driving, they keep talking with each other on the road:
    anyone can hear them.
14. Drive forth quickly with your swift ones: there are friendships for you among the Kaṇvas.
    There you will bring yourselves to exhilaration.
15. For (our friendship) is always there for your exhilaration; we are always there for them [=Maruts], in order (for us) to live a full lifetime.

I.38 Maruts

Kaṇva Ghaura
15 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tṛcas

The conversational tone that was occasionally discernible in the previous hymn (I.37) is fully in evidence here, especially in the first tṛca (vss. 1–3), in which the poet peppers the Maruts with castigating questions about their whereabouts: the gods are clearly absent from his sacrifice and presumed to be enjoying the sacrificial offerings of rivals. The poet continues in this intimate tone in the next tṛca—first (vs. 4) slyly suggesting that if their positions were reversed, the Maruts, as poets, would praise him, the current poet, like a god, and then begging them to keep him safe (vss. 5–6) and to end the current dry spell (vs. 6c). The compressed and abrupt quality of gāyatrī meter is ideally suited for this conversational style.

The next six verses (7–12) present a more conventional description of the Maruts as the thunderstorm, with familiar images. In the last three verses (13–15), the poet exhorts himself to sing not only to the Maruts but like the Maruts, especially in verse 14. The first verse of this tṛca (13) introduces two other divinities, the Lord of the Sacred Formulation (to whom the same poet will dedicate nearby I.40) and Agni; it is not clear why they share this last tṛca with the Maruts.

1. What is this now, you fair-weather friends?! What have you taken in your hands,
 as a father does his son, o you for whom the ritual grass has been twisted?
2. Where now—what your goal?—have you gone on earth, as if in heaven?
 Where are they taking pleasure in you, like cows (in a pasture)?
3. Where are your newer favors, Maruts, where the easy passages?
 Where all the good portions?

4. O you whose mother is Pṛśni, if you were mortals, your praiser would be immortal.
5. Let your singer not be displeasing to you, like a wild animal in a pasture, and let him not go along the path of Yama.
6. And let not dissolution, evil rage—(going) ever further away—smite us.
 It should collapse, along with thirst.

7. This is real: the dazzling, hard-charging sons of Rudra even in the desert create unquenchable mist.
8. Like a bawling (cow) the lightning bellows. Like a mother her calf, it accompanies (the rain), when their rain has been sent gushing.
9. Even by day they create darkness, together with Parjanya the water-carrier,
 when they inundate the earth.

10. Then because of the roar of the Maruts throughout the whole earthly seat the sons of Manu trembled.
11. O Maruts, along the shimmering (waters) with their riverbanks, drive with your hard-hooved (horses) whose journey is never broken.
12. Let your wheel-rims be steady, and your chariots and horses, and your reins be well fashioned.

13. Speak here with a song at length to the Lord of the Sacred Formulation, to awaken him, and to Agni, lovely to see like an ally.
14. Bellow [/measure] the call that is in your mouth. Like Parjanya, you will thunder [/stretch it out].
    Sing the song-verse belonging to the hymn.
15. Extol the Marut throng—glittering, inviting admiration, receiving the chant—
    (so that) they will be grown fully strong here with us.

I.39 Maruts

Kaṇva Ghaura
10 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

The weighty register and solemn syntax of this hymn contrast with the light texture and somewhat colloquial register of the last two hymns (I.37–38), also dedicated to the Maruts but in a different meter, even though the rapid-fire questions of verse 1cd remind us of the abrupt questions of I.38.1–3.

Here the poet hopes to harness the overwhelming power of the Maruts in order to protect himself and his people from some looming, but not entirely defined, threat. This hope is expressed especially nakedly in the last part of the hymn, verses 7–10. In the earlier parts of the hymn the poet praises the power of the Maruts in a formal style, but by stating that this might cannot be challenged (vss. 2cd, 4), he hints that it could in fact encounter a challenge.

The usual buoyant descriptions of the Maruts' appearance and behavior as the thunderstorm are muted in this hymn. They serve only to illustrate what power might be available to the poet and his people (vss. 3, 5–6).

1. When from the far distance you cast your measure [/your bellowing], like a flame, just so, by whose will, o Maruts, in whose form, and to whom do you drive? To whom, o you shakers?
2. Let your weapons be steadfast for thrusting far away, and let them be staunch for blocking.
   Yours be the might more to be admired, not that of the tricky mortal.

3. As you smite the steadfast to the far distance and you set the heavy to rolling, o men, you drive across the forests of the earth and across the regions of the mountains.
4. For a rival to you has not been found in heaven nor on earth, o you who care for the stranger.
   Yours be the might, with your full lineage as yokemate; o Rudras, let it never be open to challenge.

5. They make the mountains tremble; they shake the trees asunder.
   O Maruts, you gods, you have set out, like those badly drunk (on battle frenzy), o gods, with your whole clan.
6. You have harnessed the dappled mares to your chariots; the chestnut-red pulls as your side horse.
   Even the earth has listened for your journey and the sons of Manu have become afraid.

7. We wish (to bring) your help quickly here for our lineage, o Rudras.
   Come now to us with help in just the same way as (you went) before to fearful Kaṇva.
8. Whether sent by you, Maruts, or sent by a mortal, the formless being that sets upon us—keep him away by your strength, by your power, away by the help that stems from you.

9. O you who receive the first of the sacrifice, you discerning ones, because you gave (to us?) Kaṇva—not a half gift!— with unhalved help come to us, like lightning bolts to the rain, o Maruts.
10. You bring unhalved power, unhalved strength, you of good gifts, you shakers.
    O Maruts, launch your enmity like an arrow at him who is inimical to seers, who is enveloped in fury.

I.40 Brahmaṇaspati

Kaṇva Ghaura
8 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

Brahmaṇaspati, "Lord of the Sacred Formulation," is addressed in this hymn, but this divine figure with his transparent name is only a means to accomplish other ends. As the patron deity of ritual speech, Brahmaṇaspati will make the poet's speech effective enough to bring the other gods, especially Indra, to our sacrifice (vss. 1–2). In the second pragātha (vss. 3–4) the poet seeks Brahmaṇaspati's indirect help. If the poet's efforts on behalf of the sacrifice are successful, his patron stands to gain (see esp. vs. 4cd), and the patron then should give liberal rewards to the singer (vs. 4a). It is striking that the patron is here called a "hero" and promised, in the famous inherited phrase, "imperishable fame"—not for his exploits on the battlefield, but for his generosity to his poet.

The test comes in the following pragātha (vss. 5–6): the new mantra under the patronage of Brahmaṇaspati is pronounced both by Brahmaṇaspati and by the human actors at the ritual. If it is a properly formulated mantra, it will bring the desired success. Judging from the final pragātha (vss. 7–8), ritual success was achieved, and this success is expressed in strikingly sexual terms: both the patron's dwelling place and his power to rule are infused with productive sexuality (vss. 7d, 8a). He also gains the gods as his allies (8a), and, most surprising of all, becomes identified as the god Indra himself (8cd), via the very last word in the hymn, vajrín "wielder of the mace," a qualifier otherwise only of Indra.

1. Rise up, o Lord of the Sacred Formulation. Seeking the gods, we beseech you:
   let the Maruts of good drops come forth; o Indra, swelling with strength, keep (them) company.
2. For it is just you, o son of strength [=Indra], that the mortal implores when the stake is set.
   O Maruts, whoever loves you, he would acquire the possession of good heroes and good horses.

3. Let the Lord of the Sacred Formulation go forth, let the goddess Liberality go forth to the hero belonging to men, whose gifts come in fives. Let the gods lead our sacrifice.
4. Who gives to the cantor liberal goods, he acquires imperishable fame; for him we win through sacrifice faultless refreshment bringing good heroes and advancing well.

5. Now the Lord of the Sacred Formulation proclaims the mantra worthy to be spoken, in which Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman, and the gods have made their home.
6. Just that would we speak at the rites—the faultless mantra that brings good fortune, o gods.
   And if you gladly receive this speech, o noble men [=gods], it will attain all things of yours worth winning.

7. Who can attain to the man who seeks the gods, and who to the man whose ritual grass has been twisted?
   The pious man has advanced ever further through his abodes; he has made his own dwelling place pregnant.

8. He should inseminate his dominion. Together with the kings [=Ādityas], he smites: even in peril he has established a good dwelling for himself.
   There exists no one to obstruct, no one to overcome the one who wields the mace, be the stake great or small.

I.41 Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman (1–3, 7–9), Ādityas (4–6)

Kaṇva Ghaura
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

For most of its short compass, this hymn is a simple celebration of the rewards and protection the Ādityas grant to their devotee. The only notable aspect of these verses is the pervasive imagery of journeys and their potential risks.

It is only the last two verses (8–9) that introduce interesting complications. This last tr̥ca begins (vs. 7) with a deliberative question—how shall we make our praise of the gods succeed? The advice in the next two verses seems to be (translated into modern American political parlance) "Don't go negative!" In verse 8 the poet forswears responding directly to a rival behaving with hostility and affirms his intention to use only positive means to win the gods. The first two pādas of verse 9 depict the rivalry in terms of the ever-popular ancient Indian dice game (see esp. X.34), counseling the poet that you can never tell what your opponent has up his sleeve until all the cards are on the table. (We have recast this vignette into the language of modern card-playing, which works remarkably well—even to the holding of the four winning tokens, aces in our recasting, which in the Indian dice game would be a handful of vibhītaka nuts divisible by four.) The lesson seems to be that, given the possibility that your opponent might have some successful tricks of his own, you should engage him as little as possible and concentrate on your positive praises of the gods.

1. Whom they guard—the attentive Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman—that person is never deceived.
2. The mortal whom they carry across as if in their arms and protect from harm,
   he thrives, unharmed and whole.
3. The kings [=Ādityas] smash apart the hard places, apart the hostilities in front of them;
   they lead across difficult ways.

4. The path is easy to go on and harmless to men for the one going to truth.
   There is no fissure there for you.
5. The sacrifice that you lead along the straight path, o superior men, Ādityas,
   that will reach you for insight.

6. That mortal attains to treasure and to goods, to a whole lineage along with his life, as one who cannot be laid low.

7. O comrades, how shall we bring to success our praise song for Mitra and Aryaman, a great delight for Varuṇa?
8. Let me not respond to the man who smites or curses you, (as if) to one devoted to the gods;
   by benevolent thoughts alone will I seek to win you.
9. (A gambler) should be afraid, right up till (the cards) are laid on (the table), that (his opponent) may be holding four (aces).
   One should not go eagerly after evil speech.

I.42 Pūṣan

Kaṇva Ghaura
10 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas, with a final verse

Like other Pūṣan hymns, this one has an informal tone and imaginative depictions of the circumstances in which Pūṣan can render us aid. In the first part of the hymn the god is asked to rid our paths of potential enemies (esp. vss. 2–4), while in the latter part he is to lead us along these roads, now rendered safe, to prosperity (esp. vss. 7–8). The nine verses of tr̥cas are consistently addressed to Pūṣan in the 2nd person, and all those verses but 5 contain imperatives; note especially the final explosion of five abrupt, object-less imperatives in 9ab, the final verse of the hymn proper. In the final summary verse (10) Pūṣan is in the 3rd person, the object of our attentions and our requests.

1. Traverse the roads with (us), Pūṣan, and (release) constraint from (us), o child of release.
   Go forth before us to victory, o god.
2. The evil, malevolent wolf that will set his sights on us, o Pūṣan, smite him away, as always, from the path.
3. Drive away this highwayman, the robber who knows the crooked ways, to a distance far from our route.

4. The double-dealing utterer of evil, whoever he is—with your foot stamp on his scorching (weapon).
5. We choose that help of yours, o wondrous counselor Pūṣan, with which you spurred on our forefathers.
6. Now then, o you who bring every good fortune, who are the foremost wielder of the golden axe, make the stakes easy for us to win.

7. Lead us across the parched places. Make easy passages, easy pathways for us.
   – Pūṣan, here you will find the resolve.
8. Lead us to good pasture, with no new suffering on the road.
   – Pūṣan, here you will find the resolve.
9. Strive! Give and proffer! Sharpen up! Fill the belly!
   – Pūṣan, here you will find the resolve.

10. We do not oppose Pūṣan; we greet him with hymns.
    We beg the wondrous one for goods.

I.43 Rudra (1–2, 4–6), Rudra, Mitra and Varuṇa (3), Soma (7–9)

Kaṇva Ghaura
9 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 9, arranged in tṛcas

There is only one other Ṛgvedic hymn dedicated jointly to Rudra and Soma, gods who have little apparent in common. In VI.74 the two are invoked together, in a dual dvandva, but aside from generic divine descriptions only Rudra's characteristics are mentioned. Here the two gods are confined to separate tṛcas; in fact, as Oldenberg suggests, it may have originally been two hymns: verses 1–6 Rudra, 7–9 Soma.

In contrast to other Rudra contexts the depiction of Rudra here is resolutely positive; there is no trace of the dangerous or vengeful Rudra. One might in fact consider the pile-up of flattering adjectives in the opening question in verse 1 a poetic insurance policy, making it clear to the god that there will be no caviling from us. The rest of the two Rudra tṛcas focuses on the god's power to provide for the welfare of both humans and livestock, along with Aditi (vs. 2) and the principal Ādityas (vs. 3).

The first two verses (7–8) of the tṛca to Soma are straightforward and generic, with no particularly somian features. The final verse (9), in a different meter, is syntactically complex and lexically formal, and has given rise to a number of competing interpretations. In our view it depicts Soma, as often, as extending from earth to heaven, and he finds the gods in both places, in heaven, which is their abode, and on the ritual ground, because they have come to drink soma at the sacrifice. Both the relevance of this verse to the rest of the tṛca and the connection of the Rudra and Soma portions of the hymn escape us.

1. What might we say to Rudra, the provident, the most generous, the very powerful;
   what might we say that is most wealful to his heart?
2. So that for our livestock and men Aditi will create Rudrian power, likewise for our kine, likewise for our offspring.
3. So that Mitra and Varuṇa will be attentive to us, likewise Rudra, likewise all (the gods) in concert.

4. To the lord of songs, the lord of ritual offerings, to Rudra whose remedies are healing [?]
   we plead for the favor of luck and lifetime.
5. He who shines like the blazing sun, like gold, as the best of the gods, as the good one
6. Will make weal for our steed and easy passage for our ram and ewe, for our men and women, for our cow.

7. Upon us, Soma, set down the glory of a hundred men, great, powerfully manly fame.
8. Let neither obstructions nor hostilities deflect us, Soma.
   O drop, give us a share in the prize.
9. The creatures [=gods] that belong to you, the immortal one—as their head you seek them in the highest domain of truth [=heaven] and in the navel (of the earth?) [=ritual ground], Soma. You will know them as the ones who attend upon (you), Soma.

The next group of hymns (I.44–50), attributed to Praskaṇva Kāṇva, the poet also of VIII.49 (the first Vālakhilya hymn) and IX.95, has the defining feature that all the hymns are related to a particular ritual litany, the Prātaranuvāka or "Early-Morning Recitation" (on which see Eggeling Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa 2: 229 n. 2; Hillebrandt 1897: 128; Keith 1925 I: 328). The gods to whom these Praskaṇva hymns are dedicated are those mentioned in the litany: Agni, particularly in his capacity as illuminator of the early morning and conveyor of the dawn divinities, the Aśvins, Dawn, and the rising Sun.

I.44 Agni, Aśvins, Dawn (1–2), Agni (3–14)

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
14 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

As indicated in the introduction to the Praskaṇva collection, this hymn to Agni praises him in his connection to the rituals of the early morning, especially in his role as conveyor of the other gods who attend this sacrifice. In its fourteen verses this hymn seldom departs from this simple message. The language is measured and dignified, but not difficult or poetically contorted.

1. Agni, immortal one—the bright benefit radiating from Dawn:
   convey it here to the pious man, o Jātavedas; convey here today the gods who wake at dawn.
2. For you are the delightful messenger, conveyor of oblations, o Agni, charioteer of the ceremonies.
   Jointly with the Aśvins and with Dawn establish in us good heroism and lofty fame.

3. Today we choose as messenger Agni the good one, dear to many, whose beacon is smoke, but who is foamy with radiance when the dawns break, the glory of the ceremonies, of the sacrifices.
4. The fairest, the youngest guest, well-libated, delightful to the pious folk—
   I reverently invoke Agni Jātavedas when the dawns break, to journey to the gods.

5. I will praise you—o immortal nurturer of all—as immortal guardian—o Agni, partaker of the ritual meal—as best sacrificer—o conveyor of the oblation.
6. Be one who is good for the singer to laud, o youngest one, one whose tongue is honey when well-libated.
   Lengthening the lifetime of Praskaṇva to live, do homage to the divine folk.

7. Because the clans together kindle you as Hotar who provides all possessions [/possesses all knowledge], o much-invoked Agni, bring the discerning gods here at a run—
8. Savitar, Dawn, the Aśvins, Bhaga. Through the nights, when the dawns break, the Kaṇvas, their soma pressed, kindle you, Agni, as conveyor of the oblation, o you of good ceremony.

9. For you are the master of the ceremonies, Agni, the messenger of the clans.
   Convey here today the gods who wake at dawn, who look like the sun, for soma-drinking.
10. O Agni rich in radiance, through the earlier dawns you have shone visible to all.
    You are the helper set in front among the settlements; you are the descendant of Manu (set in front) at the sacrifices.

11. O Agni, as the furtherer of the sacrifice, as the Hotar seasonably sacrificing would we install you, just as Manu did, o god—and as the discerning, quick, immortal messenger.
12. When as the one set in front for the gods, their intimate, you undertake their mission, o you of Mitra's might, the beams of your fire flash like the clamorous waves of a river.

13. Listen, you with listening ears, along with your passengers, the gods who travel with you, o Agni.
    Let them sit on the ritual grass—Mitra, Aryaman, and those who travel early to the ceremony.

14. Let them listen to the praise—the Maruts of good drops, whose tongue is Agni, strong through truth.
 Let him drink the soma—Varuṇa of steadfast commandment, jointly with the Aśvins and with Dawn.

I.45 Agni (except Gods 10cd)

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
10 verses: anuṣṭubh

Like the immediately preceding hymn, this one celebrates Agni as the conveyor of the gods appropriate to the early-morning sacrifice. Unlike the last hymn, however, these gods are not individually enumerated; instead generic names for groups of gods are given in the first half of the first verse, and in the last two verses (9–10) they are summed up in the phrase "the divine folk." The emphasis is rather on the world of men. In verse 3 the poet mentions a number of prior singers as models for his own interaction with Agni, and he groups himself with his kinsmen the Priyamedhas (vs. 4) and Kaṇvas (vs. 5), as well as unnamed poets and invokers in verses 6–8. Thus, while the two pairs of outer verses (1–2, 9–10) concern Agni's delivery of the gods to the sacrifice, the middle verses (3–8) are occupied with the sacrificers' desire for Agni to listen to their hymns and pleas.

1. You, Agni, (bring) the Vasus, the Rudras, and the Ādityas here.
 I will sacrifice to the being who assures good rites, born of Manu, sprinkling ghee [=Agni].
2. Because, o Agni, the discriminating gods give attentive hearing to the pious man, bring them here, the three and thirty, you with the ruddy horses, you who long for song.
3. As in the case of Priyamedha, of Atri, of Virūpa, o Jātavedas, as of Aṅgiras, o you of great commandment, hear the call of Praskaṇva.
4. The greatly observant Priyamedhas have called for help on Agni, ruling over the rites with his blazing flame.
5. O comrade whose oblation is ghee, listen well to these songs here, with which the sons of Kaṇva call upon you for aid.
6. O you of brightest fame, the kinsmen within their clans call upon you, o much beloved Agni, the flame-haired, to convey the oblation.
7. The inspired poets have installed you as their Hotar, seasonably sacrificing, best finder of goods, with listening ears, of greatest extent, o Agni, at the rituals of daybreak.
8. The inspired poets whose soma is pressed have roused you to delight—they bearing the lofty light, the oblation for the pious mortal, o Agni.

9. O might-made comrade, those who travel early for soma-drinking, the divine folk—here today make them sit on the ritual grass, o good one.
10. The divine folk, o Agni, attract toward us through sacrifice, with invocations common (to all):
 "Here is the soma, you of good drops. Drink it, aged overnight."

I.46 Aśvins

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
15 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn is an invitation to the Aśvins to come in the early morning to a soma offering, either the early morning of the pressing day or the early morning of the following day in an Atirātra or "overnight" soma ritual. It is a difficult hymn because of its obscure references (cf. vss. 4 and 5) and its penchant for hapaxes (e.g., kúṭa in vs. 4, ā́dāra in 5, avidriyá in 15).

A unifying image running through much of the hymn is the journey of the Aśvins over the waters to the sacrificial area (vss. 3, 7, 8, 11), introduced by the poet's statement that the Sindhu River is the mother of the Aśvins (vs. 2). In accord with this image, the soma itself is a river, flowing upward to the Aśvins to bring them to the sacrificial area (vs. 9ab). In this verse "what is good" or "the good thing" that is "in the track of the rivers" may refer to the soma, as Geldner suggests. Echoing this image is the poet's repeated use of derivatives of √pṛ̥ "carry across" (vss. 4, 6, 12).

In verse 1 Dawn is the first to arrive, before other deities, although with the arrival of dawn the Aśvins should also appear, and indeed in verse 14 the poet returns to the arrival of Dawn and says that she has followed the Aśvins. In verse 2 the insight through which the Aśvins find goods may be both their insight and also the poet's, for the hymns inspire the Aśvins to bring goods. Verse 4 is very obscure for several reasons. First, the identity of the "lover of the waters, the carrier" is uncertain. Among the suggestions are Indra (Pirart 1995: 81) or Soma (Geldner, Renou, Thieme [1967: 236]), but it might also be Agni, who is also connected with the waters—he is famously "the Child of the Waters"—and who carries oblations to the gods and carries sacrificers across difficulties. Unfortunately 4c is not much help in identifying "the carrier" since kúṭa is a hapax of uncertain meaning. We have translated it as "house" following Thieme, but it may have another meaning and could even be a proper name, as Pirart suggests. This "lover of the waters" is probably also the ā́dāra, again a hapax and again of unsure meaning. We have translated it as "the one paying heed," but according to another etymological analysis it could mean "breaker, splitter." All we can say with certainty is that the verse ends with a clear invitation to the Aśvins to drink the soma (5c). As the soma flows to the Aśvins, so the poet hopes that the morning light, corresponding to the soma, will flow toward the sacrificers (6). In verse 9 the poet turns to address his fellow Kaṇvas in the first half-verse and the Aśvins in pāda c. In that last line, the poet asks where the Aśvins are hidden, where they are "cloaked," for it is presumably still dark and neither the dawn nor the Aśvins have yet appeared. The cloaking of the Aśvins in 9 contrasts with verse 13, in which the poet asks the Aśvins to "clothe" themselves in the soma in the company of Vivasvant, who is here likely associated with the sun. Then they and the morning will be present to the sacrificers.

1. With none before her, this Dawn breaks, the beloved of heaven.
   I shall sing aloft praise to you, Aśvins,
2. Who are wondrous, whose mother is the River Sindhu, who are mindful of riches—the gods finding goods through insight.
3. Your lead (animals) twist and turn upon the (sea's) broken surface, when your chariot will fly with its birds.
4. By the oblation the lover of the waters, the carrier, carries across, o men—he, the father and boundary of the house [?],
5. The one paying heed [?] to (our) conceptions for the sake of you two, o Nāsatyas, you for whom (these) words are conceived:
   "Drink boldly of the soma."
6. The light-bringing refreshment that will carry us across the darkness, Aśvins—give that to us.
7. Travel here by the boat of our conceptions to go to the far shore!
   Hitch up your chariot, Aśvins!
8. Your oar is broader than heaven; your chariot is at the ford of the rivers; through our insight the soma drops have been hitched up.
9. O Kaṇvas, (in the track) of heaven are the soma drops; in the track of the rivers is what is good.
   Where do you two desire to place that cloak of yours?
10. Radiance has come into being for the soma plant: the sun, counterpart to gold!
    The black one [=the fire in the coals] has peered out with his tongue.
11. And the path of truth has come into being to lead right to the far shore.
    The course of heaven has appeared.
12. The singer awaits each and every help of the Aśvins at the exhilarating drink of soma for the two who carry across.
13. Having clothed yourselves with the drink of soma and with song in the company of Vivasvant, come here, o you who are good luck, as at the time of Manu!

14. Dawn has followed your glory as you circle the earth.
    You will win the truths in the nights.
15. Aśvins, both of you—drink! Both of you—offer protection to us through your unbreakable help!

I.47 Aśvins

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
10 verses: br̥hatī alternating with satobr̥hatī, arranged in pragāthas

The hymn is dominated by imperatives, which appear in every verse except the last. These imperatives command the Aśvins to attend to the poet (e.g., 2d), to come to the sacrifice (e.g., 2b, 3d, 7c, 8b, 8d, 9a), to drink the soma (e.g., 1c, 3b), and especially to bestow prosperity on the sacrificer (e.g., 1d, 5c, 6b, 6d). The last verse summarizes the desire of the poet to bring the Aśvins, together with many goods, by means of the "recitations and chants" of those performing the sacrifice.

Like I.34 the hymn also associates a number of triplets with the Aśvins: their "triply turning chariot with its three standing places" (vs. 2) and the ritual grass "on which are three seats" (vs. 4). These triplets likely have ritual reference, although it is not clear what the reference might be. The "three turns" of the Aśvins' chariot may describe the three pressings of a soma sacrifice. Compare X.52.4d = 124.1b, which speaks of the sacrifice with its páñcayāmaṃ trivŕ̥taṃ saptátantum "five courses, three turns, seven threads." The term trivandhurá "with three standing places" is only used to describe the chariot of the Aśvins, but never with much indication about its referent. Geldner suggests that "the three seats" of triṣadhasthá might be for the two Aśvins and Sūryā or that they are simply three because the Aśvins are regularly associated with triplets. But there are other possibilities. Although triṣadhasthá characterizes various gods, in X.61.14 and V.11.2 it describes the three seats of Agni, the three fires, and perhaps it refers to these in this context as well. In that case, the three seats are not actually on the ritual grass but rather at or near it.

In the first verse the reference to the "day-old" soma places this hymn in the morning of the day following the pressing day in an Atirātra or "overnight" soma ritual. The soma offerings in the morning are a continuation of the offerings of the Third Pressing. If recited at the end of the rite, it is no wonder that the poet emphasizes the goods that he hopes that the Aśvins will bring on their chariot (3c, 6a, 9bc)—the chariot that is both the vehicle on which the Aśvins ride and the sacrifice itself. These are the goods that should come to the sacrificers as a result of their completed sacrifice.

In verse 7 the poet calls on the Aśvins to come whether they are far away or with Turvaśa. The Kaṇva poets of the VIIIth maṇḍala suggest their alliance with the Turvaśa and Yadu tribes (e.g., VIII.4.1 and 4.7; 7.18; 9.14; 10.5; 45.27). Since our poet is a Kaṇva as well, Turvaśa represents an ally, perhaps the people of the sacrificer for whom the hymn was composed. The point is therefore that the Aśvins should come to this sacrifice whether are far away or close by, among this very people.

1. O you growing strong through truth, this most honey-filled soma has been pressed for you two.
   Drink that (soma) aged overnight, Aśvins. Grant riches to the pious man.
2. Journey here, Aśvins, by your triply turning chariot with its three standing places, with its beautiful adornment.
   The Kaṇvas are creating a formulation for you at the rite. Listen well to their call!

3. O Aśvins, growing strong through truth, drink the most honey-filled soma.
   Then today, wondrous ones, come to the pious man, bringing goods on your chariot.
4. O you providing all possessions, mix the sacrifice with honey on the ritual grass, on which are three seats.
   The heaven-bound Kaṇvas, having pressed soma for you, call upon you two, Aśvins.

5. With what superior powers you helped Kaṇva, Aśvins, with these help us, o lords of beauty! Drink the soma, o you growing strong through truth!
6. Wondrous Aśvins, convey nourishments to the very generous one, bringing goods on your chariot.
   Whether from the sea or from heaven, grant much-desired wealth to us.

7. Nāsatyas, if you are in the far distance, or if you are with the Turvaśa, from there come to us by your smoothly rolling chariot, together with the rays of the sun.
8. Turning this way, let your team, the glory of the rite, convey you to our soma-pressings.
   Replenishing refreshment for the good (ritual) performer, and possessing good drops, sit here on the ritual grass, o men.

9. Nāsatyas, come by your sun-skinned chariot, by which you have ever conveyed goods to the pious man, in order to drink of the honeyed soma.
10. With our recitations and chants we call the two bringing many goods down this way for their help, for surely you have always drunk soma at the dear seat of the Kaṇvas, Aśvins.

I.48 Dawn

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
16 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

Another in Praskaṇva Kāṇva's series devoted to the deities of the early-morning sacrifice, this hymn to Dawn is especially concerned with the acquisition of goods—a common association because the dakṣiṇā or "priestly gift" is distributed to the poets and priests at the Morning Pressing. The radiant beauty of Dawn and her mandate to rouse and animate all living beings are not neglected in the hymn, however, especially in the middle verses (5–10). In verses 11–12 she is also, unusually, charged with a task more appropriate for Agni (see, e.g., I.44), namely conveying the gods to the sacrifice.

1. Along with a thing of value, dawn forth to us, Daughter of Heaven, along with lofty brilliance, radiant goddess, along with wealth, (you who are) rich in gifts.
2. Possessing horses and cows, finding all goods in abundance, (the dawns) bestir themselves to shine.
   Arouse liberalities toward me, o Dawn; stimulate the generosity of the benefactors.

3. Dawn has dawned (before) and will dawn now—the lively goddess of the chariots.
   Those who hold themselves (ready [for giving]) at her approaches, as those who seek fame on the sea hold themselves (firm),
4. And, o Dawn, those who at your journeys yoke their mind for giving—the patrons—here (the poet) Kaṇva, the latest of Kaṇvas, sings their names, the names of those superior men.

5. Liberal-spirited Dawn drives here, giving delight like a maiden.
   Wakening the footed community, she speeds along. She makes the winged ones fly up.
6. She who disperses the assembly, disperses the busy ones, she follows (them) like a track—she moist (with dew) [/lubricious].
   The birds, having flown at your dawning, do not settle, o you who are rich in prize mares.

7. This one has hitched herself up from out of the distance, from (the place of) the rising of the sun.
   With a hundred chariots, this well-portioned Dawn drives out toward men.
8. Every moving creature bows before her gaze. The spirited one creates light.

Dawn, the bounteous Daughter of Heaven, dawns away hatred, away failures.

9. O Dawn, be radiant here with your glittering radiance, o Daughter of Heaven, conveying hither abundant good fortune for us, dawning forth at the rituals of daybreak.
10. For the breathing and living of all is in you, when you dawn forth, spirited one.
With your lofty chariot, radiant one, heed our call, you of bright bounty.

11. Dawn, do win the prize, which is bright for the human race.
With it convey those of good action [=gods] here to the ceremonies, to those of good action [=sacrificers] who (as oblation-)conveyors sing to you.
12. Convey all the gods here for soma-drinking from the midspace, o Dawn.
Establish in us a mass of cows and of horses, worthy of praise, o Dawn, also victory's prize and good heroes en masse.

13. She whose gleaming, auspicious rays have appeared opposite, let her—Dawn—give us all-desirable wealth, well ornamented, easy to come by.
14. Because even those previous seers who called upon you for aid, for help, o great one—do you (now) greet our praises (as you did theirs) with generosity, o Dawn, with your bright brilliance.

15. Dawn, when today with your radiance you will push apart the two doors of heaven, then hold out to us broad shelter that keeps the wolf away, o goddess, hold out refreshments consisting of cows.
16. Mingle us with lofty wealth provided with all ornaments, with refreshments, with brilliance surpassing all, great Dawn, with prizes, o you who are rich in prize mares.

I.49 Dawn

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
4 verses: anuṣṭubh

A short and simple hymn, treating Dawn's journey from heaven to the earthly realm (vss. 1–2), to rouse the living world (vs. 3). The poets' response to her coming and their hope that her advent will bring them gifts end the hymn (vs. 4cd).

1. Dawn, with your auspicious (rays) come here, even from the luminous realm of heaven.
   Let the (horses) whose breath is reddish convey you right to the house of the one who has soma.
2. The well-ornamented, well-naved chariot that you have mounted, Dawn—with it further the people of good fame today, Daughter of Heaven.
3. Even the winged birds and the two-footed and four-footed, o silvery Dawn, have set forth following your regulations of time, from the ends of heaven—
4. For, dawning forth with your rays, you illuminate the whole luminous realm.
   Just you, Dawn, have the Kaṇvas, longing for goods, called upon with songs.

I.50 Sūrya (1-9), and a Spell against Disease (10–13)

Praskaṇva Kāṇva
13 verses: gāyatrī 1–9, anuṣṭubh 10–13

This final hymn of the Praskaṇva sequence falls into two parts. The last three verses (11–13) have a clear Atharvan cast, as a spell against disease, specifically jaundice. By sympathetic magic, the golden sun removes the jaundice from the afflicted man and displaces it onto other, presumably yellowish creatures—parrots and other birds.

The first nine verses, in a different meter, are a charmingly simple description of the rising of the Sun and the beginning of his journey across the sky. The affinity of the intermediate verse (10) is not clear. Though it matches the meter of the final three verses, in tone it seems more like a final verse summarizing the happy result of the sunrise in verses 1–9. (It is not unusual for the final verse of a hymn to be in a different meter from the rest.) If this is the case, then the spell in verses 11–13 could have been tacked onto this hymn because of the phrase "higher heaven" (11b), which echoes "higher light" and "highest light" in verse 10.

1. Up do the beacons convey this god Jātavedas, the Sun, for all to see.
2. Away like thieves go these heavenly bodies with the night, before the Sun, who has his gaze on all.

3. His beacons have appeared; his rays (extend) widely throughout the peoples,
   flashing like fires.
4. Transiting, visible to all, a light-maker are you, o Sun.
   You illuminate the whole luminous realm.
5. Facing the clans of the gods, facing the descendants of Manu do you go up, facing all, (for them) to see the sun—
6. With which as your eye, o purifying Varuṇa, you look upon the one bustling throughout the peoples.
7. Across heaven you go, the broad realm, measuring the days with the nights, looking upon the races, o Sun.
8. Seven fallow bay mares convey you, the flame-haired, in your chariot—o wide-gazing god Sun.
9. He has yoked the seven sleek daughters of the Sun's chariot.
   With these of his own yoking he drives.
10. Looking up from the darkness to the higher light, we have come up to the Sun, god among the gods, the highest light.

11. As you go up today, o you of Mitra's might, and mount the higher heaven,
    banish my heart-affliction and jaundice, o Sun.
12. In the parrots, in the ropanā-birds we place my jaundice.
    And in the hāridrava-birds we deposit my jaundice.
13. Up has gone this Āditya here, along with all his strength, making the hater subject to me. May I not become subject to the hater.

Here begins the second large division of Maṇḍala I (51–191).

The next seven hymns (I.51–57) are ascribed to Savya Āṅgirasa and consist only of Indra hymns. For the most part the hymns are a glorification of Indra's deeds—both the standard and well-known triumphs like the smashing of Vr̥tra (see esp. I.52) and numerous lesser-known feats, which are presented in catalogue fashion (see esp. I.51, 53). The style is often syntactically and rhetorically contorted, with rare words and obscure expressions.

I.51 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 14–15

This hymn consists primarily of an elaborated list of Indra's great deeds, some well known (like the Vala myth in 3a, the Vr̥tra myth in 4, Indra's involvement with Uśanā Kāvya and Kutsa in the slaying of Śuṣṇa in verses 6a, 10–11) and others quite obscure. For example, Vimada, mentioned in 3ab, is usually a client of the Aśvins, who supply him with a wife (often using the same verb [√vah "convey"] as here: I.112.9, 116.1, 117.20; X.39.7, 65.12). Is the same deed attributed to Indra here and is the "good thing" that Indra brings him a reference to the wife? Similarly puzzling are the enemies who make oblation "on the shoulder" in verse 5 (perhaps indicating people following different ritual practices and not part of the Ārya community; see vss. 8–9), Indra's role as an ant destroying walls in verse 9, and his transformation into the female consort of an otherwise unknown figure in verse 13c.

The catalogue of deeds is interrupted by demands that Indra use his same martial powers for our benefit (vss. 7–9ab), and it is framed by an exhortation to the poets to give praise to the god (vs. 1) and the announcement of the end of the praise hymn and the boons we seek from it (vss. 14–15).

1. With your hymns exhilarate this ram, much-summoned Indra worthy of verses, the flood of good, for whom the human (generations) pass by like the days. Chant to the most liberal inspired one for our benefit.
2. His forms of help [=helpers] attained to the very superior one, who fills the midspace but is enclosed by his powers—the skillful R̥bhus (attained to) Indra, who was aroused to exhilaration. Liberality, impelling (him), mounted to him of a hundred resolves.
3. You opened up the cowpen for the Aṅgirases, and you were the way-finder for Atri in the (house) of a hundred doors.
   You also conveyed the good thing [=wife?] to Vimada along with grain (for the oblation?), when in the contest you set to dancing the stone of the one clad in it.
4. You opened up the covers of the waters; you held fast to the drop-laden goods in the mountain.
   When, o Indra, with your vast power you smashed the serpent Vr̥tra, just after that you made the sun rise in heaven to be seen.
5. With your wiles you blew away the wily ones, who, according to their own customs, poured (their offering) "on the shoulder."
   You broke through the strongholds of Pipru, o you of manly mind; you helped R̥jiśvan through in the smashing of Dasyus.
6. You helped Kutsa in the smashing of Śuṣṇa, and you made Śambara subject to Atithigva.
   With your foot you trampled down Arbuda, though he was great. Indeed, from long ago you were born to smash Dasyus.
7. In you every power has been placed toward the same end. Your generosity excites itself to drink the soma.

Your mace has become visible, placed in your arms: hew down the bullish strengths of your rival.

8. Distinguish between the Āryas and those who are Dasyus. Chastising those who follow no commandment, make them subject to the man who provides ritual grass.
   Become the potent inciter of the sacrificer. I take pleasure in all these (deeds) of yours at our joint revelries.
9. Indra—making those who reject his commandments subject to those who follow his commandments, piercing those who don't stand by him with (the aid of) those who do—being praised, as an ant he smashed apart the mud walls of the one trying to reach heaven, who, though already full grown, kept growing.
10. When Uśanā fashions might with might for you, then your vast power thrusts apart the two worlds with its greatness.
    The mind-yoked (horses) of the Wind conveyed you, being filled (with soma?), here to fame, o manly minded one.
11. When he has found exhilaration together with Uśanā Kāvya, Indra mounts the two (horses) that are surging and surging further.
    The strong one let loose the waters in a stream for coursing and propelled apart the fortified strongholds of Śuṣṇa.
12. You mount the chariot to the bullish drinks on which you become exhilarated at Śāryata's (ritual) presentation, so that you will take pleasure in (the ceremonies) with their pressed soma, o Indra. (Then) you ascend to the unassailing signal call in heaven.
13. You gave little Vr̥cayā to great, eloquent Kakṣīvant, the soma-presser, o Indra.
    You became the wife of Vr̥ṣaṇaśva, o you of good resolve. All these (deeds) of yours are to be proclaimed at the pressings.
14. Indra has become fixed in the exclusive possession of the man of good insight; the praise song (has been fixed) like a doorpost among the Pajras, as it seeks horses, cows, chariots, and goods. Indra alone is master of wealth and will provide it.
15. This homage has been pronounced for the bull, the independent king, the mighty one of real unbridled force.
    In this community might we, together with our patrons, be possessors of hale heroes under your protection, o Indra.

I.52 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 13, 15

This hymn begins in the same way as the previous one, by praising Indra in the form of a ram, but, unlike I.51 with its listing of Indra's great deeds, I.52 focuses almost entirely on the Vr̥tra myth and its aftermath—save for a brief reference to the Vala myth in verse 5 (and possibly verse 3). The account of the Vr̥tra battle begins in verse 2 and continues through verse 10, with a reiteration in the final verse 15, and thus constitutes one of the longer sustained R̥gvedic passages devoted to this myth. This account of the myth has not achieved the fame of a hymn like I.32, however—in part because of the obscurity of its diction and syntax.

This version also allots a large role to the helpers that encouraged and aided Indra at the battle, not only Tvaṣṭar (vs. 7) as often, but also the Maruts, identified as such in verses 9 and 15 (see also vs. 3), but also referred to as personified abstractions—"forms of help" (see vss. 2, 4–5, 9), "powers," et cetera. Almost paradoxically the hymn also depicts the fear of the divine beings and of heaven itself during the Vr̥tra battle (vss. 9–10). Moreover, the final verses (11–14, excluding the summarizing verse 15) concern the extent of Indra's unrivaled power, comparing its reach to the furthest expanses of heaven, earth, and the midspace.

1. I shall exalt this ram, who finds the sun, whose hundred (superior powers) of good essence arise together.
   (Might I turn) his chariot, rushing to the summons, like a steed (rushing to) the prize; with my well-twisted (hymns) might I turn Indra here for help.
2. Like a mountain, immovable on its foundations, Indra, with his thousand forms of help, grew strong amid his powers, when subduing the floods, highly excited by the soma stalk, he smashed Vr̥tra, who obstructed the rivers.
3. For he (was) a skulker among skulkers at the maw (of Vr̥tra?), but he, having a golden foundation, was strengthened to exhilaration at the (soma-)udder by the inspired thinkers [=Maruts?]—
   Indra—with my skillful work and insight I have summoned him whose gifts are most generous, for he is a provider because of the soma stalk.
4. Him whom they fill like the sea—his own superior powers of good essence which have the ritual grass as their seat in heaven—
   Indra—his forms of help [=helpers] stood by him at the Vr̥tra-smashing, as did his unextinguishable gusts whose breath is unobstructed.
5. In his exhilaration, while he was fighting, his forms of help rushed to him, who has his own proper work, like rapids in a torrent, when the mace-wielding Indra, emboldened by the soma stalk, split the barricades of the Vala cave, as Trita had.

6. Glowing heat encircles him [=Indra], and his vast power flared. He [=Vr̥tra], having obstructed the waters, was lying on the foundation of the dusky realm, when you, Indra, struck your thunder down upon the jaws of Vr̥tra, Hard-to-Grasp, in the (waters') torrent.
7. For like waves to a lake, the sacred formulations that make you strong rush down to you, o Indra.
   Tvaṣṭar also strengthened his own power, to be employed by you: he fashioned the mace of overwhelming might.
8. And when you, o Indra of concentrated resolve, together with your fallow bays, smashed Vr̥tra, making a way for the waters for Manu, you held the metal mace in your arms. You fixed the sun fast in heaven to be seen.
9. What is lofty, self-luminous, formidable, and praiseworthy [=Indra in form of sun]—in fear they made that their own means of ascent to heaven, when the forms of help appropriate to human prize-contests, (that is,) the Maruts, accompanying that superior man [=Indra], cheered on Indra, their sun.
10. Even formidable heaven kept retreating from the sound of this serpent and in fear at your mace, Indra, when, in the exhilaration of the pressed soma, with your vast power you split the head of Vr̥tra, who was pressing harder and harder upon the two world-halves.
11. Now, o Indra, just as far as the earth with its ten coils (extends) and the separate peoples will extend throughout all the days, just to there, o bounteous one, your widely famed strength will pervade heaven with vast power and mightiness.
12. O you of bold mind, at the far edge of this dusky realm and of distant heaven with the might natural to you you have made the earth the counterpart of your might for our help. Encompassing the waters and the sun, you go all the way to heaven.
13. You have become the counterpart of earth and you became the lord of high (heaven) containing lofty heroes.
    You filled the whole midspace with your greatness. This is certainly true: there is no other like you.
14. Whose expanse neither heaven nor earth reaches across—any more than the rivers reach the end of the dusky realm—nor (do they reach him) who performs his own proper work in his exhilaration while he is fighting. You alone have done everything else in due order.
15. There at this same contest the Maruts chanted and all the gods cheered you on, when with your deadly weapon covered with spikes, o Indra, you struck down against the mouth of Vr̥tra.

I.53 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
11 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10–11

This hymn is divided into two roughly equal halves. After an initial verse exhorting the singers to present their work to Indra at the sacrifice, lest a lazy performance or bad composition deprive them of his gifts, Indra is praised in verses 2–5 for his quick response in fulfilling the desires of his singers. The mood changes in the next five verses (6–10), which constitute a brisk catalogue of Indra's martial deeds in aid of his named human clients. This survey is somewhat reminiscent of the list of Indra's deeds in the first Savya hymn, I.51. The hymn ends with a summary verse (11), which returns to the hortatory style of verse 1.

1. Let us bring forward our speech for the great one, our songs for Indra, at the seat of Vivasvant, for never has anyone found a treasure among those who are, as it were, asleep. A poor praise hymn is not acclaimed among the givers of wealth.
2. O Indra, you are the one who breaks out the horse, breaks out the cow, breaks out the grain, since you are the forceful lord of (every) good thing.
   He who from of old does his best for men, who does not short their desires, a comrade to his comrades—to him we now sing.
3. O able Indra, most brilliant doer of many (deeds)—just yours is the good that keeps appearing all around.
   Therefore, o overpowering one, having grasped it entirely, bring it here. Don't leave lacking the desire of the singer who seeks you.
4. He is well disposed through these days by reason of these soma drops, checking neglect by means of cows and (wealth) in horses.
   Might we, breaking up the Dasyu with Indra and the soma drops, keeping hostility away, be embraced by refreshment.
5. O Indra, might we be embraced by wealth, by nourishment, and by much-glittering prizes bound for heaven.
   Might we be embraced by your divine solicitude, having the unbridled force of heroes, with cows at the front, accompanied by horses.
6. These exhilarating drinks exhilarated you and your bullish powers—these soma juices at the smashing of obstacles, o lord of settlements, when you laid low ten unopposable obstacles for the bard, a thousand for the man who spreads the ritual grass.
7. Battle after battle you join boldly; fortress after fortress do you now smash together with your power, since, with Namī as your comrade, o Indra, in the far distance you laid low the wily one, Namuci by name.
8. You struck Karañja and Parṇaya with the sharpest wheel-edge of Atithigva.

You, unyielding, split the hundred fortresses of Vaṅgr̥da that were besieged by R̥jiśvan.

9. You, together with Suśravas with no (other) adherents, (wrenched down) those twice ten kings of the peoples, who had come too close; you, the famous, wrenched down the sixty thousand ninety-nine with a chariot wheel and a lame (horse).
10. You helped Suśravas with your means of help and Tūrvayāṇa with your means of rescue, o Indra. You made Kutsa, Atithigva, and Āyu subject to him, to the great young king.
11. We who, when the chant is raised, will be your most friendly comrades, Indra, having the gods as our herdsmen— let us praise you—we having good heroes because of you and receiving a longer, more extensive lifetime.

I.54 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
11 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 6, 8, 9, 11

Etymological figures and lexical repetitions abound in this hymn, and through this repetition Indra comes to "own" certain words—particularly "daring" and "sovereignty." Much of the hymn (esp. vss. 1–6) consists of praise of Indra's various violent deeds, interspersed with exhortations to sing these praises to the god. In verse 7 the earthly king is invested with some of Indra's prestige—as long as he emulates Indra's habit of command and also shows the Indraic quality of generosity to the poets. This generosity is also urged on Indra himself in verses 8–9 and 11, with a curious and obscurely phrased treatment of the Vr̥tra myth interspersed in verse 10.

1. Do not (leave) us in this distress in our battles, o bounteous one, for the end of your vast power cannot be reached. You made the rivers roar, yourself constantly bellowing through the woods. How have the war cries [/Heaven and Earth] not clashed together in fear?
2. Chant to the able one, the capable one with his abilities. Exalting him, praise Indra as he listens— he who, a bullish bull by his bullish nature, with his daring power bears down on the two world-halves.
3. Chant a thunderous speech to lofty heaven. Of which daring one his daring mind has its own sovereignty— the lord possessing lofty fame through his lofty might, the bull [=Indra] has been put in front for his two fallow bays, for he is the chariot.

4. You shook the back of the lofty heaven; by yourself, in your daring, you cut down Śambara, as, daringly, by reason of the exhilarating (soma), you battle the sharpened stone, the fist, of the wily one grown weak,
5. As you yank down on the head of the snorting Śuṣṇa also grown weak, yourself constantly bellowing through the woods, with your mind facing forward and possessed of lofty might. If you will also do (such) today, who (will evade) you?
6. You helped the manly Turvaśa and Yadu; you (helped) Turvīti and Vayya, o you of a hundred resolves;
   you (helped) Etaśa and his chariot when the stake was to be decided, and you subjugated the ninety-nine fortifications.
7. As king and lord of the settlements, that man will grow in strength who, having bestowed his oblation, advances (Indra's) command in turn, or who greets the (poets') hymns with generosity. For him the gift [/drop] of heaven swells here below.
8. Unequalled is his sovereignty, unequalled his inspired thinking. Let the soma-drinkers of our group be preeminent through their labor—they who strengthen the great sovereignty, steadfast and bull-strong, of you who give, o Indra.
9. For you alone are these ample beakers, milked by stones and resting in cups—the draughts of Indra.
   Attain (them), satisfy your desire for them, and then put your mind to giving goods.
10. There stood darkness, whose tangles were the foundation for the waters, a mountain within the belly of Vr̥tra.
    Indra smashes all the rows (of palings) set up in succession among the torrents by the encloser of the rivers.
11. Establish in us brilliance increasing in benevolence and your great and mighty sovereignty, o Indra, as vanquisher of the peoples.
    Guard those generous to us and protect our patrons. Destine us for wealth and for nourishment bringing good descendants.

I.55 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
8 verses: jagatī

The hymn has a weak omphalos shape, with the paired middle verses 4 and 5 contrasting Indra's central role in peace (4) and war (5), in parallel syntactic constructions. The hymn begins by describing Indra's vast size and fierce power (vss. 1–3) and ends with an appeal to him to come to our sacrifice bearing gifts (vss. 7–8). Despite the emphasis in the hymn on Indra's martial powers and contrary to Savya's usual practice, no particular heroic deeds are recounted or even mentioned directly; there is simply one indirect allusion to the Vṛtra myth in the final pāda of verse 6, which serves as the transition between the omphalos verses and the final requests.

1. His expansion spreads out even beyond heaven; not even the earth is the counterpart to Indra in greatness.
   Fearsome and mighty, a scorching firebrand for the settled domains, he hones his mace, like a buffalo (its horn), to be piercingly sharp.
2. As the sea's flood receives the rivers, he receives the sprawling (soma-streams?) with his expanses.
   Indra acts the bull to drink the soma. From of old he seeks admiration as a battler by his power.
3. In order to enjoy it [=soma] like a mountain, you are in control of the principles of great manliness.
   Among the gods he shows ever more brightly by his heroism—the powerful one placed in front for every deed.
4. It's just he who displays his eloquence in the woods along with those offering homage, when he proclaims his own dear Indrian (name) among the peoples.
   The bull becomes pleasing, the bull delightful, when, as bounteous one, he impels the nourishing stream (of speech) in peace.
5. It's just he who by his greatness makes great clashes for the peoples, a battler by his power.
   Then indeed they place their trust in turbulent Indra, as he smashes down his mace, his deadly weapon, again and again—
6. For it's he, seeking fame, who's destroying the artfully made seats (of the enemy) across the earth, as he grows strong in power, and is making lights free of wolves [=safe] for the worshipful man. The very resolute one released the waters to flow.
7. Let your mind be on giving, o soma-drinker. Hearing our tributes, make your fallow bays turn this way.
   These fervent intentions, which are your coachmen, best at guiding, do not deceive you, o Indra.
8. You bear inexhaustible goods in your hands. The famed one takes undominatable dominance into his body.
   Like wells covered over by their makers are the many resolves within your body, o Indra.

I.56 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
6 verses: jagatī

Though characterized by rare words and tortuous expressions, both defying easy interpretation, the hymn follows a fairly straightforward trajectory. The ability of soma to strengthen Indra for his great feats is described in the first two verses, which also depict Indra's journey to our sacrifice. His power in general is the subject of the next two verses (3–4), while the last two (5–6) focus on the slaying of Vr̥tra and its cosmogonic effects.

1. This one has raised forth for himself the many dippers of this *well (of soma), as a stallion, all aquiver, raises himself up to [=mounts] a young mare.
   For the great (deed?) he gives himself golden skill [=soma] to drink, having turned his ingenious chariot here, hitched with his fallow bays.
2. Our greetings in profusion, seeking his leadership, (go) seeking to win him, like (rivers) in their converging on the sea.
   With your sharpness, (o Soma,) ascend to the lord of skill, (who is) now the power of ritual distribution, as trackers ascend a mountain.
3. He is surpassing and great in masculine strength, (even) without raising dust. Like the peak of a mountain his power glints with its thrusting,
   (the power) with which his headstrong metal (weapon), in his exhilaration and among those standing by him, brought wily Śuṣṇa down to rest in fetters.
4. If his divine might, strong through you [=poet], accompanies Indra to help (him), as the sun accompanies the dawn, (then) he, who by his daring power repels the darkness, raises the dust aloft with a cry of hurrah!
5. When you spread out the immovable foundation [=earth], you set the airy realm on the doorposts of heaven with your lofty power.
   When, o Indra, in (the contest) with the sun as its prize, ecstatic in your exhilaration with the excitement (of soma), you smashed Vr̥tra, (then) you forced out the flood of waters.
6. You set the foundation of heaven and of earth upon their seats with your power as the great one, o Indra.
   You made the waters flow in the exhilaration of the pressed soma; you broke apart all at once the two jaws of Vr̥tra.

I.57 Indra

Savya Āṅgirasa
6 verses: jagatī

This final hymn of the Savya group turns its attention from the recounting of Indra's great (and lesser) deeds to focus on the ritual performance being offered to honor the god (vss. 1–3) and on the participants in that performance: "we" who are "yours," that is, Indra's (vss. 4–5). Only in the final verse (6) is there mention of any of Indra's exploits, with an oblique reference to the Vr̥tra myth that is featured heavily in other Savya hymns.

One of the puzzles of the hymn is the identity of the female addressee in verse 3, "(you,) lovely like Dawn." Oldenberg (tentatively), Geldner, and Renou all suggest that she is the Sacrificer's Wife, but this is quite unlikely. As I have argued elsewhere (Jamison 2011, forthcoming a, forthcoming b), this ritual participant is only being introduced in the late R̥gveda and she is a controversial and polarizing figure there, so it is improbable that she would be addressed without fanfare here. Moreover, the addressee is called upon to bring or assemble material for the sacrifice, a role that the Sacrificer's Wife never has in classical śrauta ritual (see Jamison 1996a passim).

1. For the most bounteous one, the lofty one bringing lofty wealth, for the mighty one of real unbridled force I bring forth my thought—for him whose generosity is difficult to restrain as if in a torrent of waters, lifelong generosity opened up to his power.
2. Then will everything be at hand for you to seek it: the soma-pressings of the man who offers oblation (flow) like waters to the depths, when the gladdening golden mace of Indra has been whetted, as if on a mountain, to be the piercer.
3. For him the fearsome, much to be admired, assemble with homage (everything) here at the rite, o (you,) lovely like Dawn—
   (for him) whose Indrian name has been made a light, a foundation for fame, like tawny mares for coursing.
4. Here we are—those of yours, o much-praised Indra, who carry on, having seized hold of you, o you providing outstanding goods, for none other than you bears up to our songs, o you who long for songs. Gladly receive this speech of ours like war-cries.
5. Abundant is your heroism, o Indra. We are yours: fulfill the desire of this singer, o bounteous one.
   Lofty heaven measures itself against your heroism, and this earth bends to your power.
6. You, Indra, cut that great, wide mountain apart joint by joint with your mace, o mace-wielder.
   You released the confined waters to flow. You acquired all strength exclusively and entirely.

The next seven hymns (I.58–64) are attributed to Nodhas Gautama. His Indra hymns (I.61–63) are especially notable for their verbal agility.

I.58 Agni

Nodhas Gautama
9 verses: jagatī 1–5, triṣṭubh 6–9

Although Nodhas Gautama's poetic intricacy is not as much on display in his Agni hymns as in his Indra hymns, he excels here in his vivid and dense depiction of physical fire, especially the forest fire. In the jagatī portion of the hymn, verses concerning ritual fire (1, 3) alternate with evocations of the unchecked passage of fire in the woods (2, 4–5), while the final four verses (6–9), in triṣṭubh, are only about the ritual fire. The ritual verses focus on the choosing and installation of Agni as Hotar (vss. 1, 3, 6–7), especially in its first enactment by the gods and the human ancestors (see esp. vss. 3, 6).

The counterpoint between wild uncontrollable fire and ritual fire may subtly emphasize what a feat of civilizing was accomplished by taming fire for sacrificial (and domestic) purposes in the legendary past, and how this feat is repeated in the present day. The last two verses (8–9) beg Agni for shelter and protection for us, the singers. Again, the image of a guardian fire may acquire special intensity by contrast with the potentially destructive fire in the wild.

1. Never is the immortal one, born of strength, forced down. When he became Hotar, messenger of Vivasvant, he measured across the airy realm along the paths that lead straightest to the goal. In service to the gods he entices them here with the oblation.
2. The unaging one, drawing his own food toward him, thirstily eager to eat, keeps to the thickets.
   His back when he is sprinkled shines like a steed; thundering like the spine of heaven, he has roared.
3. He was placed in front successfully by the Rudras and the Vasus, set down as Hotar, the immortal who conquers wealth, like a chariot steering straight among the clans descended from Āyu. The god discloses valuables in due order.
4. Sped by the wind, he spreads himself out among the thickets at will, with his tongues as sickle, powerfully noisy.
   When, Agni, thirstily you rush like a bull upon the woods, black is your course, o unaging one with gleaming waves.
5. With scorching fangs, spurred by the wind he gusts down upon the wood, like a victorious buffalo upon the herd, advancing upon the imperishable airy realm in his full dimension. The still and the moving fear, and also the winged ones.

6. The Bhr̥gus installed you among the sons of Manu, dear like wealth, easy to invoke for the peoples, as Hotar, o Agni, a guest worthy to be chosen, favorable like an ally to the divine race.
7. Whom the seven tongues, whom the cantors choose as Hotar, best sacrificing at the ceremonies, to Agni, the nave of all goods, I render service with a pleasurable offering. I beg for a treasure.
8. O son of strength with the might of Mitra, today hold out unbroken shelters to us, your praisers.
   O Agni, child of nourishment, deliver the singer from narrow straits, with your metal strongholds.
9. Become a defense for the singer, o radiant one. Become shelter for bounteous ones, o bounteous one.
   Deliver the singer from narrow straits, Agni. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, bringing goods through (his) insight.

I.59 (Agni) Vaiśvānara

Nodhas Gautama
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Agni in his aspect as Vaiśvānara ("belonging to all men") is the dedicand of this hymn, and the epithet Vaiśvānara occurs once in every verse. The universality of Agni is emphasized throughout. The first and last verses have contrastive víśva ("all") expressions: "all the immortals" in 1b contrasting with "belonging to all (human) communities" in 7a. The first two verses situate him as cosmically central, between gods and men and heaven and earth, while in verse 3 he is the center that attracts everything else within him. A different kind of universality is asserted in verses 5–6, where the signature deeds of Indra are attributed to Agni and he is called by Indra's standard epithet, "Vr̥tra-smasher." This rhetorical ploy makes him the equivalent of the most powerful of the gods, hence in some sense the embodiment of divinity itself.

The hymn also shows an omphalos structure. The outer ring (vss. 1 and 7) noted above, as well as an inner ring defined by the identification of Agni as king (vss. 3 and 5), point to the middle verse 4 as omphalos. And in a hymn of reasonably straightforward syntax and imagery, verse 4 does stand out for its relative obscurity. Why this verse should be freighted with the message of the hymn is not entirely clear, but it brings together the cosmic (the two world-halves) with the human, in the form of the sacrifice, where the Hotar offers hymns to Agni, who himself regularly serves as Hotar (see, e.g., the preceding hymn I.58). Thus the centrality of Agni for both the cosmos and the mundane world is affirmed in this, the central verse of the hymn, as is the interpenetration of Agni's twofold nature as an element of the cosmos (the son of Heaven and Earth, possessed of the sun) and as a participating member of human society (the Hotar, recipient of hymns).

It is worthy of note that, in contrast to the last hymn (I.58) with its graphic depiction of actual fire, this hymn contains almost no mention of Agni's physical qualities.

1. The other fires are just twigs of you, Agni. In you do all the immortals bring themselves to euphoria.
   Vaiśvānara, you are the navel of the settlements. Like a pillar, as prop you hold the peoples fast.
2. The head of heaven, the navel of the earth is Agni. And he became the spoked wheel of the two world-halves.
   You did the gods beget as god, Vaiśvānara, as light just for the Ārya (people).
3. Like the rays (placed) firm in the sun, in Vaiśvānara, in Agni have goods been placed—those that are in the mountains, in the plants, in the waters, that are among men—of (all) this you are king.
4. Like the two lofty world-halves for their son [=Agni], like Manu's skill, the human Hotar (brings) hymns—many (hymns), (like) exuberant maidens—for him possessed of the sun, him whose bluster is real, for the most manly Vaiśvānara.
5. Even beyond lofty heaven does your greatness project, o Jātavedas Vaiśvānara.
   You are king of the communities belonging to the sons of Manu. Through combat you made a wide realm for the gods.
6. I now proclaim the greatness of the bull, whom the Pūrus attend upon as Vṛtra-smasher.
   Vaiśvānara, Agni, having smashed the Dasyu, shook the wooden barriers, cut down Śambara.
7. Vaiśvānara, belonging to all communities by his greatness, worthy of the sacrifice among the Bharadvājas, far-radiant, Agni, displaying liberality, at the (place of) Śātavaneya of many stratagems, is awakened with hundredfold (riches).

I.60 Agni

Nodhas Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Two double aspects of Agni, touched on in the two previous Agni hymns by Nodhas Gautama, are united in this brief hymn. On the one hand, Agni's primal installation in the sacrifice by the ancestors of humankind is contrasted with his regular re-installation by the current sacrificers (see esp. vs. 2ab, but also throughout). In fact, the original theft of fire from heaven by Mātariśvan, who bestowed it on the legendary Bhr̥gu, ends the first verse. In several places (2c, 3d, 4b, 4d) it is not possible to determine from the verb form whether the poet is referring to the distant and legendary past or the recent past of the current ritual, though unfortunately English imposes the choice. The aorist forms in question often refer to the immediate past, and so we have translated them ("has been set down," etc.), but an unmarked past ("was set down," etc.) is far from excluded. It is quite likely that the poet wished to leave the question open.

The other double aspect treated is Agni's dual role in the sacrifice: he both acts as priest and is the object of ritual activity by human priests. See especially verse 2b, where the Uśij ("fire-priests") present oblations to him, and 4a, where Agni is identified as an Uśij (as well as a Hotar, in 4b).

1. Glorious conveyor and beacon of the rite, pursuing (his ritual duties) well, the messenger who immediately (reaches) his goal, of double birth, celebrated like wealth—Mātariśvan brought him as a gift to Bhr̥gu.
2. His command do both sides follow in presenting their oblations: his (ancient) fire-priests and mortals (now).
   He has been set down as Hotar even in front of heaven, as clan-lord worthy of the asking, the ritual adept among the clans.
3. Ever newer acclaim from us, from our heart, should reach him as he is being born, the honey-tongued one, whom the sons of Manu who sacrifice regularly in ritual community, who dispense ritual delight, the Āyus, have begotten.
4. Himself a fire-priest, pure and good, he has been installed among the clans of the sons of Manu as the Hotar worthy to be chosen.
   As domestic ally, house-lord in the home, Agni has became wealth-lord of wealth.
5. It is you, Agni, that we Gotamas celebrate with our thoughts as lord of wealth, grooming you like a swift, prize-bearing (horse). – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, bringing goods through (his) insight.

I.61 Indra

Nodhas Gautama
16 verses: triṣṭubh

The three Indra hymns by Nodhas share a ritual context: judging from their last verses (I.61.16, 62.13, 63.9) they were all composed to accompany the Hāriyojana ("Fallow-bay-yoking") oblation, when Indra's pair of horses is yoked up for the god's return journey to heaven after the sacrifice is complete. The parts of these hymns before the final verse do not seem to reflect this ritual moment, and the three hymns are quite different, though they all display Nodhas's remarkable poetic skill.

This first hymn, I.61, is a masterpiece of intricate structure and verbal trickery. We will summarize the main points here, but for more detailed treatment see the lengthy discussion in Jamison (2007: 60–68). The most obvious structural device is the fronted repetition of a deictic pronoun: each of the sixteen verses except the last (which is an extra-hymnic summary verse) begins with either the dative asmaí "for him" or the genitive asyá "of him," followed by two emphasizing particles, always referring to Indra (except in vs. 12—see below). The dative sequence is the more common and frames the hymn (vss. 1–6, 8, 12, 15); the genitive sequence is found primarily in the center of the hymn (vss. 7, 9–11, 13–14).

This rigid structural device both parallels and counterpoints the semantic structure of the hymn. In general in this hymn the dative verses express the ritual here-and-now, with the production and presentation of hymns and ritual offerings "to/for just this one," while the genitive verses concern Indra's great deeds. Especially in the dative verses numerous co-referential adjectival datives reinforce the fronted pronoun, as well as strategically placed dative tokens of the god's name. Curiously, in the genitive verses the genitive several times (vss. 7, 10, 11) seems to have quite a loose syntactic connection to the rest of the sentence, and Indra may appear in another case in the same verse, as in

> I.61.10ab asyéd evá śávasā śuṣántaṃ, ví vṛścad vájreṇa vṛtrám índraḥ
> Of just this one [gen.]—in (his) expansion Indra [nom.] hewed apart snorting Vṛtra with his mace.

But what may appear superficially to be clumsy composition serves a larger structural purpose: it seems that the logical structure of the hymn requires a two-way opposition, between dative asmaí and something else: the something else is genitive asyá even when a different case form might have been more appropriate, for a variety of other cases would have obscured the bipartite contrastive structure of the hymn. Here we see an example of clausal morphosyntax subordinated to and indeed distorted by the imposition of a larger literary and rhetorical pattern.

The poet Nodhas also lays a few traps for us by playing on the expectations he has created. Most notable of them is verse 12, which begins with the dative asmaí and therefore appears to return us from the mythological past to the realm of the current-day poet of verses 1–5, an expectation reinforced by the verb prá bharā, a standard lexeme for presenting a hymn to a divinity. But the phrase in verse 12 quickly goes awry. At the opening of the next pāda, where Indra's name has been prominently placed in previous verses (índrāya 1d, 4d, 5b, 8b), we find, most shockingly, the name of his arch-enemy, vṛtrā́ya, immediately followed by the accusative object vájram, Indra's weapon, not the word for hymn we were expecting. The poet has simply tricked us, having laid a trap with conventional phraseology and syntax and with the stylistic patterns established earlier in the hymn. He also skillfully exploits the morphological ambiguity of the verb form bharā: given the pattern set in verses 1–5 we are primed to interpret bharā as a 1st sg. subjunctive ("I shall present"), but as the half verse unfolds, it becomes clear that bharā must rather be taken as a metrically lengthened 2nd singular imperative ("bear down!").

The meter of this hymn is often irregular, with a number of ten-syllable lines, but again this irregularity should not be taken as a sign of poor poetic technique. Rather the hymn seems to be phrase-driven rather than meter-driven, and the metrical rests that result from "missing syllables" serve to isolate and emphasize crucial nominal phrases—an effect also heightened by the copious examples of alliteration.

With all the poetic fireworks on display the actual contents of the hymn may seem almost beside the point, but we will provide a brief sketch. The first five verses ("dative verses") are variations on a theme: the poet's verbal offerings to Indra. The sixth verse, also a dative verse, modulates to the distant past and the god Tvaṣṭar's gift of the newly fashioned mace to Indra. Verse 7 combines two rare Indra myths: his appropriation of his father's soma right after his birth and the Emuṣa myth, in which the god Viṣṇu steals a mess of rice porridge while Indra shoots the boar Emuṣa. (For further on this myth, see Introduction, p. 40.) Verses 8–12 treat the Vṛtra myth for the most part, though with some detours. Verses 13–15 generalize the praise of Indra's deeds and bring it back to the present time and to the present poet, Nodhas, who names himself in verse 14, while the final verse, 16, summarizes the hymn that precedes and names the ritual application, the "Fallow-bay-yoking" oblation.

It is difficult to do justice to this tour de force of poetic craft, and many of its finest effects have not been discussed here. It is, unfortunately, even more difficult to do justice to it in English translation.

1. Just for this one, powerful, precipitous, mighty, do I bring forward praise like a pleasurable offering—for the one equal to song, not poor, (do I bring) a laud—for Indra (I bring) sacred formulations best bestowed.
2. Just to this one I have held it out like a pleasurable offering. I bring out a song; I thrust it out with a good twist to Indra, with heart, with mind, with inspired thought. For the primordial lord the insights groom themselves.
3. Just to this one this utmost sun-winning song do I bring with my mouth, to strengthen the most munificent patron with the invitations of my thoughts, with their good twists.

4. Just for this one I put together praise—like a carpenter a chariot for the one whose gear it is—and hymns with a good twist for the one whose vehicle is hymns—for wise Indra (praise) that sets everything in motion.
5. Just for this one, for Indra, do I anoint the chant with my tongue [/the offering ladle], as one anoints a team when seeking fame—to extol the hero accustomed to giving [/gifts], the splitter of strongholds whose fame is sung.
6. Just for this one Tvaṣṭar fashioned the mace of best workmanship, the reverberating one, for battle [/for joy], with which he found the mortal spot of that very Vr̥tra, as, gaining mastery, he thrust with the thrusting (mace), while conferring (who knows) how much.
7. Just this one—he, having already drunk in an instant the nourishment of his great (father), the pleasing foods at his mother's soma-pressings—while Viṣṇu the stronger stole the cooked (rice-porridge), he pierced the boar through the stone, (Indra) the archer.
8. Just for this one, for Indra, even the ladies, the Wives of the Gods, wove a chant at the Vr̥tra-smashing.
   He held encircled broad heaven and earth; they did not encompass his greatness.
9. Just this one—his greatness projected beyond heaven and earth, beyond the midspace.
   Sovereign king, Indra, sung by all in the house, a reverberant tankard, waxed strong for battle [/for joy].
10. Just this one—with his swelling strength Indra hewed apart snorting Vr̥tra with his mace.
    The streams, pent up like cows, he released toward fame, of one mind (with them), for giving.
11. Just this one—the rivers with their glittering came to rest when he held them encircled with his mace.
    Performing the master's part, showing favor to the pious man, the victorious one made a ford for Turvīti.
12. Toward just this one, toward Vr̥tra, bear down the mace, thrusting, gaining mastery, conferring (who knows) how much.
    Scrape through him crosswise as if through the joints of a cow, dispatching the floods of waters to wander.
13. Of just this one, the precipitous—proclaim his former deeds anew with solemn words, when, propelling his own weapons to battle, showing his mettle, he dissolves his rivals.

14. Just this one—in fear of his birth both the firmly fixed mountains and heaven and earth thrust against each.
    Constantly calling upon him [=Indra], who is a (protective) arm for the seeker, in an instant Nodhas [=the poet] will be (there) for his [=Indra's] (next?) manly deed.
15. Just to this one has this (soma-drinking?) been conceded by them [=gods], since he alone won (it?), becoming master of much.
    Indra aided Etaśa, who was contending for the sun; he will aid the soma-presser contending for good horses.
16. Thus have the Gotamas made you sacred formulations for the "Fallow-bay-yoking" (oblation), with a good twist, o Indra.
    Do you confer on them an insight with all its ornaments. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come bringing goods through his insight.

I.62 Indra

Nodhas Gautama
13 verses: triṣṭubh

The poetic ingenuity of Nodhas is also on display in this hymn, though in somewhat different ways from his tricks in I.61. The hymn is full of phonetic play and alliteration, with numerous somewhat aberrant morphological forms generated for this play. Repetition and variation on this repetition are also conspicuous—for example, the word sanā́t ("from of old") opening 8a, 10a, 12a, with teasingly close forms (sánemi 9a, sánīḍā 10a) alternating with it.

The hymn falls into two main sections. The first five verses are the more conventional—if poetically rich—part, treating the Vala myth and especially the role of the Aṅgirases in it. (Interestingly, the Vala myth is absent from I.61.) The first half of verse 6 seems to summarize this deed of Indra's extravagantly: "This is his most conspicuous deed, the dearest wonder of the wondrous one." But Nodhas tricks us here, for the second half of the verse concerns an entirely different and much more obscure deed of Indra's, the swelling of the four, probably celestial, rivers. From 6cd through verse 10 we meet fleetingly recounted fragments of other myths, but these myths seem connected at a structural level, since they involve female figures in pairs or groups working reciprocally or jointly: the rivers of 6cd, the two world-halves of 7 (compared to twin consorts), Night and Dawn (compared to young girls) in 8, black and red cows in 9, and streams again in 10, apparently returning to the rivers of 6cd. In the second half of 10 we encounter a surfeit of females: two words for wives (jáni and pátnī) as well as sisters, all offering friendship to Indra. These females may refer to the streams of the first half of the verse, or to the thoughts converging on Indra in the next verse (11), which are also compared to wives. Most likely the reference in 10cd is double, providing a transition from the cosmic mythological realm in verses 6–10 to the ritual here-and-now of verses 11–13. The hymn ends, like I.61, with a verse (13) specifically applicable to the "Fallow-bay-yoking" oblation, and like I.61 (vss. 14 and 16) mentions both the poet Nodhas and his clan, the Gotamas.

1. We think up a fortifying song for the forceful one who longs for hymns, just as the Aṅgirases did.
   A chant with the good twists of a praiser we chant to the one worthy of chant, to the widely famed superior man.
2. Present your great reverence to the great one, a songful melody to the forceful one, with which our forefathers, the Aṅgirases, knowing the track [/word], chanting, found the cows.
3. At the desire of Indra and the Aṅgirases, Saramā found the wellspring for posterity.
   Bṛhaspati: he split the rock; he found the cows. The superior men bellowed together with the ruddy (cows).
4. He with (his flock) of good rhythm, he with rhythm, with the seven inspired poets, with the Navagvas, he, the resounding one, with sound (split) the rock.
   With the hastening ones, o able Indra, you cleft the bolt, with a roar you cleft Vala with the Daśagvas.
5. Being hymned by the Aṅgirases, o wondrous one, you uncovered the blinding darkness [/soma stalk] along with the dawn, with the sun, with the cows.
   You spread out the back of the earth, Indra; you propped up the nearer realm of heaven.
6. This is his most conspicuous deed, the dearest wonder of the wondrous one, that he made the four nearer (celestial?) rivers with their honeyed floods swell in their eddying.
7. Another time, with his chants that were being sung, the irrepressible one uncovered the age-old pair belonging to the same nest [=the two worlds].
   As Bhaga [/a (good) portion] (supports) his two consorts, he of very wondrous power supported the two world-halves in farthest heaven.
8. From of old the two young girls of distinct forms, (ever) regenerating, (go) around heaven and earth along their own courses—
   Night with her black, Dawn with her gleaming white shapes progress one after the other.
9. Possessing very wondrous power, doing good work, the son with his strength supported the partnership to its full extent.
   You placed the "cooked" (milk) even within the "raw" (cows), the gleaming white milk in the black and in the red (cows).

10. From of old the streams coming from the same nest, unquenchable and immortal, guard their commandments with their powers.
    For many thousands (of aeons?), like lady wives, the sisters [=streams? thoughts?] offer friendship to the unabashed one.
11. The age-old thoughts, with reverence, with chants, seeking goods, have run anew (to you), wondrous one.
    Like eager wives their eager husband, the inspired thoughts caress you, you strong one.
12. Though (originating) from of old, the riches in your hand do not become exhausted, nor do they give out, wondrous one.
    You are brilliant, Indra, you are resolute and insightful. Do your best for us with your abilities, able one.
13. For the age-old "Fallow-bay-yoking" (oblation) Gotama has fashioned a newer sacred formulation, Indra—Nodhas (has fashioned it) for us for good guidance, o forceful one. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, bringing goods through his insight.

I.63 Indra

Nodhas Gautama
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The fondness of Nodhas for initial repetition is on display in this hymn, where almost every verse begins with t(u)vám "you," with a distracted vocative ind(a)ra positioned after an early caesura. The hymn lacks the verbal intricacy of the last two (I.61–62), though it is full of philological problems.

The tone of the hymn also differs from the two previous ones: it is far more martial and concerned with Indra's fearsome power. His aggressive power, even just after birth, is highlighted in verse 1, and the following verses quickly allude to the destruction of various foes, usually for the benefit of one of his clients (e.g., Kutsa, vs. 3) or for mortals in general. Like the last two hymns, this one ends with a summary verse applicable to the "Fallow-bay-yoking" oblation.

1. You are great, Indra, you who, on just being born, with your tempests put heaven and earth in (the path of your) onslaught, so that all the vast masses, even the mountains, though firmly fixed, stirred like dust-motes in fear of you.
2. When, Indra, you pursued hither your two fallow bays who follow separate commandments, the singer placed the mace in your two arms, with which, o you whose resolve is not to be deflected, you dispatch the foes and their many strongholds, o much invoked one.

3. You are trusty, Indra, and bold against them. You are master of the Ṛbhus, favorable to men; you are victorious.
   You smashed Śuṣṇa in his (war-)band, when strengthening nourishment and the axle-pin (were at stake), for the young, heaven-bright Kutsa, in partnership.
4. You then, Indra, as partner provided the spur, when you knotted up Vṛtra, you mace-bearer of bullish deeds, when, you champion of bullish mind, you cut apart the Dasyus in their womb far away, as one who is victorious at will.
5. You then, Indra, intending no harm to mortals, in your displeasure (you opened up the doors) even of the stronghold, opened the barriers for the steed (that comes) from us. As if with a deadly weapon, mace-bearer, pierce the foes.
6. On you then, Indra, the superior men call, at the winning of the flood, in the contest whose prize is the sun.
   This help of yours here in the clash when prizes (are at stake), o autonomous one, has become something unshakeable.
7. You then, mace-bearing Indra, attacking, split seven fortifications for Purukutsa, one after the other.
   When at will you twisted them like ritual grass for Sudās, o king, from narrowness you made wide space for Pūru.
8. You, god Indra, will make this bright refreshment swell for us as waters do in their circling, the refreshment with which, o champion, you will extend yourself toward us like nourishment to flow everywhere.
9. (This hymn) has been made for you, Indra, by the Gotamas; sacred formulations have been spoken with reverence to your two fallow bay horses.
   Bring a well-ornamented prize here to us. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, bringing goods through his insight.

I.64 Maruts

Nodhas Gautama
14 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15

Exuberant in language and crammed with vivid description, this hymn treats the usual Marut themes. The poet begins by exhorting himself to produce a worthy and well-crafted hymn for these gods (vs. 1), and proceeds to do just that. Verses 2–4 describe the Maruts' birth and beauty, while verses 5–8 turn to their role in the thunderstorm, with comparisons to various wild animals found in verses 7–8. Verse 9 is a pun on the word ródasī, which in the first half of the verse is in the dual number and refers to the two world-halves, while in the second half it must refer to the goddess Rodasī (usually differently accented rodasī́), the regular consort of the Maruts. (For the same pun, see I.167.4, also in a Marut hymn.) Further description of their boisterous behavior occupies verses 10–11.

In verse 12 the poet returns to the beginning, by referring to the hymn "we" are offering to the Maruts. Reestablishing the relationship between the mortal worshipers and the Maruts allows him to make the transition to the boons we ask of them. After providing a model of the fortunate man who receives the Maruts' aid in verse 13, the poet calls on the gods to grant good things to the patrons and the worshipers in general (vss. 14–15).

1. To the bullish troop, good battlers and ritual adepts, present a well-turned (hymn), o Nodhas—to the Maruts.
   As one clever in mind and with dexterous hands ornaments his work,
   I ornament the hymns standing ready at the rites.
2. They were born as the lofty bulls of heaven, the young bloods of Rudra, lordly, unblemished, pure white, blazing like suns, like consummate warriors with their drops as banners, of frightful form.
3. The young unaging Rudras, who smite the miser though themselves not poor, have grown strong like mountains.
   All earthly creations, even the firm ones, do they stir up, and the heavenly ones as well, by their might.
4. With bright unguents they anoint themselves for wonder; on their breasts they arrange brilliants for beauty.
   On their shoulders spears have rubbed. They were born all at once by their own power, the men of heaven.
5. Performing the master's part, the boisterous ones who care for the stranger have produced winds and lightning flashes with their powers.
   The shakers milk the udder for heavenly (goods [=rain]). Swirling they swell the earth with milk.
6. The Maruts of good drops swell the waters, the ghee-rich milk, as they stand ready at the rites.
   They lead (their horse) out to piss like a prize-seeking steed. They milk the thundering, imperishable well-spring.
7. Buffalos, masters of artifice, of bright radiance, self-powerful like mountains yet quick streaming, like wild elephants you chew up the woods, when you have yoked your own powers to those of your ruddy (horses).
8. Like lions the discerning ones keep roaring, beautifully marked like mottled (deer), granting all possessions.
   Animating the nights, urgently they (join) together with their dappled (mares), with their spears—those who have a snake's fury in their strength.

9. Salute the two world-halves [=ródasī], you who are splendor in a flock, who accompany the superior man [=Indra], champions with a snake's fury in your strength.
   She [=Rodasī], like lightning lovely to look at, has mounted your chariot like the ensign on chariot boxes, o Maruts.
10. Granting all possessions, at home with riches, linked with powers, copious, the archers have taken their arrows in their fists, the superior men of endless tempests and bullish bangles.
11. With their golden wheel-rims the milk-strong ones keep pounding the mountains like wayfarers (pounding the road with their feet)— unruly battlers, self-propelling, stirring (even) the fixed, acting headstrong, the Maruts with their glinting spears.
12. The ardent, pure, winning, unbounded offspring of Rudra do we hymn with an invocation.
   The space-traversing, powerful Marut flock, possessing the silvery drink, bullish—follow it for splendor.
13. That mortal has now stood out beyond the people in strength by your aid—the one whom you helped, Maruts.
   He bears away the prize for himself with his steeds, bears away the stakes with his men, bears resolve worthy of the asking. He dwells peacefully; he thrives.
14. O Maruts, confer on the bounteous (patrons) brilliant bluster ever to be celebrated, difficult to overcome in battles, gaining the stakes, worthy of hymns, governing all domains. May we thrive in life and lineage for a hundred winters.
15. Now, Maruts, confer on us durable wealth consisting of heroes, victorious in the clash, swelling in hundreds and thousands. – Early in the morning—soon—he should come, rich through (his) insight.

The next nine hymns (I.65–73) are ascribed to Parāśara Śāktya and are dedicated only to Agni. The first six (65–70) are in the relatively rare dvipadā virāj meter, while the last three are in triṣṭubh. Despite the difference in meter, there is a strong sense of unity in this group of hymns, in phraseology, in style, and in theme. Moreover, somewhat in Vālakhilya fashion there are several paired hymns, especially I.65–66 and I.68–69 (with I.70 acting as a climatic third to that pairing).

The most important theme running through the series is Agni's function as the locus and target of joint action undertaken by men and by gods, and as the representative of the unity thus produced. In this capacity for mortals he is named the Vaiśvānara fire ("fire belonging to all men"—for another, nearby Agni Vaiśvānara hymn see I.59), and the series I.68–70 contains an extended pun on the constituents of this epithet. In the divine realm the joint action of the gods is represented by the Tānūnaptra rite and its foundation myth, treated in I.72 (see Proferes 2007: 51–61). These complementary aspects of Agni are not restricted to the hymns just named, but surface throughout this series, which thus shows a rare thematic unity.

I.65 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: dvipadā virāj

As is generally the case with dvipadā virāj meter, the hymn falls into two-verse units, essentially equivalent to a single trimeter verse (forty syllables, versus forty-four [triṣṭubh] or forty-eight [jagatī]). The five-syllable units in which the verses are organized lend themselves to brief, discrete semantic and syntactic units, producing a mosaic-like effect. In this hymn, as in the following one, the mosaic fragments are often similes—especially pronounced here in the middle verses 5–6, though found throughout. Each simile highlights a particular aspect of Agni.

The hymn also follows a ritual and mythological trajectory. It begins with the hidden Agni (vs. 1), alluding in mythological terms to the well-known story of Agni's flight and rediscovery by the gods, which is treated in verses 2–3, but also, in ritual terms, to the fire hidden in the wood before kindling. This kindling is accomplished by the end of the hymn, where Agni spreads through the firewood and awakens at dawn, conspicuous and visible from afar (vss. 7–10). The relationship of Agni to waters, in his identity as Apām Napāt, is another theme in the hymn (vss. 4–7, 9), though the epithet Apām Napāt is not mentioned.

1. Hiding in secret like a thief with livestock, yoking homage, conveying homage:
2. (You) did the clever, of one accord, follow along your tracks;
   all those worthy of the sacrifice reverently approached you.
3. The gods followed the commandments of truth.
   Like heaven (enclosing) the earth was his enclosing.
4. With wonder the waters strengthen the lovely child, well-begotten in the lap of truth, in its womb.
5. Like thriving that brings delight, like a broad (place of) peaceful dwelling, like a mountain a source of benefit, like a gush (of water) that brings blessings;
6. Like a steed on its course, launched in a surge, like a river (sending) its gush: who can obstruct him?
7. Akin to the rivers, like a brother to his sisters, (yet,) like a king his vassals, he devours the wood.

8. When, sped by the wind, he has spread out through the wood,
   Agni cuts the hair of the earth.
9. He hisses like a wild goose sitting in the waters;
   awakening at dawn, he is the most conspicuous to the clans by his intention.
10. Like soma, a ritual expert, begotten of truth; ranging widely like livestock with their young, far-radiant.

I.66 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: dvipadā virāj

Like the previous hymn, this one is constructed of short phrases often consisting of similes. The similes here alternate between images of peace and prosperity and those of turbulent combat, sometimes strikingly juxtaposed, as in the second half of verse 3 or the contrasting halves of verse 4.

Toward the end of the hymn we find several puzzles, which have elicited widely differing interpretations—especially verse 8 with its double mention of twins (yamá). In our view the end of the hymn builds toward a ritual climax, found in the final two verses of the hymn (9–10), and verse 8 sets the stage for this, the early-morning sacrifice, by mentioning the risen sun as the twin already born and the soma, not yet pressed, as the twin awaiting birth—both also identified with Agni. Although these identifications would break the pattern of constant reference to Agni set in the earlier parts of the hymn (and our interpretation therefore gives us pause), the final pair of verses also move beyond the stasis of repeated Agni-similes and depict a ritual moment, prefigured, in our view, by the mention of other ritual entities in verse 8.

Note the ring-compositional element, the "sight of the sun," in the first half of verse 1 and the last words of verse 10. This double mention may support our interpretation of verse 8 as mentioning the risen sun.

1. Glittering like wealth, like the sight of the sun, like life-breath, like one's own son;
2. Like a swooping (bird), ever restless, he clings to the wood;
   like a milk-cow (yielding) milk, (he is) blazing and widely radiant.
3. Delightful like a home, he maintains peace; ripe like grain, a conqueror of peoples.
4. Having rhythm like a seer, lauded among the clans;
   well treated like a winning horse, he confers vitality.
5. Whose blaze is beyond domestication like one's own will;
   like a wife in the lap, enough for anyone.

6. When, glittering, he has flashed like a white (horse) among the clans, like a brilliant chariot (he is) dazzling in combats.
7. Set loose like an army, he initiates an onslaught, like the arrow of an archer with its dazzling point.
8. (The one) twin [=Sun?] has been born, (the other) twin [=Soma?] is what is to be born:
   (the one [=Sun]) is the lover of girls [=Dawns?]; (the other [=Soma]) the husband of women [=cows' (milk)?].
9. With our movable (goods [=livestock]) and with our settled household, we, like cows (going) home, approach him, on your behalf, when he has been kindled.
10. Like a river its gush, he has sent forth those [=butter offerings?] heading downward.
    The cows cry out upon seeing the sun.

I.67 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: dvipadā virāj

Although this hymn contains several similes (see vss. 1, 2, 5, 10), the simile is not the organizing principle of the hymn, unlike I.65–66, and metaphors and personifications share the stage with formally marked similes.

Agni's disappearance and hiding (vss. 3, 6–7) and his discovery by the gods (vss. 3–4), and by implication by pious mortals (vss. 7–8), provide the mythological theme of the hymn. The physical counterpart to this mythic concealment is the immanence of fire in wood, in plants, and in water, mentioned at the beginning (vs. 1) and end (vss. 9–10) of the hymn. For similar themes, see I.65.

1. A conqueror amid the wood, an ally among mortals; like a king he demands obedience without fail.
2. Like peace that brings prosperity, like good resolve;
   he has become the very attentive Hotar who carries the oblations.
3. Taking in his hand all manly powers, sitting down in secret, he sets the gods in (the path of) his onslaught.
4. The superior men, producing insights, find him here, when they have recited mantras fashioned by the heart.
5. Like Aja (Ekapad) he supports the broad earth;
   he props up heaven with mantras that come true.
6. Protect the dear tracks of the livestock.
   During your whole lifetime, Agni, you go from hiding place to hiding place.

7. He who perceives him gone into hiding, and who has taken his seat at the stream of truth—
8. Those who unbind (the fetters of deceit?), serving truths — for him, because of this, he [=Agni] has proclaimed good things.
9. He who [=Agni]—along with his offspring—sprouts greatly in the sprouts and within the fruitful (plants),
10. (He is) the bright apparition in the house of the waters through his whole lifetime.
   Like clever men an abode, the wise have made a seat (for him), having measured it out completely.

I.68 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: dvipadā virāj

Breaking the pattern of Parāśara's previous dvipadā virāj hymns (I.65–67), this one contains only a single, conventional simile (vs. 9). Its focus is instead on ritual, and especially on the joint activity performed by "all" in their separate ways and the rewards they share because of it (see esp. vss. 3, 4, 5, 8, 9). Although the identity of the "all" is never made explicit, we believe that the poet is depicting the communal fire shared and jointly tended by the united clans, and that the "all" (víśve) are the members of the separate clans serving their shared fire (the Vaiśvānara fire [see Proferes 2007: 46–49 and passim]). In fact, in reading this hymn with its twin, I.69, the motif of the Vaiśvānara fire emerges strongly. In this hymn the focus is on víśva "all," in the next hymn on náraḥ "(superior) men," while at the end of I.70 the two words are found sequentially (vss. 9–10). These are exactly the two elements found in the vr̥ddhi bahuvrīhi compound vaiśvānará "belonging to all men," the very name of the shared clan fire, a word that never appears in this hymn sequence. Thus, I.68–70 contain a buried but persistent pun, with one half of the compound allotted to each of the first two hymns until they are reunited in the third. The phonological resemblance between víśva "all" and víś "clan" is also in play, though the two words are etymologically unrelated.

1. Bringing (the sacrifice) to readiness, bustling about, he approaches heaven.
   He discloses the still and the moving through the nights,
2. When, alone of all these gods, the god encompasses (them) by his greatness.
3. All take pleasure in your resolve because of this:
   that you are born alive from the desiccated (wood), o god.
4. All have a share in divinity and in its name, as they serve immortal truth in their own ways.

5. The promptings of truth, the vision of truth—all have performed their tasks lifelong.
6. Whoever will do ritual service to you or who will do his best for you, to him distribute wealth as the attentive one.
7. As the Hotar, he has taken his seat among the progeny of Manu.
   Just he is now the lord of these (offspring/clans? and) of riches.
8. They seek the seed mutually among themselves;
   no fools—they act in unison, each according to his own skill.
9. They take pleasure in his resolve like sons in their father's—the powerful ones who obey his command.
10. Bringing much livestock, he has opened wide the doors of wealth.
    He, the master of the house, has emblazoned heaven's vault with stars.

I.69 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: dvipadā virāj

Twinned with the preceding hymn (I.68), this hymn also treats the common clan-fire, which serves as a symbol of unity during joint action undertaken by ordinarily separate groups, although this theme is subtly conveyed. In the first few verses there are only indirect hints: Agni "encompasses" an unspecified set of objects (vs. 2); in verse 4 he takes his place "in the middle" and is compared to a "friendly __ among the people"—parallel passages suggest that "ally" should be supplied in this last phrase.

The clans are mentioned explicitly in verse 5, which describes Agni's extension through the clans, who are brought together, along with their superior men, in the next verse (6). As already noted in the introduction to I.68, these men, the náraḥ, supply the second part of the name of the clan-fire, Vaiśvānara. Agni's reciprocal relationship and joint action with these men are described in verses 7–8, and, in our view, verse 9 describes the brilliance of the newly kindled clan-fire, which is the focus of the shared sacrificial activity of the united clans. This interpretation is supported by an adjective qualifying Agni in that verse: sáṃjñāta-rūpa. Although most translators take this word as meaning "having a well-known form" on the basis of the verbal root √jñā "recognize," the idiom sáṃ-jñā has a different and very specific meaning "come to an agreement, act in unison." This very idiom is found in the previous, twinned hymn, in verse 8, where it describes the mutual action of all the clans, each contributing its own set of skills. Therefore in verse 9 of this hymn Agni is described as the very form or representation of the agreement reached by the clans, as well as the focus of the ritual activity that results from that agreement. (It is worth noting that the final hymn of the Ṛgveda, self-consciously advocating unity, contains two occurrences of this lexeme [X.191.2b, d].)

The final verse (10) describes the successful dawn sacrifice and the rising of the sun that accompanies it. The rejoicing of "all" at the sight of the sun introduces into this hymn the "all" that dominated the paired hymn I.68.

1. The blazing one, blazing bright like the lover of Dawn, has filled the two conjoined (world-halves), like the light of heaven.
2. (Though just) born, you encompass (them) in accordance with your will.
   You will become the father of the gods, although you are their son.
3. Discerning Agni is the undistracted ritual expert; like the udder of cows he is the sweetness of foods.
4. Like a friendly (ally) among the people, though quick to anger,
   (he has) taken his seat in the middle, bringing joy to the house.
5. Like a son just born, bringing joy to the house;
   well treated like a winning horse, he has traversed the clans.
6. When I have summoned the clans of the same nest along with their men, by his divinity Agni should attain all things.
7. None transgress these commandments of yours, since you have given attentive hearing to these men.
8. This is your wondrous power: that on (the same) day, yoked with the same men, you carry out your tasks.
9. Ruddy and far-radiant like the lover of Dawn, he will be conspicuous to him [=the sacrificer?] as the one whose very form has been produced in unison.
10. Carrying him themselves, they [=priests] open wide the doors.
    All cry out upon seeing the sun.

I.70 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
11 verses: dvipadā virāj

As was noted in the introduction to I.68, this last of the Parāśara's dvipadā virāj hymns to Agni is the climax of a sequence of three whose disguised subject is Agni Vaiśvānara, the clan-fire "belonging to all men." The Vaiśvānara aspects of I.70 were already discussed by Proferes (2007: 48). In particular he points to the movement toward the unity of a single focal fire (vs. 9) contrasted with the separation of this fire into many, separately served fires (vs. 10), though he fails to mention the verbal encoding of the underlying compound members in these climactic verses 9–10, where all (víśve) bear tribute to the fire (vs. 9) and men (náraḥ) serve him in many places (vs. 10).

This hymn also widens the view somewhat, for not only does the fire belong to all men, but simultaneously to the gods (see the paired divine and human in vss. 2, 4, and 6), and it is also related to all natural objects (see vss. 3–4, 7), expressed in series of oppositional merisms, such as "the moving and the still" (vss. 3, 7).

This final hymn of the dvipadā virāj series has eleven verses, rather than the ten found in the other hymns. This eleventh, unpaired verse describes the power, skill, and eagerness of the martial Agni, and thus expresses one of the roles for which the Vaiśvānara fire is especially designed: to unite the clans into a force able to oppose its enemies. (See Proferes 2007 passim.) It may be taken as a summary verse for the entire sequence of Vaiśvānara hymns.

1. Might we vanquish the many inspired thoughts of the stranger by our inspired thought;
   might bright-blazing Agni attain all things (for us),
2. Watching over all the divine commandments and the races of the people descended from Manu.
3. He who is the embryo of the waters, the embryo of the woods, and the embryo of the still, the embryo of the moving,
4. Even in the rock (as well as) within the house, every immortal, like every (member) of the clans, is very attentive to him.
5. For Agni, the protector of riches on earth, does ritual service (for him [=the mortal]) who does ritual service for him [=Agni] fittingly with good hymns.
6. O watchful (Agni), protect these worlds, since you know the races of gods and of mortals.
7. Whom they will make grow through the many nights (and dawns) of differing forms—the one conceived by truth (whom) the moving and the still (will make grow), 8. He has been brought to success, installed as Hotar, as the sun, performing all the tasks to be realized.
9. You acquire a laud among the cows and the (fire)wood.
   All bear tribute to (you), our sun.
10. Men serve you separately in many places;
    they bear (you) away separately as (sons bear away) the property of their aging father.
11. Avid like (a horse) heading to the goal, like a champion archer, fearsome like a (chariot-)driver, dazzling in combats.

I.71 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

The first of the Parāśara hymns in triṣṭubh, this is a curiously structured and very difficult hymn. It begins with a sexually suggestive verse describing the kindling of the ritual fire by the fingers of the officiant manipulating the kindling sticks. Verse 2 switches to the mythic past and a fairly standard and straightforward summary of the role of the Aṅgirases in the opening of the Vala cave, but nothing in the hymn is straightforward after this. Verses treating the here-and-now of the ritual alternate with snippets of mythology.

The most dramatic mythological material is found discontinuously in verses 5 and 8, which treat the well-known if ill-understood story of the incest between Heaven and his daughter (see also X.61.5–7, as well as Jamison 1991: 288–301) and especially the punishment meted out to the offender by his avenger, who is clearly Agni. Since the birth of the Aṅgirases resulted from this incest, this myth fits both the dedicand of the hymn and the Aṅgiras verse (2) that follows the opening, and even the sexual innuendo of verse 1 may have evoked, or been evoked by, the incest theme.

The other mythological allusion is to Mātariśvan's stealing of fire (vs. 4); it is not clear whether this reference is meant to have any points of contact with the other mythological portions of the hymn. It does, however, connect with the theme of the interaction between gods and men, especially with Agni as go-between, found in verses 3, 4, and 7. Another puzzle is why Mitra and Varuṇa intrude into this Agni hymn in verse 9, though the appearance of the Sun in that same verse takes us back to verse 2. Ritual concerns are the focus of vss. 3, 6, and 7.

In short, in terms of structure this hymn neither follows a point-to-point trajectory nor displays an omphalos/ring-compositional shape. Instead it seems to show, at least in its central sections, sets of interlocking, overlapping paired verses—3 + 6, 4 + 7, 5 + 8—loosely nestled within a ring consisting of 2 + 9, and perhaps, more loosely still, 1 + 10.

1. The desirous females belonging to the same nest [=fingers] stimulate the desirous male [=Agni] close by—as wives of the same nest [=household] stimulate their own husband.
   The sisters [=fingers] have delighted in the dusky one and in the ruddy one [=two fire-kindling sticks], like cows in the brilliantly dawning dawn.
2. Even the firm fastnesses did our fathers, the Aṅgirases, break with their hymns, and the rock with their shout.
   They made the way of lofty heaven for us; they found the day and the sun, the beacon of the ruddy dawn.
3. They set the truth in place and they set the vision of it in motion; just after that the voracious (visions) of the stranger are dispersed.
   Never thirsting, (the [Aṅgirases'/poets'] visions), performing their tasks, go to the gods, strengthening their race with a pleasing offering.
4. When Mātariśvan, borne away, stole him, and he of worthy birth came to be gleaming in every house, after that (the fire) of the Bhr̥gus undertook the role of messenger, as if for a more powerful king, being associated with him.

5. When he made the sap [=semen] for great Father Heaven, noting the caresses he stealthily crept up (on him).
   The archer boldly loosed a missile at him (when) the god placed his "spark" in his own daughter.
6. Who will radiate widely for you here in his own house, or through the days will piously offer reverence belonging to (you) who are eager for it—as the doubly lofty one, o Agni, you increase his vitality. He whom you speed will drive in the same chariot with Wealth.
7. All nourishments converge on Agni, like the seven youthful streams on the sea.
   Our vitality is not widely perceptible in the form of our kin. Perceiving (it [=vitality]), find solicitude (for us) among the gods.
8. When the (missile's) sharp point reached the lord of men [=Agni] (for him) to release it, Heaven, at the moment of contact, (released) the blazing semen poured out.
   Agni engendered the faultless young troop of good intention [=Aṅgirases] and sweetened it.
9. Who, like thought, travels his roads in a single day, the Sun alone is entirely master of goods,
   (as are) the kings Mitra and Varuṇa, they of good hands, who guard their own dear immortal thing [=milk?] within the cows.
10. Agni, do not neglect our ancestral partnerships, being preeminent as a wise poet.
    Old age alters our form like a cloud. Be attentive (to us) in the face of this curse.

I.72 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

Another hymn in which the overall structure and the relationships among the parts are unclear. The dominant myth here is the gods' search for and recovery of Agni, who had gone missing, and his (re)establishment as the ritual fire. This myth is treated in verses 2, 4, and 6 at least, and verses 3 and 5 are probably related as well. However, sorting out the narrative(s) is made difficult by the lack of overt subjects (as Geldner already pointed out) and by the number of injunctive verb forms, as well as some perfects that can have either presential or preterital value. These grammatical ambiguities allow much of the hymn to be applicable simultaneously to the mythic past of the gods and the ritual present of men. Other mythic references include the dog Saramā's discovery and release of the penned-in cattle (vs. 8), thematically parallel to the discovery and recovery of Agni, and a puzzling reference to Aditi and her sons the Ādityas and the suckling of a bird (vs. 9).

What provides some unity to the hymn is less these unfinished scraps of mythical narrative than a focus on the vocabulary of knowledge and discovery: forms of the root vid "find, acquire, possess" and the homonymous root vid "know, discern," as well as the semantically related roots jñā "know, recognize" and cit "discern," are found, often multiply, in almost every verse. The hymn can thus be read as a sort of meta-reflection on the process of learning.

Another important feature of the hymn is the preoccupation with names and bodies, rather like the later category of "name-and-form" (nāma-rūpa). Proferes argues that verse 5 contains an early reflection of the Tānūnaptra rite, in which the sacrificer and the officiating priests at a soma sacrifice enter into a pact to be loyal to each other. The charter myth for this vow involves the gods all depositing their bodies in a common place (the sun, or Indra standing for the sun) to produce a common defense against external enemies. (See Proferes 2007: 59 for I.72.5 and 51–61 for the rite in general and its mythological background.) We agree with his analysis, but in fact think that the theme is more prominent in the hymn than in just that one verse. The central verses seem to suggest that the gods' quest for Agni and their discovery of him and his name (not overtly present, but formulaically suggested) in verse 2 and their ritual service to him in verse 3 allow them to acquire their own ritually worthy names and to make their own bodies also worthy of ritual service in verse 4. This leads to the mutual exchange and mutual possession of bodies in the Tānūnaptra verse proper (5). Thus rendered ritually worthy, they find within Agni the intricate and secret "tracks" of the ritual itself (vs. 6ab), a discovery that allows them to protect their own (6c), and that also leads to the beneficial actions of Agni in the world of men (6d, 7). More benefits follow in verses 8–9, though the connection of these to what precedes is admittedly hazy. The "deposit" in a central entity, here Agni, that is the heart of the Tānūnaptra pact seems to reappear in verse 10, in a context both cosmogonic (10b) and apparently ritual (10cd).

The depiction of Agni in this hymn as the locus for the joint deposit of the bodies of the gods in the Tānūnaptra myth is the mirror and complementary image of Agni Vaiśvānara, the fire "belonging to all men," around which all the allied human clans rally, in the earlier hymns of Parāśara Śāktya's Agni cycle (esp. I.68–70).

1. He outdoes the poetic skills of each and every ritual expert, taking in his hand many manly powers.
   Agni has become the wealth-lord of wealth, making wholly his own all immortal things.

2. Among us they did not find what was enclosing the calf [=Agni], though all the immortals—no fools—were seeking it.
   Taking pains, following the track, producing insight, they took their stand at the dear (name) of Agni, on the highest track.
3. Since, o Agni, for three autumns they [=gods?] served just you, the glowing one, with ghee—themselves glowing—they also acquired names worthy of worship and, well-born, they sweetened their own bodies.
4. Ever possessing the two lofty world-halves [/Rodasī], the sons of Rudra [=Maruts], worthy of worship, pressed forward.
   In the opposite position a mortal, perceiving him, found Agni standing on the highest track.
5. Coming to an agreement, they reverently approached him on bended knee; along with their wives, they did reverence to the one worthy of reverence.
   Having given up their bodies, they made (each other's bodies) their own, guarding them (as) a comrade does (that of) his comrade when he closes his eyes.
6. Since those worthy of worship found deposited just in you the three times seven secret tracks, with these do they, of one accord, guard their own immortal one. Protect the livestock, both the still and the moving.
7. Knowing the patterns of the settled peoples, o Agni, distribute proliferating riches in proper order (for them) to live.
   Inwardly knowing the roads leading to the gods, you have become the tireless messenger carrying the oblations.
8. Very attentive, (they discerned) the seven young maidens of heaven [=rivers]; knowing the truth, they discerned the doors of wealth.
   Saramā found the firmly fixed cattle-pen, by which, even now, the clan stemming from Manu benefits.
9. Those who mounted upon (those actions [=sacrifice]) that bring good descendants, making themselves a way toward immortality, by means of (those) sons, great in their greatness, the earth, their mother Aditi, spread out, in order to suckle the bird [=Agni? sun?].
10. They deposited (their?) own dear splendor within him, when the immortals made the two eyes of heaven [=sun and moon].
    Then like rivers sent surging they stream: heading downwards, the ruddy ones have recognized the way, o Agni.

I.73 Agni

Parāśara Śāktya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

This last hymn of the Parāśara Agni cycle recapitulates some of the poetic devices and themes found in the earlier hymns and thus in some sense provides the close of a ring to the whole sequence. It begins with three verses dense with similes, recalling the first two hymns, I.65–66, which were similarly simile rich. The three verses are entirely descriptive of Agni, particularly of the sacrificial fire in its position on the ritual ground, but the god's name is not mentioned until verse 4, where he is kindled by men.

The rest of the hymn concerns Agni as the central focus of humans, of gods, and of ritual substances (for this last, see vs. 6), Agni as a distributor and redistributor of goods and services among gods, patrons, and poets, a role summed up in the word "portion" found in verses 5, 6, 7, and 10. This theme was announced in the first pāda of the hymn, and the "wealth acquired from one's father" of 1a recurs in verse 9.

Although this hymn lacks overt reference to the motifs of the Vaiśvānara fire and the Tānūnaptra rite, in which men and gods respectively become united by joint action involving the fire, the interrelations among men, among gods, and among men and gods depicted in this hymn recall the more explicit treatment of those motifs in earlier parts of the cycle. That both gods and men and, among men, both poets and patrons serve the fire in similar ways and seek similar rewards depicts these groups of beings as having a certain equality before Agni.

1. Who confers vitality like wealth acquired from one's father, providing good guidance like the instruction of a perceptive man, resting in a comfortable place like a guest whose pleasure is served, like a Hotar he has traversed the (sacrificial) seat of him who does honor.
2. Whose thoughts become reality like god Savitar's, who protects all communities according to his will, lauded by many like a (royal) emblem, really present and agreeable like one's own self, he has become desirable to install.
3. Who, suckling all, dwells peacefully upon the earth, like a god, like a king with established alliances, stationed in front like heroes stationed for protection, irreproachable like a wife pleasing to her husband—
4. You, o Agni, kindled here in the house as their own, do men attend on in their fixed abodes.
They deposited abundant heavenly brilliance within him. Become the foundation of riches for your whole lifetime!

5. Might the bounteous ones reach nourishments, o Agni, and (might) the patrons who give (reach) through a whole lifetime.
   Might we gain the victory-prize in our clashes with the stranger, acquiring a portion among the gods for our fame.
6. For the bellowing cows of truth, apportioned by heaven, swell with their udders; from afar, seeking a portion of (your?) favor, the rivers have flowed forth all at once over the rock.
7. Seeking a portion of favor in you, those worthy of worship [=gods] set their fame in heaven.
   They made night and dawn of different forms, and they put together the black color and the red.
8. Might we—we and our patrons—be those mortals whom you will sweeten for wealth, o Agni.
   Like a shadow you accompany all creation, having filled the two world-halves and the space between.
9. Might we vanquish steeds with steeds, men with men, and heroes with heroes, o Agni, when aided by you.
   As lords of wealth acquired from their fathers, might our patrons, having a hundred winters, reach through (a whole lifetime).
10. Let these solemn speeches be pleasing to you, o Agni, ritual expert—to your mind and heart.
    Might we be able to control (the prizewinning horses) of your wealth, (so they are) amenable to the chariot-pole, while we acquire the fame apportioned by the gods.

The next, rather sizable group of twenty hymns is attributed to Gotama Rāhūgaṇa, who could be the father or other ancestor of the poet of I.58–64, Nodhas Gautama. If so, the dazzling skill of the son is not on view in the work of his father in the opening Agni hymns (74–79) or in the All God hymns (89–90), which seem more dutiful than engaged, but when he treats other gods, especially the Maruts (85–88) and Dawn (92), his poetry can be inspired.

I.74 Agni

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
9 verses: gāyatrī

The favor shown to the pious man by Agni is the theme of this short hymn. The beneficiary of Agni's patronage is identified as dāśvā́ṃs "pious" in verses 2, 8, and 9, and Agni's activities on his behalf are the subject of the middle verses 4–5. These activities are mostly the familiar ones, of serving as messenger between the mortal and divine realms and going after the gods in order to bring them to the sacrifice (see esp. vss. 4, 6–7), but Agni is also credited with aiding the pious man under attack (vs. 2), leading to the god's covert identification with Indra, via the epithet "Vṛtra-smasher" (vs. 3). Another unusual feature of this hymn is the appeal to what "the people say" about Agni and his devotee (vss. 3, 5).

1. Reverently approaching the ceremony, might we speak a solemn formula to Agni, to him who listens, (when he is) in the distance and with us (here),
2. Who, at the forefront in the "blizzards" (of attacks) when the separate peoples were clashing together, guarded for the pious man his patrimony.
3. And let the people say: "Agni, the Vṛtra-smasher, has arisen, who wins the stakes in every battle!"
4. The man whose messenger you are in the dwelling place, for whom you pursue (the gods) to pursue the oblations, whose ceremony you perform wondrously—
5. Just he has good oblations, has the gods with him, o Aṅgiras, young (son) of strength, has a good ritual grass-strew—so the people say.
6. And you will convey the gods here for their glorification, (for them) to pursue the oblations, o much gleaming one.
7. No trampling of horses is heard at all from your chariot as it drives, when, o Agni, you travel on your mission.
8. Aided by you, the competitor, unabashed (even though he was) behind the one in front, the pious man, has taken first place, o Agni.
9. And a brilliant, lofty abundance of heroes, Agni, do you strive to win from the gods, o god, for the pious man.

I.75 Agni

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
5 verses: gāyatrī

This short hymn begins (vs. 1) by urging Agni to enjoy our praise of him, which the poet hopes will be "a winning sacred formulation" (vs. 2). But, contravening our expectations, in place of this promised bráhman the poet instead asks a series of abrupt questions in verse 3. Then once again our expectations are disappointed, for although verse 4 at first appears to contain the answers to the questions posed in verse 3, only the first question is actually answered, while the rest of verse 4, though maintaining the clausal structure of verse 3, is only vaguely related in meaning to the corresponding clauses in verse 3. The hymn ends (vs. 5) with a conventional directive to Agni to perform sacrifice, with its imperative matching the imperative beginning the hymn ("take delight," 1a).

Although the hymn is too brief to develop the theme of thwarted expectations sketched above, it does uninsistently suggest that verbal form may trump content in the construction of praise poetry and that the audience should be wary of being led astray by a poet's expressed intentions.

1. Take delight in the most extensive speech, which affords most delight to
   the gods,
   while pouring the oblations into your own mouth.
2. Then, o Agni, best of Aṅgirases, best of ritual adepts, something dear to you might we speak—a winning sacred formulation.
3. Who is the kinsman of your peoples? O Agni, who holds the pious ceremony?
   Who are you and fixed in what?
4. You are the kinsman of the peoples. O Agni, you are the dear envoy, a comrade for your comrades, to be reverently invoked.
5. Sacrifice for us to Mitra and Varuṇa; sacrifice to the gods, to lofty truth.
   Agni, you will sacrifice to your own home.

I.76 Agni

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins (vs. 1) with anxious questions about how best to worship Agni in order to harness his powers. The structure of this question verse is reminiscent of verse 3 of the previous hymn (I.75), with each pāda containing a separate query; however, the questions here are more focused on how best to please Agni, and the longer line of triṣṭubh meter makes the questions seem less abrupt than in the gāyatrī of I.75.3. As in I.75 the questions here do not receive explicit answers. Instead the poet devotes most of the rest of the hymn to detailing Agni's duties and seeking Agni's aid as ritual performer and priest (see esp. vss. 2, 4), to bring the gods, especially Indra (see vs. 3c), to the ritual ground and to sacrifice to them.

1. What reverent approach is to your heart's desire? What inspired thought will be the most beneficial, Agni?
   Or, who attains your skill through his sacrifices? Or, with what mind should we piously serve you?

2. Come hither, Agni; sit down here as Hotar. Become an undeceivable leader for us.
   Let the two world-halves, which set everything in motion, aid you. Sacrifice to the gods for great benevolence.
3. Burn away all demonic beings, Agni. Become for the sacrifices the protector from curses.
   Then convey here the lord of soma with his two fallow bays. We have made a guest reception for him who gives well.
4. With a speech bringing offspring you are to be invoked as the conveyor (of oblations) with your mouth, and you will sit down here with the gods.
   You pursue the Hotarship and the Potarship, you instrument of sacrifice. Become (all this), o provider and engenderer of goods.
5. Just as you sacrificed to the gods with the oblations of the inspired poet Manu, along with the poets, yourself a poet, even so, o Hotar most truly present, o Agni, today perform sacrifice with your gladdening tongue.

I.77 Agni

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is in some ways a twin to the last one: both have five triṣṭubh verses, and both open with a verse of questions about the proper way to serve Agni, using some of the same vocabulary (e.g., dāśema "we should piously serve" I.77.1a and I.76.1d). Lexical similarities continue through the hymn: śáṃtama "most beneficial" (77.2a, 76.1b), various forms of the verb √vī "pursue" (77.2c, 4b; 76.4c), et cetera. Like I.76, this hymn also focuses on Agni's role as priest and sacrificer, although the rhetoric in this hymn is somewhat more expansive than in I.76.

1. How should we do pious service to Agni? Which hymn enjoyable to the gods is spoken to him, the radiant—the one who, the immortal among mortals, the truthful Hotar, as the best sacrificer just does so [=sacrifices] to the gods?
2. The one who is the most beneficial at the ceremonies, the truthful Hotar—attract him here with reverence.
   When Agni, for the sake of the mortal, has pursued the gods all together, he will be attentive to them and will perform sacrifice with his mind.
3. For he is resolve; he is a young buck; he is on target. Like an envoy he has become charioteer of the unerring.

Him, the wondrous one, do the god-seeking Ārya clans entreat first at the ritual offerings.

4. He, most manly of men, who has care for the stranger—let Agni with his help pursue our hymns, our visionary thought—for us and for our benefactors, the strongest ones, motivated by prizes, who propel our prayers at length.

5. Thus has Agni, the truthful one, the Jātavedas, been praised by the Gotamas, inspired poets.
He will swell brilliance among them; he will swell the prize. He drives to prosperity at his pleasure—the observant one.

I.78 Agni

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
5 verses: gāyatrī

A hymn of uninspired content, which is rigidly structured and dominated by its refrain. Its most noteworthy feature is that the first two pādas of the last verse (5) break the pattern of the preceding ones, and it is here that the name Agni appears for the first and only time in the hymn, with the reference switched from the 2nd person of the rest of the hymn to 3rd person in its final verse. It is also striking that in verses 1 and 4 the refrain is syntactically integral to the verse, with the initial "to you" the object of the verb in the third-pāda refrain, whereas in the middle verses 2–3 the refrain is syntactically separate, and the initial "to you" is construed with the verb in the first hemistich. Thus, its formal properties are the whole point of the hymn, with meaning essentially backgrounded. For discussion of other ways in which Gotama privileges form over content, see the introduction to I.75.

1. To you, o boundless Jātavedas, with a hymn do we Gotamas keep bellowing, with éclat.

2. And to you with a hymn does Gotama, desirous of wealth, show friendship.
– We keep bellowing to (you), with éclat.

3. And to you, best winner of prizes, do we call, as Aṅgiras did.
– We keep bellowing to (you), with éclat.

4. And to you, best smasher of obstacles, who send the Dasyus tumbling down, we keep bellowing, with éclat.

5. We Rahūgaṇas have spoken a honeyed speech to Agni.
– We keep bellowing to (him), with éclat.

I.79 Agni

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
12 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, uṣṇih 4–6, gāyatrī 7–12

As its position in the sequence and its metrical disunity suggest, this hymn actually consists of four separate hymns of three verses each (1–3, 4–6, 7–9, 10–12). The last three are relatively simple in their construction and their contents, but the first is rich and vividly descriptive and poses some problems of interpretation.

This first hymn segment begins (vs. 1) with quick sketches of different forms of fire: fire as sun (pāda a); fire as lightning (pāda b); ritual fire, especially as it is kindled at dawn (pādas cd). This verse manages to convey dynamism without the use of a single finite verb or participle. The next two verses (2–3) take up the second image, fire as lightning, and develop it in unexpected ways. In our reading, the ritual fire (that is, the god Agni) is compared with and ultimately identified with the thunderstorm, and therefore its product, the fructifying rain, can be presented, paradoxically, as the product of fire itself, a substance that in nature cannot produce water. In verse 2 the zigzagging lightning flashes are the fire's flames; the bellowing bull is the roaring fire itself, and the flying mists and thundering clouds are the billowing smoke. Verse 3 takes this naturalistic comparison to its logical but unnatural conclusion: if fire is the embodiment of the thunderstorm, then it is full of rain, a most desirable product, here called "the milk of truth." In the last half of this verse the principal Ādityas as well as Wind become involved by engorging the clouds with water.

After this complex and allusive vignette, the other three hymn segments are a serious anticlimax. In verses 4–6 Agni is asked to give wealth and fame and to protect against demons. Wealth is also the preoccupation of verses 7–9. In the final three verses the poet, Gotama, exhorts himself to give hymns to Agni, and then implores Agni to keep demons away. There is nothing in these nine verses to arrest the attention, but Gotama's first three verses are indeed a worthy gift for the god.

1. A golden-haired one in his spread through the dusky realm—a snake, tumultuous, swooping like the wind—blazing bright (when he becomes) cognizant of Dawn, like the glorious busy (Dawns themselves) actually present.
2. Your fine-feathered (lightning flashes) zigzagged along their ways. The black bull keeps bellowing. If he is really here, he has come here with his (lightning flashes) like kindly, smiling (girls). The mists fly; the clouds thunder.
3. When he, swollen with the milk of truth, (has come) leading them [=the lightning flashes] along the straightest paths of truth—
   Aryaman, Mitra, Varuṇa, and the Earth-circling (Wind) engorge the skin in the womb of the nearer (realm).

4. O Agni, being the lord of the prize consisting of cows, o youthful (son) of strength, on us confer great fame, o Jātavedas.
5. On being kindled, Agni the good poet is to be reverently invoked with a hymn.
   Shine richly for us, you of many faces.
6. Through the nights in your own person, King Agni, and at the dawning of dawn, o sharp-fanged one, burn against the demons.

7. Help us, Agni, with your help at the presentation of the gāyatrī song, o you to be extolled in all hymnic visions.
8. Bring here to us wealth, o Agni, which is victorious in every way, worthy to be chosen, and difficult to surpass in all battles.
9. (Bring) here to us wealth affording lifelong prosperity with your kind attention, o Agni.
   Confer grace, (for us) to live.

10. Present your own purified speeches to sharp-flamed Agni, o Gotama; present your own hymns, as you seek his favor.
11. Whoever will assail us, close by or in the distance, let him fall, o Agni.
    Be (ready) to strengthen only us.
12. Thousand-eyed, boundless Agni repels the demonic forces.
    As Hotar, worthy of praise, he is hymned.

I.80 Indra

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
16 verses: paṅkti

Like the justly famous I.32, this hymn is entirely concerned with the Indra–Vr̥tra battle. It portrays Indra's defeat of Vr̥tra and his release of the pent-up waters with admirable clarity, though it lacks the richness of detail of I.32 and the intimacy of the portrait of the overmatched and then defeated Vr̥tra found in that other hymn. Instead this hymn simply keeps repeating the climactic moment when Indra smote Vr̥tra with his mace (vájra). In fact, the mace seems almost as much the hero of the hymn as Indra is: in the first thirteen verses, those concerned most directly with the Vr̥tra battle, only three (4, 9, 10) lack a mention of the mace. Verse 8 is especially noteworthy in containing the only occurrence of plural vájra in the R̥gveda, in a puzzling context: "Your maces have been dispersed across the ninety navigable (rivers)." This passage superficially reminds us of I.32.14, in which Indra, having slain Vr̥tra, flees in fear across "the ninety-nine flowing rivers," but the implications of our passage seem more positive. Perhaps the point is that, once the rivers were released to flow in all directions, Indra's power, embodied in the mace, was subdivided and spread across the whole fertile, water-fed landscape.

The fifth-pāda refrain in every verse is an especially salient feature of the hymn and concerns the verbal encouragement given to Indra. The subject of the plural verb árcann ánu is never specified, and since the verb is in the injunctive, it is ambiguous between present and indefinite mythic past. These uncertainties are no doubt deliberate: the subject can be the current poet-sacrificers, their legendary counterparts (Atharvan, Manu, and Dadhyañc mentioned in vs. 16), or the Maruts, the gods who in mythic time provided encouragement to Indra before and during the Vr̥tra combat. A direct-speech example of such encouragement is given in verse 3, and verse 9 encourages the encouragers in this action. The relationship between the current poets and their predecessors is built into the structure of the hymn, in a telling ring between the first and last verses. Verse 1 mentions the formulation created "in the current style" (itthā́), while in verse 16 formulations made "in the older style" (pūrváthā), imitating illustrious named past poets and sacrificers, are offered to Indra. Thus the hymn implicitly suggests that not only was Indra's great victory impossible without his cheering comrades, but that poets today, like those in the past, fulfill the same role.

1. Because right at the time of the soma exhilaration the formulator created a strengthening (formulation) in the current style, o strongest mace-bearer, with your might you ordered the serpent forth from the earth.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
2. The bullish exhilaration exhilarated you—the soma, brought here by a falcon, then pressed, with which you smashed Vr̥tra forth from the waters, o mace-bearer, with your might.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
3. "Go forth! Go to it! Dare! Your mace will not be restrained, for, Indra, manly power and strength are yours. You will smash Vr̥tra;
 you will conquer the waters."
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
4. Forth from the earth you smashed Vr̥tra, o Indra, forth from heaven.
 Release downward these waters, which are accompanied by the Maruts, affording riches to the living.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
5. Indra, angered, having attacked the back of raging Vr̥tra with his mace, keeps smashing him downward, spurring the waters to flow.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.

6. He keeps smashing down on his back with the hundred-jointed mace.
 Indra, exhilarated from the stalk, seeks a way for his comrades.
 – They cheer on his sovereign power.
7. O Indra, possessor of the stone, of the mace, to you alone virile power was conceded.
 When (you kept smashing) this wild beast of magic power, you slew him with your own magic power.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
8. Your maces have been dispersed across the ninety navigable (rivers).
 Great is your virile power, Indra; force has been placed in your two arms.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
9. Thousand(-strong), do you chant as one. Twenty(-strong), encircle him with rhythm.
 In the hundreds they have bellowed after him. To Indra has the sacred formulation been raised.
 – They cheer on his sovereign power.
10. Indra has smashed forth the power of Vr̥tra, has smashed forth the might of Vr̥tra with his might.
 Great was this manly deed of his: having smashed Vr̥tra, he released (the waters).
 – They cheer on his sovereign power.
11. Even these two great (world-halves) here tremble with fear before your battle-fury, since, mace-bearing Indra, you have slain Vr̥tra with might, with the Maruts alongside.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
12. Not by his trembling excitation, not by his thundering did Vr̥tra make Indra fear.
 His mace of metal with a thousand spikes confronted him.
 – They cheer on his sovereign power.
13. When with your mace you set Vr̥tra and your missile to fighting, o Indra, your strength, as you sought to smash the serpent, kept pressing toward heaven.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
14. At your thundering, o possessor of the stone, both the still and the moving shake.
 Even Tvaṣṭar quivers with fear before your battle-fury, Indra.
 – They cheer on your sovereign power.
15. For, from what we can learn, no one is beyond Indra in virile power.
 In him have the gods assembled manliness and resolve and mighty powers.
 – They cheer on his sovereign power.

16. The poetic vision which Atharvan, Manu the father, and Dadhyañc extended—our sacred formulations and hymns in this older style have come together in him, in Indra.
– They cheer on his sovereign power.

I.81 Indra

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
9 verses: paṅkti

Like the immediately preceding hymn, this one is in paṅkti meter, but here the fifth pāda, rather than being a refrain, is variable and in one instance (vs. 4) syntactically connected to what precedes it in the verse. (Otherwise the fifth pāda is syntactically independent but linked thematically.)

The strength and power of Indra are the main theme, but it is clear that for the poet the purpose of Indra's might is simply to enable him to provide his worshipers with goods (vss. 2–3, 6–9)—particularly those goods belonging to "the stranger" (vss. 6, 9), in this case probably a non-sacrificing member of the Ārya community, which Indra should redistribute to more deserving men. The demands for largesse become increasingly peremptory, and the quantity of praise given to Indra is rather limited. One wonders how much success this bid for riches would have met with.

1. Indra has been strengthened for exhilaration, the Vr̥tra-smasher for strength, by superior men.
Just him do we invoke in great contests, and him in a petty one;
when prizes (are set) he will help us.
2. For you are the martial one, hero; you are the one who hands over much.
You are the increaser even of the paltry. You exert yourself for the sacrificer; for the soma-presser your goods are many.
3. When contests loom, rich stakes are set for the daring one.
Hitch up your two fallow bays, aroused to exuberance. Whom will you smash? Whom will you set in goods?
It's us you will set in goods, Indra.
4. Through his resolve the great, fearsome one has increased his strength in accord with his own nature.
For splendor the lofty belipped possessor of fallow bays has taken the metal mace into his own clasped hands.
5. He filled the earthly space; he kept thrusting the luminous realms toward heaven.
There is no one like you, Indra, who has been born or will be born.
You have grown beyond everything.

6. He who hands over to the pious man the sustenance for mortals that belongs to the stranger—let Indra do his best for us. Share out your many goods:
   might I have a share of your generosity.
7. For at every revel (you) of straight resolve give us herds of cattle.
   Gather together many hundreds of goods with both hands.
   Look sharp!—bring riches here.
8. Become exhilarated on the pressed soma, for strength, o champion, for generosity.
   Because we know you as possessing many goods, we have dispatched our desires to you—so become our helper.
9. These (people who are) kin to you [=us] foster everything of value.
   Because you detect the possessions of the stranger, of the impious peoples, bring their possessions here to us.

I.82 Indra

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
6 verses: paṅkti, except jagatī 6

Like the three Indra hymns (I.61–63) of our poet's descendant, Nodhas Gautama, this hymn was composed to accompany the "Fallow-bay-yoking" oblation at the end of the soma sacrifice, at which the two horses of Indra are hitched up for the return journey to heaven. The first five verses are in paṅkti meter, with the fifth pāda a refrain announcing the sacrificer's intention to perform this yoking. In the body of those verses the poet announces that the goal of the sacrifice has been achieved (vss. 1–2): both Indra and his companions the Maruts have received praise and oblations, and they have provided presents in return. He offers Indra a last bit of praise and a last oblation to send him on his way (vss. 3–4), and then turns to the actual yoking of the pair of horses (vs. 5).

The final verse is in a different meter and expresses the act of yoking in a different tense and mood. The subtle distinction in wording between the refrain of verses 1–5 and its variant in the first pāda of the final verse (6a) is significant: the refrain contains the 1st sg. root aorist subjunctive yójā in the prospective/volitional sense "I will yoke," while the version in the final verse transposes the formula into the present indicative with yunájmi, and adds the instrumental bráhmaṇā "with a sacred formulation." These changes make the statement into a "performative" in the technical linguistic sense; that is, the utterance by itself performs the action it expresses: "I (hereby) yoke your two shaggy fallow bays with a solemn formulation." The bráhman refers to the entire hymn that precedes, and it is the very recitation of the hymn, identified as a bráhman, that performs the ritual act of yoking.

A particularly appealing part of the hymn is the mention of Indra's wife in verses 5–6: the poet is concerned to send the god directly back home to his "dear wife" and further exhilaration. See also III.53.4–6.

1. Listen well to our hymns, bounteous one, not like a nay-sayer.
   When you will make us the beneficiaries of your liberality, it's just then that you will achieve your goal.
   – Now, Indra, I will hitch up your two fallow bays.
2. They have eaten; for they have brought themselves to exhilaration; they have shaken down dear things.
   They have been praised—the self-radiant (Maruts)—with the newest inspired thought.
   – Now, Indra, I will hitch up your two fallow bays.
3. We would extol you of wholly lovely appearance, o bounteous one.
   Praised, drive forth now following your will, once your chariot box is full.
   – Now, Indra, I will hitch up your two fallow bays.
4. The only one who will mount on the bullish, cow-finding chariot is the one who will take care that the cup is full for your "Fallow-bay-yoking" oblation, Indra.
   – Now, Indra, I will hitch up your two fallow bays.
5. Let your right (horse) be yoked, and your left one, you of a hundred resolves.
   With this (chariot) drive up to your dear wife, while (you are still) exhilarated from the stalk.
   – Now, Indra, I will hitch up your two fallow bays.
6. With (this) sacred formulation I (hereby) hitch up your two shaggy fallow bays. Drive forth; you have taken (the reins? the mace?) in your fists.
   The wild pressed soma-drinks have stirred you up. Accompanied by Pūṣan, o mace-bearer, you will become exhilarated along with your wife.

I.83 Indra

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
6 verses: jagatī

In this hymn the poet uses two different senses of the word "first" to imbue the good sacrificer with the qualities and prestige of the legendary institutors of the sacrifice. At the beginning of verse 1 the good sacrificer is "the first" to attain to wealth provided by Indra. The next two verses continue the characterization of the good sacrificer and the good life bestowed on him by the gods. The next two verses (4–5) pick up the word "first" (prathamá) that opened the hymn, but here not in the sense of "foremost, first in line" as in verse 1, but rather "primal, original": these verses concern the first establishment of the sacrifice and the actions of the famous primordial sacrificers. In the final verse (6) we return to the current sacrifice, but by putting the model of the original sacrificers before us, the poet implies that the present-day sacrificer is replicating their actions and is identified with them. This is one of the common themes of R̥gvedic sacrifice: that each new sacrifice is an enactment of the first one.

1. The first to come to (wealth) consisting of horses, to cows with your help, o Indra, is the mortal who pursues (his ritual duties) well.
   Just him do you engorge with more abundant goods, as waters, conspicuous from everywhere, engorge a river.
2. Like the goddesses, the Waters, they [=gods] approach (the place) associated with oblation; they look downward onto the extended (soma-filter? sacrifice?) as if onto an extensive airy realm.
   The gods lead forward the one who seeks the gods. Like suitors, they delight in the man who pleases (them) with the sacred formulation.
3. You have placed a speech worthy to be spoken in the two (priests), the pair who ritually serve with their offering spoons extended.
   Not mustered (to battle), he dwells in peace under your commandment, he thrives. Propitious is your potency for the sacrificer who presses soma.
4. The Aṅgirases, who had (previously) kindled the fires with ritual labor and good ritual performance, after that first acquired their life-force.
   They collected together all the sustenance of the niggard, livestock consisting of horses and cows—the superior men.
5. With sacrifices the Atharvan first stretched the paths. Thereupon was the Sun, the protector of commandments, the tracker, born.
   Uśanā Kāvya drove the cows together. We sacrifice to the immortal birth of Yama.
6. When the ritual grass is twisted for the sake of good descendants, or the chant sounds its signal-call toward heaven, when the pressing stone, the praiseworthy bard speaks, just at his (sacrifice) does Indra take pleasure at suppertime.

I.84 Indra

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
20 verses: anuṣṭubh 1–6, uṣṇih 7–9, paṅkti 10–12, gāyatrī 13–15, triṣṭubh 16–18, bṛhatī 19, satobṛhatī 20; arranged in tṛcas 1–18, pragātha 19–20

Coming at the end of Gotama's Indra collection, this long and metrically complex hymn must actually be composed of smaller hymn segments. The first eighteen verses are arranged in tṛcas, and it ends with a single pragātha. The contents range from the most banal invitation to the sacrifice to elusive and allusive treatments of little-known myths. There are a number of reminiscences of the Indra hymns preceding it in the Gotama collection.

The first six verses, in anuṣṭubh meter, appear to form a unity, urging Indra to come to the soma sacrifice in clichéd and predictable phraseology. The next tṛca (vss. 7–9) is in uṣṇih meter (8 8 12); the last four syllables of the third pāda are a semidetached refrain ("Indra indeed!"), so that the verses present themselves like gāyatrī (i.e., 8 8 8). The contrast between the good sacrificer and his unsatisfactory counterpart is the theme.

The next tṛca (vss. 10–12), in paṅkti meter, is highly reminiscent of I.80, also in paṅkti. As in that hymn the fifth pāda of each verse is a refrain syntactically unconnected to the rest of the verse. In fact, the last six syllables of the refrain match those of I.80, and in order to make sense of the refrain here, we must supply the verb ("they cheer on") from the refrain of I.80. This tṛca concerns the mixing of milk with the pressed soma, in metaphorical terms—with the milk streams depicted as buffalo-cows. Beneath this first metaphor there may be a second: it is possible that the Maruts lurk behind the buffalo-cow facade. (Remember that the Maruts were one of the possible subjects of the refrain in I.80.) An association of the Maruts with "the ritual midpoint" here might allude to their recent incorporation as recipients of the oblation at the Midday Pressing.

Another reminiscence of I.80 is found in the next tṛca (vss. 13–15), in gāyatrī, which treats in most condensed and puzzling fashion the myth of Dadhyañc and the horse's head. (For this myth in general, see Macdonell 1897: 141–42.) Dadhyañc and his father Atharvan were mentioned in passing in the last verse of I.80 (vs. 16). In other versions of the myth Dadhyañc substitutes a horse's head for his own in order to declare the secret location of Tvaṣṭar's soma. In these three short verses we find Dadhyañc, the horse's head, and Tvaṣṭar, but the narrative in which they are involved is entirely unclear and we confess ourselves mystified.

The last tṛca (vss. 16–18) consists entirely of anxious questions, mostly in connection with the sacrifice, reminiscent of the cascade of questions in other Gotama hymns (I.75.3, 76.1, 77.1). The first verse (16) wonders who will be able to yoke particularly ill-behaved cattle and bring them here. "Here" seems to refer to the sacrifice, and the best guess as to the identity of the cattle is the Maruts, who are the dedicands of Gotama's next four hymns (I.85–88). The next verse (17) is more confused, but the location of Indra and indeed his very existence are in question, and a formal spokesman on behalf of mortals is sought. The questions are more clearly ritual in verse 18, ending with the sacrificer's self-doubt about his status with the gods he sacrifices to. The final two verses (19–20), an independent pragātha, seem designed to quell this doubt, asserting that Indra himself, in a turn-about, will praise the sacrificer and show him mercy, as well as offering him help and goods.

Although no strong unity among the various pieces of this hymn is perceptible, it does mimic in certain ways the progress of a soma sacrifice. It opens with the invitation (vss. 1–6), made more pointed by the contrast between our well-made and deserving sacrifice and the behavior of ungenerous mortals (vss. 7–9). Verses 10–12 concern the actual preparation of the soma (and also refer, in vs. 7, to the ritual midpoint). Verses 13–15 can be seen as a mythic interlude, praising the great deeds of Indra while he is present on the ritual ground. Verses 16–18 raise doubts about the efficacy of the sacrifice that has been, or is being, performed—doubts somewhat allayed by the final two verses (19–20), which end with the usual requests for benefits from the god.

1. The soma has been pressed for you, Indra. O strongest bold one,
   come here.
   Let Indrian strength permeate you, as the sun permeates the airy realm with its rays.
2. The two fallow bays convey Indra of irresistible strength up to the praises of the seers and to the sacrifice of the sons of Manu.
3. Mount the chariot, Vr̥tra-smasher: your two fallow bays have been yoked with a sacred formulation.
   Let the pressing stone with its call make your mind inclined hither.

4. Drink this soma here, Indra, the preeminent immortal exhilaration.
   The streams of the clear (soma) have flowed to you in the seat of truth.
5. Chant now to Indra and speak solemn words.
   The pressed drops have exhilarated him. Do homage to (his) preeminent might.
6. No one is a better charioteer than you, Indra, when you control your two fallow bays.
   No one has reached you in greatness, not (even) one with good horses.

7. He who alone apportions the goods to the pious mortal, the unrepulsable master – (that's) Indra indeed!
8. When will he kick the ungenerous mortal with his foot like a mushroom?
   When will he listen to our hymns? – Indra indeed!
9. For someone who has pressed soma seeks to entice you here, away from the many.
   He has control of powerful strength – Indra indeed!

10. The buffalo-cows drink just so of the sweet honey belonging to the (ritual) midpoint, they who, fellow travelers with bullish Indra, become exhilarated for beauty—
    – The good ones (cheer) on his sovereignty.

11. These dappled ones, eager for caresses, prepare the soma for him.
 The milk-cows dear to Indra propel his mace, his missile.
 – The good ones (cheer) on his sovereignty.
12. They, forethoughtful, serve his might with reverence.
 They follow his many commandments, to be first in his thought.
 – The good ones (cheer) on his sovereignty.

13. With the bones of Dadhyañc unrepulsable Indra smashed the nine and ninety obstacles.
14. The head of the horse that he was seeking set away in the mountains, that he found in the reed-filled (lake?).
15. Right there they thought of the secret name of the cow of Tvaṣṭar—likewise in the house of the moon.

16. Who today yokes the cattle to the chariot-pole of truth—the vehement, wrathful, very angry ones, with arrows in their mouths, shooting at the heart, but embodying joy? Whoever will succeed in bringing them, he will live.
17. Who retreats and who is thrust back? Who is fearful? Who might think Indra exists? Who (might think he is) nearby?
 Who will speak for offspring, who for a retinue and for wealth? Who will speak on behalf of himself, on behalf of his people?
18. Who reverently invokes Agni with oblation and ghee? (Who) will perform sacrifice with a ladle according to the fixed ritual sequences?
 For whom will the gods swiftly convey the offering here? Who might think himself a man whose oblations are worth pursuing, who has gods well on his side?

19. Surely you, (though) a god, will solemnly praise the mortal, o strongest one.
 There is no other dispenser of mercy than you, bounteous one. Indra, I say this speech to you:
20. Let not your benefits, nor your help, good one, ever cheat us.
 And mete out to us all goods coming from the settled domains, you who belong to the descendants of Manu.

I.85 Maruts

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
12 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5, 12

A typical Marut hymn: their beauty and their adornments, their unruly journey to the sacrifice and the thunderstorm it represents, their parentage (Rudra as father, Pr̥śni the cow as mother), their fearsome power. One stylistic peculiarity is the tendency to repeat with minimal variation parts of one verse in the next, an example of concatenative repetition; see 2c/3ab; 4cd/5a; 6c/7b, d; 10a/11a.

Although the focus throughout is firmly on the Maruts, there is one seemingly intrusive verse (9), where the Maruts are unmentioned and mythologically irrelevant, in which Tvaṣṭar fashions the mace for Indra to slay Vr̥tra. Indra's release of the waters after the slaying must be the point of contact, since the next two verses (10–11) concern the Maruts' tipping the heavenly well to pour out its water.

1. Those who go forth in beauty like wives, spanned together on their journey, the sons of Rudra, possessing wondrous power—for the Maruts made the two world-halves grow strong—the heroes reach exhilaration, eager at the rites.
2. Once grown, they attained greatness: the Rudras made their seat in heaven.
Chanting their chant, generating Indra's strength, they whose mother is Pr̥śni put on their splendors.
3. When those whose mother is a cow beautify themselves with unguents, the beautiful ones put radiant (ornaments) on their bodies.
They thrust away every antagonist. Ghee flows along their tracks.
4. Those good battlers who flash out with their spears, stirring forth even the unstirrable by their power—
When, o Maruts, in a bullish troop you have yoked the mind-swift dappled mares to your chariots,
5. When you have yoked the dappled mares to your chariots, speeding the stone at the prize-contest, o Maruts—they unloose the streams of the ruddy one and inundate the earth with waters like a skin.
6. Let the quick-streaming spans convey you hither; quickly flying with your arms, go forth.
Sit on the ritual grass: a broad seat has been made for you. Make yourselves exhilarated, Maruts, on the honeyed stalk.
7. Those self-powerful ones strengthened themselves in their greatness. They mounted the vault; they made themselves a broad seat.
When Viṣṇu rinsed the bull [=soma] arousing exhilaration, [and/or] When Viṣṇu aided the bull [=Indra], stirred by the exhilarating drink, they settled like birds on the dear ritual grass.
8. Like champions, like oncoming fighters, like those seeking fame in battles, they have marshaled themselves.
All creatures fear the Maruts—the superior men glittering in appearance like kings.
9. When Tvaṣṭar the good craftsman had turned the well-made golden mace with its thousand spikes, Indra took it to do the manly works: he smashed Vṛtra, he forced out the flood of waters.

10. They pushed the well upward with their power; they split apart the mountain, though it was firmly fixed.
    Blowing their music, the Maruts of good drops performed these joyous (deeds) in the exhilaration of soma.
11. They pushed the well aslant in this way. They poured out the wellspring for the thirsting Gotama.
    They come hither to him with help—they of bright radiance. They satisfy the desire of the inspired poet through their own essential qualities.
12. The shelters you have for the one who performs ritual labor—hold these out threefold to the pious man.
    Extend these to us, Maruts; establish for us wealth in good heroes, o bulls.

I.86 Maruts

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
10 verses: gāyatrī

The first half of this hymn has a remarkably intricate syntactic structure, especially for a gāyatrī hymn. Verse 1 makes the outlines of this structure clear: a genitive relative pronoun (yásya "whose, of whom") introducing a clause in which the Maruts perform some service for the man so identified, with a main clause expressing the rewards this man receives. (Roughly paraphrased, in vs. 1 "whose dwelling you protect, he has the best protector.") With this structure set, the poet feels free to attenuate and manipulate it. In our view, verses 2 and 3 are examples of this same structure, but the yásya has been gapped in verse 2 and must be supplied from verse 1, along with a verb for 2a. Moreover, the main clause expressing the reward is postponed until verse 3c, and there are three different relative clauses that it completes (2a, 2bc, 3ab). The repeated vā́'s ("or") allow this submerged structure to be discerned, despite the gapping. The three clauses define three different beneficiaries of the Maruts' favor: the sacrificer (2a), the poet himself (2bc), or the poet's patron ("prize-seeker" 3ab).

Verses 4–5 continue the fronted genitive pattern, but now with a demonstrative pronoun, not a relative. The referent is still the Maruts' client, and his success becomes magnified in these verses; not only is his sacrifice a success (vs. 4), but he subjugates the surrounding peoples, and his sacrificial offerings go all the way to heaven (vs. 5).

Verse 6 abruptly switches to the 1st plural from the 3rd singular: it's we who have been performing all this sacrificial labor, and the poet implicitly identifies us with the anonymous hard-working and well-rewarded man of the first five verses. The 3rd sg. sacrificer returns in verses 7–8, with the syntactic structure switched: the main clause and happy reward precede the relative yásya clause (see esp. vs. 7). The last two verses call on the Maruts for their help, especially against aggressors.

Gotama's penchant for elaborate and varied syntactic patterning has been noted previously in the introductions to several of his hymns.

1. O Maruts of extensive might, certainly the man over whose dwelling place you keep protective watch from heaven, he has the best protector.
2. Or he by whose sacrifices (you were attracted), o you whose vehicle is the sacrifice, or of the thoughts of which inspired poet you heard the call, o Maruts—
3. Or for which prize-seeker you fashioned an inspired poet to follow, he will go to a pen full of cattle.
4. Of that hero here the soma has been pressed at the rituals of day(break) on his ritual grass;
   his solemn speech and exhilarating drink are being announced.
5. To him let the beings listen attentively, to him who dominates all the separate peoples.
   His are the refreshing drinks that have run even to the sun.
6. For through many autumns we have done pious work, o Maruts, with the help of the separate peoples.
7. O Maruts who receive the first of the sacrifice, let that mortal be well-portioned
   whose pleasurable offerings you will guide.
8. You superior men whose strength is real, you know the sweat of the one laboring to exhaustion, or the desire of the one who seeks the (ritual) track.
9. You whose strength is real—make it [=strength] manifest by your greatness.
   Smite the demon with your lightning.
10. Conceal the concealable darkness. Run over every rapacious one.
    Make the light that we desire.

I.87 Maruts

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
6 verses: jagatī

The gleeful density of descriptive adjectives in verse 1 opens this hymn with a bang. It is only in the final pāda of this first verse that we encounter a verb—and its subject is explicitly left unspecified ("whoever they are"). On the one hand, they need not be named, as the descriptions are enough to identify them as Maruts; on the other hand, it is frequently stated that individual Maruts can't be told apart. The next two verses (2–3) are more dynamic, depicting the Maruts' usual wild journey, with its thunder, lightning, and rain.

The first half of verse 4 returns to the style of verse 1, with a torrent of adjectives, this time applied not to the plural Maruts, but to the singular "flock" (gaṇá). The second half of this verse opens with the 2nd sg. verb "you are." Although most interpreters take this as an address to the Marut flock, with a shift of person—and this would be the default reading—we believe something more tricky is going on. The patronymic of our poet Gotama is Rāhū*gaṇa*, whose second element is this word "flock." On the basis of this shared verbal designation, Gotama seems to be addressing himself and identifying himself with the Maruts, particularly as the "furtherer of this insight," that is, as a producer of sacral poetry arising from inner insight. (He may call himself a requiter of debts because he pays with his verbal labor for the benefits given by both gods and patrons.) He clarifies this identification in the following verse (5). We are poets because of our kinship with our ancestral father, that is, the Marut flock (pāda a). As with them, our speech ("tongue") is inspired by the vision ("eye") produced by soma (pāda b), and we aspire to emulate the Maruts, who chanted to Indra to encourage him in the Vr̥tra battle and acquired a share in the sacrifice (pādas cd). (The relationship between Gotama Rāhūgaṇa, the Maruts, and verbal inspiration is explored even more elaborately in the following hymn, I.88.)

The hymn ends (vs. 6) with a more conventional depiction of the Maruts.

1. Projecting power and strength, copious, unbowable, unfaltering, possessing the silvery drink, most delightful, most manly, with their unguents they have anointed themselves—whoever they are—like the ruddy (dawns) with stars.
2. When you have set your mind on journeying on the byways like birds, o Maruts, along who knows what path, the casks on your chariots drip. Sprinkle ghee the color of honey for the one who chants.
3. At their drives, at their journeys the earth trembles like one with faltering step, when they hitch up, for beauty.
   Playful, boisterous, with glinting spears, the shakers admire their own greatness.
4. For such is the flock: youthful, self-propelling, possessing dappled horses, irrepressible, showing mastery, swathed in powers.
   And you are a real, irreproachable requiter of debts, a furtherer of this insight here. Therefore you [=Gotama Rāhūgaṇa] are (also) a bullish flock.
5. We speak by virtue of our kinship with our primordial father; the tongue advances with the eye of soma.

When, equipped with chant, they [=Maruts] reached Indra by their labor, just after that they acquired names worthy of the sacrifice.

6. For splendor they join themselves with radiant beams, with rays, with those equipped with chant—the well-spangled ones, possessing axes and arrows, fearless. They know their own dear Marut nature.

I.88 Maruts

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
6 verses: prastārapaṅkti 1, 6; triṣṭubh 2–4; virāḍrūpā 5

Metrically, thematically, and poetically complex, this hymn brings Gotama's Marut collection to a worthy end. It is structured as a "journey" hymn—the Maruts' journey to and arrival at the sacrifice—but unlike the general run of such hymns, with stereotyped and simple expressions, this is a superbly crafted example of the genre, which develops in unpredictable directions.

The hymn is organized by pairs of verses. The first two describe the glittering flight of the Maruts, in fairly typical terms, with special emphasis on their chariots. The focus shifts to the waiting poets in the next verse pair (3–4). At the beginning of verse 3 the Maruts are said to "have axes on their bodies." This detail seems at first just to continue the inventory of the Maruts' equipment found in the previous verses, but the poet turns it into a telling image: the poets will raise up their poems "like trees," thus inviting the Maruts to chop them down with their axes—that is, to take possession of the poems. The next verse (4) picks up another superficially straightforward characterization of the Maruts and complicates it with reference to the poets. In verse 1 the Maruts were urged to "fly like birds" to the sacrifice; in verse 4 unspecified plural subjects "wheel like vultures" (pāda 1). In our view these vultures are the poets (the Gotamas named later in the verse), mentally circling around the dhī́ "insight, poetic vision" (pāda b) that they are seeking in order to produce a bráhman, a "sacred formulation," fit for the Maruts. In the second half of the verse they succeed in making this bráhman (pāda c) and, in a different image, push the fountainhead of poetic inspiration upward in order to drink from it (pāda d). They had also been wheeling around the goddess vārkāryā́ (pāda 4b). This hapax has been much discussed, and is generally considered to be the name of the Gotamas' muse, their "Sangeskunst." We will propose our own interpretation below.

The last two verses (5–6) depict the simultaneous arrival of the Maruts and of the inspired thought for the poem in their honor, again in complex and obscure imagery. The literary epiphany of a god is often marked linguistically by deictic pronouns and/or the aorist of immediacy ("just now"). The last two verses of I.88 begin with paired double deictics: (vs. 5) etát tyád and (vs. 6) eṣā́ syā́ both meaning "this very," and verse 5 contains also the aorist aceti "has just appeared/been perceived," marking the arrival of both the poem and the gods. Verse 6 is the most enigmatic of the hymn, though the general situation is clear: the Maruts have just arrived, and they are greeted—by something that both "sounds" and is "caused to sound." This something is identified as anubhartrī́, another feminine-gender hapax; it seems a good interpretive strategy to attempt to connect the two mysterious feminines, vārkāryā́ in verse 4 and anubhartrī́ here. Both of them are fairly easy to understand on a literal level: the former means literally "water-maker," while the latter is made up of the preverb ánu and an agent noun of the root bhṛ. The lexeme ánu-bhṛ has a quite specific value in the Ṛgveda and Atharvaveda: it means "penetrate sexually, stick (one's penis) in." It is, of course, a piquant paradox that the "penis wielder" should be feminine. With this meaning in mind, vārkāryā́ in verse 4 becomes somewhat clearer: the "water-maker" can also refer to the penis. But what would be the figurative or metaphorical sense of these two words, and how, in particular, can the literal sense be made to conform with the statements in verse 6 that the object is question both sounds and is made to sound? The riddle is solved if we assume that it is a musical instrument, and in fact that it is the first reference to the "Indian lute," the vīṇā (the first occurrence of that word is in the Taittirīya Saṃhitā, an early Vedic prose text), a noun of feminine gender. At least some of the forms of this musical instrument bear a remarkable resemblance to male genitalia. The poet brings his hymn to a climax with this clever sexual pun, which surely would have been appreciated by the lusty Maruts. (This verse and its role in the hymn are discussed in more detail in Jamison 1981.)

1. With your chariots fitted with lightning bolts and with spears, whose wings are horses, accompanied by lovely chants, drive here, o Maruts.
   Fly here like birds, with highest refreshment for us, you masters of artifice.
2. With the ruddy, tawny horses they drive at will for beauty, with their horses that outstrip chariots—provided with hatchets (the Marut flock) is sparkling like a brilliant.
   They keep pounding the earth with the wheel-rim of their chariot.
3. For splendor you have axes on your bodies; (the poets) will make their wise thoughts erect like trees for you, well-born Maruts. The powerfully brilliant ones [=Maruts] are running to the (pressing) stone.
4. For days, (like) vultures they have been wheeling around this insight for you, and around the goddess "Water-Maker" [=penis =vīṇā].
   Making a sacred formulation, with their chants the Gotamas have pushed the fountainhead erect, for drinking.
5. Just now it has appeared, not (even) a wagon-trek away—the (formulation) that Gotama (has made) in private for you, Maruts, upon seeing your golden-wheeled (chariots) and (you) copper-tusked boars streaking across (the sky).

6. Just now this "lady hornsman" [=penis-wielder =vīṇā] sounds in response to you, Maruts, like the voice of a cantor.
   (The player) has made (her) sound by the power of his hands, the way women like it.

I.89 All Gods

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
10 verses: jagatī 1–5, virāṭsthānā 6, triṣṭubh 8–10

Unlike Gotama's often clever and verbally inventive hymns to particular gods, this hymn to all the gods has a dutiful air, and the gods chosen for inclusion (or exclusion) don't seem to conform to any pattern. Still, there is a pleasing symmetry, especially at the beginning and end. This feature is clear in the first two verses of the hymn, where the word bhadrá "auspicious" is applied both to the ideas that mortals will acquire and turn into the praise hymns for the gods and to the favors that the gods will bestow on the properly worshiping humans in return. These unspecified benevolent gods return toward the end of the hymn (vss. 8–9), and the particular favor we desire from them is to secure our proper length of life (see esp. vss. 8cd, 9), the very request with which the first verse pair ended (vs. 2d)

In between are a series of verses invoking various gods and asking for their help. The longest list is found in verse 3, but gods or cosmic forces are named in every verse—from the very prominent, such as the various Ādityas (vs. 3) and Indra (vs. 6), to the obscure and marginal, notably Tārkṣya (vs. 6c), a deified racehorse, to judge from its other appearance in the R̥gveda (X.178). The final verse (10) returns to the Ādityan emphasis of verse 3 by identifying their mother Aditi with the most important cosmic features, kinship relations, and beings.

1. Let auspicious ideas come here to us from all sides—undeceivable, uncircumscribable, bursting out—so that the gods will be (ready) to increase us always, will be our unfaltering protectors every day.
2. The auspicious benevolence of the gods is for those who aim straight; let the generosity of the gods roll down toward us.
   We have reverently approached the fellowship of the gods: let the gods lengthen our lifetime for us to live.
3. Them do we call upon with our age-old formal invocation [=nivid]: Bhaga, Mitra, Aditi, Skill unfailing, Aryaman, Varuṇa, Soma, the Aśvins. May well-portioned Sarasvatī create joy for us.
4. At this let the Wind blow us a remedy that is joy itself. At this (let) Mother Earth, at this (let) Father Heaven, at this (let) the soma-pressing stones (be) joy itself. To this, o holy Aśvins, give ear.

5. The one who holds sway, the lord of the moving and the still, who quickens insight, do we call upon for help, so that Pūṣan will be (ready) to increase our possessions, will be a guardian, an undeceivable protector for our well-being.
6. Well-being for us (may) Indra of strengthened fame (establish); well-being for us (may) Pūṣan of all possessions; well-being for us (may) Tārkṣya of indestructible wheel-rims; well-being for us may Bṛhaspati establish.
7. The Maruts having dappled horses, having Pṛśni as mother, charging to beauty, coming regularly to the rites, the men having Agni as tongue and the Sun as eye: may all the gods come here to us with help.
8. Might we hear (only what is) auspicious with our ears, o gods; might we see (only what is) auspicious with our eyes, o you who are worthy of the sacrifice.
Having praised (you?), with sturdy limbs and bodies might we traverse the lifetime that has been established by the gods.
9. A hundred autumns are now in front (of us), o gods, where you have made old age for our bodies, where sons become fathers. Do not harm our lifetime in the midst of our progress.
10. Aditi is heaven. Aditi is the midspace. Aditi is the mother; she is the father, she the son.
Aditi is the All Gods, the five peoples. Aditi is what has been born, Aditi what is to be born.

I.90 All Gods

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
9 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 9

In this hymn as in the last one it is clear that Gotama did not reserve his best efforts for All God hymns. With its elementary phraseology and patterned repetitions this hymn is blessedly easy to read but offers little of interest. It falls into three clear parts, which may well have been originally separate (though the hymn does not disturb the pattern of hymn arrangement in the Saṃhitā): verses 1–5, 6–8 (these two segments in the same meter), and 9.

The first segment begins with the principal Ādityas as our guides (vs. 1) and touches briefly on their general benefits to mortals in the next three verses. The final verse (5) is more specifically focused on the ritual interchange: the hymns we offer to the gods should produce cows in return. The next segment (vss. 6–8) simply attributes metaphorical "honey" to all natural phenomena, while the last verse (9) expresses the hope that a variety of gods will be luck or welfare for us. This final verse is highly reminiscent of a much longer such litany in VII.35.

1. With straight guidance let Varuṇa, let Mitra the knowing guide us;
   let Aryaman jointly with the gods.
2. For they are goods-possessors of goods; unerring, they with their mighty powers guard the commandments everywhere.
3. They will extend shelter to us, the immortals to the mortals, thrusting away hatreds.
4. Let them clear out paths for us for easy passage—Indra, the Maruts, Pūṣan, Bhaga, (all those) to be extolled.
5. And (make) our poetic insights tipped with cows, o Pūṣan and Viṣṇu traveling your ways; make us possessed of well-being.
6. Honey do the winds (blow) to the one who follows truth; honey do the rivers stream.
   Honeyed be the plants for us.
7. Honey by night and at dawn; honeyed is the earthly realm.
   Honey be Father Heaven for us.
8. Honeyed be the tree for us, honeyed the sun.
   Honeyed be the cows for us.
9. Luck for us Mitra, luck Varuṇa; luck be Aryaman for us—Luck for us Indra and Bṛhaspati; luck for us Viṣṇu of the wide strides.

I.91 Soma

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
23 verses: triṣṭubh 1–4, gāyatrī 5–16, uṣṇih 17, triṣṭubh 18–23

Long and metrically disunified, this hymn no doubt falls into distinct segments, but there is no scholarly agreement about the exact divisions. Some verse groupings are found together in later liturgical texts (e.g., vss. 16–18, which, though in three different meters, agree in contents), but in other cases there is no external evidence. It is possible that the triṣṭubh verses at the beginning (vss. 1–4) and those at the end (vss. 19–23) belong together, with the dimeter verses 5–16 (plus 17–18) having been inserted between them. This is suggested by the fact that verse 19 starts with the same sequence as the beginning of verse 4 (yā́ te dhā́māni), and also by the apparent ring between 1a prá cikitaḥ and 23d prá cikitsā.

In any case this hymn shares both the rather simplified rhetoric and the totalizing thematics of Gotama's hymns to the All Gods. Soma is identified with numerous gods (see, e.g., vss. 3, 5) and is credited with multiple cosmogonic deeds (e.g., vs. 22) and martial powers (e.g., vs. 21). Especially in the gāyatrī verses he is begged for all sorts of aid and comradeship.

Since this is not a Soma Pavamāna hymn and is not found in the IXth Maṇḍala, the ritual details that dominate that maṇḍala are essentially absent here. The exception is the aforementioned triad of verses 16–18, each of which contains a form of ā́ √pyā "swell," an idiom used of the soaking of the soma stalks in water to make them swell up before their pressing. As this action occurs before the purification process proper, it is hardly mentioned in the IXth Maṇḍala (twice in fact, once [IX.31.4] in an exact repetition of the present vs. 16 in a hymn attributed to our poet Gotama Rāhūgaṇa), while it is the most prominent ritual detail in this hymn.

1. You, Soma, have become conspicuous through our inspired thought.
   You—lead along the straightest path.
   Through your guidance, o drop, our insightful forefathers had their share in the treasure among the gods.
2. You, Soma, become very intent through your intentions; very skillful with your skills, all-knowing.
   You are a bull through your bullish powers, your greatness. You became brilliant through your brilliancies, drawing the gaze of men.
3. The commandments of King Varuṇa are yours; lofty and deep is your domain, o Soma.
   You are blazing pure, like dear Mitra. You are besought for skill like Aryaman, o Soma.
4. Your domains that are in heaven, that are on the earth, that are in the mountains, in the plants, in the waters—with all those, being well-disposed and not angry, King Soma, accept our oblations.
5. You, Soma, are lord of the settlements; you are king and Vr̥tra-smasher.
   You are auspicious intention.
6. And if you will wish us to live, Soma, we will not die.
   (You are) the lord of the forest to whom praise is dear.
7. You, Soma, (establish) good fortune for the great man, you, for the youth who pursues the truth;
   you establish skill for living.
8. You, King Soma—guard us on all sides from the one who bears malice.
   No comrade of one such as you could suffer harm.
9. Soma, your forms of help that are joy itself for the pious man, with those become our helper.
10. This sacrifice here—having delighted in this speech, come near to it.
    Soma, be (ready) to strengthen us.

11. Soma, we who know speech strengthen you with our hymns.
    Very compassionate to us, enter us.
12. Fattening the livestock, smiting afflictions, finding goods, increasing prosperity, Soma, be a good ally to us.
13. Soma, take pleasure in our heart, as cows do in pastures, as a young man in his prime does in his own home.
14. O Soma, the mortal who will take pleasure in your comradeship, o god, him does skill accompany, him does the sage poet.
15. Make a broad space for us against imprecation; Soma, protect us from narrow straits.
    Be a comrade well disposed to us.
16. Swell up! Let your bullish power come together from all sides, Soma.
    Be there at the gathering for the prize.
17. Swell up, most exhilarating Soma, with all your shoots.
    Become our comrade of best fame, to strengthen us.
18. Let your milk-drinks come together and together your prizes, together the bullish powers of you who vanquish hostility.
    Swelling up for the immortal, Soma, establish your own highest measures of fame in heaven.
19. Those domains of yours that they sacrifice to with oblation, let all these of yours be encompassing the sacrifice.
    Fattening the livestock, furthering (us), bringing good heroes, not smiting heroes, o Soma, advance to our doorways.
20. Soma gives a milk-cow, Soma a swift steed, Soma a hero fit for action—one fit for the residence, for the rite, for the assembly, one who brings fame to the forefathers—(gives these to the man) who will do ritual service to him.
21. Invincible in combats, in battles a deliverer, winning the sun, winning the waters, herdsman of the community, born at raids, granting good dwelling and good fame, conquering—you would we celebrate, o Soma.
22. You, Soma, begot all these plants here; you the waters, you the cows.
    You have stretched across the wide midspace; you have uncovered the darkness with your light.
23. With your god(like) mind, god Soma, battle for a share of wealth for us, mighty one.
    Don’t let it hold out on you. You are master of heroism. On behalf of both (men and gods? / singers and patrons?) be on the lookout in the quest for cattle.

I.92 Dawn (1–15), Aśvins (16–18)

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
18 verses: jagatī 1–4, triṣṭubh 5–12, uṣṇih 13–18

This metrically complex structure with two different dedicands must originally have consisted of several independent hymns—probably, with Oldenberg, verses 1–4, 5–8, 9–12, 13–15, 16–18, all but the last dedicated to Dawn. Indeed, the first two segments (vss. 1–4 in jagatī, 5–8 in triṣṭubh) appear to be partial variants of each other, the first describing multiple Dawns (except vs. 4), the second a single Dawn. There are precise agreements in lexicon, phraseology, and imagery, particularly between verses 1–2 and 5–6, that go beyond standard shared Dawn vocabulary. The seductive dancing girl of verse 4 also reminds of the smiling siren of verse 6. The third segment (vss. 9–12) has fewer connections with the first two, but is thematically unified, especially by the emphasis on "diminishing/belittling" (all expressed by the root mī in different combinations) in verses 10–12.

All three of the segments in trimeter meter (that is, through vs. 12) contain arresting images, and the poet enjoys exploiting ambiguities to poetic effect. In verses 1 and 12, for example, he uses different syntactic constructions in the simile and the frame because the verb held in common by both can be either reflexive or transitive; in verse 3 the pun inherent in the root arc (both "shine" and "chant") allows the introduction of a simile involving female work-songs, though the dawns themselves are presumably not chanting.

The last two segments, in uṣṇih meter, to Dawn and the Aśvins respectively (vss. 13–15, 16–18), are, not surprisingly, less complex. Both hope for the arrival of the divinities at the sacrifice, accompanied by plenty of presents.

1. These very Dawns have made themselves a beacon. In the eastern half of the dusky realm they anoint their beam [=sacrificial post].
   Presenting themselves, as bold ones present arms, the reddish cows, the mothers come toward (us).
2. Their ruddy beams have flown up at will. They have yoked their reddish cows, easy to yoke.
   The Dawns have made their patterns as of old. A gleaming beam have the reddish ones propped up.
3. They chant [/shine] like women busy with their labors, (coming always) along the same route from afar, conveying refreshment to the man of good action [=sacrificer], the man of good gifts, the man who sacrifices and presses soma all the days.
4. She strews ornaments on herself like a dancing girl. She uncovers her breast like a ruddy (cow) her udder [?].
   Making light for all creation, Dawn has opened up the darkness as cows (would) their pen.

5. Her gleaming ray has appeared opposite. She spreads herself out, thrusts away the black void.
The Daughter of Heaven has propped up her bright beam, her ornament, like (a priest) propping up the sacrificial post, the ornament at the ceremonies, and anointing it.
6. We have crossed to the further shore of this darkness. Dawn, dawning, is making her patterns.
Like one aiming to please, she, shining forth, smiles for splendor. She of the lovely face has awakened (us?) to benevolence.
7. Light-filled leader of liberalities, the Daughter of Heaven is praised by the Gotamas.
O Dawn, mete out prizes rich in offspring, rich in men, founded on horses, tipped with cows.
8. O Dawn, might I attain this glorious wealth, rich in good heroes, founded on horses, with alien-slaves as its forelock—o you of good portion, who with fame of wondrous power radiate forth, motivated by (desire for) the prize, to lofty (wealth).

9. The goddess, overseeing all creatures, (like) an eye, facing toward them, shines forth widely.
Awakening all life to activity, she has found the speech of every zealous one.
10. Being born again and again though ancient, (always) beautifying herself to the same hue, like a successful (gambler) with the best throw who diminishes the stake (of his opponent), the goddess keeps diminishing the lifetime of the mortal as she ages him.
11. Uncovering the ends of heaven, she has awakened. She keeps her sister [=Night] far away.
Diminishing human (life-)spans, the maiden radiates forth with the eye of her swain [=Sun].
12. The bright, well-portioned one spreading herself as if (dispersing) cattle, like a river (spreading) its surge, she has whitened forth widely.
Not belittling the divine commandments, she has come into view, appearing along with the rays of the sun.

13. Dawn, bring that bright (gift) here to us—you who are rich in prize mares—by which we may acquire both progeny and posterity.
14. Dawn, here today—o radiant one rich in cows and horses—richly dawn forth to us, o liberal-spirited one.
15. So yoke the ruddy horses today! O Dawn rich in prize mares; then convey to us all good portions.

16. Aśvins, (drive) your circuit that brings cows and gold, right up to us, wondrous ones.
    Stop your chariot nearby, like-minded ones.
17. You two, who have made your signal-call (reach) all the way to heaven and at the same time made light for the people, convey nourishment here to us, you Aśvins.
18. The two gods, embodiments of joy, wondrous, of golden course—let (the priests) waking at dawn convey them here, for soma-drinking.

I.93 Agni and Soma

Gotama Rāhūgaṇa
12 verses: anuṣṭubh 1–3, triṣṭubh 4–8, gāyatrī 9–11, triṣṭubh 12

Another metrically complex hymn, this is the last attributed to Gotama Rāhūgaṇa in Maṇḍala I. Despite the variety of meters, the piece is unified by the emphasis on the two gods to whom it is dedicated, and especially by the presence of the dvandva compound agnī́-ṣómā "Agni and Soma" in every verse. This compound is found only twice elsewhere in the R̥gveda (both times in Maṇḍala X). Although Agni and Soma are the quintessential ritual divinities, each representing a crucial sacrificial substance, this is the only hymn in the R̥gveda explicitly dedicated to them together, and it is a fairly banal product. However, it is worth noting that, at least in our view, V.44, sometimes called the hardest hymn in the R̥gveda, seems to concern Agni and Soma simultaneously, though it is identified in the Anukramaṇī as an All God hymn.

The essential unity of the hymn is also discernible in its fairly simple thematic-cum-syntactic structure, which regularly constructs the verse as a relative clause referring to the actions of a pious mortal ("whoever serves [etc.]…"), and a main clause expressing his reward (see vss. 2–3, 8, 10), as well as in repeated vocabulary in the earlier and later parts (see, e.g., matches between vss. 2 and 8, 3 and 10). The hymn also has an outer ring: the last word (12d śruṣṭimántam "having an attentive hearing") recalls the first verb of the hymn (1b śr̥ṇutam), the imperative "hear, listen!"

One part of the hymn stands out, verses 4–6, which ascribe various mythological deeds to the pair. Curiously, the deeds in verses 4 and 5 are really more appropriate to other gods: the mysterious Br̥saya and the theft in verse 4 are found also in a hymn to the river goddess Sarasvatī (VI.61.1, 3), while verse 5 sounds like a generic praise of Indra. In verse 6, however, we do find mythological material appropriate to the two gods addressed, namely the story of the stealing of those gods. This is, tellingly, the only place in the hymn where the two gods are treated separately: Mātariśvan is the figure who stole fire, while the falcon's theft of soma from heaven is also often alluded to.

1. Agni and Soma, hear this call of mine, you bulls.
   Delight in the well-spoken hymns. Become refreshment for the pious man.
2. Agni and Soma, whoever today renders this speech as service for you two, for him establish an abundance of heroes, the thriving of cattle, an abundance of horses.
3. Agni and Soma, whoever will piously perform a poured offering or the preparation of an oblation for you, he along with his offspring will attain to an abundance of heroes and a complete lifespan.
4. Agni and Soma, this heroic deed of you two has become conspicuous—that you stole the provender, the cows from the niggard.
   You brought low the posterity of Bṛsaya. You found the single light for the many.
5. You, Soma and Agni, of like resolve, placed these lights in heaven.
   You, Agni and Soma, released from imprecation and from reproach the rivers that had been held back.
6. Mātariśvan bore the one here from heaven; the falcon stole the other from the rock.
   Agni and Soma, having grown strong through a sacred formulation, you have made wide space for the sacrifice.
7. Agni and Soma, the oblation set before you—pursue it; yearn for it, bulls; enjoy it.
   Since you are providers of good shelter and good help, therefore establish luck and lifetime for the sacrificer.
8. Whoever will serve Agni and Soma with an oblation, with a mind turned toward the gods, with ghee, guard his (ritual) ordinance; protect him from narrow straits; to his clan, to his people extend great shelter.
9. O Agni and Soma, who have common property and a common invocation—crave our hymns.
   You two have come together among the gods.
10. Agni and Soma, whoever piously honors you with this (oblation), who honors you with ghee, for him shine loftily.
11. Agni and Soma, you will enjoy these oblations of ours here.
    Together drive right up to us.
12. Agni and Soma, deliver our steeds (to safety). Let the ruddy (cows) who sweeten the oblations swell up.
    In us and in our benefactors establish powers. Give our ceremony an attentive hearing.

Most of the next 22 hymns (94–115) are attributed to Kutsa Āṅgirasa by the Anukramaṇī. Though a few (99–100, alternatively 105) have other poets named, the presence of the Kutsa refrain in both 100 and 105 (99 is a one-verse hymn) supports the unity of the collection. The Kutsa refrain, in triṣṭubh, "This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven," occupies the last hemistich of the last verse of every hymn except I.97 (a gāyatrī hymn), 99 (a one-verse hymn), and 104 (though this last hymn is in triṣṭubh).

The Agni hymns (94–99) are each dedicated to a different form of Agni. There follow, in the normal order, five hymns to Indra, three to the All Gods, with miscellaneous other divinities making up the collection. The collection is at a generally high level of poetic craftsmanship, but we will only single out for special mention 104, a challenging Indra hymn, 105, a famous and enigmatic All God hymn, and the lovely Dawn hymn 113.

I.94 Agni

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
6 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15–16

The first fourteen verses in this hymn, in jagatī, end with the refrain "while in company with you may we not come to harm." The first half of the hymn (vss. 1–7) gives little motivation for this repeated, preventative hope: the subject is primarily the sacrifice and the mutually beneficial relationship between Agni and the sacrificers. But in verses 8 and 9 evil rivals of the sacrificer appear, and Agni's aid against them is requested. The next two verses (10–11) sketch the dangers posed by Agni himself as the uncontrolled forest fire, and verse 12 calls for Agni's help against the most potent menace of all, the anger of the gods. The remaining verses (13–16) return to the reassuring realm of properly performed sacrifice, with Agni providing benefits and protection to the ritualist.

1. For Jātavedas, who deserves this praise, we would bring it into being like a chariot, with our inspired thought, for his solicitude for us in the assembly is beneficial. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
2. For whom you perform sacrifice, that one reaches his goal. Without assault he dwells in peace; he will acquire good heroes en masse.
   He is powerful; constraint does not reach him. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
3. Might we be able to kindle you. Send our insights to their goal. The gods eat the oblation poured in you.
   Convey the Ādityas here, for we are eager for them. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.

4. We shall bring the kindling, and we shall make oblations to you, while being attentive at each (ritual) juncture.
   For us to live longer, send our insights to their goal. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
5. His kinfolk [=flames], the herdsmen of the clans, (of) both the two-footed and the four-footed, roam by night.
   You are the great, bright sign of dawn. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
6. You are the Adhvaryu and the primordial Hotar, the Praśāstar and the Potar, by birth the one placed in front [/Purohita].
   Wise, you prosper all the priestly offices, o insightful one. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
7. You of lovely face who have the same appearance in all directions—even though far in the distance, you shine across (it [=distance]) as if right there.
   You see across even the blind darkness of night. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
8. Let the chariot of the soma-presser be in front, o gods, and let our recitation dominate those whose insight is evil.
   Take heed of this speech (of ours) and prosper it. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
9. With fatal weapons strike away those of evil recitation and of evil insight, and whatever rapacious ones are in the distance or nearby.
   Then for the sacrifice and for the singer make an easy way. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
10. When you have harnessed the pair of ruddy, wind-sped chestnuts to your chariot and your bellowing is like that of a bull, then you spur on the trees [/the winners] with (a flame) whose beacon is smoke. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
11. And then the winged are afraid of your roar, when your "drops" [=sparks], consuming the grasslands, have spread out.
   That (makes) an easy way for your own little "chariots" [=flames?]. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
12. This (Agni) here is to be suckled, as the unerring appeaser of the anger of Mitra and Varuṇa and of the Maruts.
   Have mercy upon us! Let the mind of these (gods) be once again (as before). – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
13. As a god, of the gods you are Mitra, the unerring ally. As a Vasu [/good one], of the Vasus you are the one beloved at the rite.
   Might we be in your broadest shelter. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.

14. This is your benefit—that, when kindled in your own house and bepoured with soma, you remain wakeful as the most merciful (of gods).
    You provide property and treasure to the man who ritually serves. – O Agni, while in company with you may we not come to harm.
15. For whom you will perform ritual service, o you possessing good property, for whom there is blamelessness in his entirety, o Aditi [=Innocence], and whom you will rouse with your beneficial power and with generosity that provides offspring—might we be those.
16. You, o Agni, knowing the quality of good fortune—for us extend our lifetime here, o god.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.95 Agni (or Agni Auṣasa "Agni at Dawn")

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: triṣṭubh

A typical puzzle hymn in many ways. The dedicand of the hymn, Agni, does not appear by name until verse 9, and there are only two occurrences of the name, both vocatives, in the whole hymn (the second being in the final, summary verse 11). The address to Agni in verse 9 also breaks the uninterrupted 3rd-person description that holds sway in the hymn up to that point. In what precedes, Agni's characteristics, the ritual service given to him, and the entities that render that service are referred to in oblique fashion.

The Anukramaṇī suggests that it is Agni "at dawn" who is the subject of the hymn, and indeed the hymn is specifically concerned with the birth, that is, the kindling, of the ritual fire at daybreak. The birth imagery dominates the first verses, with Night and Dawn suckling Agni as their calf (vs. 1) and the fingers of the officiants begetting him (vs. 2). Three births of Agni are mentioned in verse 3; though there is some disagreement about whether the three entities mentioned in pāda b are the sites of the three births, in our opinion only two sites are found there (the sea and the heavenly waters), and the third birth is the ritual birth that occupied the first two verses. Again in our opinion, the second half of verse 3 concerns the removal of the oblation fire (the fire later called the Āhavanīya) to the east.

The remaining verses of the hymn describe the growing strength of the newly born fire, first barely visible in the kindling sticks (vs. 4), but with flames rising higher and higher (see esp. vss. 7–8) as he also spreads across the ground (vss. 8–9). The expected requests for aid and gifts are rather muted and perfunctory (vss. 9cd and 11b); the focus is on the riddling descriptions.

The hymn displays some omphalos characteristics: the middle verses (5–6) show responsion, and there is a wisp of a ring in the lexical repetitions between verses 2 and 9. But the omphalos effect is not strong.

1. The two of different form [=Night and Dawn] proceed, having (the same) good goal: one after the other, the two suckle their calf.
   At the one [=Dawn] he becomes tawny, possessing his own powers; in the other [=Night] he is seen blazing, intensely lustrous.
2. The ten (fingers) beget this babe of Tvaṣṭar—the tireless young women (beget the babe) to be carried about.
   Sharp-faced, self-glorious, shining widely among the peoples—him do they lead around.
3. They attend upon his three births: one in the sea, one in the heaven, in the waters.
   (Going) forth along the forward quarter of the earthly realms [=to the east], directing the (ritual) sequences, he has distributed them in proper order.
4. Who of you perceives this one in hiding? The calf begets his mothers with its own powers.
   The babe moves away from the lap of the many hardworking women, the great poet possessing his own powers.
5. The beloved one, manifest, grows strong among them—the self-glorious one upright in the lap of those aslant.
   Both (world-halves) are afraid of (the babe) of Tvaṣṭar while he is being born, (but turning) back to face him, the two give the lion pleasure in return.
6. Both give pleasure like excellent wives. Like bellowing cows they (all [=men]) have reverently approached (him) in their own ways.
   He has become the skill-lord of skills, whom they anoint from the right (/south) with oblations.
7. Like Savitar, he raises up his arms again and again. He aligns himself along the two seams (of the world?), the fearsome one charging straight on.
   He thrusts his blazing cloak up from his very self; he leaves behind new clothes for his mothers.
8. He makes for himself a glittering form, which is (even) higher, as he mingles with the cows and waters in his seat.
   The poet keeps grooming his foundation all around, while his insight is being groomed. He has become the meeting point with the assemblage of the gods.
9. Your broad expanse encompasses your foundation, the wide-shining domain of the buffalo.
   When kindled, o Agni, protect us with all your self-glorious, undeceivable protectors.

10. He makes himself a stream in the wasteland, a way, and a wave. With blazing waves he reaches the ground.
    He takes all the old things [=dry wood] in his bellies; he roams within the new, fruitful (plants).
11. In just this way, o Agni, as you grow strong though the kindling wood, shine out richly for fame, o pure one.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.96 Agni (or Agni Draviṇodā "Agni Wealth-Giver")

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
9 verses: triṣṭubh

Simpler and more straightforward than the previous hymn, this one shares a final verse (9) as well as some themes with I.95: see especially verse 5, where Night and Dawn suckle Agni, the calf, which matches I.95.1, where the two mothers were unidentified.

A pāda-length refrain is found in the first seven verses; in the last two of these (vss. 6–7) the refrain is integrated syntactically into the verse: pāda c with pāda d in 6, the whole verse in 7, while in the first five verses the refrain is independent. Agni has the epithet "wealth-giver" in this refrain, and in the eighth verse (post-refrain) that epithet, repeated four times, is the focus. This verse expresses the poet's desire for the various types of Agni's "wealth," a typical finale. In the earlier parts of the hymn (vss. 1–5), however, it is not Agni's material gifts that are dominant, but his ritual and cosmogonic properties, though his relation to wealth surfaces in verses 6–7 (see also 4a). This gradual integration of the refrain into the fabric of the hymn, both syntactically and thematically, shows how a skillful poet can deploy even something as apparently inert as an invariant refrain in building a forward-moving composition.

1. Being born with strength as of old, at once he has acquired all poetic powers—yes indeed!
   Both the waters and the holy place [=earth] make the ally [=Agni] succeed. – The gods uphold Agni, the wealth-giver.
2. With the age-old formal invocation [=nivid] and the poetic power of Āyu he begot these offspring of Manu's people; with Vivasvant [=Sun] as his eye (he begot) heaven and the waters. – The gods uphold Agni, the wealth-giver.
3. The Ārya clans solemnly invoke him as the foremost one, bringing the sacrifice to success when bepoured, aiming straight, the son of nourishment, the Bharata, possessing buttery drops. – The gods uphold Agni, the wealth-giver.
4. As Mātariśvan he brings prosperity filled with many desirable things; as the finder of the sun, he finds a way for his lineage.

He is the herdsman of the clans, the begetter of the two worlds. – The gods uphold Agni, the wealth-giver.

5. Night and Dawn, ever exchanging their color, together suckle their single child.
   Between heaven and earth the bright ornament shines out. – The gods uphold Agni, the wealth-giver.
6. The foundation of wealth, the assembler of goods, the beacon of the sacrifice, the bird bringing our thoughts to success.
   Protecting their immortality, protecting him, the gods uphold Agni, the wealth-giver.
7. Both now and before the seat of riches, the ground of what has been born and is being born, the herdsman of what is and of much coming into being—Agni, the wealth-giver, do the gods uphold.
8. The wealth-giver (shall offer) of his surpassing wealth; the wealth-giver shall offer of (his wealth) along with superior men.
   The wealth-giver (shall grant) us refreshment accompanied by heroes; the wealth-giver shall grant long lifetime.
9. In just this way, o Agni, as you grow strong though the kindling wood, shine out richly for fame, o pure one.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.97 Agni (or Agni Śuci "Blazing Agni")

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
8 verses: gāyatrī

Like the previous hymn, this one has a refrain, which is also not always syntactically integrated in the verse. But here the independence is more jarring because the refrain is just a participial phrase, not a self-contained clause. The rest of this brief hymn consists of snatches of expressed hopes for the well-being of the sacrificers and the patrons and for Agni's aid in overcoming hostilities. The Sanskrit contains a pleasing counterpoint of preverbs, which cannot be easily rendered in English.

1. Blazing away the bad for us, blaze wealth here, o Agni, —blazing away the bad for us.
2. With a desire for good lands, for easy passage, and for goods we offer sacrifice, —(you) blazing away the bad for us—
3. So that the most fortunate one of these (would become) preeminent, and preeminent our own patrons,
   —(you) blazing away the bad for us—

4. So that we and our patrons would be further propagated through you, o Agni,
   —(you) blazing away the bad for us—
5. When the beams of powerful Agni go forth in all directions —(you) blazing away the bad for us.
6. For you, o you who face in all directions, encompass (everything) in all directions —blazing away the bad for us.
7. O you who face in all directions, carry us across hostilities as if with a boat —blazing away the bad for us.
8. Carry us across (them), as if across a river with a boat, to well-being —blazing away the bad for us.

I.98 Agni Vaiśvānara

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
3 verses: triṣṭubh

A rather perfunctory and quite brief hymn, with phraseology borrowed from other hymns. Verse 2 seems to refer to the myth of the Agni's disappearance.

1. Might we be in the favor of Vaiśvānara, for he is the king and full glory of the creatures.
   Born from here, he surveys this whole (world). Vaiśvānara aligns himself with the sun.
2. Sought in heaven and sought on earth, being sought, Agni entered all the plants.
   Sought forcefully, let Agni Vaiśvānara protect us from harm by day and by night.
3. Vaiśvānara, let this come true of you: let riches and generous patrons accompany us.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.99 Agni Jātavedas

Kaśyapa Mārīca
1 verse: triṣṭubh

This one-verse hymn is the shortest of the Ṛgveda. Embedded in the Kutsa hymns and placed at the end of his Agni cycle (I.94–98), it is the only hymn attributed to Kaśyapa Mārīca in Maṇḍala I, though a number of hymns and verses in hymns are ascribed to him elsewhere, especially in Maṇḍala IX. Its message is simple and straightforward. The imagery of the boat and the river matches that in I.97.7–8. Both because of this agreement and because the first of Kutsa's Agni hymns begins with a praise of Jātavedas, also in the dative case (I.94.1a), this hymn seems well integrated in the Kutsa cycle.

1. For Jātavedas we will press soma. He will burn down the property of the hostile.
   He will carry us across all difficult passages, across difficult transits, as if with a boat across a river—Agni.

I.100 Indra

Five Vārṣāgira poets: R̥jrāśva, Ambarīṣa, Sahadeva, Bhayamāna, and Surādhas
19 verses: triṣṭubh

This first Indra hymn in the Kutsa collection is assigned by the Anukramaṇī to five named poets with the patronymic Vārṣāgira, only one of whom (Ambarīṣa, of IX.98) is known from elsewhere. However, the hymn ends with the Kutsa refrain (vs. 19cd), and the Vārṣāgira attribution must come from the dānastuti, where the names of these five poets are mentioned (vs. 17, see also 16).

The first fifteen verses (up to the dānastuti, vss. 16–19) end with a refrain linking Indra to the Maruts, and one of the main themes of the hymn is comradeship: Indra joined not only with the Maruts but with other like-minded beings (see, e.g., vss. 4–5, 10–11). The context is almost exclusively martial, as Indra joins with his forces and his powers to conquer various foes, though his standard opponents, like Vr̥tra, are curiously absent. The insistent presence of the Maruts may mark this as a hymn for the Midday Pressing, where Indra and Maruts share the oblation. The next hymn also has a strong Marut presence.

The dānastuti finale begins (vs. 16) with the praise of the gift, a fine mare, but, after naming the Vārṣāgiras (vs. 17), ends with straightforward praise of Indra.

Verbally the hymn is structured by the frequent hemistich-initial occurrences of the pronoun sá "he," reinforced by plays on this syllable: for instance, verse 1c satīnásatvā, 18cd sánat. There are also a number of hapaxes, whose translations are provisional (see vss. 8, 12, 16).

1. He who, as bull at home with his bullish powers, is sovereign king of great heaven and of earth, the one having trusty warriors is to be invoked in raids. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.

2. Whose course, like the sun's, cannot be reached, (who has) obstacle-smashing bluster in every raid, the most bullish one (should come) with his comrades along his own ways. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
3. Whose paths, like those of heaven, go milking out (the milk of) their semen, unencompassible in their vastness, he, overcoming hatred, is victorious through his male powers. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
4. He has become the best Aṅgiras with the Aṅgirases, a bull with the bulls, while being a comrade with his comrades, a versifier with versifiers, preeminent along the routes. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
5. He, the skillful one, along with the Rudras [=Maruts] as if with his own sons having conquered his foes at the time for men-conquering, along with the nest-mates [=Maruts] bringing to triumph (deeds) worthy of fame. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
6. He, confounding the battle-fury (of the foe), the creator of the battle-elation (of the allies), has won the sun along with our men on this very day, the lord of the settlements invoked by many. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
7. Him do his help(er)s [=Maruts] cause to take pleasure in the contest of champions; him do the settled peoples make the protector of their peace.
He alone is lord of every undertaking. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
8. Him they inspired [?] in the upsurgings of his vast power—the men inspired [?] the man to help, inspired [?] him to the stakes.
He found the light even in blind darkness. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
9. He with his left (hand) will hold fast even the overweening (foes), in his right will hold (all) winning throws massed together.
He, even in association with a weakling, is the winner of the stakes. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
10. As a winner with his hordes, a winner with his chariots, he is known by all the communities now today.
He with his male powers prevails over taunts. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
11. Since with his kindred or with his non-kin he will drive together (the warriors? the spoils?) when the prize of battle (is at stake), he is invoked by many in (many) ways for the conquering of the waters, of life and lineage. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.

12. He is the mace-bearer, the Dasyu-smasher, fearsome, mighty, of a thousand insights and a hundred counsels, skillful—like a beaker [?] in his vastness, belonging to the five peoples.
– Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
13. His mace roars alongside, sun-winning, like the reverberating, vehement bellowing of heaven.
Him do gains follow, him prizes. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
14. Whose inexhaustible measure in its vastness, (like our) hymn, will coil around both worlds on all sides, he will deliver (us) with his strategies while he is rejoicing.
– Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
15. The limit of whose vast power no gods in their divinity, nor mortals, nor even the waters have reached—he projects with his energy beyond earth and heaven. – Accompanied by the Maruts, let Indra be here for us with help.
16. A chestnut, dusky mare, marked with "stalks" [?] and a blaze, heaven-bright, a portion of the wealth of R̥jrāśva, drawing a chariot with bulls at the chariot-poles, gladdening, has distinguished herself among the clans of Nahuṣa.
17. This very hymn is for you, Indra the bull. The Vārṣāgiras greet your largesse—R̥jrāśva with his sidekicks, Ambarīṣa, Sahadeva, Bhayamāna, Surādhas.
18. Invoked by many in (many) ways, having smashed the Dasyus and the Śimyus to the earth, he has laid them low with his missile.
He has won a dwelling place along with his bright comrades [=Maruts]; he has won the sun; he has won the waters—he with the good mace.
19. Let Indra always speak up for us. Not led astray, may we win the prize.
– This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.101 Indra

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: jagatī 1–7, triṣṭubh 8–11

The structure of this hymn is under tight control, giving pleasure both by its predictable repetitions and by their breaches. Though the hymn falls into two unequal metrical segments, there is no reason not to consider it a unity: the two segments complement each other, structurally and thematically. (One might fancifully compare it to the 8 / 6 structure of a Petrarchan sonnet.)

The jagatī section (vss. 1–7) is characterized most obviously by its refrain, occupying all of the fourth pāda of each verse. Interestingly this refrain lacks the name

Indra, though this name appears in first or (modified) second position in each of the third pādas, save for verse 1. Instead it is his connection with the Maruts that is foregrounded in the refrain, using the same stem, though in a different case, that appeared in the refrain of I.100. Verses 1 and 7 also deviate from the signature stylistic feature of the middle verses (2–6), that the first three-fourths of these verses are all relative clauses: a form of the relative pronoun begins each verse, and each of the two subsequent pādas in each verse contains (and often begins) with at least one. (Note the explosion of relative pronouns in the final verse 6: five in three pādas.) This arrangement, with most of the verse devoted to relative clauses but ending with a main clause refrain, reminds us of the famous Indra hymn II.12, with its identificatory refrain "He, o peoples, is Indra!" But this one is more complex, in that Indra is not identified directly in the refrain. The jagatī section is also demarcated by a faint ring, the verb "address" (prá… arcatā 1a, abhy àrcati 7c), and by the fact that Indra is referred to only in the 3rd person in a series of definitional descriptions in the indicative.

By contrast, the triṣṭubh verses (8–11) switch to direct address to Indra (save for the final, summary verse with the Kutsa refrain) and to urgent invitations to him to come to our sacrifice. The Marut theme is continued, however—already in the first pāda of the first triṣṭubh verse (8a) with a vocative of the same stem (marútvant "accompanied by the Maruts") that dominated the jagatī refrain. (See also 9c, 11a.) A faint ring also defines the triṣṭubh verses, with vr̥jána "(ritual) circle" in both 8b and 11a.

As for content, it is largely familiar, praising Indra for his victories over various enemies, for his aid to mortals hard pressed in battle, and for his steadfast lordship. Needless to say, the Marut element is quite strong, as in the preceding hymn (I.110). The most striking formulation may be found in the first verse, with its image of Indra causing the fortresses of the enemy to abort their fetuses.

1. Address a nourishing speech to the exultant one, who, along with R̥jiśvan, aborted the (strongholds) with their black embryos.
   Seeking help from the bull with the mace in his right hand, the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call for partnership.
2. Who with his bristling battle-fury smote the one with its shoulders apart [=Vr̥tra =cobra], who smote Śambara, who smote Pipru who followed no commandment, Indra, who wrenched down insatiable Śuṣṇa—the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call upon for partnership.
3. Whose great masculine nature Heaven and Earth (strengthen); in whose commandment is Varuṇa, in whose is Sūrya, Indra, whose commandment the rivers follow—the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call upon for partnership.
4. Who of horses, who of cows is the herdsman exerting his will; who is acknowledged as steadfast in every action,

Indra, who is the weapon of death for the non-presser, even one standing firm—the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call upon for partnership.

5. Who is the lord of everything moving and breathing, who first found the cows for the maker of sacred formulations, Indra, who brought the Dasyus down low—the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call upon for partnership.
6. Who is to be called upon by champions and who by the fearful, who is called upon by those on the run and who by the victors,
   Indra, whom all beings altogether set their sights on—the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call upon for partnership.
7. At the Rudras' [=Maruts'] direction he goes, wide-gazing; along with the Rudras the maiden [=Rodasī] stretches her broad expanse.
   Indra the famed does the inspired thought address—the one accompanied by the Maruts do we call upon for partnership.
8. Whether you, accompanied by the Maruts, will reach exhilaration in the furthest seat or in the nearest (ritual) circle, from there journey here to our ceremony: with desire for you we have made an oblation, o you whose generosity is real.
9. With desire for you we have pressed soma, o very skillful Indra; with desire for you we have made an oblation, o you whose vehicle is the sacred formulation.
   So, you with your teams, flocking with the Maruts—reach exhilaration at this sacrifice here, on this ritual grass.
10. Reach exhilaration along with the fallow bays that are yours, Indra. Unfasten your two lips; unloose the two nourishing streams.
    Let your fallow bays convey you here, lovely-lipped one. Eagerly take pleasure in our oblations.
11. As herdsmen of the (ritual) circle that offers praise to the Maruts, may we win the prize with Indra.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.102 Indra

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: jagatī 1–7, triṣṭubh 8–11

The structure of this hymn is superficially identical to that of its immediate predecessor, I.101: eleven verses, the first seven in jagatī, the last four triṣṭubh. But the tight syntactic and formulaic control of I.101 is not present here. Nonetheless, the hymn is stitched together by lexical repetitions, and the two metrically diverse segments show especially strong lexical responsions.

The hymn begins with a difficult verse, which has received a number of incompatible interpretations. Ours is, perhaps, especially bold, in that we assume that the poet (in the 1st person) is speaking to a "you" who is not the god (as most people assume), but the human praise singer, who may, in fact, be the poet himself. (Such incompatibilities in address are not infrequent in such ritual situations; the poet often addresses himself in the 2nd person; see discussion in Jamison 2009a.) The poet thus announces that the composition of his poem is complete and it is ready to be recited to its object, the god, who is present in the verse in the 3rd person.

After naming the cosmic forces whose activities provide support to Indra (vs. 2), the poet turns to two intertwined themes: the aid we beg from Indra in conflicts and contests, where, we know, our rivals and foes will be seeking the same aid (esp. vss. 3–6, 9–10), and the immeasurable power Indra commands, power that accounts for the desire of all contenders to get him on their side (esp. vss. 6–8). These latter verses play with forms of the root mā "measure, match." The transition between the jagatī and triṣṭubh sections is especially nicely handled: having claimed in verses 6–7 that Indra has no match in strength, verse 8 takes up the exact phrase from verse 6, but asserts that indeed there does exist such a match—but it consists of the whole cosmos in all its divisions. The next verse (9) of the triṣṭubh section densely repeats and rings changes on the lexicon and thematics from the early parts of the hymn and thus signals a kind of ring composition. Verse 10 seems to announce the success of our petitions, though in a different lexicon. The final verse (11) is a refrain verse, repeated from I.100.19, the last half of which is the general Kutsa refrain.

1. I present this great visionary thought to you, the praiser of this great one, when the Holy Place [=the earth] has been anointed for you.
   The one victorious in his upsurging and his outsurging, Indra with his vast power did the gods cheer on.
2. His fame do the seven rivers bear; Heaven and Earth, the Broad One, (bear) his wondrous form, lovely to see.
   For us to look upon (it), to put our trust in (him), the Sun and Moon roam, traversing in regular alternation, o Indra.
3. Help this chariot forward to win, o bounteous one, which we will cheer on as victorious for you in the clash, and help us in the contest with your mind, much-praised Indra. Extend shelter to us who seek you, bounteous one.
4. Might we conquer their defense with you as yokemate. For us uphold our stake in every raid; for us, Indra, create wide space and easy passage. Break the bullish powers of our rivals, bounteous one.

5. As these peoples here, each for itself, in admiration are calling for you along with your help, o securer of prizes—mount our chariot, to win—because your mind, Indra, when it's settled, is victorious.
6. Cow-conquering are his two arms—he himself is of unmatched resolve, providing a hundred forms of help in every action, creating tumult.
   In the disorder (of battle) Indra is a match (for all) in his strength. So the peoples vie in invoking him when they wish to win.
7. Your fame reaches higher than a hundred, bounteous one, and even more—higher than a thousand among the separate peoples.
   The great (Earth), the Holy Place has sparked you who are matchless. So you keep smashing obstacles, you stronghold-splitter.
8. The (only) match for your strength has threefold divisions: it is the three earths, o lord of men, and the three luminous realms.
   You have grown beyond this whole world. You are without rival, Indra, by birth and from of old.
9. It is you we call upon first among the gods; you have become the one victorious in battles.
   Let him make this bard of ours fervid and effusive; let Indra put our chariot in front at the surging out.
10. You have conquered; you have not withheld prizes in the petty contests and in the great ones, bounteous one.
    You, the strong, we hone for help. So, Indra, spur us on in the challenges.
11. Let Indra always speak up for us. Not led astray, may we win the prize.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.103 Indra

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Like I.102, this hymn begins with a difficult verse, treating the two aspects of Indra's power, situated on earth and in heaven respectively. We can assume that the earthbound power has to do with the aid he provides to mortals in battle, while his heavenly power is displayed by his cosmogonic deeds. The poet claims the two types of power are mixed together equally and the result serves as a sort of beacon, an odd image—but the underlying notion must be that of the light (of Dawn, of Agni) that connects heaven and earth, frequently referred to as a beacon. Similarly Indra's twin powers link the heavenly and earthly realms and are conspicuous in both.

Both types of power are treated in the hymn, which has an omphalos structure. The cosmogonic deeds are found in the outer frame, verses 2 and 7 (and 8ab), particularly the slaying of Vr̥tra. The inner verses (3–6) concern Indra's involvement with us, the Āryas, as we confront our traditional foes, the Dāsas and the Dasyus, who do not share in the values of the Ārya community. The omphalos itself consists of verse 4, where Indra acquires several names marking his successful progress. The following verse (5) presents itself as a sort of epiphany: the people are exhorted to behold the results of Indra's actions and therefore believe in his existence. The omphalos structure is marked not only thematically but verbally. Note the two occurrences of śrád-dhā "trust" in the inner ring of verses 3 and 5.

The responsion in the outer ring (specifically vss. 2 and 7) is more complex and more interesting. Verse 2c begins with the signature formula of the Vr̥tra saga: áhann áhim "he slew the serpent," and 7b ends with the word áhim "serpent." The phrase in verse 2 lacks the frequent accompaniment, the weapon (vájra) in the instrumental "with his mace," while 7b has vájreṇa. But on the surface the action in that verse is entirely different: "he woke the sleeping serpent with his mace." As argued elsewhere (Jamison 1982/83 and 2007: 110–12), this is a formal "pun," which means exactly the opposite of its surface sense. Indra did not nudge the snake with his weapon to wake him up to fight. Instead the poet combines the formal causative shape of the verb "awaken" (lit., "cause to awaken") with the semantics of its object "sleeping (serpent)," to produce an underlying form "cause (the serpent) to sleep." In Vedic, as in English, "cause to sleep / put to sleep" is a euphemism for "kill," and "waken the sleeping serpent with the mace" is simply a particularly clever way to say "slew the serpent." Since this phrase is anticipated by the standard áhann áhim expression, which is in the structurally responsive position in the ring, an alert audience would have no trouble catching this deep-structure pun.

1. This highest Indrian power of yours did the sage poets hold fast earlier, (the one) far away and this one here—this one here on the earth and the other one of his in heaven. The one (part) is mingled (with the other) equally, like a beacon.
2. He held the earth fast and spread it out; having smashed with his mace, he sent forth the waters:
   He smashed the serpent; he split apart Rauhiṇa; he smashed the cobra—the bounteous one with his powers.
3. He who by nature provides support, being trusted for his power, roved widely, splitting apart the Dāsa strongholds.
   As knowing one, o possessor of the mace, cast your missile at the Dasyu;
   strengthen Ārya might and brilliance, o Indra.
4. This is for him who is accustomed to it. Bearing the name "bounteous," a name to be celebrated through these human generations, the mace-bearer was advancing to smash the Dasyus when he took for himself the name "son (of strength)" for fame.

5. Look here at this abundant success of his; put your trust in the heroism of Indra.
   He found the cows; he found the horses; he the plants, he the waters, he the trees.
6. For the bullish bull of abundant action, for him whose bluster is real, we will press the soma, for him, the champion who, tearing them out like a highwayman, goes about distributing the possessions of the non-sacrificer.
7. This heroic deed you carried out, Indra—that you "awakened" the sleeping serpent with your mace, as it were.
   The wives [=waters?] and the birds [=Maruts?] applauded you who were roused to excitement; all the gods applauded you,
8. When, o Indra, you smashed Śuṣṇa who brings bad harvest, Pipru, and Vr̥tra and smashed apart the strongholds of Śambara.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.104 Indra

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
9 verses: triṣṭubh

At nine verses, this final hymn of the Kutsa Indra cycle is longer than its immediate predecessor by one verse. On this basis Oldenberg identified it as an Anhangslied (a supplementary hymn appended to the end of a divinity cycle), an opinion supported by the fact that, alone of the Kutsa hymns (I.94–98, 100–115), it lacks the Kutsa refrain always found in the last hemistich of the last verse of each hymn. (This applies only to trimeter hymns; the gāyatrī hymn I.97, not surprisingly, also lacks it.) But if "supplementary" suggests something attenuated or in decline, that suggestion is emphatically false. This hymn is extraordinary complex and challenging, especially in its mythological portion (vss. 3–5), and we are far from solving the many puzzles it presents. It may have been inserted just here in the Saṃhitā because the mythological portion in part concerns a foe named Kuyava, or the demon "of bad grain," that is, bad harvest, mentioned as having been slain by Indra in the last verse of the preceding hymn (I.103.8ab). There are also several other lexical connections between I.103 and this hymn, particularly the two forms of śrád-dhā "trust" in each hymn, which may have encouraged the insertion, or even the composition, of this supplementary poem.

As in many hymns, an invitation to Indra to come to the sacrifice is found in the first verse. But some of the features of this verse give us a taste of what is to come. For example, the apparently straightforward simile in pāda b, rendered here as "like a steed sounding off," is actually a triple pun (impossible to convey in translation): the participle s^{u}vānáḥ can belong to three different verbs: "sound," "impel," and "press (of soma)." When Indra takes his seat on the ritual ground, he is compared to a horse neighing, to a horse that has been driven to the place where it takes its rest, and finally to soma (which itself is often compared to a horse) being pressed in its womb. In fact the same phraseology is applied to soma elsewhere (cf. IX.70.7).

The second verse introduces the theme that will dominate the mythological portion, the importance of having Indra and the other gods on our side in the battle against the traditional, perhaps indigenous, enemies of the Ārya, identified as Dāsa (vs. 2) and Dasyu (vs. 5). The word "color" in the final pāda of the verse is a frequent way of referring to a cohort, a unified group of people. Our urgent need for Indra and his aid returns after the mythological portion, in fact starting with the second half of verse 5. The poet twice asserts his trust in Indra's power (6d, 7a); this may not be a mere repetition but refer rather to the two aspects of Indra's power, as described in the first verse of the preceding hymn (I.103.1), partly in heaven and partly on earth. And he also issues a series of peremptory commands, especially negative commands, to Indra from verse 5ab through verse 8, which ends with a plea not to split our "eggs" or our "cups," in our opinion male and female genitalia respectively. The final verse (9) is again a simple invitation to soma.

The problematic verses 3–5ab need to be interpreted within this outer framework, the context of Indra's martial aid to the embattled Ārya. Our interpretation of these verses is quite speculative and differs from those of others, but we have attempted to construct a coherent account, while supplying as little extraneous material as possible. What is immediately striking about the first of these verses (3) is the presence of two female figures, the "two maidens of Kuyava," who are obviously rivers. More rivers appear in the second half of the next verse (4cd). Now the advance of the Ārya is often obstructed by rivers, which must be forded (see esp. III.33), and important battles are fought beside these barrier rivers (see esp. VII.18). The two maidens of Kuyava thus could be rivers initially controlled by forces impeding the progress of the Ārya. The charming image of the foamy rivers "bathing in milk" turns swiftly cruel: "may they both be smashed," perhaps a reference to their violent confluence with a mightier river still, the Śiphā (otherwise unknown). This verse reminds us of V.30.9, in another Indra hymn, in which Indra confronts an enemy who "made women his weapons" and who has two streams, perhaps the same rivers as here. Once Indra recognizes the situation, he initiates battle.

> V.30.9 Because the Dāsa made women his weapons, what can they do to me? His armies lack strength.
> Since he [=Indra] distinguished both his [=Dāsa's?] streams, therefore Indra advanced on the Dasyu to fight.

The point may be that though rivers are formidable natural obstructions, they are also, by grammatical gender, feminine, and females are, by nature, weak. Conceiving of rivers as women robs them of their power and allows them to be overcome. The analogue of Indra's distinguishing the streams in V.30.9 may be found in our verse 5ab, where the "guide" of the Dasyu, which we interpret both physically as the streambed and metaphorically as his strategy, is revealed. It is another female who reveals and recognizes it, and, on the basis of shared lexicon, we think that Dawn is the figure lurking behind this unidentified feminine. Dawn regularly makes things visible and knows the way forward, and here she leads the Aryan forces to the very seat of the enemy.

These Ārya forces are personified in Āyu in verse 4ab. His "navel" has been effaced for two reasons. On the one hand, the mythic hero Āyu is the son of the Apsaras Urvaśī and the mortal king Purūravas, but his lot was cast with mortals when his mother abandoned him (see X.95), and in this sense his true origins have been, at the least, muddied. But there is a more positive aspect to this phrase; since he and the other Ārya continue to move forward into ever new territory, where they came from recedes into the background: their future is forward.

What remains to be explained is the emphasis on the rivers' "carrying away" (áva-√bhr̥ 3a, 3b; √bhr̥ 4b). Here we feel there may be a latent ritual reference. The "final bath" (avabhr̥thá, a derivative of áva-√bhr̥) of the sacrificer and his wife at the end of the classical śrauta ritual is purificatory, removing all ritual pollution. And it is a commonplace in Vedic that rivers and moving waters in general carry away stain. The mention of bathing in 3c, combined with the emphasis on "carrying away," suggests that a notion of expiation and ritual cleansing has been superimposed on this battle scene. What is not clear is what is being carried away. Is it pollution produced by some offense of the enemy? An even more speculative idea is inspired by the mention of "foam" (phénam 3b): in a well-known myth Indra cuts off the head of the demon Namuci with the foam of waters (see VIII.14.13), having tricked him by forswearing all conventional weapons. It is possible that the rivers here are carrying away the defilement that Indra acquired from this underhanded killing. It is worthy of note that the Namuci myth is treated in V.30.7–8, right before the verse cited above about enemy streams.

The last word has not been said about this dense and fascinating hymn, but we hope to have advanced the discussion.

1. A womb has been prepared for you to sit down in, Indra. Sit down in it here, like a steed sounding off, once you have released your vitality [/the birds] and unhitched the horses, who convey you so well to the mealtime, evening and morning.
2. These men here have come to Indra for help. Even now, immediately, he should go to them along the roads.
   The gods will extinguish the battle-fury of the Dāsa. They will convey our "color" to welfare.

3. She who knows his [=Kuyava's?] will carries away by herself; (the other) by herself carries away the foam in her water.
   The two maidens of Kuyava bathe in milk: may they both be smashed in the torrent of the Śiphā (River).
4. The navel [=lineage, origin] of the Āyu to come has been effaced. He lengthens his life through the (dawns) in front. The champion reigns.
   The Añjasī, the Kuliśī, (the Sarasvatī) whose husband is the virile one— they, impelling the milk, carry it with their waters.
5. When that guide [=both riverbed and strategy] of the Dasyu was revealed, she who recognized it [=Dawn] went to his seat as if straight home.
   Now then, bounteous one, just grant us acclaim. Don't hand us over, like a careless man his bounties.
6. You, Indra—give us a share in the sun, in the waters, in blamelessness, in the praise of the living.
   Do no harm to our inner delight. Trust has been placed in your great Indrian power.
7. And, I think, trust has been placed in this (power) of yours right here. As bull, bestir yourself toward great stakes.
   Don't (put) us in an unprepared womb, o much invoked one. Indra, grant vitality and the pressing (of soma) to those who hunger for them.
8. Don't smite us, Indra; don't hand us over. Don't steal our dear delights.
   Don't split apart our "eggs," o bounteous and powerful one; don't split our "cups" along with their contents.
9. Come here nearby. They say you have lust for soma. Here it is, pressed: drink it, for exhilaration.
   Being of broad expanse, rain it into your belly. Like a father, hear us when you are being called on.

I.105 All Gods

Trita Āptya or Kutsa Āṅgirasa
19 verses: paṅkti, except mahābṛhatī 8, triṣṭubh 19

This famous hymn has been the victim of a range of unlikely interpretations; among them that it tells the story of "Trita in the Well" (so Geldner; for discussion of the verse on which this is based, see the introduction to I.106); that it is the lamentation of a sick man (so Oldenberg, Noten); that it is the complaint of a poet who's unemployed because his patron has died (so Bloomfield 1916: 114–15); or that it is a charm against a solar eclipse (so Lüders 1959: 576–78). The range and incompatibility of these hypotheses testify to the interpretive challenges of the poem. Nonetheless, guided by the structure, we feel that we have arrived at an internally consistent and satisfying interpretation. (See also discussion in Jamison 2007: 82–85).

It is an omphalos hymn. It has nineteen verses, but the last verse is in a different meter from the rest and does not end with the refrain found in the other eighteen verses (but rather with the standard Kutsa refrain), so we can legitimately consider it extra-hymnic for structural purposes. The exact center of the hymn is then verses 9 and 10. As in a number of other omphalos hymns, they are responsive, beginning identically, with amī́ yé NUMERAL ("those which…"). Their content is, it seems, mystical—at any rate, it has provoked much scholarly discussion. Also as in other omphalos hymns a set of concentric verses surround this central pair. But its structure is even more intricate than most other omphalos hymns, in that there is also a certain forward progress in the hymn, held in tension with the architectonic symmetry of the omphalos structure.

The subject of the hymn is the poet's doubts and anxieties about the efficacy of the sacrifice and, in particular, of his own ritual speech and thus about the relationship between the earthly and heavenly realms, if that relationship exists at all. It is this central doubt that prompts the refrain "Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves." The poet wishes both Heaven and Earth to listen to and bear witness to what he says and thereby prove that there is a relationship between them, a relationship established and maintained by the sacrifice.

The poet begins with a happy picture of cosmic (vs. 1) and earthly (vs. 2) order, but he quickly turns to his fear about the maintenance of this order (vs. 3). He follows with a series of baffled questions to the gods, introduced by pṛchāmi "I ask." He first questions Agni, the divinity nearest to him, about the fate of his previous poems (his "truth"), and then turns to the gods in heaven to ask what happens in heaven to the sacrifice and the poetic formulations of mortals (vss. 5–6). These questions express almost a loss of faith in the efficacy of these mortal techniques to make contact with the gods. His anguish grows stronger in verses 7–8, where his painful thoughts are memorably compared to wolves, to cowives, and to mice gnawing their own tails.

There follows the pair of verses (9–10) we have just identified as the omphalos, which seem to constitute the oblique response to the poet's cry for reassurance—a cosmic vision in which the poet's connection and kinship with the distant heaven is manifest, and is attested to by what may be his forefather, the seer Trita Āptya. The precise nature of this vision is not clear to us, but it seems to involve celestial bodies and celestial movement. After this central mystery, the rest of the hymn seems designed to calm the worries expressed by the poet, in the reverse order of his first expression, by asserting divine participation in the mortal's ritual acts. In verse 11 a cosmic wolf is kept at bay, similar to the earthly, metaphorical one that pursued the poet in verse 7. In the following verses effective words are established anew (12); Agni takes charge of the sacrifice (13–14); Varuṇa produces poetic formulations (15); and the path to heaven and the relations between god and men are made safe (16–17).

Thus I.105 has two structures held in tension—one is the symmetrical architectural one of concentric rings of verses around a central pair, and the other is the forward movement of question and answer, worry expressed and reassurance given. The two structures can be diagrammed as follows:

Structure of I.105 (a): architectural:

1–2 cosmic and earthly order

3 fears about maintaining order

5–6 questions about fate of ritual offerings

7–8 more anguish; thoughts compared to wolves, cowives, mice

9–10 Omphalos: cosmic vision

11 wolf kept at bay

12 effective words reestablished

13–15 gods take charge of sacrifice

16–17 order restored

[18: structure destabilized? (see below)]

Structure of I.105 (b): forward movement:

1–8 poet's questions and worries
11–17 (gods') answers and reassurances

The intricacy of the responsive patterns and the tension between the two structures compel our attention and provide us with aesthetic satisfaction, even though we find ourselves puzzled by much of the actual content of the hymn. But there is a final sly trick that complicates the hymn even more. In the last verse (before the extra-hymnic one), the wolf returns—the wolf that tracked the poet in verse 7, but whose threat was curbed by divine power in verse 11. But it seems that that check was only temporary; the wolf comes back, enigmatically but with a lurking menace, in verse 18. Have the poet's fears been calmed after all? Has he really regained his faith in the efficacy of his own poetry and of the sacrifice they serve? Or will the wolf prey upon him again? The hymn leaves these questions open and in this way subtly and uninsistently undermines the reassuring structure of the poem and destabilizes its architecture. It is a masterful stroke.

1. The moon is here in the waters; the fine-feathered one [=sun] runs in heaven.
   They do not find your track, o lightning bolts with golden fellies.
   – Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.
2. Those with tasks (pursue) each his own task. The wife draws her husband to herself.

The two squeeze out the bullish milk; having surrendered, he milks out his sap [/having bound him about, she milks out his sap].
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

3. Let not, o gods, yonder sun fall down [/be miscarried] from heaven.
Let us never be in want of the beneficial somian (sap).
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

4. I ask the nearest one [=Agni] about my sacrifice. Will the messenger [=Agni] declare this:
Where has my earlier "truth" gone? Who bears it now?
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

5. You gods, who are yonder in the three luminous realms of heaven—
What is truth for you, what is untruth? Where is the age-old offering for you?
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

6. Is (the vision) of truth steadfast? Is the vision of Varuṇa (steadfast)?
Might we along the path of great Aryaman pass beyond those of evil intent?
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

7. I am one who used (always) to speak some (speeches) at the pressing.
But cares (now) pursue this same me, like a wolf a thirsting wild beast.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

8. They scorch me all about, like cowives, (like ailing) ribs.
Like mice their tails, the cares gnaw at me, your praiser, o you of a hundred resolves [=Indra].
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

9. The seven reins [=seers?] that are yonder—to there is my umbilical cord stretched.
Trita Āptya knows this. He rasps (witness) to the kinship.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

10. The five oxen that stand yonder in the middle of great heaven—this is now to be proclaimed among the gods—they have turned back (toward home), directed toward a single end.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

11. These fine-feathered ones sit in the middle, on the stairway to heaven.
They keep away from the path the wolf that is overtaking the boisterous waters.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

12. Anew has this (speech) been established worthy to be spoken, good to proclaim, o gods.
The rivers stream truth; the sun stretches through the real.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

13. O Agni, it exists: this friendship of yours among the gods, worthy to be hymned.

Seated here, sacrifice to the gods for us as you did for Manu—as the one who knows better.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

14. Seated here as Hotar, as for Manu, (facing?) toward the gods, as the one who knows better, Agni sweetens the oblations, the wise god among the gods.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

15. Varuṇa creates sacred formulations; we implore him as the finder of the way.
He opens up the thought in our heart. Let a newer truth be born.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

16. The path that is yonder, belonging to the Ādityas, made as something to be proclaimed in heaven—it is not to be overstepped, o gods; o mortals, you do not (even) see it.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

17. Trita, set down in a well, calls upon the gods for help.
Bṛhaspati has heard this, making a broad (space) from narrowness.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

18. Because the reddish wolf has suddenly seen me going along the path, he rears up on having noticed me, like a carpenter with a stitch in his side.
– Take heed of this (speech) of mine, you two world-halves.

19. With this song may we, with Indra on our side and possessing hale heroes, be preeminent in the community.
– This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.106 All Gods

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
7 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 7

After the challenges and pyrotechnics of the previous hymn, this simple appeal for aid to a range of divinities comes as something of a relief. It is a hymn of the most straightforward All God type. The most notable feature of the hymn is verse 6, which closely parallels verse 17 of I.105. Here the poet Kutsa is "squeezed down into a pit" and appeals to the gods for help. There Trita is found in a similar situation and makes the same appeal. The verse conforms better to its context in this hymn than in I.105: in I.106 the refrain filling half of each verse calls on the gods to "rescue us from narrow straits," as exemplified by Kutsa's confinement, whereas in I.105 the poet is tormented by spiritual doubts that only in that one particular verse are conceived of as physical confinement. It seems possible that I.105.17 was adapted from this hymn.

1. Indra, Mitra, Varuṇa, Agni, the Maruts' troop, and Aditi do we call upon for help.
   – Like a chariot from a hard place, o good ones of good gifts, rescue us from all narrow straits.
2. O Ādityas, come here for our wholeness; o gods, become luck itself in the overcoming of obstacles.
   – Like a chariot from a hard place, o good ones of good gifts, rescue us from all narrow straits.
3. Let the Fathers help us, those good to proclaim, and the two goddesses [=Heaven and Earth], whose sons are the gods, strong through truth.
   – Like a chariot from a hard place, o good ones of good gifts, rescue us from all narrow straits.
4. Inciting the prizewinner Narāśaṃsa here—with appeals for grace we beg Pūṣan, who rules over heroes.
   – Like a chariot from a hard place, o good ones of good gifts, rescue us from all narrow straits.
5. O Bṛhaspati, make easy passage for us always. The luck and lifetime of yours that was set in place by Manu—that we beg for.
   – Like a chariot from a hard place, o good ones of good gifts, rescue us from all narrow straits.
6. Kutsa the seer, squeezed down into a pit, called on Indra, smasher of Vṛtra, lord of power, for help.
   – Like a chariot from a hard place, o good ones of good gifts, rescue us from all narrow straits.
7. Let goddess Aditi, with the gods, keep guard over us. Let the god Protector protect us, not keeping his distance.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.107 All Gods

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
3 verses: triṣṭubh

The first verse of this brief and elementary hymn continues the theme of "broad space out of narrowness" found in the refrain of the previous hymn.

1. The sacrifice goes toward the benevolence of the gods: o Ādityas, become compassionate.

Your benevolent thought, inclined our way, should turn you hither—that which will be excellent at finding a wide place even out of narrow straits.

2. Let the gods come close to us here with help, being praised with the melodies of the Aṅgirases.
   Indra with his Indrian powers, the Maruts with the Maruts, Aditi with the Ādityas will extend shelter to us.
3. In this of ours shall Indra take delight, in this shall Varuṇa, in this Agni, in this shall Aryaman, in this Savitar take delight.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.108 Indra and Agni

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
13 verses: triṣṭubh

For the ritual pairing of Indra and Agni, see the introduction to I.21. This hymn is structured by patterned repetition that becomes decidedly more restrictive in the second half of the hymn. The vocative of the dual dvandva "o Indra and Agni" occurs in every verse but the middle one (vs. 6). In the first five verses this vocative moves around the verse (though it always occurs in second position in its pāda), but in the second half (vss. 7–13) it always occurs in second position of the first pāda, after the subordinator yád "when" (except in the final verse [13], where it appears after evā́ in the same position). The second half of these same verses (7–12) is a refrain, which has slowly been assembled in the earlier part of the hymn: its second half is also found in 1d and 6d, and in part in 5d; the end of its first half first appears in 6c. These elements all come together first in 7cd. And the first halves of these same verses are thematically superimposable: in each verse several different potential locations of the gods are listed, which they are urged to leave in order to come to us.

The contents of the first six verses are more various. The united front and the joint activities of Indra and Agni are emphasized, though some verses have a distinctly Indraic character (esp. vs. 3, where both gods are called "Vṛtra-smashers") and some are more in Agni's camp (esp. vs. 4). The middle verse (6) is, as noted above, the only verse without an address to the gods (or any mention of them by name), and it also contains 1st-person direct speech. In it the speaker recalls his words when he "chose" the gods, presumably as his priests, and these words announce the necessity for competing with others (in this case the other human "lords" [not, in our opinion, the nonhuman Asuras, the later Vedic opponents of the gods]) for the gods' visitation, the theme that will dominate the rest of the hymn. Though we hesitate to call verse 6 an omphalos, it does serve as pivot point for the hymn, and its deliberately different structure from both what precedes and what follows marks it and its position as exceptional.

1. O Indra and Agni, the brightest chariot of yours, which looks upon all creatures, with that one drive here, standing together on the same chariot. Then drink of the pressed soma.
2. As great as this whole creation here is, deep and wide-spreading in its expanse, so great let this soma here be, for drinking—enough for you two, to your thinking, o Indra and Agni.
3. For you two made your own joint name auspicious, and you two, o Vr̥tra-smashers, are conjoined.
   O Indra and Agni, you bulls, having sat down jointly, drench yourselves in the bullish soma.
4. You two being anointed when the fires have been kindled, with your offering spoon extended, having strewn your own ritual grass, with the sharp soma drinks poured about, drive in our direction to (display) benevolence, o Indra and Agni.
5. O Indra and Agni, which manly deeds you two have done; which forms and bullish powers you have made your own; which age-old propitious partnerships are yours—with these, drink of the pressed soma.
6. Since I said first on choosing you two: "This soma here is to be invoked by us in competition with the (other human) lords," toward this confidence (of ours) (which has) come true—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.
7. When, o Indra and Agni, you are reaching exhilaration in your own dwelling, when at a brahmin's or at a king's, o you who deserve the sacrifice, from there, bulls—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.
8. When, o Indra and Agni, you are among the Yadus, the Turvaśas, when among the Druhyus, the Anus, the Pūrus, from there, bulls—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.
9. When, o Indra and Agni, you are on the lowest earth, on the middle one, and on the highest one,
   from there, bulls—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.
10. When, o Indra and Agni, you are on the highest earth, on the middle one, and on the lowest one,
    from there, bulls—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.
11. When, o Indra and Agni, you are in heaven, when on earth, when in the mountains, in the plants, in the waters, from there, bulls—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.

12. When, o Indra and Agni, at the rising of the sun in the middle of the heaven you bring yourselves to exhilaration by your own power, from there, bulls—yes! drive here. Then drink of the pressed soma.
13. Thus, o Indra and Agni, having drunk of the pressed soma, entirely conquer all rich prizes for us.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.109 Indra and Agni

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Dedicated to Indra and Agni like the preceding hymn, this one takes a livelier and less predictable course, characterized by a 1st-person voice. This voice announces in the first two verses that he seeks a better state and must turn to Indra and Agni for help because his kin-group is unreliable. This is expressed in general terms in the first verse, but in bitter particulars in the second. Interestingly the deficient relatives in that verse are both connections through the female line: his daughter's husband and his wife's brother (the word syālá is specialized for this relationship). In a patrilocal system like that of ancient India, neither of them would have particularly close ties to him.

The theme of kinship is continued in verse 3, where the forefathers, a more satisfactory set of relatives, provide the model for the performance of a soma sacrifice for Indra and Agni, the success of which seems to have been in doubt (see 3a). This soma sacrifice continues in verse 4, where the Aśvins, somewhat surprisingly, participate in its performance. Perhaps the idea is that even other gods, the Aśvins and the goddess Holy Place, do ritual service to the great Indra and Agni.

The subject gradually shifts to praise of the two gods' powers (vss. 5–6) and requests for their aid (vss. 7–8). In verse 7 the forefathers return, and the poet, rather indirectly, compares the sacrificial compact the gods had with these ancestors with the one he hopes he has established now.

1. Because, seeking a better state, I have surveyed with my mind my kith and kin, o Indra and Agni, there exists for me no other (fatherly) solicitude than you two. So I have fashioned for you a thought that seeks the prize.
2. Because I have heard of you two as better givers of abundance than a no-count son-in-law or brother-in-law—so with an offering of soma for you, o Indra and Agni, I beget a newer praise.

3. Crying in distress, "Let us not cut the reins," guiding themselves following the skills of the forefathers, the bulls bring about exhilaration for Indra and Agni—for the two (pressing) stones are in the lap of the Holy Place.
4. For you two, o Indra and Agni, for your exhilaration, the goddess, the Holy Place, eagerly presses the soma.
   You two, o Aśvins, with your auspicious hands and lovely palms—rinse it with honey, infuse it in the waters.
5. O Indra and Agni, I have heard of you as most powerful at the distribution of goods, at the smashing of obstacles.
   Having sat on the ritual grass at this sacrifice here, make yourselves exhilarated on the pressed soma, o you of extensive domains.
6. You extend beyond the bordered domains at the battle cries, you extend beyond earth and heaven, beyond the rivers, beyond the mountains in your greatness, beyond and over all other creatures, o Indra and Agni.
7. Bring it to the fore, ready your skill, you two with the mace in your arms. Help us, o Indra and Agni, with your skills.
   Here are the very rays of the sun with which our forefathers were in communion.
8. O stronghold-splitters with the mace in your hands, ready your skill. Help us, o Indra and Agni, in the raids.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.110 Ṛbhus

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5 and 9

The Ṛbhus are originally mortal craftsmen who achieved immortality because of a series of marvelous deeds. This hymn begins in the ritual here-and-now, where the Ṛbhus, already immortal, are offered their share of the sacrifice by the poet-sacrificer, who speaks in the 1st person. The story of their achievement is then begun in verse 2, with the Ṛbhus depicted as itinerant skilled workers, rather like the poet and his comrades (thus perhaps holding out the hope that immortality will come to them as well). The particular feats they accomplished are then recounted, with special emphasis on their turning Tvaṣṭar's single cup into four (vss. 3, 5), the others hurriedly covered in verse 8, interspersed with pleas for their favor.

1. My (ritual) work has been stretched out, and it is being stretched out again. My sweetest insight is being recited for a hymn.

Right here is the sea (of soma) belonging to the All Gods. Satiate yourselves together on the (soma) prepared with the svāhā-cry, o R̥bhus.

2. When, facing front, you shrewd ones went forth in search of your daily bread, kind of like my pals, o sons of Sudhanvan, after your fill of roaming you came to the house of Savitar the pious.
3. Then Savitar impelled you to immortality when you went to make Agohya heed.
   This very beaker, the drinking vessel of the lord [=Tvaṣṭar]—though it was single, you made it fourfold.
4. Toiling with labor, with surpassing skill, the cantors, though they were mortal, reached immortality.
   The sons of Sudhanvan, the R̥bhus, who have the sun as their eye, in a year became infused with insights.
5. Like a field with a sharp stick, the R̥bhus measured into parts the single cup, which was gaping—they who were crying in want at the praise-invocation, seeking highest fame among the immortals.
6. Let us pour an inspired thought with our know-how, like ghee with a ladle, for the men of the midspace.
   Those who by their surpassing skill followed (the way) of the father of this one, the R̥bhus mounted to their prize, the realm of heaven.
7. (One) R̥bhu is for us a newer Indra by his power; (another) R̥bhu is a good one by his goods, a giver by his prizes.
   With the help of you, o gods, on a favorable day may we stand up to the battle thrusts of those who don't press soma.
8. O R̥bhus, you carved out a cow from a hide; you sent the mother to join with her calf again.
   O sons of Sudhanvan, superior men, with your skillful work you made your two elderly parents young.
9. Aid us with prizes at the winning of prizes: o Indra, accompanied by the R̥bhus, break out bright benefit.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.111 R̥bhus

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
5 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5

Unlike the preceding hymn, this one passes over the R̥bhus' marvelous achievements very quickly, in the first verse, in favor of appeals to those gods to use their skills for our benefit (esp. vss. 2–3). The signature verb is √takṣ "fashion." In the final two verses (4–5) it opens out into a sort of All God hymn, with appeals first to Indra as master of the R̥bhus and then to other gods with little or no connection to the R̥bhus.

1. They fashioned the smooth-rolling chariot, working with their know-how; they fashioned the two fallow bays that convey Indra and bring bullish goods.
   They fashioned—the R̥bhus—for their parents youthful vigor; they fashioned for the calf a mother to stay by it.
2. For our sacrifice fashion R̥bhu-like vigor; for will, for skill (fashion) refreshment along with good offspring.
   So that we may dwell peacefully with a clan possessing hale heroes, you shall establish this Indrian strength for our troop.
3. Fashion winning for us, o R̥bhus, winning for our chariot, winning for our steed, o men.
   Might you bring to pass victorious winning for us always, conquering kin and non-kin in battles.
4. Indra, master of the R̥bhus, do I call upon for help, and the R̥bhus, the Vājas, the Maruts for soma-drinking.
   Both Mitra and Varuṇa now and both the Aśvins—let them impel us to winning, to insight, to victory.
5. Let R̥bhu sharpen winning for the taking; let Vāja, victorious in the clash, help us.
   – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.112 Aśvins (except Heaven and Earth 1a, Agni 1b)

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
25 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 24–25

This tightly structured hymn conforms to the list format frequently found in Aśvin hymns. A pāda-length refrain ends every verse but the last two (24–25), urging the Aśvins to come with the same forms of help they have used in past rescues and marvelous deeds. The first three quarters of each verse provides examples of said deeds; as often in Aśvin hymns, many of these involve little-known or unknown episodes and proper names of otherwise unidentified clients of the Aśvins, intermixed with allusions to myths and legends found at least glancingly elsewhere. This fast-moving catalogue occupies most of the hymn (starting especially with vs. 5, through vs. 23), and its effect is to convince the audience that, with so many helpful interventions behind them, the Aśvins will surely answer our calls for help, as finally articulated in vss. 24–25.

The beginning of the hymn (vss. 1–4), while the rhetorical pattern is still being established, is more difficult and more syntactically and conceptually dense. The climax of this portion of the hymn is verse 4, where the rhetorical pattern gets its full shape but the content has not yet settled into the litany that follows. The pervasive double meaning of verse 4 cannot be conveyed directly in translation, for each part of the verse, on the one hand, identifies an unnamed divinity associated with the early-morning sacrifice (Wind [Vāyu], Agni, and Soma) by characteristic epithets, while, on the other, all three descriptions are also appropriate to the Aśvins' chariot (already mentioned in vs. 2), on which they will make the journey constantly alluded to in the refrain.

1. I reverently invoke Heaven and Earth, to be first in their thought; (I reverently invoke) Agni and the very bright gharma drink, for (the Aśvins) to seek on their journey.
   Those with which you stimulate the decisive act in the match, for (us to gain) a share—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
2. For you two to give them, inexhaustible (gifts?), easy to carry, have mounted onto your chariot, as if onto an eloquent (vehicle) for thinking.
   Those with which you help (us) to seek insights at the cultic act—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
3. You two rule over these clans at the command of the divine, through the might of the immortal.
   Those with which you swell the uncalved cow, you superior men—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
4. Those through which the earth-encircler [=Wind] is distinguished in the might of his extension, through which he of two mothers [=Agni] is distinguished, transiting in his transits, through which the wide-gazing one [=Soma] became of triple thought—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
5. Those with which from the waters you raised up rasping Rebha, who was confined and bound, and raised up Vandana to see the sun, with which you helped Kaṇva desiring gain—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
6. Those with which you revived Antaka, languishing in foreign parts, with which unwavering ones you revived Bhujyu, with which you revive Karkandhu and Vayya—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
7. Those with which (you made) Śucanti gain the stakes, keeping good company, (with which you made) the heated pot comfortable for Atri, with which you helped Pr̥śnigu and Purukutsa—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
8. Those powers with which, o bulls, you (helped) the outcaste, made the blind to see, the lame to go, with which you released the quail that had been swallowed—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

9. Those with which you revived the honeyed, inexhaustible river, with which you revived Vasiṣṭha, you unaging ones, with which you helped Kutsa, Śrutarya, Narya—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

10. Those with which you revived Viśpalā, to pursue the way, to gain the stakes in the contest with a thousand battle-prizes, with which you helped Vaśa Aśvya and Preṇi [?]—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

11. Those through which, o you of good drops, a cask streamed honey for Dīrghaśravas Auśija the merchant, with which you helped Kakṣīvant the praiser—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

12. Those with which you swelled the Rasā (River) with a gush of water, with which you helped the horseless chariot to victory, with which Triśoka drove up ruddy cows for himself—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

13. Those with which you drive around the sun in the distance and you helped Mandhātar [/the thinker] in (the battles for) lordship of lands, with which you helped the inspired poet Bharadvāja—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

14. Those with which you helped the great Atithigva Kaśojū and Divodāsa at the smiting of Śambara, with which you helped Trasadasyu at the stronghold splitting—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

15. Those with which you favor Vamra [/the ant], who drinks up, and Upastuta, with which you favor Kali, who acquired a wife, with which you helped Vyaśva and Pr̥thi—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

16. Those with which, o superior men, you sought a way for Śayu, with which for Atri, with which for Manu long ago, with which you drove the (cows?) of Śara for Syūmarśmi—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

17. Those with which Paṭharvan, with the might of his belly, shone like a fire laid and kindled, on his drive, with which you help Śaryāta in (the contest) for great stakes—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

18. Those by which, o Aṅgiras, with your mind you two *find a way out and go to the forefront at the opening up of (the cave) flooding with cows, with which you helped Manu the champion with refreshment—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.

19. Those with which you brought home wives for Vimada or with which you did your best to obtain the ruddy (cows), with which you brought Sudevī (as wife) [/divine favor] for Sudās—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
20. Those with which you become weal for the pious man, with which you aid Bhujyu, with which Adhrigu,
    (and make) (the woman) R̥tastubh comfortable and easy-bearing—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
21. With which you favor Kr̥śānu in shooting, with which you helped the steed of the youth in speed—you bring the dear honey that comes from the bees—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
22. Those with which you revive the superior man fighting for cattle at the conquering of men, at the winning of land and descendants, with which you help the chariots, with which the steeds—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
23. Those with which, o you of a hundred resolves, you promoted Kutsa Ārjuneya, promoted Turvīti and Dabhīti, with which you helped Dhvasanti and Puruṣanti—with those forms of help come here, o Aśvins.
24. Make speech fruitful for us, o Aśvins; make for us inspired thought, o wondrous bulls.
    I call you down for help at a time when one shouldn't gamble. Be there to strengthen us at the winning of prizes.
25. Through the days, through the nights protect us all around, o Aśvins, with your blessings that can come to no harm.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.113 Dawn (except Dawn and Night 1cd)

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
20 verses: triṣṭubh

Dawn often brings out the best in R̥gvedic poets, and this hymn is no exception. It consists of separate groups of thematically unified verses without seeming disjointed, because there is an overall theme: unity amid diversity.

In the first three verses Dawn is contrasted with her opposite number, her sister Night, but they are eternally conjoined and regularly alternating according to the divine plan. Verses 4–6, marked off by a pāda-length refrain, present the diversity of the animate world. Dawn wakes all creatures, and they all have different goals to pursue in their waking lives, while all being subject to Dawn. Verse 7 provides both summary and transition; it almost sounds like a hymn-final verse.

The substantial middle section of the hymn (vss. 8–15) sees a different kind of unity in diversity, in what is perhaps the most challenging conceptual question about dawn. Every day has a dawn and every day's dawn is, in some sense, the same, while being quite distinct. Today's dawn has been preceded by countless many and will be followed by countless many; she is both last and first. But she is also the capitalized and personified single Dawn. This conceptual puzzle is presented in verse 8 (especially the first half), and the gist and lexicon of 8ab are repeated in the final verse of this section, 15cd, forming a ring around the section. The most difficult verse in the hymn, verse 10, also treats this same problem, and the next verse (11) draws the melancholy conclusion: just as there were earlier dawns, now gone, so were there earlier mortals who saw those dawns—and others will follow and replace us, to see the dawns to come. Verse 13 provides indirect solace, by reframing the many dawns as one Dawn, who dawned before, dawns now, and will continue to dawn. (The other verses in this section, 9, 12, and 14, simply concern the current Dawn, in fairly standard terms.)

The final section (vss. 16–20) begins (vs. 16) with a triumphal exhortation, which indirectly counters the consciousness of inevitable death attending on time stated in verse 11 with the announcement that life is lengthened by the advent of dawn. The following verses treat the early-morning ritual: the response of the sacrificial fire (vs. 17), the offering to Vāyu (vs. 18), the recitation and singing of praise (vss. 17–18), and, of course, the gifts that are distributed at the dawn sacrifice by Dawn herself (vss. 17–20).

1. This fairest light of lights has come here. The bright sign, wide-reaching, has been born.
   Just as she [=Dawn] is impelled forth for the impulsion of Savitar, so Night has left behind the womb for Dawn.
2. Having a gleaming calf, herself gleaming white, she has come here. The black one [=Night] has left behind her seats for her.
   Having the same (kin-)bonds, immortal, following one upon the other, the two, Day (and Night), keep exchanging their color.
3. The road is the same for the two sisters—unending. They proceed on it, one after the other, commanded by the gods.
   They do not oppose each other, nor do they stand still, though well grounded—Night and Dawn, of like mind but different form.
4. Light-filled leader of liberalities, the bright one has appeared. She has opened out the doors for us.
   Having stirred forth the moving world, she has looked out for riches for us. – Dawn has awakened all the creatures.
5. The bounteous one (has awakened them), for (even) one who lies crossways to move, for (another) one to seek wealth to his use, for (even) those who see (only) a little to gaze out widely. – Dawn has awakened all the creatures.

6. (She has awakened) one for dominion, another for fame, another to seek greatness, another to go to whatever his goal.
   Living being are not alike in what they have in view. – Dawn has awakened all the creatures.
7. This Daughter of Heaven has appeared opposite, dawning forth, the youthful one with gleaming garment.
   Holding sway over every earthly good, o well-portioned Dawn, dawn forth here today.
8. She follows the troop of those who go away; she is the first of those who, one by one, come hither—
   Dawn, as she dawns forth, rousing up (every) living being, but awakening no dead one at all.
9. Dawn, since you have caused the fire to be kindled, since you have shone forth with the eye of the sun, since you have awakened the sons of Manu who are about to sacrifice, so you have made for yourself good profit among the gods.
10. How long (will it be) until she will be together with those who (previously) dawned forth and those who will dawn forth now?
    Bellowing, she yearns after the early ones; thinking ahead, she goes at pleasure with the others.
11. They have gone, the mortals who saw the earlier dawn dawning forth.
    (This dawn) has now come to be gazed upon by us. And there are those coming hither who will see (the dawn) in the future.
12. Keeping away hatred, guardian of truth, born in truth, gracious, arousing liberalities, of good omen, bringing to birth (our ritual) pursuit of the gods—here today, Dawn, as the most fairest, dawn forth.
13. Over and over in the past the goddess Dawn dawned forth. And today she has dawned forth here, the bounteous one.
    And she will dawn forth through later days. Unaging, immortal, she proceeds according to her own customs.
14. She has flashed forth with her ornaments at the doorposts of heaven. The goddess has removed the black raiment.
    Awakening (the world), with her ruddy horses, Dawn drives hither with a well-yoked chariot.
15. Conveying hither flourishing valuables, she makes herself a bright beacon, showing herself ever more brightly.
    The last of those who, one by one, have gone, the first of those radiating forth—Dawn has whitened widely.
16. Raise yourselves up! The living life-force has come here to us. Away, forth has gone the darkness; light comes hither.
    She has left a path for the sun to drive on. We have come to where they lengthen lifetime.

17. With reins of speech the conveyor (of oblations), the hoarse-voiced (singer) [=Agni], himself being praised, arouses the radiant dawns.
 Today then, o bounteous one, dawn for the one who sings; for us shine down a lifetime full of offspring.
18. The dawns, bringing cows and hale heroes, who dawn forth for the pious mortal when the litany of liberalities is raised like (the litany) of Vāyu—to them, the givers of horses, shall the soma-presser attain.
19. Mother of gods, face of Aditi, beacon of the sacrifice, lofty—shine forth.
 As creator of lauds, dawn forth for our sacred formulation. Beget (it) here among our people, o you who bring all valuables.
20. The bright profit that the dawns convey to the laboring sacrificer—the auspicious thing—
 – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.114 Rudra

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
11 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10–11

A simple but pleasing hymn, characterized by considerable chaining and intertwining of repeated vocabulary and syntactic structures. The helpful and healing aspects of Rudra are emphasized—the related words sumatí "benevolence" and sumná "favor" occur six times in this eleven-verse hymn. His fearsome and angry side is for the most part downplayed, mentioned in passing in verses 4c and 10a, both beginning "in the distance." But Rudra's possible punitive actions are addressed directly in verses 7–8, which contain twelve occurrences of the prohibitive negative mā́ "don't!"

1. These poetic thoughts do we proffer to Rudra, the powerful one with braided hair who rules over heroes, so that he will be luck for our two-footed and four-footed, so that everything in this settlement will be flourishing, free of affliction.
2. Be merciful to us, Rudra, and create joy for us. To you who rule over heroes we would do honor with reverence.
 Whatever luck and lifetime Father Manu won through sacrifice, that may we attain under your guidance, Rudra.
3. May we attain your benevolence though sacrifice to the gods, the benevolence of you who rule over heroes, o reward-granting Rudra.
 Bestowing only favor, come roaming toward our clans: possessing heroes who cannot be harmed, we will pour you an oblation.

4. We call down turbulent Rudra for help, the wandering poet who brings the sacrifice to success.
   In the distance from us let him shoot his divine anger. It is just his benevolence we choose.
5. We call down with reverence the boar of heaven, flame-red, with braided hair, turbulent in form.
   Bearing in his hand desirable healing remedies, he will extend shelter, covering, and protection to us.
6. This speech here is spoken to the father of the Maruts—speech sweeter than sweet, strengthening to Rudra.
   Both grant us, immortal one, what nourishes mortals, and be merciful to our selves, to our progeny and posterity.
7. Not the great one among us nor the wee little one, not the growing one among us nor the grown—don't smite our father nor our mother. Don't harm our own dear bodies, Rudra.
8. Don't do harm to our progeny and posterity nor to our (own) lifespan, not to our cows nor to our horses.
   Don't smite our heroes, Rudra, when enraged. We, with our oblations, will always invoke you.
9. Like a cowherd, I have driven these praises close to you. Grant your favor to us, father of the Maruts, for your benevolence is auspicious, most merciful. It is just your aid that we choose.
10. In the distance be your cow-smiting and men-smiting (anger). You who rule over heroes, let your favor be on us.
    Both be merciful to us and speak on our behalf, o god, and then extend double-lofty shelter to us.
11. We have spoken reverence to him, seeking his aid. Let Rudra, accompanied by the Maruts, hear our call.
    – This let Mitra and Varuṇa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

I.115 Sūrya

Kutsa Āṅgirasa
6 verses: triṣṭubh

As in most hymns and verses dedicated to Sūrya, the Sun, this hymn focuses on his rising. His function as eye of the gods, especially Mitra and Varuṇa, is mentioned in verse 1 (and in our opinion also in verse 5), and the activity that his rising inspires, both ritual and mundane, in verse 3. Verses 4 and 5 are more enigmatic and have occasioned much discussion: many scholars believe that both verses contrast the sun of the day with the "night sun," the dark side of the sun that, in the form of a wheel, travels invisibly from west to east to position itself for the next daily rising. Thus, in such interpretations, in the first half of verse 4 Night gathers up the dark garment she was weaving (see II.38.4) at the advent of the rising sun, but swathes the night sun in her garment in the second half of the verse. Two sides of the sun, bright and dark, are also referred to, more clearly, in the second half of verse 5. Although these interpretations have much in their favor, we still remain uncertain about what verses 4 and 5 are actually depicting. On the one hand, the interpretations offered seem too cut-and-dried for the fluid cosmology of the Ṛgveda; on the other, given the usual concentration on the happy event of sunrise, too much mention of the less auspicious night sun seems somewhat out of place.

1. The brilliant face of the gods has arisen, the eye of Mitra, Varuṇa, and Agni;
   he has filled heaven, earth, and the space between: the Sun is the life-breath of both the moving and the still.
2. The Sun approaches the gleaming goddess Dawn from behind, like a dashing youth a maiden, when the men seeking the gods stretch their yokes across, in response to the auspicious (god) for the sake of an auspicious (thing).
3. The auspicious tawny horses of the Sun—the brilliant ones, worth cheering on, that win dappled cows—bringing reverence, they have mounted the back of heaven. They circle around heaven and earth in a single day.
4. This is the Sun's divinity, this his greatness: in the middle of (her) work (Night?) has gathered together what was stretched out.
   When he has yoked his tawny horses from their seat, just after that Night stretches her garment for him.
5. The Sun takes on his own form in the lap of heaven, for Mitra and Varuṇa to see.
   His one surface, gleaming, is unbounded; the tawny (horses) together bring the other, the black one.
6. Today, o gods, at the rising of the Sun, deliver us from distress and from disgrace.
   – This let Mitra and Varuıa grant to us, and Aditi, River, and Earth and Heaven.

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa, the son of Dīrghatamas (poet of I.140–164), is the poet of the next eleven hymns (116–126). As Geldner points out, however, Kakṣīvant refers to himself as pajriyá (I.116.7, 117.6, 120.5) and to his family as the pajrā́ḥ (I.122.8, 126. 4, 5). According to I.121.13 the Pajras are Aṅgirases. Kakṣīvant also calls himself the son of Uśij in I.119.9 and 122.4; Sāyaṇa identifies Uśij as a dāsī, a servant woman.

Whatever his family affiliations Kakṣīvant has one of the most distinctive poetic personalities in the R̥gveda. He is a very skillful, self-conscious, and tricky artist, setting traps for his unwary hearers and twisting words and phrases into often impenetrable knots, with an exuberance that we have to admire despite our frequent frustrations. He also has clear thematic preoccupations. Approximately half of his oeuvre is devoted to the Aśvins (116–120), with important catalogues of their deeds and services. (Much of what we know or surmise about the mythology of the Aśvins comes from these hymns.) He is also particularly interested in women in all their aspects: there are important and high-style treatments of the marriage of Sūryā and the Aśvins' wooing of her, as well as two lovely Dawn hymns (123–124) sketching a range of female roles, but there is also a nearly obscene celebration of a girl he received as a gift from his patron (126.6–7) that presses the boundaries of R̥gvedic decorum.

Because so much of Kakṣīvant's artistry is bound up with his manipulation of the Sanskrit language even at the phonological level, the special flavor of his poetry is particularly hard to convey in translation, unfortunately.

I.116 Aśvins

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
25 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a catalogue that mentions many stories in which the Aśvins came to the rescue of those in need but that provides little detail. There is some thematic linkage among the narratives, which in three instances occur in sets of four. So, for example, the hymn begins with references to the Aśvins' chariot or chariots and to the chariot-animals in verses 1–4 and then returns to them once again not quite at the end but toward the end, in verses 17–20. Verses 13–16 contain a set of stories involving body parts: the hands of the Aśvins in verse 13, the mouth of the wolf in 14, the foot of a mare in 15, and the eyes of R̥jrāśva in 16. Elsewhere the poet repeatedly returns to references to waters or liquids (vss. 3, 5, 7, 9). Such linked verses do not structure the hymn tightly, but they keep it from becoming merely a list of great deeds.

The Aśvins are closely associated with the Pravargya, originally an independent rite that was incorporated into the classical soma ritual either during the upasad-days that precede the soma-pressing day or on the pressing day itself. In this rite milk is poured into a heated pot and offered to the Aśvins. This hymn explicitly refers to the Pravargya rite in the first verse, which employs the marked verb prá vr̥ñje, which gave the Pravargya its name. The verb describes either placing the Pravargya pot on the fire or turning the pot to offer the milk. In the penultimate verse, the poet frames the hymn by an indirect reference to the Pravargya by describing Rebha as "having twisted" (právr̥kta) in the water.

Many of the deeds alluded to in this hymn are likewise mentioned in the following four Aśvin hymns (I.117–20), especially the first two, often in the same or similar phraseology.

1. I twist (the milk-pot) as (one twists) the ritual grass and I stir up the praise songs, like winds the rain clouds, for the Nāsatyas, who have carried a wife down to our little Vimada with their chariot that is swift as a weapon,
2. As they were exulting in their firm-winged, swiftly speeding (steeds) or in the gods' spur.
   Then, o Nāsatyas, a donkey [=Vimada?] conquered the thousand at stake in the contest of Yama.
3. Tugra left Bhujyu behind in a cloud of water, Aśvins, as one who has died (leaves behind) his wealth.
   You carried him with your breathing ships [=winged steeds] that bob in the midspace far from water.
4. Through three nights and through three days, o Nāsatyas, you carried Bhujyu with your winged ones that wander far beyond:
   (you carried him) on the wasteland of the sea, at the far shore of the watery (sea), with your three chariots with their hundred feet and six horses.
5. Then you two acted as heroes upon the unsupporting sea, which has no place to stand and nothing to grasp, when, Aśvins, you carried Bhujyu home after he mounted your ship of a hundred oars.
6. O Aśvins, the white horse that you gave to (Pedu), whose horse was bad, to be everlasting well-being (for him)— that great gift of yours is to be famed. The racehorse of Pedu is ever to be called upon by the stranger.
7. O men, you two dug out plentifulness for Pajra's son, Kakṣīvant, who was praising you.
   You poured from the filter, the hoof of the bull-like horse, a hundred pots of liquor.
8. With snow you two kept away fire and scorching heat. You placed the nourishment of solid food for him.
   You brought Atri up to well-being, who had been brought down into the earth cleft together with his whole band.
9. You pushed the well far away, Nāsatyas; you put it bottom up, with its banks [=rim] aslant.
   Like waters for drinking they [=inspirations] flowed, for wealth to the thirsting thousand (descendants [?]) of Gotama.

10. And, Nāsatyas, from Cyavāna, who had become old, you removed his covering [=aged skin] like a garment.
    You extended the lifetime of him who was left behind, wondrous ones, and thereby you made him the husband of young women.
11. O men, that is your protective cover to be praised and brought to realization, o Nāsatyas, when you knowing ones dug (him) [=Vandana] out because he was beautiful, like a treasure that had been hidden away, for the sake of Vandana [/for you to be celebrated].
12. O men, I disclose that powerful, wondrous might of yours, like thunder the rain, in order to win it, as when Dadhyañc son of Atharvan (disclosed) the honey to you by means of the head of a horse when he proclaimed it.
13. Puraṃdhi has called upon your two hands again and again, o Nāsatyas, you of many delights [/of many arms], for what is great on your journey.
    You two heard (the call) of Vadhrimatī like a command. You gave (her a son) with golden hands.
14. At the critical moment you two freed the quail-hen from the mouth of the wolf, men, Nāsatyas, and, you two of many delights, you made the lamenting sage poet [=Uśanā Kāvya] to gaze far.
15. Because her foot was cut away like the wing of a bird, in the contest of Khela, at the decisive turn, right away you inserted a metal shank for Viśpalā to run, when the stake had been set.
16. R̥jrāśva, who butchered a hundred sheep for the she-wolf—him did his father blind.
    You placed two eyes in the unassailable one for him to gaze afar, o Nāsatyas, you wondrous healers.
17. The Daughter of the Sun mounted your chariot, like one winning the finish-line with her steed.
    All the gods approved in their hearts, and, Nāsatyas, you two keep company with her splendor.
18. When you two drove the course for Divodāsa and for Bharadvāja, Aśvins, urging (your steeds) onward, your accompanying chariot conveyed wealth. A bull and a river dolphin were yoked (to it).
19. Conveying wealth with good rule and a full lifetime with good descendants and good men, Nāsatyas, you two of one mind journeyed here with the prizes of victory to the wife of Jahnu, who was setting your portion three times a day.

20. At night you conveyed Jāhuṣa, besieged from every direction, through the easily traversed airy spaces.
    With your chariot that cuts asunder, o never-aging Nāsatyas, you journeyed through the mountains.
21. At the dawning of a single (dawn), Aśvins, you gave Vaśa the help (needed) for the battle in order for him to gain thousands (of cattle).
    Along with Indra you two smashed misfortunes and hostilities away from Pṛthuśravas, o bulls.
22. From the (dry [?]) well also of Śara, son of Ṛcatka, you supplied water (flowing) upward from below for him to drink.
    Also for starving Śayu, o Nāsatyas, with your powers you made his sterile cow swell (with milk).
23. To Viśvaka Kṛṣṇiya, who was seeking your help and singing your praise, who was aiming straight, Nāsatyas, you gave by your powers Viṣṇāpū to be seen (once more), like a lost animal.
24. Within the waters through ten nights and nine days, bound and pierced by the malicious one,
    Rebha, who bobbed and twisted in the water—him you two brought up, like soma with a ladle.
25. I have proclaimed your wondrous deeds, Aśvins. Having good cows and good men, might I be the lord of this (wealth).
    And both seeing and reaching a long lifetime, might I go to old age as if (going) home.

I.117 Aśvins

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
25 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a catalogue of the heroic deeds of the Aśvins, which ultimately leads to the poet's request for heroes (vs. 25). The problem for the poet is that such a hymn listing so many of the gods' deeds could easily become just an inventory without any real coherence. One of the poet's solutions to this problem is to create verbal and thematic linkages among verses and sets of verses in order to organize and unify his composition.

At the highest level the great deeds of the Aśvins are arranged according to theme. First are deeds in which the Aśvins rescue those who have been hidden away in some fashion: Atri in the earth cleft (3), Rebha in the waters (4), and Vandana in the ground (5). Then, the poet shifts from the Aśvins' rescues to their generosity. The theme is announced in verse 6 and then exemplified in verses 7–9. The Aśvins give the gift of a wife (7ab) and husband (7cd), a bright body (8ab), fame (8cd), and a horse (9). Verse 10 then summarizes this theme and announces a new one that extends the image of the horse in verse 9. The deeds in the next section turn on the Aśvins as charioteers and horsemen. They bring prizes to the poet (11ab) and restore the racing mare Viśpalā (11d). Verses 12–16 connect the Aśvins' deeds to the journeys of their chariot and horses. On those journeys they come to the aid of Cyavāna, Bhujyu, and others. The last extended set of verses, verses 16–22, describe a variety of different acts, but all these verses mention animals: a quail (16), sheep and a she-wolf (17–18), a barren cow (20), a "wolf" (possibly a plow; 21), and the head of a horse (22). This leaves aside verse 19, but the "lame one" here is probably the mare Viśpalā, one suggestion of Sāyaṇa. Note that the last two sets of verses overlap at verse 16, a join that again helps hold the poem together.

Another way the poet creates a sense of unity is by the repetition of lexical items, sometimes used in different contexts. So, the poet uses the unusual verb sám √rī "draw back together" in verses 4, 11, and 19 to describe a rescue from the sea, the repair of a horse, and the healing of the "lame one." Or again, the Aśvins carried down (ní…ūhathuḥ) a horse or a bride (9b, 20d) and carried Bhujyu out (níḥ…ūhathuḥ) of the sea (14d, 15c). In 5c níkhāta "buried" describes Vandana; níkhāta occurs again in 12c, although it is not clear to whom the latter verse refers. Sāyaṇa suggests that it is Rebha, who was "buried" in the waters, an interpretation supported by the reference to the tenth day (cf. I.116.24). However, since the verb níkhāta was just used with Vandana in verse 5cd, it may be he to whom the verse refers.

Likewise, the poet links consecutive verses by repeating the same or similar words. The Aśvins rescue the seer (ŕ̥ṣi) Atri in 3a and the seer Rebha in 4b. Each of verses 20–22 addresses the aśvinā and the "wondrous ones" (dasrā/dasrau). The four hemistichs of verses 13 and 14 all begin with yuvóḥ or yuvám. Verses 15 and 16 both begin ájohavīt "he called again and again." Such verbal concatenation again helps unify the diverse contents of the hymn.

The poet explores other kinds of verbal play, some of which create interconnections within the poem, but others reflect other purposes or simply his artistry as a poet. For example, víṣakta "drooping" of 20a is phonologically rearranged in 24c as the rare word víkasta "split apart." There appears to be another phonological connection in verse 16cd between viṣvā́c, the personal name Viṣvāc, which may mean the "Double-Talker," and viṣá "poison." However, the interpretation of this hemistich is problematic, in part because Viṣvāc and his son are only attested here. Geldner and others understand the poison to be the means by which the Aśvins destroy the son of Viṣvāc, but if so, such use of poison by the Aśvins is isolated. Rather, the poison may have given rise to the son of Viṣvāc, an interpretation supported by the phonological similarity of viṣvā́c and viṣá. Perhaps the idea is that Viṣvāc's son is born from the "poison" of his "double-talking" speech.

1. The age-old Hotar [=Agni] seeks to win you in order for you to be exhilarated on the honeyed soma, o Aśvins.
 The gift accompanied by the ritual grass is laid out, (as is) my song. With refreshment, with prizes of victory, journey here, o Nāsatyas.

2. Your chariot, o Aśvins, swifter than mind, drawn by good horses, comes to the clans.
   By which (chariot) you go to the home of the good ritual performer, by that, o men, travel your course to us.
3. You free Atri, the seer of the five peoples, from narrow straits, from the earth cleft along with his band, o men—confounding the wiles of the merciless Dasyu, driving them out, one after another, o bulls.
4. O Aśvins—you men, you bulls—by your wondrous powers you draw back together the seer Rebha, who bobbed away in the waters, like a horse hidden by those of evil ways. Your ancient deeds do not grow old.
5. Like one who has gone to sleep in the lap of destruction, like the sun dwelling in darkness, o wondrous ones, like a buried gem, lovely to see, (dug out) for beauty, you dug him [=Vandana] out for Vandana [/for our celebration of you], o Aśvins.
6. This (deed) of yours in your earth-encircling course, o men, deserves to be praised by Kakṣīvant, the son of Pajra, o Nāsatyas:
   from the hoof of your prizewinning horse, you poured a hundred pots of honey for the people.
7. You two, o men, gave Viṣṇāpū to Viśvaka Kr̥ṣṇiya, who was praising you.
   Even to Ghoṣā, living at home with her father, you gave a husband, though she was growing old, Aśvins.
8. You two gave a bright (body) to Śyāva Kaṇva [/Kaṇva, the Dark One] of the great flood [?], Aśvins.
   That deed of yours is to be proclaimed, o bulls: that you bestowed fame upon the son of Nr̥ṣad [=Kaṇva].
9. Assuming many forms, Aśvins, you carried down a swift horse to Pedu, an unstoppable prizewinning horse that gains a thousand (cows), a smasher of serpents, deserving to be famed as the surpassing one.
10. These things deserving to be famed are for you, o you who give good gifts: the formulation, the song, the seat within the two world-halves.
    When the Pajras call you, Aśvins, travel with refreshment and toward victory's prize for the knowing one!
11. Being sung by Sūnor Māna [=Agastya], o energetic Aśvins, digging out victory's prize for the inspired poet, and growing strong alongside Agastya through his poetic formulation, you draw Viśpalā back together, Nāsatyas.
12. Journeying where?—Toward the good praise of (Uśanā) Kāvya? To a bed, o sons of heaven, o bulls?— you dug out the one who was buried like a tub of gold on the tenth day, Aśvins.

13. You, o Aśvins, made the aging Cyavāna a youth again through your powers.
Your chariot did the Daughter of the Sun choose, Nāsatyas, together with its splendor.
14. You turned your minds again to Tugra in your ancient ways, o youthful ones.
You carried Bhujyu from the flood, from the sea, with your birds, your silvery horses.
15. Carried forth into the sea, the son of Tugra [=Bhujyu] called upon you again and again, having gone (to you) on an unwavering course, Aśvins.
You carried him out with your chariot, swift as mind, with its good team, o bulls, to keep him well.
16. The quail-hen called upon you again and again, Aśvins, so that you freed her from the mouth of the wolf.
With your victorious (chariot) you journeyed across the back of the rock. You crushed the (son) of Viṣvāc [=the Double-Talker?], born by poison.
17. Him who had readied a hundred sheep for the she-wolf, who was led forth into darkness by his merciless father—in R̥jrāśva you put eyes; you made light for the blind one to see.
18. O Aśvins, you bulls, that she-wolf summoned good fortune and the winner's stake for the blind man, saying, "O men!
Like the lover of a maiden is R̥jrāśva (to me), since he butchered a hundred and one sheep."
19. Great is your help, a joy itself, o Aśvins. Even the lame one do you draw back together, o holy ones.
And so Plenty called upon just you two, and you two came to her with your help, o bulls.
20. Wondrous Aśvins, you made the drooping, barren cow, no milk-cow, to swell (with milk) for Śayu.
By your powers you carried down to Vimada a wife, the maiden of Purumitra.
21. O Aśvins, wondrous ones, scattering barley by a "wolf" [=a drill plow?], milking out refreshment for the race of Manu, blasting sound at the Dasyu with a bagpipe, you made wide light for the Ārya.
22. For Dadhyañc, the son of Atharvan, you substituted the head of a horse, Aśvins.
Speaking the truth, he proclaimed to you Tvaṣṭar's honey, which was hidden from you, o wondrous ones.
23. Always, o poets, I delight in your favor. Help all my insights, Aśvins.
Give us lofty wealth bringing descendants and worthy of fame, o Nāsatyas.
24. Giving Hiraṇyahasta [the Gold-Handed One], o Aśvins, you granted him as a son to Vadhrimatī [She Who Has a Steer (for a Husband)], o men.

Your raised up Śyāva [the Dark One], who had been split apart in three places, so that he might live, o Aśvins, who bring good gifts.

25. The sons of Āyu have proclaimed these your ancient heroic deeds, o Aśvins, creating for you a poetic formulation, o bulls. Obtaining good heroes, we would announce the ritual distribution.

I.118 Aśvins

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The structure of the hymn is straightforward. It begins with an invitation to the Aśvins to come to the sacrifice on their chariot. Indeed, it is their chariot that is the focus of the poet's attention through most of the first half of the poem. The triplets associated with the chariot—its three chariot boxes (vss. 1–2), three wheels (2), and three turnings (2)—suggest the sacrifice itself with its three soma offerings. Within the poem, therefore, the ritual performance thus becomes an image of the Aśvins' chariot, and its realization a sign of the arrival of the Aśvins. The chariot not only brings the Aśvins to the sacrifice but it also brings help to the sacrificer (vs. 1). Ancient poets have told of the help of the Aśvins (3cd), and the second part of the poem (vss. 5–9) begins with a recital of the many men and even animals in their many desperate situations whom the Aśvins have helped. The hymn then returns to the poet's own need for help (vs. 10), and in verse 11 there is once again a summons of the Aśvins. The last verse creates a formal ring, for just as in verse 1 the Aśvins should come quickly in their "falcon-winged chariot" (ráthaḥ... śyenápatvā), so in verse 11 the Aśvins should come with the "fresh speed of a falcon" (śyenásya jávasā nū́tanena).

1. Aśvins, let your falcon-winged chariot journey here toward us—filled with compassion, filled with help—which is swifter than a mortal's thought, which has three chariot boxes and the speed of the wind, o bulls.
2. Journey toward us by your smooth-turning chariot with its three chariot boxes, with its three wheels, and three turnings.
Swell the cattle (with milk), quicken the chargers, and strengthen the hero for us, o Aśvins.
3. Racing headlong by your smooth-turning chariot, wondrous ones, hear this signal-call of the stone.
Have not the inspired poets born long ago said that you are the first to respond to trouble, Aśvins?
4. Aśvins, let the swift, soaring falcons harnessed to your chariot carry you here—those that, crossing the waters high in the heavens like vultures, carry you to (our offered) enjoyment.

5. Having become pleased, the young girl, the Daughter of the Sun, has now mounted your chariot, o men.
   Let the soaring horses of your wonder [=your chariot], let your ruddy birds, carry you at the critical moment.
6. You raised up Vandana through your wondrous powers; o wondrous bulls, (you raised) up Rebha by your powers.
   You rescue the son of Tugra from the ocean, and you made Cyavāna youthful again.
7. You granted nourishment and relief to Atri, who was led down into the scorching (earth cleft).
   Having found pleasure in his good praise, in return you granted sight to Kaṇva, whose eyes were pasted shut.
8. You swelled the cow (with milk) for Śayu of long ago, who needed help, o Aśvins.
   You released the quail-hen from tight straits, and you inserted a shank for Viśpalā.
9. You gave to Pedu the serpent-smashing white horse, sped by Indra, o Aśvins—the overwhelming, powerful (horse), repeatedly called upon by the stranger, the strong-limbed bull that wins a thousand (cattle).
10. Needing help ourselves, o men, we call on you, who are nobly born, for aid, o Aśvins.
    Finding pleasure in our songs, journey here to us by your chariot bearing goods for our safe passage.
11. Of one accord, Nāsatyas, journey here to us with the fresh speed of a falcon, for, as one who has given an oblation, I call upon you, Aśvins, at the break of the newest dawn of all.

I.119 Aśvins

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
10 verses: jagatī

The hymn begins along expected lines with a summons to the Aśvins to come to the sacrifice (vs. 1). However, the offering mentioned is not soma, but rather the hot milk (gharmá) of the Pravargya rite (vs. 2cd). In 2cd and probably verse 3 Kakṣīvant describes the arrival of the Aśvins, who bring Sūryā, the Daughter of the Sun, to her wedding. The bridegroom of Sūryā is Soma in the late R̥gveda (X.85), but in 5cd she chooses the Aśvins themselves as her husbands. Pirart (1995: 252) suggests that yuvā́m pátī is a corruption for *yuvā́m pátim and therefore the line means that Sūryā chose "the young (Soma) as her husband." But if the gharmá in this hymn in some sense displaces the soma, perhaps the poet has replaced the god Soma by the deities of the Pravargya rite, the Aśvins. For further on the self-choice marriage of Sūryā and Kakṣīvant's treatments of it, see Jamison (2001). In this connection verse 3 contains one of Kakṣīvant's characteristic verbal tricks: the phrase sūrím ā́ váram, which literally means "the patron according to his will," is a scrambling of sūriyā́m váram*, with a reference to Sūryā (whose name is normally read trisyllabically as Sūr(i)yā) and her svayaṃ-vara (self-choice) marriage. This scrambled phrase is "repaired" in verse 5 with the straightforward declaration of her choice. See Jamison (2006).

1. I summon your chariot with its many wiles, swift as thought, with speeding horses, and worthy of the sacrifice, in order for us to live—the winning (chariot) of a thousand banners, bringing hundreds of good things, obedient to command, and creating wide space—toward (our offered) enjoyment.
2. At its journey our lofty insight has been aimed at your praise. (Our praises, going) in (all) directions, converge (upon you).
   I sweeten the hot milk; your help comes in return. Ūrjānī [=Sūryā] has mounted your chariot, Aśvins.
3. When, contending with each another, they have clashed with one another for beauty—(those) innumerable combatants, victorious in battle—then your chariot appears ever brighter in its steep descent, when you convey the patron according to his will, Aśvins.
4. You came to Bhujyu, tossing (in the sea), with your self-harnessed birds, conveying him back from his ancestors [=from the dead].
   You traveled your most noble track, o bulls, and your great help became manifest to Divodāsa.
5. For the sake of your marvel [=your chariot], Aśvins, two voices guided the chariot harnessed by you and its (cargo?) belonging to the warrior band [? =the Aśvins].
   Having come to marriage to you for a partnership with you, the noble young girl chose you two as her husbands.
6. You give Rebha space from being besieged, (and you cool) the intensely heated, hot (vessel) with snow for Atri.
   You swelled nourishment in Śayu's cow. Vandana was extended through a long lifetime.
7. You constructed Vandana, who had fallen apart because of age, like workers a chariot, o wondrous ones.

Out of the soil you give birth to the inspired poet [=Vandana?] amid acclaim. Here (too) your skill will prevail for the one honoring (you).

8. You went to the one piteously crying in the far distance [=Bhujyu], entrapped by his own father's abandonment of him.
Your enduring help that brings the sunlight, your brilliant mastery, arose at the critical moment.

9. And the little fly whispered honeyed (speech) to you, (and now) in the exhilaration of soma, (Kakṣīvant), the son of Uśij, cries out (to you):
"You two try to win the thought of Dadhyañc, and then the horse's head replies to you."

10. In friendship you offer to Pedu a white (horse), bringing many boons, overcoming contenders, the heaven-bound (horse), hard to overcome by arrows in battles, to be celebrated, and conquering the lands, like Indra.

I.120 Aśvins

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
12 verses: gāyatrī 1, 10–12; kakubh 2, kāvirāj 3, naṣṭarūpī 4, tanuśirā 5, uṣṇih 6, viṣṭārabr̥hatī 7, kr̥ti 8, virāj 9

Even for Kakṣīvant, a master of enigmatic poetry, this is an especially puzzling hymn, and not surprisingly it has given rise to quite different interpretations. For example, in Geldner's view the hymn concludes with the poet's complaint that his patron has been ungenerous. Much of the hymn reflects that disappointment: Kakṣīvant pretends to be a simple man but creates metrically irregular, obscure verses, characterized by irony and hidden malice. While there is much to recommend in Geldner's approach to the hymn, we have taken a different tack.

The most notable feature of this hymn is its strange metrical pattern. The hymn begins in gāyatrī (vs. 1), a simple and common meter, but then sinks gradually into metrical chaos and finally emerges gradually into gāyatrī once again (vss. 10–12). The metrical transitions are marked by verse 2 in kakubh and verse 9 in virāj. Both are rarer Vedic meters, but they are meters found elsewhere. However, the middle section (vss. 3–8) changes meter in every verse and with one exception (vs. 6 in uṣṇih), the meters are jagged and very unusual. The impression they make is one of dislocation and even poetic incompetence, although it is obviously an artful and deliberate incompetence.

This metrical structure underscores the theme of the hymn. The poet begins, in gāyatrī, with a question about who will earn the support of the Aśvins. The first two pādas are typical and formulaic. Indeed, they reflect a very old, traditional formula, since the phrasing of ab resembles lines from the Gāthās of Zarathustra: Yasna 33.2 tōi vārāi rādəntī, ahurahyā zaošē mazdā "These will bring success to his desire and will be to the liking of the Wise Lord." If this formulaic identification is correct, then pāda c may stand in intentionally shocking contrast: it is a question not about a successful worshiper but about an incompetent one, and immediately after this question the poet's meter begins to disintegrate. The poet does not have the knowledge he needs (2) and fears that he might become someone acetás "without insight," a word that recalls ápracetas "inattentive" in 1c and the anxiety that propels the hymn. The Aśvins know a certain entranceway, "doors," that the poet does not. Pirart (1995: 263) suggests that these doors are the "doors of riches," after I.68.10, 72.8, and similarly IX.45.3 = 64.3, and Geldner, the "doors of awareness" after IX.10.6 and similarly VII.95.6. It would be fully in accord with Kakṣīvant's enigmatic style to mean either and both, especially since the poet's knowledge and his prosperity are bound together.

Because of his anxiety, the poet calls on the Aśvins to help him (3–4). Verses 5 and 6 are particularly problematic, but they appear to describe the poet's shortcomings. His speech is not grand like that recited before the Bhr̥gavāna fire, the fire originally lit by Bhr̥gu that symbolizes the unity of all the clans, and it is not beautiful (5). His voice is rough, but he asks the Aśvins to hear his song as if it were the song that Takavāna sings (6). Takavāna appears only here, but judging from the context he is someone whose beautiful voice the poet hopes the Aśvins will hear instead of his own raspy one. The poet thus asks the Aśvins to overlook his faults, and not to consign him and his people to the evildoings of their enemies (7–8). In the last verses the crisis seems to have passed. The poet's verse stabilizes (into virāj), and the poet can hope that his measured pādas will win him measures of goods (9). At the beginning of this verse he also demonstrates his ability to puzzle. The subject is a cow, suggested by the previous verse, but what does the cow represent? Although it looks back several verses, one possibility is his Speech (vs. 5). Before he couldn't speak the way he wished, but now he hopes that his Speech will yield the milk that will bind the Aśvins to him.

In verse 10 the "horseless chariot" of the Aśvins is the hymn, which, safely back in gāyatrī, is now running smoothly. It will carry the poet to successful sacrifices (11). This then leaves a problem in interpreting the last verse. Perhaps the anxiety he expressed in the middle of the hymn was not real but imagined, a kind of a dream. This last verse then might be the dismissal of that anxiety and of the concern that he will not receive the patronage he deserves.

1. What oblation to you will bring success, Aśvins? Who will be to the liking of you both?
   How will he make offering?—he, an inattentive man!
2. He should ask just the two [=the Aśvins] who know about the doors—he, the man who does not know properly, who later (would be) without insight.
   Never are the two inactive around the mortal.

3. We call upon you two knowing ones. Knowing, you should speak to us a (poetic) thought today.
   Distributing portions, the one seeking you chants forth.
4. In my naïveté I ask (you), not (other) gods, about the unerring (soma), created with the vaṣaṭ-call, o wondrous ones.
   Protect us from the more powerful and the more violent one!
5. (The Speech that says,) "I who cry forth as if at the Bhr̥gavāna (fire), who am beautiful, I the Speech by which Pajriya [=Kakṣīvant] sacrifices to you"— seeking refreshment, (I do) not (cry) forth (such Speech) as one who knows.
6. Hear the song of Takavāna, even though I have rasped it out to you, Aśvins.
   (Set) your eyes here, lords of beauty, upon our home.
7. Because you two were in great joy surely (then) when you had jerked it away—o good ones, you should be fine herdsmen for us!—protect us from the ill-wishing wolf.
8. Do not betray us to a nobody (who is) our enemy. Do not let our cows go from our house to a nowhere place, giving sustenance from their udders, though without young.
9. She should give milk in order to establish an alliance with you two. Measure us for wealth accompanied by prizes of victory, and measure us for nourishment accompanied by cattle.
10. I have won the horseless chariot of the Aśvins with their prizewinning mares.
    By it I enjoy abundant delight.
11. In every way this easy-moving chariot will carry me again and again among the peoples, o body (of mine), to the soma-drinking.
12. So then, I take no account of a dream nor of a rich man who gives no sustenance.
    Both these vanish in the morning.

I.121 Indra or the All Gods

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
15 verses: triṣṭubh

Of all the challenging and maddening hymns in Kakṣīvant's small but memorable oeuvre, this hymn may present the biggest challenges and the most maddening set of puzzles—though the immediately preceding one is at least in competition. It seems that antiquity had a similar reaction, as the Anukramaṇī is not even sure whether the hymn is dedicated to Indra or to the All Gods. We will here sketch a structure and suggest some themes, but we make no claims for the correctness of all the choices made in our translation or commentary.

The predominant deity of the hymn must be Indra, though his name does not appear until verse 11, and the governing myth of the hymn is that of the opening of the Vala cave. But other mythic material is interspersed through the hymn, and the present-day sacrificial situation is also treated—while, conversely, the Vala myth is sometimes presented as if it were happening at this moment. In fact, the first verse sets up this scenario, with questions about Indra's attendance at a sacrifice where the Aṅgirases, his helpers in the Vala myth, are performing their hymns. The same prospective appearance of Indra among the Aṅgirases is also described in verse 3, with the recital of the Vala myth continued, in the past, in verse 4. The intervening verse (2) is also couched in the mythic past and begins (2ab) with Indra's primal cosmogonic deed, the separation of heaven and earth. The second half of verse 2 contains one of the most discussed portions of the hymn, a set of three memorably described female figures whose relationships to each other and to the "buffalo" who is gazing upon at least one of them are unclear. In our view, all three figures are different forms of Dawn, the subject of two of Kakṣīvant's other hymns (I.123–124), as she transforms herself from a young girl choosing her husband (the Sun) to a wife (of the Sun in the form of a horse) to a mother (of a cow: the light of Dawn is frequently compared to cows). The buffalo is probably Indra, and the focus on Dawn is appropriate to a hymn celebrating the opening of the Vala cave and the release of the dawn-cows.

Verse 4 alluded to the impetus that drinking soma gave to Indra at the opening of the Vala cave, and the following two verses (5–6) sketch the history of Indra's possession of soma and then turn to the soma currently being produced at today's dawn sacrifice. The following, quite puzzling verse (7) seems to identify Indra with the sun and, by implication, with the shining soma of the previous verse, also compared to the sun. The poet seems further to suggest that, even in the absence of all the sacrificial necessities, the presence of radiant Indra is tantamount to a properly performed sacrifice, for the benefit of the poet and his family. (We suggest that Kakṣīvant is alluding to himself here, on the basis of similar vocabulary used in I.126.5.)

Verse 8 begins a series of mythological verses, with an intertwining of the Vala myth (9ab, 10ab) and that of Indra's slaying of Śuṣṇa with the aid of Uśanā Kāvya (9cd, 10cd, 11d, 12) and the related myth of the halting of the Sun's horses and chariot (13), with incidental mentions of other deeds of Indra (the Vr̥tra battle, 11c) thrown in. The interpenetration of these mythic allusions keeps the audience off balance, a queasy feeling much increased by the disjunctive and elliptical syntax.

The final two verses (14–15), asking for protection and valuables, are by contrast quite straightforward. Presumably on this subject Kakṣīvant did not want the god to misunderstand.

1. Will he, hastening to the cup of the men seeking the gods, listen properly to the hymns of the Aṅgirases?
   When he has reached the clans of the secure habitation, will the one worthy of the sacrifice stride widely at their ceremony?
2. He propped up heaven, and he sprinkled its foundation [=earth]. The ingenious one (provided) movable wealth of man and cow for the prize.
   The buffalo gazed after (Dawn,) the self-created maiden making her choice (of husband), (who turned into) the consort of the horse [=Sun], (then into) the mother of the cow.
3. The surpassing king will come through the days to the age-old call of the clans of the Aṅgirases for the ruddy (cows).
   He will fashion the mace, his team-mate; he will prop up heaven for the sake of the two-footed and four-footed belonging to men.
4. In the exhilaration of this (soma) you gave the noisy vanguard of the ruddy (cows), (previously) covered over, to truth, when the three-humped (herd) was (momentarily) turned back in its forward surge. You uncovered the deceits and unclosed the doors for the (people) descended from Manu.
5. For you is this milk, consisting of good semen, which your two bustling parents brought as a bounty, (for you) to become surpassing—your blazing legacy, which they gained through sacrifice, the milk of the ruddy one who gives sap as milk.
6. And now he [=Soma] has been produced—let him give exhilaration as he advances; he has shone forth like the sun from this dawn, when the drop, (being impelled) by (priests) having sweat as their oblation, (itself) pouring with the offering spoon, has reached its old (ritual) domains.
7. (Even) when a woodpile provided with good kindling should be far away, the sun (still goes) around the cowpens at the ceremony, when you [=Indra] shine forth, through the days that bring results, for the surpassing one [=Kakṣīvant?] whose clan is on the (wedding?) carts, seeking livestock.
8. You brought here the two tawny (horses) attained from great heaven, as you were battling for the wellspring (of soma), which was overwhelming in heavenly brilliance, when for you to grow strong they milked with stones the exhilarating tawny (soma), that was frenzied for cows [=milk], befriended by the wind.

9. Ingenious, you rolled back from the cow the metallic stone of heaven, which had been brought nearby, when, o much-invoked one, vanquishing Śuṣṇa, you kept encircling him with endless deadly weapons.
10. When it is just before the sun enters into (the fold) of darkness, then cast the missile against the bolt, o possessor of the stones.
   Even the power of Śuṣṇa that surrounded him—that you tore away from heaven, even though it was well-knotted.
11. The two great surfaces that have no wheels, Heaven and Earth, cheered you on at this deed, o Indra:
   You put Vr̥tra to sleep powerfully with your mace, as he was lying upon the streams, (and you put to sleep) the boar [=Śuṣṇa?].
12. You, o Indra, the manly one driving to the men for help—mount the (horses) of the Wind, the best conveyors, easy to yoke.
   What Uśanā Kāvya gave to you to provide exhilaration, that decisive, Vr̥tra-smiting mace had he fashioned.
13. You brought to a halt the tawny mares of the Sun for men. Etaśa bore the wheel; (you were) on your own, Indra.
   Having cast (it) forth to the far shore of the ninety and nine (rivers), you rolled the non-sacrificers over into the pit.
14. Protect us from this evil rage and from difficulty in a close encounter, o Indra, mace-bearer.
   Hold out toward us prizes by the cartload, with horses as their foundation—for refreshment, for fame, and for liberality.
15. Let not your favor wither away from us, o you great in prizes: refreshments will completely cover (us).
   Give us a share in the cows of the stranger, o bounteous one. Might we be your most bounteous feasting companions.

I.122 All Gods

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
15 verses: triṣṭubh, except virāḍrūpā 5–6

This hymn is divided almost equally between praise and invocation to a variety of gods (vss. 1–6) and a complex dānastuti (vss. 7–15). As is true of all of Kakṣīvant's oeuvre there are many twists and turns along the way. The part devoted to the gods seems to define an early-morning sacrifice in its first verses, especially those calling on Dawn and Night (vs. 2), the Wind as well as Indra (vs. 3), and the Aśvins and Agni (vs. 4), though Rudra and the Maruts (vs. 1), Pūṣan (vs. 5), and, especially, Mitra and Varuṇa (vss. 6–7, 9) also appear. An early-morning ritual is appropriate for the following dānastuti, since the priestly gifts (dakṣiṇās) are distributed then.

The dānastuti is filled with personal names, and, as often, it is difficult to disentangle the relationships among them. In fact it appears that we may be dealing with competing potential patrons, each praised for a fleeting moment for his generosity until a larger prize from a different patron is in the offing. In verse 12 the poet seems to be inviting this competition, promising to act as a kind of kingmaker for whomever he gets as patron, and in the difficult verse 13 the poet may be suggesting that patrons with goods to offer are attempting to surpass competing patrons with their largesse. This interpretation remains uncertain, however.

1. O you of quick fervor [=priests], bring forward your drink, your stalk, your sacrifice for Rudra who grants rewards.
   I have praised (him) along with the heroes of the lord of heaven; (I have praised) the Maruts as if aiming at the two world-halves.
2. It is for Dawn and Night, like two wives, to strengthen the Early Invocation—the two that are known in many ways:
   (the one) like a barren woman wearing a castoff cloak, (the other) with the glory of the sun, lovely to see with her golden (ornaments).
3. Let the earth-circling one [=Wind], rising at early morning, invigorate us.
   Let the Wind, (child?) of the waters, accompanied by bulls, invigorate us.
   Sharpen us, o Indra and "Mountain" [=Indra's mace]. Let all the gods then create wide space for us.
4. And it is for (Kakṣīvant), son of Uśij [/the fire-priest], to call for me this glorious pair [=Aśvins], the pursuers (of the oblation), the drinkers, for the whitening (of dawn).
   Put forward for yourselves the Child of the Waters [=Agni], forward the two mothers [=kindling sticks] of abundant [?] Āyu.
5. It is for (Kakṣīvant), son of Uśij [/the fire-priest], to call the "screecher," the laud, for you as if with a shout, at the attainment of the silvery one [=soma?].
   (Put him [=Pūṣan]?) forward for yourselves, for Pūṣan to give. I would call here Agni's assemblage of good ones [=gods].
6. Hear these calls of mine, Mitra and Varuṇa, and hear them in your seat on all sides.
   Let the one who grants the gift of hearing, who hears well, hear us—the Sindhu River with her waters who provides good lands.

7. This gift of yours is to be praised, Mitra and Varuṇa. Having received hundreds of cows among the Pr̥kṣayāmas: Pajra, Śrutaratha, Priyaratha, they [=priests and poets] immediately came to prosperity, upon penning them in.
8. The largesse of him who offers great bounty is to be praised. Together might we, having good heroes, win (that) of Nahus, who for the Pajras is the man providing prizewinning mares and for me is the patron (of largesse) consisting of horses and chariots.

9. A man who's a liar, a crooked liar who presses (soma that's) like water for you two, o Mitra and Varuṇa, he himself installs a wasting disease in his own heart, while the truthful man gains his object through his oblations.
10. He, spurred by wondrous power, is more forceful than proud Nahus, and his fame is sung by men.
He whose gifts have been set loose drives as a pumped-up runner, always the champion in all battles.
11. Now then, as you go to the call of Nahus the patron, o gladdening kings of immortality, hear what largesse of Nabhojū and of Nirava there is for the possessor of the chariot to proclaim in its greatness.
12. "Whichever patron (we belong to), we shall establish him as a force," so did they say on the attainment of ten-part (gushing [=soma?]).
The brilliant things in which the assemblage of good ones [=gods] finds enjoyment—let them all [=gods] gain (them) as their victory prize.
13. Let us find elation in the ten-part gush (of soma?), when the twice five [=fingers?] come, bringing foods.
The one providing desirable horses, the one providing desirable reins, and these masters (of goods)—are they heading straight toward the men to surpass (them)?
14. The "flood" with golden ears and bejeweled necks—let all the gods make it wide for us.
Let the ruddy ones [=Dawns?], coming here in an instant to the songs of the stranger, find pleasure in both of us [=singers and patrons].
15. The four young'uns [=foals?] of Maśarśāra and the three of King Āyavasa, the victorious (come) to me.
Your chariot, o Mitra and Varuṇa, with its long front, with hands as its guiding rope, has shone like the sun.

I.123 Dawn

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
13 verses: triṣṭubh

One of the loveliest of the R̥gvedic Dawn hymns. It begins with references to the dakṣiṇā or "priestly gifts" distributed at the early-morning sacrifice (vss. 1–6), almost as if to get the business of the hymn out of the way. But even here the gifts are clearly under the control of the lovely young Dawn, whose beauties are hinted at. The next section (vss. 7–9) confronts the usual conundrums and paradoxes about Dawn (see also I.113 above)—both her twinned opposite number, Night (vs. 7), and the identity and diversity of the dawns of each individual day (vss. 8–9), each one dutifully conforming to the rules that order the cosmos by performing her appointed rounds. In the last of these verses (9), Dawn's daily journey is likened to a girl's going to a lovers' tryst, and this simile provides the transition to the next two verses (10–11), where she is compared to a beautiful young woman showing herself off. The final two verses (12–13) combine the gift theme of the beginning of the hymn with the periodicity of the dawns treated in the middle section.

1. A broad chariot has been yoked for the priestly gift. The gods, the immortals have mounted it.
   Up from the dark has arisen the lady of extensive power, being attentive to the human dwelling place.
2. Earlier than all creation she has awoken, the lofty one, conquering, winning the prize.
   On high she has gazed forth—the young woman come into being again. Dawn has come here, the first one at the Early Invocation.
3. When today you will share out a share to the superior men among mortals, o nobly born goddess Dawn, god Savitar, master of the house, will here declare to the Sun that we are without offense.
4. To house after house she drives *in her greatness, day after day assuming (new) names.
   Seeking to win, flashing, over and over she has come hither. She has her share of the very tip-top of goods.
5. Sister of Bhaga, kin to Varuṇa, o liberal Dawn, be first awake.
   The institutor of evil should lag behind. Might we conquer him with a priestly gift as our chariot.
6. Let liberalities rise up, up plentiful gifts; up have the blazing fires stood.
   The eagerly sought goods hidden by darkness do the radiant dawns reveal.
7. The one goes away; the other approaches: having distinct forms, the two day-halves proceed in tandem.
   Of the two that circle around, the one has hidden the darkness: Dawn has flashed with her ever-blazing chariot.
8. Of the same appearance today, just the same appearance also tomorrow, they follow the long(-standing) ordinance of Varuṇa.
   The faultless ones make a circuit through thirty "wagon-treks" [=days of the month], each one encompassing her purpose in a single day.
9. Knowing the name of the first day, gleaming, bright-faced, she has been born from the dark.
   She does not violate the ordinance of truth, every day going to the appointed place like a maiden to a rendezvous.

10. Like a girl exulting in her body, you go, o goddess, to the god who seeks to attain you [=Sun].
    Youthful, full of smiles, radiant, you reveal your breast in the east [/before (him)].
11. Of lovely appearance like a maiden groomed by her mother, you reveal your body to be seen.
    Dawn forth widely, o Dawn, auspicious one. The other dawns will not achieve this of yours.
12. Possessing horses, cows, and all desirable things, aligning themselves with the rays of the sun, they go away and they come here again, bearing auspicious names—the dawns.
13. Guiding yourself following the rein of truth, place ever more auspicious resolve in us.
    O Dawn, easy to invoke, dawn forth to us today. Let there be riches among us and among our bounteous (patrons).

I.124 Dawn

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
13 verses: triṣṭubh

Another virtuosic Dawn hymn. Here the poet takes the usual generic themes, especially Dawn as a beautiful woman, and creates highly specific images, especially in verses 7–8, which provide a series of almost sociological portraits of ancient Indian female figures. In verse 7 we first (pāda a) meet a brotherless girl boldly approaching men; since the brother was important in finding and arranging suitable matches, a brotherless girl was at a disadvantage in the marriage market and needed to take initiative on her own. (See Schmidt 1987: 30–75.) The next image is a pun (pāda b), with one harmless generic image and one shockingly specific one. In the harmless reading a figure, presumably male, mounts a chariot to seek prizes; in the other a woman, presumably a prostitute, shows herself off on a platform for money. The third image (pādas cd) is of the legitimate wife adorned for her husband, but even there the image shades into that of a loose woman showing her breast. The next verse (8) treats the common theme of the sisters Dawn and Night, but again Dawn is presented in a particular female role. In the second pāda, the "girl to be gazed upon" may well refer to the display motif of the ancient Indian self-choice marriage (Svayaṃvara; see Jamison 2001), while the "maidens with a choice" may refer to the same phenomena, girls making their choice of bridegroom at a specially called assembly (see Jamison 2003).

Even more striking perhaps is verse 4, where Dawn is compared to three different animals or their parts: she is glossy like the breast of a waterbird who preens it;

she reveals herself like an elephant kneeling to drink; and she wakens the sleeping like a fly, buzzing around again and again. (We owe these interpretations to Thieme 1965 [=1971: 214–27].)

Nothing in the rest of the hymn is quite so quirky, but the standard tropes are well handled. The common counterpoint between individual Dawn and the multitude of identical dawns that have preceded and will follow today's dawn is found in verses 2–3, 6, and 9. Another common theme, the diversity of beings that Dawn awakens, appears in verses 1, 6, and 12. The final verses of the hymn raise the hope of gifts and rewards that will come with the dawn.

1. Dawn as she dawns when the fire is being kindled; the sun as it rises—each has propped up its own light widely.
   God Savitar here and now has impelled forth our two-footed, forth our four-footed, each to go to its task.
2. Not belittling the divine commandments, but diminishing human (life-) spans, the last of those who, one by one, have gone, the first of those who come hither—Dawn has flashed forth.
3. This Daughter of Heaven has appeared opposite, dressed in light, in the same way (as the others), from the east.
   She follows along the path of truth, straight to the goal. Like one who knows the way, she does not confound the directions.
4. She has appeared like the breast of a preening waterbird. Like a female elephant she has revealed her intimate parts.
   Wakening the sleeping like a fly, she has come as the latest of those who,
   one by one, have come here again (and again).
5. In the eastern half of the dusky realm that cannot be flown to, the begetter of cows has put forth her beacon.
   She spreads out further, more widely, filling both laps of her two parents [=Heaven and Earth].
6. Just thus is she, the latest of many, to be seen. Neither the non-kin does she avoid, nor the kin.
   Exulting in her spotless body, neither from the small does she retreat, nor from the great, as she shines forth.
7. Like a brotherless (girl) she goes right up to men—like one mounting a chariot seat to win prizes [/(display-)platform to gain property].
   Like an eager wife, richly dressed, for her husband, Dawn, like a wanton, lets her breast spill over.
8. The (one) sister has left the natal place to her older sister. She goes away from her, like (a girl) to be gazed upon.
   Dawning forth with the rays of the sun, she smears unguent on herself, like (maidens) with a choice going to assemblies.

9. Day after day the latest of those earlier sisters advances from behind toward the earlier one.
   Let the newer ones now dawn richly for us as of old—the day-bright dawns.
10. Awaken those who grant, bounteous Dawn; unawakening let the niggards sleep.
    Richly dawn for the bounteous ones, o bounteous one, richly for the praiser, o liberal-spirited one, as you rouse them.
11. This young woman has whitened down from the east. She yokes the forefront of the ruddy cows.
    She will dawn forth now; her beacon will stand out. Agni will reverently come to house after house.
12. The birds have also flown up from their dwelling and the men who partake of food, at your first flush.
    To the one who is at home you convey much of value, goddess Dawn, and to the pious mortal.
13. You have been praised, praiseworthy ones, by my sacred formulation. You, eager (for it), have been strengthened, o Dawns.
    Goddesses, with your help may we win spoils in hundreds and thousands.

I.125 Svanaya's Dānastuti

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 4–5

This hymn falls into two distinct but thematically connected parts. The second part (vss. 4–7) develops an extravagant picture of the rewards that accrue to the generous giver and sacrificer. The whole cosmos seems to exist only to gratify him, and a place among the gods as an immortal awaits him. The syntax and sentiments are straightforward and indeed somewhat simplistic.

The other section (vss. 1–3) is quite different. It consists of an apparent dialogue between an "early-coming" figure (vs. 3) and, probably, a householder or host (vs. 2), with a scene-setting introduction (vs. 1). The word "early-coming" (prātarítvan) is found only in this hymn and in a narrative in the Kāṭhaka Saṃhitā (besides the later etymological work, the Nirukta), where the same dialogic relationship between the Prātaritvan and a householder, in that case Manu, obtains. In both passages the Prātaritvan seems to be an itinerant priest or poet, offering his ritual services to a sacrificer, his potential host. But he also stands in for or represents a god who is coming to attend the early-morning ritual. (Compare the compound of similar form and similar meaning prātaryā́van "early-driving, early-traveling," used especially of the Aśvins and their chariot.) Thus, the host is more inclined to receive the itinerant Prātaritvan because he may be entertaining a god in disguise, and the Prātaritvan is not only seeking payment for his ritual work, the dakṣiṇā whose giver is lyrically celebrated in verses 4–7, but also himself brings (or claims to bring) goods and good fortune for his host, as is emphasized in all three verses of this portion of the hymn. The relationship between them is also presented as somewhat coercive or threatening in the second half of verse 2 (which unfortunately contains several hapaxes and is therefore not very clear). The Kāṭhaka Saṃhitā narrative, a version of "Manu's Cups," depicts that threat much more strongly, as an aspect of the "anxieties of hospitality." For further discussion see Jamison (1996a: 184–89).

1. In the early morning, the early-coming (priest/god) establishes a treasure.
   An observant man, receiving him (as guest), lays it in himself.
   Increasing his own progeny and lifetime with it, possessing good heroes, he is accompanied by thriving of wealth.
2. [The host:] "He will have good cows, good gold, good horses—for him Indra establishes lofty vigor—he who, o early-comer, binds you up like a pard [?] with a thong [?], when you come hither with goods."
3. [The early-comer:] "I have come here today early in the morning with a goods-filled chariot, seeking one who performs (sacrifice) well, the son of my seeking.
   Make (Indra?) drink the pressed (soma) of the exhilarating plant;
   strengthen the hero-ruling (Indra?) with liberal gifts."
4. The rivers, embodiments of joy, milk-cows, flow near to the one who has sacrificed and the one who will sacrifice; seeking fame, the streams of ghee on every side go near to him who grants and has granted.
5. On the back of the firmament he stands firmly fixed. Whoever grants, he goes among the gods;
   to him the waters, the rivers stream ghee; for him this gift-cow (dakṣiṇā) swells always.
6. For the givers of dakṣiṇās only there are these brilliant (bounties) here; for the givers of dakṣiṇās there are suns in heaven.
   Givers of dakṣiṇās have a share in immortality; givers of dakṣiṇās lengthen their own lifetime.
7. Let those who grant not encounter difficulty or outrage; let the patrons, of good commandment, not grow old;
   let there be some other enclosure for them, but to the non-granting one let there come the flames of pain.

I.126 Kakṣīvant's Dānastuti

Kakṣīvant Dairghatamasa
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 6–7

Kakṣīvant's last hymn is, to be idiomatic, a humdinger. It details in extravagant terms the gifts that King Svanaya Bhāvya presented to him, in return for the fame the poet could bestow on him (see esp. vss. 1d and 2d). The first five verses list the gifts, especially the (not quite believable) numbers of livestock, given to Kakṣīvant and his family, the Pajras. The last of these verses (5) ends with an elaborate simile, not all the details of which are clear, comparing the Pajras seeking fame with noblemen seeking brides by attending maidens' Svayaṃvaras (bridal self-choice ceremonies) with their carts. (The word "cart" [ánas] is specialized in the R̥gveda for the vehicle that conveys the bride home.) The phrase "(the Pajras) sought fame" (5d) provides a ring with the first verse (1d), where the king, Kakṣīvant's patron, is "seeking fame," and brings the dānastuti proper to a close.

The final two verses (6–7) provide an erotic, indeed rather obscene, appendix, with a vignette of the poet and one of the girls he received as part of his gift. Already in verse 3 "ten chariots carrying brides" were mentioned as part of his loot, and the simile about Svayaṃvaras in verse 5 also helps set up the erotic atmosphere. Besides the striking simile of a mongoose (kaśīkā, a playful variant of the poet's name Kakṣīvant) as sexual partner, verse 6 contains a number of hapaxes and entirely unclear lexical items, which may well involve phonological deformation to play on taboo words. (The second half of the verse appears to allow the word yabh "fuck" to be assembled from parts of several words.) It is a pity that we understand it as little as we do. The last verse (7) contains the ostensible and crudely seductive speech of the woman herself. Kakṣīvant has indeed gone out with a bang.

1. Not feeble are the praises I present through my inspiration to Bhāvya who lives on the Sindhu, who meted out to me a thousand (soma-)pressings, the invincible king seeking fame.
2. A hundred neck-ornaments of the king in want (of fame), a hundred horses I took as soon as they were offered; a hundred cows of the lord (I), Kakṣīvant, (have taken). (Now) his unaging fame stretches to heaven.
3. The dusky (horses) given by Svanaya have come to me, and ten chariots carrying brides.
   A thousand and sixty cattle have followed. Kakṣīvant gained them at the suppertime [=evening] of the days.

4. Forty sorrel (horses) of the ten-wagon train lead at the front a rank of a thousand (cows).
   Steeds arousing delight, covered with pearls, have the Kakṣīvants, the Pajras swept up.
5. Following the previous presentation, I got for you three yoked (horses?) and eight cows that suckle the stranger—
   (for you,) the Pajras, who sought fame—as those of good lineage provided with (wedding-)carts seek maidens with a choice, appropriate to their clan.
6. She who, when squeezed and squished, keeps stinking like a mongoose—fusing (with me), the woman to be enjoyed [/coiled around] gives me hundreds of "spurts"—
7. (Saying,) "Feel me up—keep going further. Don't belittle my "little things [=private parts].
   I am entirely hairy, like a little ewe of the Gandhāris."

Hymns I.127–139 are attributed to Paruchepa Daivodāsi. This poet is especially fond of the long and elaborate atyaṣṭi meter, consisting of seven pādas, generally arranged in three groups: 12 12 8 / 8 8 / 12 8. The eight-syllable pādas that end the first and third "lines" (that is, pādas c and g) generally ring changes on the pāda that precedes, by repetition of the last word(s), by lexical substitution of synonyms, or by syntactic complementarity. A simple example of the first is I.127.1c, which repeats the epithet jātávedasam, which also ended 1b. Lexical substitution is found in 1g, where sarpíṣaḥ "of the melted butter" replaces ghr̥tásya "of the ghee" in 1f. Sometimes the "rhyme" pāda contributes material necessary to complete the syntax established in the preceding pāda. See I.127.2fg, where the rhyme pāda g provides the verb that must be supplied in the relative clause in pāda f. There are more complex relationships as well, including what will later be called *śleṣa*s, with a word or construction having two possible and incompatible readings. A nice example is I.127.3bc, where the form druhaṃtaráḥ can be analyzed either as druhaṃ-tará "overcoming deceit" or dru-hantara "better at striking wood," the former prevailing in pāda b and the latter, because of the simile "like an axe," in pāda c. This patterned variation creates a pleasing effect. (In our translation the three groups of pādas are separated into three lines, and the rhyme pādas c and g are set off by dashes.)

Paruchepa is also fond of rare words, sometimes phonetic deformations of parallel words in the same verse, puns, and contorted syntactic constructions, and many of the puzzles in his hymns have not been completely solved. But Geldner's judgment of his poetry—"wortreich, aber gedankenarm" (rich in words, but poor in thoughts)—seems harsh and unjustified. These poems are difficult to work through, but their verbal artistry and intricacy seem to us to provide a more than sufficient reward.

I.127 Agni

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
11 verses: atyaṣṭi, except atidhṛti 6

Full of puns, phonological tricks, and syntactic give-and-take, this hymn celebrates Agni in both his ritual role (e.g., vss. 1–2, 8, 10) and in his physical power (e.g., vss. 3–4, 6). The pleasures of the hymn come more from the interplay of the verbal elements than from any sustained thematic development, and in that sense Geldner's "gedankenarm" (quoted above) may be accurate, but who needs thoughts when we have such words?

1. Agni I consider as the Hotar, rich in gifts, the good one, son of strength, Jātavedas—like a poet, Jātavedas—who is the god of good ceremony, with his body erect and pointed toward the gods.
 With his flame he yearns after the blazing forth of the ghee—of the melted butter being poured.
2. We sacrificers would invoke you as best sacrificer, the oldest of the Aṅgirases, o poet, with our thoughts—(invoke you) through our poets, o glowing one, with our thoughts—
 (you) like earth-encircling heaven, the Hotar of the settled domains, the flame-haired bull whom these clans (help)—let the clans help (him) to speed.
3. Because he, shining upon the many with his radiant might, becomes the overcomer of deceit—the overcomer of deceit, as an axe is an excellent striker of wood—at whose attack even the staunch aborts and whatever is solid, like the trees,
 going forth to conquer, he will hold his place, he will not be moved—with his conquering of the wastelands, he will not be moved.
4. Even the firm things give way to him, as is known. (The pious one) does service with the piercingly hot kindling sticks, for help—he does service to Agni for help.
 He who plunges toward the many, he carves them with his flame like trees.
 Even solid foods he liquefies with his strength—even the solid with his strength.
5. This fortifying power of his might we acquire in future (days), of him who by night is more beautiful to see than by day—(more beautiful to see) than the one who traverses by day [=sun], for (the man) whose lifespan is not (yet) extended, because his [=Agni's] lifespan provides a handhold, staunch like shelter for a son.

His help, apportioned (to us?) or not, the unaging ones are pursuing—the unaging fires are pursuing.

6. For he is very noisy like the Marut troop, thundering widely in the productive meadows—thundering widely in the disorderly meadows.
The taker has taken, has eaten the oblations, as is his due, he the beacon of the sacrifice.
And then when he is excited, bristling with excitement, all take pleasure in his path—as the superior men [=Maruts] (take pleasure) in the path to beauty.
7. When, yet again, the heaven-bound praisers, the Bhr̥gus, tendering homage, invoke him—the Bhr̥gus, plundering (the fire from heaven), churning it with piety—
Agni is lord of goods, the blazing one who is their holder—then his dear coverings the wise one should seek to win—the wise one should seek to win here.
8. We invoke you, lord of all the clans, houselord common to every one of them, for benefit—you with your trusty vehicle of songs, for benefit—the guest of the sons of Manu, by whose mouth, as if by a father's,
(we) and all the immortals yonder (acquire) vigor—(place) the oblations and vigor among the gods.
9. You, Agni, are born as strongest by your strength, most tempestuous, for the divine conclave—like wealth for the divine conclave—for most tempestuous is your exuberance and most brilliant your resolve—and then they attentively surround you, o unaging one—like obedient (servants), o unaging one.
10. Let your (praise) (stand) out for the great one, who is strong by strength, wakening at dawn, for Agni, as if for a winner of cattle—let (your) praise stand (out) for Agni.
When someone with an oblation is calling on him in all the lands, in advance of (dawn's) rays he "sings" [=crackles] like a hoarse-voiced (singer)—the glowing Hotar, (in advance of) the rays.
11. Becoming visible in the nearest nearness, bring here to us, o Agni, in concert with the gods, (riches) through your kind attention—great riches through your kind attention.
Make us regard something great, o most powerful one, for our benefit here.
Plunder, churn a great mass of good heroes for the praisers, liberal one—like a mighty (warrior) with vast power.

I.128 Agni

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
8 verses: atyaṣṭi

The sacrificial fire is the relentless focus of this hymn, and it seldom strays from the physical location of the fire on the ritual ground. Though its theme is clear and inescapable, the hymn presents us with manifold interpretive difficulties in its details, especially in the central verses 4–5, which, with their responsive fronted krátvā ("though his resolve," 4cd, 5a), may constitute an omphalos. There is also some sign of ring composition: the first and last (8) verses each twice refer to Agni as the Hotar, a word used nowhere else in the hymn, and the mentions of Manu in verses 1–2 are answered by two occurrences of Manu in the penultimate verse (7). In general there is much reuse of vocabulary through the hymn, and the poet plays with the words "good" and "goods" in the second part of the hymn (vss. 5–6, 8). Though the poet does not himself beg for goods, it seems clear that the desire for goods he attributes to the gods (8fg) is shared by their human counterparts.

1. This one was born here on the foundation of Manu as the best sacrificing Hotar, following the commandment of the fire-priests—Agni, following his own commandment—all attentive to the one who seeks a comrade, like wealth for the one who seeks fame.
   The undeceivable Hotar has sat down in the footprint of refreshment—enveloped in the footprint of refreshment.
2. The one who sends the sacrifice to its goal along the path of truth: we make him our familiar with reverence accompanied by oblations—in the conclave of gods (with reverence) accompanied by oblations.
   Because of our presentation of nourishments he does not waste away with this body, he whom Mātariśvan (brought) to Manu from afar—the god he brought from afar.
3. On his way he circles round the earthly (realm) in a single day, swallowing it up in an instant, the bull (depositing) his seed ever roaring—depositing his seed ever roaring—observing with a hundred eyes, the god victorious in the woods, taking his seat on the nearer ridges—Agni, on the further ridges.
4. Strongly resolved (to sacrifice), installed in front in every house, Agni is attentive to the sacrifice, to the ceremony—through his resolve he is attentive to the sacrifice.
   Through his resolve he is a ritual expert for the straight-arrow; he has watched over all beings from the time when as guest he was born splendid with ghee—as the conveyor (of the offering), the ritual expert, he was born.

5. When through his resolve and along with the roaring of fire, which is like the roaring of the Maruts [=thunder], the (offering-)foods are infused into his forces [=flames]—like foods for the vigorous one [=Indra?]— because then he stimulates the giving (of good) and of goods by his might, he will rescue us from going astray, from the crooked way—from evil utterance, from the crooked way.
6. Every (new fire), possessing extensive power, the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice), the good one, takes (goods) in his right hand; advancing he does not let (them) loose—because of his longing for fame he does not let (them) loose.
For everyone who aims straight you have conveyed his oblation among the gods.
To everyone who performs well he propels his wish—Agni propels apart the two door-halves.
7. He has been established as most beneficial in the ritual enclosure belonging to Manu; Agni (has been established) like a noble clanlord at the sacrifices—a dear clanlord at the sacrifices.
He is master of the oblations of the sons of Manu, the oblations prepared with the refreshing drink.
He will rescue us from the injury of Varuṇa—from the injury of the great god.
8. Agni, the Hotar, the depository of goods do they reverently invoke; the dear, most conspicuous one they have installed as the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice)—they have installed as the conveyor of oblations—the one who provides all lifetimes and all possessions, the Hotar deserving the sacrifice, the sage poet.
The gods, seeking goods, (have installed) the lusty one, for help—seeking goods (they have installed) the lusty one with hymns.

I.129 Indra

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
11 verses: atyaṣṭi, except atiśakvarī 8–9, aṣṭi 11

The hymn begins with familiar, and positive, themes: calls to Indra to aid our actual chariot in prize-contests and also our metaphorical chariot, the sacrifice (vss. 1–2), and these themes recur throughout the hymn. But the poet seems preoccupied with more negative topics—not only rivals and enemies in battle (vss. 3–5, 10) and demons (vss. 6, 9, 11), but also evil thoughts and words (vss. 6–8, 11). Bad Thought appears to be personified as a menacing female in verse 8, and more surprisingly Indra seems himself to have potential bad thoughts toward us, his worshipers, which we must combat by supplying him with good things to think about (vs. 7).

Given the forces thus arrayed against us, the calls for Indra's protection grow ever stronger toward the end of the hymn (vss. 9–11).

1. The chariot which you, o vigorous Indra, lead forward to gain wisdom, though it [=chariot] is far away—(which) you lead forward, faultless one—just in a single day you will make it to prevail as a prizewinner if you so desire.
   (Thrust forward) (this chariot) for us, the ritual adepts, you faultless thruster—like this speech for (us,) the ritual adepts.
2. Listen—you who in every battle are to be besought by men for your skill for the battle cry, Indra—by men for your skill for the charge—who with the champions win the sun, who with the poets overtake the prize.
   Those showing mastery set him to succeed as their prizewinner—a fortifying power like a prizewinning steed.
3. For as wondrous one you swell the bullish skin; you keep away every hostile mortal, o champion—(in that) you shun (that) mortal.
   Indra, this to you and to heaven, this to self-glorious Rudra, to Mitra and Varuṇa I proclaim at length—to the very merciful one at length.
4. We wish to seek Indra as a lifelong comrade for ourselves, a victorious yokemate—in the prize-contests a victorious yokemate.
   (O Indra,) help our sacred formulations to help in every battle, for a rival will not lay you low whom you lay low—any rival whom you lay low.
5. Bow down the arrogance of every (rival) with your help like piercingly hot kindling sticks—with powerful help, powerful one.
   Lead us as before: you are regarded as free of guilt, o champion.
   Carry away all (the goods?) from Pūru, as draft-horse—*like the draft-horse [=Agni] with his mouth, (carry them) to us.
6. I would proclaim this to the soma-drop that is to come, the refreshing (drop) that is to be poured and that, like him to be invoked [=Indra], sets my thoughts atremble—the demon-smasher that sets my thoughts atremble.
   He himself should drive insults and bad thought away from us with his murderous weapons.
   The utterer of evil should drain away lower than low [=be miscarried?]—like a little speck he should drain away.
7. Might we win with our conspicuous invocation [/oblation]; might we win wealth, o wealthy one, and an abundance of heroes—(wealth) that is delightful and an abundance of heroes.
   When he has bad thoughts (toward us) we would engorge him with (words) good to think about and with refreshment—

Indra (we would engorge) with invocations to heavenly brilliance that come true—the one worthy of the sacrifice with invocations to heavenly brilliance.

8. (Let) Indra (be) more and more preeminent among us with his self-glorious help in the shunning of bad thoughts—in the shattering of bad thoughts.
   She herself [=Bad Thought] is to be harmed who has sought us out with her devourers.
   She will be smashed, she will not wax strong—like a firebrand flung aside she will not wax strong.
9. You, Indra, with wealth in profusion for us: drive along a faultless path—drive forward along (a path) without demons.
   Accompany us in the distance; accompany us close to home.
   Protect us from a long way, from afar with your superior powers—always protect us with your superior powers.
10. You, Indra, with surpassing wealth for us: greatness will accompany you, who are so powerful, for our help—(accompany you) like an ally for great help.
    Most powerful rescuer and helper, (you help) every chariot, immortal one.
    Another one than us—any one—should you harm, o possessor of the stone—(anyone) who (himself) intends harm, o possessor of the stone.
11. Protect us, well-praised Indra, from failure, (you who are) always a requiter of bad thoughts—as a god (a requiter) of bad thoughts—a smasher of the evil demon, a rescuer of a poet like me.
    For the begetter has begotten you for this reason, o good one—has begotten you as smasher of demons, o good one.

I.130 Indra

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
10 verses: atyaṣṭi, except triṣṭubh 10

The first two verses of the hymn provide a conventional opening, with an invitation to Indra to journey here to drink our soma. But this journey motif gives way to a rapid sampling of Indra's great deeds: Vala (vs. 3), Vr̥tra (vss. 4–5), battles against various human and legendary enemies (vss. 7–8), ending with a truly impenetrable verse (9) about the theft of the wheel of the Sun's chariot and the involvement of Uśanā, a myth that also elsewhere evokes all the obscurantism the Vedic bard has in his control (see, e.g., V.29 and 31). The final verse of this hymn, in a different meter, sums up the poets' efforts to praise Indra.

The emphasis on mythology in this hymn contrasts sharply with the immediately preceding Indra hymn, by the same poet in the same meter, which lacks any mythological content.

1. Indra, drive here, right up to us from afar, (drive) on your own to the landing site, like a master of settlements to the rites of distributions—like a king, master of settlements, to his house.
   We invoke you, bringing you the pleasing offering when the soma is pressed.
   Like sons a father (we invoke you) for the winning of prizes—(you) most munificent, for the winning of prizes.
2. O Indra, drink the soma being pressed by the stones, poured with a bucket, like a buffalo drinking at a well-spring—like a thirsty buffalo.
   For your delightful exhilaration, for your most exceptional feeding, let them [=your horses] guide you here, like the golden (mares) the Sun—like the Sun through all the days.
3. He found the depository of heaven, deposited in hiding, enveloped in the stone like the embryo of a bird (in an egg)—within the boundless stone.
   The possessor of the mace, the best Aṅgiras, seeking to win (them) like a pen of cattle—
   Indra uncovered the nourishments that were enclosed—(opened) the doors to the nourishments that were enclosed.
4. Firmly holding the mace in his hands, Indra honed it sharp like a carving knife, for throwing—honed it for the smashing of the serpent.
   Enveloping yourself with strength, with vast powers, with might, o Indra, like a carpenter a tree from the wooden one [=forest], you cut down (the serpent)—as if with an axe you cut (him) down.
5. You, Indra, released the rivers to flow at will to the sea, like chariots—like prize-seeking chariots.
   The enduring (rivers) hitched themselves up toward the same imperishable goal, like milk-cows yielding all milk for Manu—yielding all milk for the people.
6. This speech have the goods-seeking Āyus fashioned for you, like a clever artisan a chariot—they have fashioned you for favor, adorning (you / the speech), you inspired poet, like a thoroughbred, prize-seeking horse at the contests for prizes, like a steed for power, for winning riches—for winning all riches.
7. You, Indra, split the ninety strongholds for Pūru, for Divodāsa the greatly pious, you prancer—with your mace (you split them) for the pious, you prancer.
   The strong one brought down Śambara from the mountain for Atithigva, the great one distributing riches with his strength—all riches with his strength.
8. Indra aided the Ārya sacrificer in battles, affording a hundred forms of help in all contests—in contests whose prize is the sun.

Chastising those who follow no commandment, he made the black skin [=barbarians] subject to Manu.
As a burning (fire) scorches everything dried up, he scorches the thirsty—scorches Arśaśāna down to the ground.

9. Just born, he tore off the wheel of the sun with his strength—(as?) at the ritual meal the ruddy one [=Agni?/Sun?] steals speech—showing mastery he steals it—when you, o sage poet, had come from afar (to the house of) Uśanā for help, passing across all appeals for favor as if with Manu—as if passing across all the days.
10. Because of our new hymns, you splitter of strongholds whose deeds are bullish, protect us along with your capable protectors.
O Indra, being praised by the Divodāsas, you should grow strong, like heaven through the days.

I.131 Indra

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
7 verses: atyaṣṭi

At the beginning of the first verse all cosmic forces conspire in giving Indra the first rank, as a model for the similar honor and obeisance accorded him by men. But it quickly becomes apparent (vss. 2–3) that Indra is also an object of contention and competition among different groups of men, who all want him on their side. This contention is vividly depicted in verse 3. In verses 4–5 Indra's own inclinations become apparent: he aids priests and sacrificers and chastises those without sacrifice. In verse 6 we announce our own sacrifice to Indra, and thereby make a claim for his attention, and in verse 7 we ask for further aid against our rivals and ill-wishers.

1. Because to Indra the lordly Heaven has ever bowed, and to Indra the great Earth has bowed with her expanses—at the winning of heavenly brilliance with her expanses—
Indra have all the gods in concert placed in front.
To Indra let all the pressings belong that stem from the sons of Manu—all the gifts that stem from the sons of Manu.
2. Because at all pressings those of bullish fervor thrust you forward, (each of them) separately (thrusts you who are) one and the same—those seeking to win the sun, (each) separately—you, like a boat of deliverance, we would place at the chariot-pole of our forceful (song), making Indra take notice (of us) with our sacrifices as the Āyus did—as the Āyus did Indra with their praises.

3. Those seeking aid, paired in opposition, have yanked you back and forth, at the winning of the cowpen, as they set (the cows) free—being victorious (over the cowpen), as they set (them) free, o Indra—when you shove together the two peoples who are seeking cows and going to (the winning of) the sun, as you constantly display the bull partnered with (you)—the mace partnered with (you), Indra.
4. The Pūrus know of this manly deed of yours, o Indra, that you brought down the autumnal strongholds—being victorious you brought them down.
   You will chastise the mortal without sacrifice, o Indra, lord of strength.
   You stole the great earth (from him) and these waters—being exhilarated, (you stole) these waters.
5. Since then they have constantly celebrated this manly deed of yours at the revels: that, o bull, you aided the fire-priests—that you aided those acting as comrades.
   You made "Game," for them to prevail in battles.
   They kept winning one river after another—seeking fame they kept winning.
6. And now take note of this dawn—for one should enjoy it—of our chant, of our oblation along with our invocations—at the winning of the sun, along with our invocations.
   When, o Indra, possessor of the mace, as bull you will have in view to smash the negligent ones, (listen) to me, this newer ritual adept—listen to the thought of (me), the newer one.
7. You, powerfully born Indra, grown strong, being kindly toward us: (smash) the mortal who acts the foe—that mortal, o champion, with your mace—smash (him and) whoever wishes us ill. Listen to (us), as the one who listens best.
   Let malevolence stay away, like an accident on a journey—let all malevolence stay away.

I.132 Indra

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
6 verses: atyaṣṭi

This short hymn contains many puzzles of detail, which render much of the translation provisional, but the general theme is fairly clear. The present time and the current sacrifice are repeatedly highlighted (see, e.g., vss. 1–2), and the contrast between now and the past is explicitly drawn (see vss. 3–4). As is usual when past and present are invoked together, we ask Indra to aid us in the same way as he aided his companions in myth, particularly, here, the Aṅgirases at the opening of the Vala cave (vs. 4). The theme of speech, both by and about Indra, is also strongly highlighted, especially in the first four verses.

1. With you, bounteous Indra, aided by you, may we overcome those who do battle over the foremost stakes—may we win against those who seek to win.
   On this, the nearest day speak on behalf of the soma-presser.
   At this sacrifice may we pull out the perfect ("hand" of dice) at the match—seeking the prize, (may we pull out) the perfect one at the match.
2. At the match to win the sun, at the speech of the Propitiator, at the very anointing of the one who wakes at dawn [=Agni]—at the very anointing of the one being prepared [=soma]— on (that) day Indra is to be invoked by every head [=person], in the way that is known.
   Toward us only let your gifts be directed—the auspicious gifts of the auspicious one.
3. This pleasurable offering of yours is glittering as of old, when at the sacrifice they [=sacrificers] made (you), the shield, as a peaceful dwelling for themselves—you are the shield of truth, a peaceful dwelling.
   You should announce this now yet again. They [=poets?] look within (themselves?) with the (coming of) the (sun's) rays [=dawn].
   "This Indra is certainly known as a seeker of cows—as a seeker of cows for those who dwell among their kindred."
4. Now in the current way and in the earlier one it is to be proclaimed of you, that you opened up the enclosure for the Aṅgirases—o Indra, doing your best, (you opened) up the enclosure.
   In the same way as for them, win and fight for us.
   For those who press soma, weaken anyone who follows no commandment—who follows no commandment, even when he rages.
5. When the champion makes the peoples see in accord with his conceptions, seeking fame they will surpass when the prize is set—seeking fame they will distinguish themselves.
   To him they chant, for him to thrust (to them) with his strength a (full) lifetime along with offspring.
   In Indra do our thoughts desire to establish their home—our thoughts (going) as if to the gods.
6. You two, Indra and "Mountain" [=mace], who fight in the front—whoever would give battle to us, smash that very one away—with a mace smash that very one.

(Under these circumstances, even) an abyss will be pleasing to (that one,) who has fled into the distance—an abyss he will seek to reach.
O champion, (surround) our rivals all around on all sides—let the splitter split (them) on all sides.

I.133 Indra

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
7 verses: triṣṭubh 1, anuṣṭubh 2–4, gāyatrī 5, dhṛti [atyaṣṭi] 6, atyaṣṭi 7

This metrically complex hymn is the last one in the Paruchepa Indra cycle and is longer by one verse than the preceding hymn (I.132). It also falls naturally into two parts on the grounds of meter, subject matter, and diction: verses 1–5, which are mostly in dimeter meter and have an Atharvan cast, and verses 6–7 in atyaṣṭi (or modified atyaṣṭi) meter, which more nearly resembles the atyaṣṭi hymns earlier in the cycle. As Oldenberg already saw, we can thus analyze it as two hymns, of five and two verses respectively, which then conform to the usual patterns of arrangement.

The first hymn contains a number of odd formations, whose meaning and etymology are unclear; our renderings are provisional. Despite these uncertainties, we can happily grasp the gusto with which the poet urges Indra to destroy troops of witches and other demonic beings.

The second short hymn also enthusiastically rouses Indra against enemies, but in a style more recognizably Ṛgvedic, and it situates the action in the interplay between the soma-pressing sacrificer and Indra, the recipient of the soma and the sacrifice.

1. Both world-halves I purify with truth; the deceits—great, but lacking Indra—I burn up entirely, where the enemies, having attacked, lay slain, crushed all around the Place of Hostility.
2. You also having attacked, o possessor of the stone: cut off the heads of the witches with your foot that overcomes obstacles—with your foot that overcomes great obstacles.
3. Bounteous one, smash down the troop of these witches at the mudflat (called) Place of Hostility—at the mudflat (called) Place of Great Hostility.
4. When you scattered afar thrice fifty of them with your attacks, this (deed?) of yours displays your zeal—this little (deed?) of yours displays your zeal.
5. Pulverize the tawny-spiked, ballsy Piśāci entirely, Indra.
Tear down every demon.

6. Dash the great ones downward, Indra; listen to us. For heaven has blazed like the earth with fear, o possessor of the stone—as if with fear of (the sun's) heat, o possessor of the stone.
   As the most tempestuous one, you speed with your tempestuous, powerful weapons of death, smashing those who are not men, o unopposable champion, along with your warriors—o champion, along with your thrice seven warriors.
7. For the one who presses soma wins the dwelling place of profusion; for by pressing, he dashes hatreds down through sacrifice—(dashes) down hatreds toward the gods.
   Just by pressing, he desires to win thousands, as an unobstructable competitor.
   To the presser Indra gives what is ready to hand—he gives the wealth that is ready to hand.

I.134 Vāyu

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
6 verses: atyaṣṭi

As in most Vāyu hymns, the overriding focus here is on Vāyu's journey to the early-morning sacrifice and his right to drink first of the soma. The setting of the hymn at dawn is conveyed by verses 3–4, and the priestly gifts that are distributed at this morning ritual are alluded to in verses 1–3.

1. Let the speedy ones, hastening, convey you here to the pleasurable offering, o Vāyu, to drink first—to drink first of the soma.
   Let Liberality stand upright following your intention, recognizing it.
   On a chariot with a team drive here for giving—o Vāyu, for the giving of bounty.
2. Let the invigorating drops invigorate you, Vāyu, as they are being prepared by us, well-prepared, heaven-bound—being prepared with cows [=milk], heaven-bound.
   When his help, being prepared in order to succeed, follows his skill, our teams, our poetic thoughts are directed toward a single goal, toward giving—our poetic thoughts call upon him [=Vāyu] (for giving).
3. Vāyu yokes his chestnut pair, Vāyu his ruddy pair, Vāyu the two nimble ones to the chariot, to the chariot-pole to pull—the best pullers to the chariot-pole to pull.
   Awaken Plenitude, as a lover awakens her who sleeps.
   Reveal the two world-halves; make the dawns shine—for fame make the dawns shine.

4. For you do the gleaming dawns stretch their auspicious garments in the distance, into the houses at the rays (of the sun)—their brilliant (garments) at the new rays.
   For you will the milk-cow, milking her juice, milk out all good things.
   You begat the Maruts from the belly—from the belly of heaven.
5. For you do the glittering, gleaming, rapid, strong ones [=soma drinks / horses] set themselves aquiver at the revels—(like waves) of the waters they set themselves aquiver.
   You does the stealthy (hunter), as he wearies, reverently invoke for good fortune in his swooping pursuit.
   You drink before every creature by statute—you drink because of your lordship by statute.
6. You, Vāyu, with no one ahead, have first right to the drinking of these soma drinks of ours—you have the right to the drinking of these pressings.
   And of the clans with their vying oblations who have twisted (you toward them)— all their milk-cows have milked out the milk-mixture for you—have milked out the ghee and the milk-mixture.

I.135 Vāyu (1–3, 9), Indra and Vāyu (4–8)

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
9 verses: atyaṣṭi, except aṣṭi 7–8, arranged in tr̥cas

The second of Paruchepa's Vāyu hymns is longer than the first, and presumably originally consisted of three hymns, corresponding to the tr̥ca divisions. For most of its length it is preoccupied with the usual themes of Vāyu hymns: Vāyu's journey to the sacrifice with his many teams and his right to the first drink of soma at the Morning Pressing. The first tr̥ca (vss. 1–3) is an invitation to Vāyu alone; the second (vss. 4–6), thematically and verbally parallel to the first, is addressed to Vāyu and Indra, who share the second soma oblation at the Morning Pressing.

The last tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) is less straightforward. The first of its verses (7) seems to describes an ongoing sacrifice to which Vāyu and Indra are traveling, a journey continued in the first part of verse 8. And the fortunate results of the successful sacrifice are described at the end of verse 8, the thriving of stock and agriculture. But in between is the mention of a mysterious fig tree. The final verse (9) is even more mysterious, with its unidentified oxen of paradoxical movement and habits. Since the vocabulary is reminiscent of the Marut lexicon, the oxen may be the Maruts, and the association of Vāyu (Wind) with the thunderstorm may be depicted. The passage also reminds us of the mysterious oxen in I.105.10, which may be astronomical phenomena. And, of course, in a hymn focused on the soma sacrifice, any unidentified referent may be the soma drinks.

1. The ritual grass is strewn. Drive up to us, to pursue it, with a thousandfold team, o teamster—with hundredfold (teams), o teamster—for the gods have conceded to you, the god, to drink first.
The pressed, honeyed (soma drinks) have been set forth for you—have been set forth for your exhilaration and for your resolve.
2. For you has this soma been purified all around by the stones; clothing himself in coveted (garments) he rushes around the cask—clothing himself in gleaming (garments) he rushes.
For you is this portion poured among the Āyus, is the soma poured among the gods.
Travel, Vāyu; drive to our teams [=poetic thoughts], seeking us—drive at your pleasure, seeking us.
3. With your hundredfold teams drive here to our ceremony, with thousandfold ones to pursue it—o Vāyu, to pursue our oblations.
Yours is this portion at its proper time, accompanying the reins [=rays] when the sun (rises).
Being carried, they have been guided by the Adhvaryus—o Vāyu, the gleaming (soma drinks) have been guided.

4. The chariot with its team will convey you two here for aid, to pursue the well-placed pleasurable offerings—o Vāyu, to pursue the oblations.
Drink of the honey of the stalk, for the first drinking was established for you two.
O Vāyu, you two come here with shimmering bounty—and Indra, you two come here with bounty.
5. Our thoughts should turn you two hither to our ceremonies; they keep grooming this drop, the prizewinner—(the drop) swift like a prizewinning steed.
Drink of these (soma drinks), seeking us; come here to us with help.
O Indra and Vāyu, (drink) of them, pressed by stones, you two—(drink) to exhilaration, you two prize-givers.
6. These soma drinks were pressed here in the waters for you two. Being carried, they have been guided by the Adhvaryus—o Vāyu, the gleaming (soma drinks) have been guided.
They have surged toward you two, swift across the filter, seeking you two beyond the sheep's fleece—the soma drinks beyond the sheep's (fleece).

7. O Vāyu, drive beyond sleeper after sleeper. Where the pressing stone speaks, you two go there—(you) and Indra, go to that house.
Liberality has been sighted; the ghee is flowing. With a full team you two drive to the ceremony—(you) and Indra drive to the ceremony.

8. Just now you two travel to the poured offering of honey. The victorious ones [=soma drinks? Maruts?] that approach the fig tree—let these be victorious for us.
   All at once the cows give birth and the grain ripens; the milk-cows do not give out for you, o Vāyu—the milk-cows do not give up.
9. Here, o Vāyu, are those oxen of yours [=soma drinks? Maruts?], arm-strong, which fly in the river—the oxen that are greatly arrogant—that are not swift though on dry land, yet are nimble in the mountains though their home is not there, like the reins [=rays] of the sun difficult to hold back—difficult for the hands to hold back.

I.136 Mitra and Varuṇa

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
7 verses: atyaṣṭi, except triṣṭubh 7

Though the paired divinities Mitra and Varuṇa dominate this hymn, they have plenty of Ādityan company: Aryaman in verses 2, 3, 5, 6; Bhaga in verses 2 and 6; their mother Aditi in verse 3. And as the hymn nears its conclusion there are non-Ādityan gods as well: Indra and Agni in verses 6–7, the Maruts in verse 7. The hymn is defined by a ring formed by verses 1 and 6 (vs. 7 is in a different meter and extra-hymnic), with matches of key words in both verses: "lofty," "reverence," "compassionate," and "approach with praise."

Unlike many Mitra and Varuṇa hymns, the focus here is not on their ethical role, but on their status as receivers of sacrificial offerings. The rising sun in verse 2 (see also vs. 3) suggests the Morning Pressing, where Mitra and Varuṇa are among the dual divinities who receive a joint cup of soma. The position of the hymn, immediately following two hymns to Vāyu, the first recipient of soma at the Morning Pressing, supports this view.

1. Present preeminent, lofty reverence to the two attentive ones; present an oblation, a thought to the two compassionate ones—the sweetest (oblation) to the two compassionate ones.
   They are the two sovereign kings, whose potion is ghee, approached with praise at every sacrifice.
   And so the dominion of these two is not to be challenged from anywhere—their divinity is never to be challenged.
2. The way has appeared—a wider one for the wide (light); its path has been firmly guided by the reins of truth—its eye by the reins of Bhaga.
   Heaven-dominating is the seat of Mitra and of Aryaman and Varuṇa.
   And so they two assume lofty vigor, worthy of hymns—lofty vigor to be approached with praise.

3. Light-filled, sunlit Aditi who upholds the communities do the two accompany every day—being wakeful every day.
   Light-filled dominion do they acquire—the two Ādityas, lords of the drop.
   Of these two Mitra (is the one who by nature) sets the peoples in order, but Varuṇa (does as well)—(also) Aryaman sets the peoples in order.
4. Let the one here, this soma, be most wealful for Mitra and Varuṇa, the one who gives shares in the drinking places—the god who gives shares to the gods.
   Him should the gods enjoy, all of them today in joint enjoyment.
   O kings, you shall do just as we beg—you truthful ones, as we beg.
5. The person who has done honor to Mitra and Varuṇa, that unassailable one do you two protect all around from difficult straits—the pious mortal from difficult straits.
   Him Aryaman guards, him who aims straight following his commandment, him who with hymns tends to the commandment of these two—with praises tends to their commandment.
6. Reverence I proclaim to lofty heaven, to the two world-halves, to Mitra and to Varuṇa who gives rewards—to the very compassionate one who gives rewards.
   Approach Indra and Agni, heaven-dominating Aryaman and Bhaga with praise.
   Living for a long time may we be accompanied by progeny—may we be accompanied by the aid of Soma.
7. With the aid of the gods, with Indra on our side along with the Maruts, might we consider ourselves self-glorious.
   Agni, Mitra, Varuṇa will extend shelter; may we attain it—we and the bounteous ones.

I.137 Mitra and Varuṇa

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
3 verses: atiśakvarī

Short and relatively simple, this hymn continues the ritual focus of the previous hymn to Mitra and Varuṇa. The pressed soma in its various forms, the gods' journey to our sacrifice, and the time, sunrise, are its only topics. For some reason, the hymn has attracted more than its share of scorn: Renou (EVP VII: 33) calls it "assez banale et facile," and Gonda (1975: 212) classifies it among hymns that are "banal, mediocre or devoid of a deeper meaning." Perhaps the lack of the high moral tone found in most Mitra and Varuṇa hymns aggrieved these commentators, but taken on its own terms, with its rollicking rhythm and restricted phraseology, it makes a pleasant impression.

1. We have pressed—you two, drive hither—with the stones; these exhilarating ones here are mixed with cows [=milk]—these exhilarating soma drinks.
   You two kings, touching heaven, come here right to us, into our midst.
   These with their milk mixture are for you two, Mitra and Varuṇa—the clear soma drinks and those with their milk mixture.
2. Here—you two, drive hither—are the drops, the soma drinks mixed with curds—the pressings mixed with curds.
   And at the waking of the dawn, simultaneous with the rays of the sun, it is pressed for you two, Mitra and Varuṇa, for drinking—the pleasing one (pressed) for truth and for drinking.
3. This plant, like a dawn cow, do they milk for you two with the stones—the soma they milk with the stones.
   Come here right to us, into our midst, nearby, to drink the soma.
   Here it is, pressed by men for you two, Mitra and Varuṇa—the soma pressed for drinking.

I.138 Pūṣan

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
4 verses: atyaṣṭi

This hymn lacks the colloquial tone and idiomatic style of most Pūṣan hymns. Instead, as befits the elaborate meter, this is high-register praise, with a somewhat bombastic and overblown edge and contorted syntax.

The poet is especially concerned to establish "fellowship" (sakhyá, vss. 2–4) with the god—fellowship that will bring wealth and aid along with it.

1. Ever further is (the greatness) of powerfully born Pūṣan proclaimed: the greatness of him, the powerful, does not flag—the praise of him does not flag.
   Seeking his favor, I chant to him, whose help is nearby, who is refreshment itself, who, the bounteous, has bound to himself the mind of everyone—the bounteous god has bound it to himself.
2. So, Pūṣan, with praises I put you forward, like a nimble (horse) on its course, so that you will get the negligent ones on the move—like a camel you will carry (us) beyond the negligent ones.
   When I, a mortal, call upon you, a god, who are refreshment itself, for fellowship—make our songs brilliant—make them brilliant when prizes (are at stake).

3. Pūṣan, since in fellowship with you your admirers who have just this purpose have benefitted by your aid—have benefitted with such a purpose (as ours)—
   in accordance with this we implore you for a newer team of wealth.
   O you who are not wrathful, who are widely proclaimed, be a contender—whenever a prize (is at stake), be a contender.
4. Will you come near to us, for the winning of this ("team" of wealth), you who have goats for horses, who are not wrathful but bestowing—you who have goats for horses, (for the benefit) of those who seek fame?
   We would turn you hither with praises that achieve their goal, wondrous one,
   for I do not disdain you, glowing Pūṣan, nor do I spurn your fellowship.

I.139 All Gods

Paruchepa Daivodāsi
11 verses: atyaṣṭi, except bṛhatī 5, triṣṭubh 11

This complex hymn presents many interpretational difficulties, though it roughly follows the model of the Praügaśastra, a recitation at the Morning Pressing found also in Ṛgveda I.2–3, I.23, and II.41. The order of divinities in the Praügaśastra is Vāyu, Indra and Vāyu, Mitra and Varuṇa, the Aśvins, Indra, the All Gods, and Sarasvatī; this hymn follows this order through verse 6: Indra and Vāyu (vs. 1), Mitra and Varuṇa (vs. 2), the Aśvins (vss. 3–5), Indra (vs. 6), but ends with Agni (vs. 7), the Maruts (vs. 8), Indra and Agni (vs. 9), and Bṛhaspati (vs. 10), with verse 11 in a different meter and addressed to all the gods collectively.

The ritual situation is established at the very beginning, with the quotation of a familiar sacrificial formula ástu śrauṣaṭ, found all over middle Vedic ritual texts. This ritual-internal quotation is matched, in ring-compositional style, by the quotation of a praiṣa, or ritual command to the Hotar, in verse 10, the last real verse of the hymn. It is also clear that the time is early morning (see esp. vs. 4, though there are also more oblique indications in the first two verses), and that the sound of the pressing stones is calling the gods to the sacrifice (see vs. 3, and its ring-compositional echo in vs. 10).

As so often, the difficulties in the hymn may stem in part from the fact that the poet is reflecting on his poetic lineage and calling. The obscure reference to the "umbilical tie" or "navel" in verse 1 is made somewhat clearer by verse 9, in which the poet asserts that his "umbilical ties" are with a series of earlier seers and sacrificers, including Manu—whose own ties are to the gods. He thus provides himself with a poetic pedigree and in following their track, or model, produces his own hymns that have some chance of reaching the gods, since his predecessors' did. In verse 1 he mentions only one such predecessor: Vivasvant (lit., "possessing the shining forth"), who in later Vedic and even in late Ṛgveda (Vālakh., VIII.52.1) is considered the father of Manu and who is often associated, as a proto-priest, with the pressing of soma. (His Avestan correspondent Vīvaŋuuaṇt is the first man who pressed haoma [Y 9.4].) So in verse 1 our poet proclaims that he is beginning a new hymn, by newly attaching himself to a legendary seer-sacrificer. But there is another likely meaning there as well: Vivasvant is identified as the sun in later Vedic, and quite possibly in some passages in the Ṛgveda as well, and therefore the poet may also be making reference to the time of "shining forth," namely early morning.

The double reference to ritual poetry and to dawn continues in verse 2. Mitra and Varuṇa take "untruth away from truth," thus enabling the poet and his peers to see the gods' golden throne. On the one hand, the untruth can be darkness, and the removal of this darkness reveals the sun. On the other hand, the priests see this vision with their insights and their mind, and though they also see with their eyes, these are the "eyes of soma," presumably the vision arising from drinking the soma. So on another level of interpretation what they see is a poetic vision.

The three Aśvins verses (3–5) are fairly clear descriptions of the journey of those gods to the dawn sacrifice, and the invitation to Indra (vs. 6) is also straightforward, as is the praise of the Maruts (vs. 8). This clarity is unfortunately obscured in verse 7, whose translation is only provisional, though the direct speech of Agni is quite intriguing. He seems to be chiding the gods for having given the Aṅgirases a cow they (or in most interpretations, Aryaman and unspecified others) have milked out. From the mythological point of view, the cow should represent the cows imprisoned in the Vala cave that the Aṅgirases helped to liberate. In a ritual context this could be the cow that provides the milk to mix with soma; in a poetic context the poetic insight or vision that provided the Aṅgirases with songs. The role of Aryaman here is entirely unclear.

As noted above, in verse 9 the poet situates himself in the poetic and sacrificial tradition, and in verse 10, another obscure verse (Geldner calls it "unintelligible" [unverständlich]), the ritual and poetic ring is closed.

1. (Cry) "Let it be; he will hear." I place Agni in front through my insight.
   Now we choose that heavenly troop—we choose Indra and Vāyu.
   Since our (umbilical tie) has been effectively bound anew to the umbilical tie in Vivasvant's (sphere), then let our thoughts go forth—our thoughts (going) as if to the gods.
2. Since, Mitra and Varuṇa, you took untruth away from truth by your own fervor—by your own fervor of skill—just in this way among the seats we saw the golden (throne) of you two, just with our insights and with our mind, with our own eyes—with our own eyes of soma.
3. O Aśvins, the Āyus, seeking the gods, with their praise songs are causing you two to hear, as if making the signal-call (of the pressing stone) heard—the Āyus (are causing) you two (to hear) about the oblations.

In you two are all splendors and nourishments, o you who grant all possessions.
The wheel-rims on your golden one spray (honey)—on your golden chariot, wondrous ones.

4. It has appeared, wondrous ones: you two unclose the firmament; your chariot-horses are yoked at the rituals of daybreak—the unbesmirched ones at the rituals of daybreak.
   Your station is on your chariot box, on your golden chariot, wondrous ones—(you two) going as if on a path, directing (the chariot) through the dusky realm—directing (it) straightway through the dusky realm.
5. With your powers, you two whose goods are powers, favor us by day and by night.
   Let your giving never give out—let your giving never give out from us.
6. O bull Indra—these pressed drops, the drink of a bull, pressed by the stones, are bursting out—for you are the pressed (drops) bursting out.
   Let them invigorate you to giving, to great, glittering generosity.
   Being praised with songs, you whose vehicle is songs, come here—very compassionate to us, come here.
7. Listen to us, Agni: Reverently invoked, you will say to the gods worthy of the sacrifice—to the kings worthy of the sacrifice:
   "Since, gods, you have given this milk-cow to the Aṅgirases, they milk her dry. Aryaman is in partnership with the performer [=Agni/priest]—he knows her (too), in partnership with me [=Agni]."
8. Let these manly deeds of yours not get old because of us, and let the brilliant deeds not age—let them not age before us.
   What glittering, immortal (deed) of yours shall sound anew in every generation, o Maruts, fix that firm in us as well as (brilliance) difficult to surpass—and what is difficult to surpass.
9. Dadhyañc, the earlier Aṅgiras, Priyamedha, Kaṇva, Atri, and Manu know my birth—these earlier ones and Manu know mine.
   Their attachment is to the gods; our umbilical ties are to them [=ancient seers].
   (Following) along their track I bend (them) here greatly with a song—I bend Indra and Agni here with a song.
10. (Crying) "The Hotar-priest shall sacrifice," he wins what is choice of the wooden (cup) [=soma]. Bṛhaspati the seeker sacrifices with the bulls [=soma drinks?]—with the bulls with their many choice gifts.
    By ourselves we have grasped the signal-call of the pressing-stone signaling its intentions afar.

The very resolute one upheld the fittings [?]—the very resolute one (upheld) the many seats.

11. O gods, the eleven of you who are in heaven, the eleven who are on the earth, the eleven who dwell in the waters in their greatness—(all) of you, gods, take pleasure in this sacrifice here.

Hymns I.140–164 are attributed to Dīrghatamas, the son of Ucatha, who calls himself Māmateya, the son of Mamatā, in I.147.3, 152.6, and 158.6. The name Dīrghatamas means the one "of long darkness." The Bṛhaddevatā IV.14–15 (Macdonell) explains that he received this name because he was born blind, and the poet himself refers to his blindness in I.147.3. According to the Bṛhaddevatā his sight was later restored by the gods. His name is also an appropriate reflection of the difficulty of many of his hymns. His affection for word play, symbolic language, syntactic anomaly, and ambiguous reference makes his hymns distinctive, original, and often highly elusive. He is one of the most challenging, but at the same time one of the most interesting poets of the Ṛgveda.

His hymns also present an unusual sequence of divinities. The list begins conventionally enough with I.140–150, which are dedicated to Agni, but the ordinarily expected series to Indra is missing. Instead 151–153 are to Mitra and Varuṇa, 154–156 to Viṣṇu or to Viṣṇu and Indra, 157–158 to the Aśvins, 159–160 to Heaven and Earth, and 161 to the Ṛbhus. Then 162 and 163 are praises of the sacrificial horse, and 164, the climax of the collection, is a very long and very puzzling riddle hymn, which explores the mysteries of several Vedic rites. The second Aśvin hymn, I.158, is of particular interest because it is ostensibly an autobiographical hymn, composed when the poet was an old man and on the verge of being pushed aside. Partly on the basis of this hymn Bṛhaddevatā IV.21–25 gives a second legend that his servants tried to drown Dīrghatamas. But he floated downstream and was rescued in Aṅga where he married and then gave birth to the poet Kakṣīvant.

I.140 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
13 verses: jagatī, except jagatī or triṣṭubh 10, triṣṭubh 12–13

This first hymn in the Dīrghatamas cycle is bristling with difficulties in detail, although it remains focused on its central topic, the kindling and spread of the fire. The first two verses establish the ritual scene, with the ritual fire sitting on (or at) the vedi, the "altar" that is really a dug-out depression in the ground on the axis between the eastern and western ritual fires, and with the poet's presentation of his "thought" (a praise hymn) as clothing for the ritual fire. But natural fire, which spreads through the woods and devours them, is also referred to, especially in verse 2.

The chronological description of the kindling and growth of fire begins in verse 3 with a vivid depiction of the kindling sticks and the first faint stirrings of smoke and fire. The growing power of the fire and the swiftness of the spread of its flames, imagined as horses in verse 4, occupy the next verses (4–10). Fire's burning of the plants that stoke it is given an erotic cast in verses 6–8, aided by the fact that several words for "plant" are feminine in gender. Their very destruction by fire is also envisioned as a transformation into a better and more vigorous form (see esp. vss. 7cd–8).

The prayers for aid and material goods begin in verse 10, on behalf not only of a generic "us" but especially mentioning our patrons (vss. 10, 12) and others of our circle (vs. 12). One striking request is for a metaphorical boat to deliver us to the far shore of difficulty (vs. 12); the boat is described in some detail, including its possession of a foot or feet. We wonder if this refers to some sort of primitive keel or centerboard, which would probably be helpful to ensure that the boat make it across the current of a swift-flowing river. Unfortunately our knowledge of ancient Indian naval architecture is not sufficient to decide.

1. To him sitting on the altar, the very bright one whose domain is dear—to Agni bear forth his womb like a wellspring (of nourishment).
   As if with a garment, clothe the blazing one with a thought—the smiter of darkness whose chariot is of light, whose color is blazing bright.
2. Having two births, he stretches toward the threefold food. In a year what was eaten (by him) has grown again.
   With the mouth and the tongue of one (of his forms) he is a thoroughbred bull; with the other he drags down the trees (like) an elephant.
3. Plunging into the black, jerking back and forth, both his mothers [=kindling sticks], sharing the same abode, move athwart each other toward their child—to him, producing smoke, his tongues stretching forward, stirring thirstily, quivering, worthy to be attended upon, the increaser of his father [=priest].
4. For Manu and the offspring of Manu to come they are harnessed—the speedy (horses) seeking to break free, running fast, drawing black furrows, quick, racing fast, breaking ranks, sped by the wind, swift.
5. After that do these (flames) of his, producing smoke, rise at will, making and remaking a black void and a great form, while he goes forth, stroking the great (earth) as his streambed, snorting, thundering, constantly roaring.
6. He who, like a busy attendant, keeps bending over the brown (females [=plants])—he goes toward (them) like a bull to his wives, constantly bellowing.

And, showing his power, he beautifies their [?] bodies. Like a fearsome (bull), the one difficult to grasp keeps shaking his horns.

7. He masses together those spread asunder and those close-packed [=plants]. Recognizing the (females) just as they recognize him, he lies in his own (place).
 They grow again; they approach divinity. They make for themselves a form different from their parents, (though) in company with them.
8. For the long-haired spinsters embrace him; despite having died, they stand erect (to go) forth once again for Āyu [=Agni?].
 Removing their old age, he goes constantly roaring, generating a further living life-force (for them?), which cannot be laid low.
9. Licking all around his mother's [=earth's] over-garment, he drives across the expanse with his powerfully spirited warriors, producing vigor for the footed, while licking and licking always. The white (track of ash) follows along his tracks.
10. Shine upon our bounteous (patrons), o Agni. Then as the snorting bull, the master of the household, *having set loose the females who have young [=flames], you have shone, ever flickering and enveloping like armor in battles.
11. Let this well-formed (thought) be dearer to you than one poorly formed, o Agni, and dearer to you even than your own dear thought.
 With what of your body shines blazing bright you will win treasure for us.
12. For our chariot and for our house, o Agni, give us a boat with built-in oars and a foot [=keel? rudder?], which will carry our heroes and our bounteous (patrons) and our peoples to the further shore and which (will be) our shelter.
13. O Agni, may you welcome just our recitation, (as may) heaven and earth, and the rivers, which sing their own praises as they go toward an abundance of cattle and of grain through the long days. The ruddy (dawns/cattle?) will choose refreshment as their boon (for us?).

I.141 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
13 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 12–13

Like the last hymn, this one is full of puzzles, and also like the last, it focuses especially on the birth and growth of the fire. The hymn begins and ends with the installation of the ritual fire (root dhā: 1ab, 13ab), providing a faint ring structure; the second mention of its installation, with the adverb pratarám "further forward," suggests that it refers to the installation of the new Āhavanīya fire to the east, a fire removed from the old Āhavanīya at the beginning of classical śrauta rituals.

The first few verses cryptically describe the various forms of fire (vs. 2) and their production (vss. 3–4). The means of production are at first mythical or metaphorical, but in the second half of verse 4 the more familiar ritual churning of the fire is described, followed by his growth and rapid and unpredictable movement (vss. 5–8; see also vs. 1c). This type of erratic movement is iconically mirrored with extraordinary skill by our poet Dīrghatamas, who models it with abrupt changes of tense and a deliberate disregard for the usual matching of syntax and verse structure. In our reading there are enjambments across verses in 3–4, 4–5, and 6–7, with sentence breaks in verse-interior in 4, 5, 6—a very rare conjunction of syntactic anomalies. The vertiginous effect of piling clause upon clause and image upon image is especially marked in the sequence beginning with 6b and lasting through 7—giving us a faint whiff of the Gerard Manley Hopkins of "The Windhover," which models a bird's flight with verbal means.

The rest of the hymn is somewhat more conventional, beginning with verse 9, where Agni is addressed for the first time in the 2nd person. Until then not only is the hymn couched entirely in the 3rd person, but the word agní is entirely absent, either as the name of the god or as a designation of the natural substance fire. Verses 9–10 describe Agni's contributions to the welfare of both men and gods, while verses 12–13 express hopes for further help and summarize the hymn itself. But even here, in verse 11 the poet plots a meandering syntactic and conceptual course starting from the "good fortune" (bhága) desired to be acquired in 10d and amplified in the first half of verse 11 to a pun on the god's name Bhaga, with a rich set of images, a clashing set of objects to the verb "hold fast," and a covert syntactic transformation of that very verb at the end of the verse.

All in all, a tour de force of virtuosity.

1. Yes, indeed! It is just so: the luster of the god, lovely to see, has been installed for wonder, after he was born of strength.
   When he zigzags up to it, our thought goes straight to success. Flowing together, the streams of truth have led (him).
2. Abounding in food, he lies in his own (place) as the wondrous form of nourishment; his second (wondrous form lies) here among the mothers, sevenfold kindly.
   His third (wondrous form, that) of the bull to be milked, have the young women begotten—him of tenfold forethought.
3. When the patrons, showing mastery through their power, bring him forth from the depth, from the form of a buffalo, when Mātariśvan churns him who, as from olden days, is in hiding in the mixing vessel of the honey,

4. When he is led forth from his highest father, he mounts the nourishment-bringing plants in the houses, when the two [=kindling sticks] set his birth in motion. Just after that the youngest one became blazing with heat;
5. Just after that he entered into his mothers, within whom the blazing one (stayed) without suffering harm. He grew widely in all directions, when he mounted the previous ones [=plants] who spurred (him) on from of old. He races down into the newer, later ones.
6. Just after that they choose (him as) their Hotar at the rituals of daybreak. As if gorging themselves on good fortune, they steer straight (to him), since he, much praised, with resolve and with might always pursues the gods and the laud (of) mortals in order to suckle them,
7. When he, worthy of the sacrifice, has spread out, driven by the wind, wriggling through the old (plants?) like a twisting (snake), unconfined in his flight—(the flight) of this burning one of black plumage and blazing birth, whose road spreads through the airy realm.
8. Like a driving-chariot made by dexterous (men), he speeds toward heaven with ruddy limbs.
   After that these black (plumes) of his, the patrons of the burning one, retreat from his turbulent flaring, as (from that) of a champion, like birds (from that) *of the sun.
9. By means of you, o Agni, have those rich in drops [/gifts] become exultant—Varuṇa whose commandments are upheld, Mitra, and Aryaman—since, following them, you were born extending everywhere by your resolve, encompassing (everything) like a felly its spokes.
10. You, o Agni, impel treasure and the conclave of the gods to the man who labors and presses soma, o youngest one.
    Might we now acquire [/install] you anew, o young (son) of strength, like good fortune [/Bhaga] at the decisive moment, o you who have great treasure.
11. For us you will engorge good fortune [/Bhaga] like household wealth meant for a good purpose, like enduring skill, ([good fortune/] Bhaga) who will hold fast both races [=gods and men], like reins, (and also) the laud of gods, and (who himself), of good resolve, (is held fast) in truth.
12. And the bright-flashing, delighting Hotar with his lively horses and gleaming chariot will hear us.
    Without error Agni will lead us with the best leading to desirable safe passage, to a better state.

13. Agni has been praised with our energetic chants [/with his ardent flames], while being installed further forward for sovereign rule.
Both those who are our bounteous (patrons) and we (ourselves) would extend outward, as the sun (extends) beyond the mist.

I.142 Āprī (1–12), Indra (13)

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
13 verses: anuṣṭubh

Unlike Dīrghatamas's dense and dexterous Agni hymns among which this hymn is embedded, this Āprī hymn not only follows the set pattern of that genre, but, using the standard Āprī diction and tropes (for which see the introduction to I.13, as well as the general introduction, pp. 33, 63), does so without any perceptible tricks or poetic exuberance. Its only deviation from the norm is having thirteen verses rather than the usual eleven or twelve, by including both Tanūnapāt (vs. 2) and Narāśaṃsa (vs. 3) and by having two svāhā verses at the end (12–13). Dīrghatamas (if he is indeed the poet) seems to be treading water here.

1. Kindled, o Agni, convey the gods here today to the man with offering spoon extended.
Stretch the ancient thread for the pious man who has pressed soma.
2. O Tanūnapāt, measure out the ghee-filled, honey-filled sacrifice of an inspired priest like me, of the pious man who labors.
3. Gleaming, pure, and unerring, Narāśaṃsa mixes the sacrifice with honey three times a day—the god devoted to the sacrifice among the gods.
4. When solemnly invoked, o Agni, convey Indra here, brilliant and dear, for this thought of mine is twisting its way toward you, o you who have good tongues.
5. They whose offering spoons are extended are strewing the ritual grass at the sacrifice with its good ceremonies;
I twist (the grass), which provides the broadest expanse to the gods and extensive shelter to Indra.
6. Let them gape open—the great ones who increase through truth—for the gods to come forth:
the purifying, much-desired, inexhaustible Divine Doors.
7. Being happy, let well-ornamented Night and Dawn, the two youthfully exuberant mothers of truth, sit close together on the ritual grass.
8. Let the two Divine Hotars, poets possessing gladdening tongues and offering welcome, perform this sacrifice for us today, (so it) reaches its goal and touches heaven.

9. Let gleaming Hotrā Bhāratī [/the Oblation of the Bharatas], fitted in her place among the gods, among the Maruts, (also) Iḷā and great Sarasvatī, (all) worthy of the sacrifice, sit on the ritual grass.
10. Let Tvaṣṭar, inclined toward us, for the sake of our thriving and wealth, unbind in our navel that unerring flow of semen as an abundant choice thing, abundant in itself.
11. Releasing (the sacrificial victim) to the gods, sacrifice to the gods by yourself, o Lord of the Forest.
   Agni sweetens the oblations, the wise god among the gods.
12. To Vāyu, accompanied by Pūṣan and the Maruts, by all the gods, and to Indra, pulsing with excitement from the songs, make oblation with the svāhā-cry.
13. Come here right up to the oblations made with the svāhā-cry, to pursue them.
   Indra, come! Hear our summons! You do they summon at the ceremony.

I.143 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
8 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8

The beginning and end of this hymn focus on the ritual fire and our relationship to it. The poet begins (vs. 1) by presenting to Agni what he has produced, characterized as an evolving product: an "insight...the thinking of my speech." The poet's concern with his insight returns toward the end (vss. 6–7), where it is hoped that Agni will pursue our speech and promote our insights. In between the hymn touches on many of the standard Agni tropes: for example, the beauty and radiance of the newly kindled fire (vss. 2–3) and its destructive power (vs. 5). It ends (vs. 8) by begging for Agni's protection.

1. I present a stronger, newer insight to Agni, the thinking of my speech to the son of strength, the Child of the Waters, who, together with the good ones [/Vasus], has sat down upon the earth as our dear Hotar at his season.
2. As he was being born in the highest distant heaven, Agni became manifest to Mātariśvan.
   By the resolve and the might of him as he was kindled, his blaze illuminated heaven and earth.
3. His are the dazzling, his the unaging radiant beams—he possessing a lovely appearance, a lovely face, a lovely flash.

The (beams) of Agni, with the energy of their radiance, are churning like rivers of the night, across (the nights), unsleeping, unaging.

4. The all-possessor whom the Bhr̥gus have aroused upon the navel of the earth, of the living world, in his greatness—
   Agni—urge him on with songs here in his own home, him who alone rules like Varuṇa over what is good.
5. Who is not to be hindered, like the roar of the Maruts, like an army unleashed, like a heavenly missile, with his sharp fangs Agni eats; he devours. Like a fighter his rivals, he bears down on the trees.
6. Surely Agni will be the pursuer of our speech? Surely the good one with the good ones [/Vasus] will grant our desire?
   Surely as a goad he would push our insights to win? I sing to him who has a blazing face with this insight.
7. The one who has kindled him for you all stretches toward ghee-faced Agni, sitting on the chariot-pole of truth, as if toward Mitra [/an ally].
   A foal [?] while being kindled, shining at the rites, he will raise up our insight, whose color is blazing bright.
8. Staying close, o Agni, protect us with your kindly, able protectors that stay close.
   With your undeceivable, undistracted, unwinking (protectors), o object of our quest, protect our kindred all around.

I.144 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
7 verses: jagatī

As in other of Dīrghatamas's Agni hymns, the kindling of the ritual fire provides the major theme of this hymn. In particular, the middle verses 3–5 concern the production of fire by the two churning sticks and the growing strength of that fire. The hymn begins, however, with the already fully matured fire, identified as the Hotar, going about his ritual duties (vss. 1–2). The verse immediately after the kindling verses (vs. 6) opens the ritual frame: Agni there is the ruler of the realms of heaven and earth, and he even attracts those divine figures (probably Heaven and Earth, though some have suggested Night and Dawn) from their cosmic positions to take their place on the ritual ground. The final verse (7) is a typical hymn-ending verse, commending the hymn just recited to Agni's enjoyment.

1. The Hotar goes forth to his duty with his craft, setting aloft our insight, which possesses blazing ornaments.

He strides toward the ladles turning in respectful circumambulation, which first kiss his domain.

2. Those who produce the milk of truth [=streams of melted butter?] have bellowed to him—those surrounded on every side in the womb of the god, in his seat.
When, borne away, he dwelt in the lap of the waters, then he suckled upon his own powers by which he speeds.
3. The two of the same vigor [=fire-churning sticks] seek to keep hold of that marvelous form, constantly crossing each other in turn, toward the same goal; after that he is to be invoked like Bhaga. He has been firmly held by us, as a chariot-driver holds firm the reins of a draft-horse.
4. He whom the two of the same vigor serve—that pair in the same womb, sharing the same dwelling—the gray youth was born by day, not by night—he who roams unaging through many generations of the sons of Manu.
5. Our insights and our ten fingers urge him on. We mortals invoke the god for help.
From the high plain he sets the slopes in motion. With his advancing (flames?) he has established the new (ritual) patterns.
6. For in your own person, o Agni, you rule over the heavenly and the earthly (realm) like a herdsman.
These two lofty, dappled females [=Heaven and Earth? Night and Dawn?], excelling in splendor, golden, surging, have attained to your ritual grass.
7. O Agni, enjoy and delight in this speech—o gladdening one of independent power, born of truth, with strong resolve—you, lovely to see, facing in every direction, who are delightful to the sight like a peaceful dwelling abounding in food.

I.145 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 5

The hymn begins with the peremptory (2nd pl.) command "Ask him!" In the first two verses Agni is depicted as the possessor of secret knowledge that we mortals beg him to impart to us and, in verses 2–3, as the god who is always attentive to the sacrifice whose success he ensures. A sample of his secret knowledge seems to be given in verse 4, a riddling and, at least for these translators, unsolved depiction of ritual activity. The final verse forms a ring with verse 1. It begins with a continuation of the riddling language of verse 4: the "wild beast of the waters" may be a reference to Agni's identification with Apām Napāt ("Child of the Waters"), whose roaming in the woods refers to his burning of firewood. Once installed as the ritual fire in pāda b, Agni implicitly answers the questions asked of him in verses 1–2 in pāda c: he explains the ritual patterns to us. In the final pāda he is characterized by the same vocabulary as in verse 1: "knowing" (vidvā́n) matching "he knows (veda) of 1a; "perceiver of truth" ([ṛta-]cít) matching "the one who perceives" (cikitvā́n) of 1b.

1. Ask him: he has come; he knows. As the one who perceives, he is implored; he is now implored here.
   In him are our commands, in him our wishes [/offerings]. He is the lord of the victory prize and of unbridled power.
2. Just him do they ask, but he himself does not ask in turn, since, like a clever man, with his own mind he has grasped it.
   He does not forget the first nor the later word. Undistracted, he is accompanied by his resolve.
3. Just to him go the offering ladles; to him the mares [=streams of ghee?]. He alone will hear all my words.
   Enjoining many ritual commands, triumphant, bringing the sacrifice to success, offering uninterrupted help, (though) a child, he has taken on his ferocity entirely.
4. He proceeds in a reverential approach (to them) when they [=flames?] have raised themselves up together. Just born, he has crept together with the conjoined ones.
   He touches the swelling one for joy and delight, when the willing females [=streams of ghee?] go to him standing right there.
5. This wild beast of the waters that roams in the woods has been installed upon the uppermost skin.
   He has declared the (ritual) patterns to mortals—the knowing Agni. For he is the perceiver of truth who is really present (here).

I.146 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Dīrghatamas's usual preoccupation with the birth and growth of the ritual fire. In verse 1 Agni is seated in the lap of his two parents, in our opinion the fire-churning sticks, though they are not explicitly identified and other interpreters see the two as cosmic entities. (See I.140.3, 141.4, 144.3–4 for other allusions to these sticks in Dīrghatamas's Agni hymns.) The fire grows in verse 2 and is tended in verse 3. Unidentified duals are found in both verses; the ambiguity seems deliberate, allowing the pair to represent both the churning sticks in the ritual realm and Night and Dawn (or Heaven and Earth) in the cosmic realm, as the diction referring to the pair becomes closer to that used especially of Night and Dawn elsewhere. After a somewhat enigmatic verse (4) sketching Agni's relationship with poets, the god is depicted as a birth-giver (using a word ordinarily appropriate only to the female at parturition)—thus bringing his life-cycle full circle, as it were, from birth to giving birth.

1. I will hymn three-headed, seven-reined Agni, who is without deficiency, seated in the lap of his parents [=fire-churning sticks], one (stick) that moves and one that stays firm—(Agni,) who has filled all the luminous realms of heaven.
2. The great young bull has grown upon the two (sticks?). Unaging, ever young, he stands tall.
   He sets his feet down upon the back of the broad (earth); his ruddy (flames) lick the udder.
3. Converging upon the same calf, the two well-grounded milk-cows wander apart on their separate ways, measuring their roads whose end can never be reached, taking upon themselves all the intentions of the great one.
4. Clever poets guide his step, guarding with their heart, in different ways, the one exempt from age.
   Seeking to win him, they have surveyed the river. He has become manifest to them as the sun toward men.
5. Desirable to be seen, a thoroughbred around the racecourse; greatly to be invoked for the small one to live, since in many places he has become the birth-giver to these embryos—he, the generous one for all to see.

I.147 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a departure from Dīrghatamas's focus in previous Agni hymns on the creation and spread of the ritual fire. Though it begins in a ritual situation (vs. 1) and the poet commends his ritual speech to Agni in the first half of verse 2, the poet then becomes preoccupied with potential hostilities directed against him by malevolent and dishonest men and how to foil them. He counts upon the protectors deployed by Agni (vs. 3), who may well be the flames referred to in verse 1, and more generally assumes that well-performed worship of Agni will enlist that god in his protection. Who the hostile mortals are is not made clear, though in a Ṛgvedic ritual context rival sacrificers are the most likely culprits.

The insistence on the cheating and duplicity of these rivals and the general embattled but combative tone of these verses remind us somewhat of similarly contentious passages in the Old Avestan Gāthās attributed to Zarathustra.

It is also worth noting that this is the first time in the Dīrghatamas cycle that he refers to himself by name, that is, by his metronymic Māmateya (vs. 3).

1. How do the blazing (flames?) of you, of Āyu, panting hard, perform ritual service with prizes of victory, o Agni, when, establishing both progeny and posterity, the gods delight in the melody of truth?
2. Take heed of this most munificent speech of mine that has been brought forward, o youngest one of independent will.
   One man reviles but another sings welcome: as an extoller, I extol your body [/myself], o Agni.
3. Agni, your protectors who, watching, guarded blind Māmateya [=Dīrghatamas] from distress, those of good (ritual) action has the possessor [/knower] of everything [=Agni] guarded. Though wishing to damage, the cheats did no damage at all.
4. O Agni, the ungenerous one wishing us ill and full of hostility who harms us by his duplicity, let this heavy spell be back at him: he should bring harm upon his own body by his evil words.
5. Or, o strong one, the mortal who with premeditation harms a mortal by his duplicity, from him protect your praiser, o you who are praised. Agni, no one should give us over to distress.

I.148 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn shares some of the concern about malicious enemies with the previous hymn (I.147); see especially verses 2a and 5. However, the situation is more fluid and the identity of both friends and enemies is unclear, since the subjects of some crucial actions are not specified and a liberal use of injunctive verb forms blurs the temporal reference.

The hymn begins (vs. 1) with an apparent reminiscence of the original mythic theft of fire and its first installation on the ritual ground. The performers of this installation (1c) are not identified, but seem likely to be the gods. Verse 2 presents two inimical but unnamed groups: those who cannot damage Agni but presumably want to (2a) and those who delight in all his actions (2cd). The latter must be the performers of the ritual, probably both the current mortal ones and the gods who initiated the sacrifice in verse 1, but the enemies in 2a are defined only by their contrast with the others. Verse 3 appears to reprise the action of verse 1, but in present time as the regular (re-)installation of the ritual fire for the regular, repeated rites performed by men—given the "leading forward" of 3c, perhaps the removal of the Āhavanīya fire from the Gārhapatya fire and its deposit in the east of the ritual ground.

Verse 4 is a thematic intrusion, with a standard description of a wildfire in nature. Verse 5 returns to the topic of 2a: Agni's invulnerability even when only nascent. A notable feature of verse 5 is the mention of the inability of the blind enemies of Agni to afflict him with the evil eye, given that Dīrghatamas identified himself as blind in the immediately preceding hymn (I.147.3).

1. Since with effort Mātariśvan stole him, the Hotar bringing all goods, belonging to all the gods, whom they installed for wonder among the clans of the sons of Manu, dazzling like the sun, far-radiant,
2. Just him, who gives (inspired) thoughts, they cannot damage. Agni is my armor: he delights in this.
   They take pleasure in all the acts of him, the bard who produces the invitatory praise.
3. Whom even now those worthy of the sacrifice have grasped in his very own seat and installed with lauds, him they lead forth, grasping him in their quest, hastening like chariot-horses.
4. The wondrous one dissolves many things with his fangs. After that, far-radiant, he shines in the wood;
   after that the wind fans his flame, like an arrow, the shot of a shooter, through the days.
5. Whom neither cheats nor hurtful men hurt with their hurt, though he is in the womb, him can the blind, unable to see, not damage by casting an eye on him.
   His very own ones who please him have guarded him.

I.149 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: virāj

The name Agni is not mentioned in this short and enigmatic hymn. Especially in the first verse and a half its application to Agni is quite uncertain; Geldner suggests that Soma is referred to there. In our view the poet is certainly keeping the referent open at the beginning of the hymn, but moves closer and closer to a clear identification of Agni as the hymn proceeds. This gradual disclosure of the subject of the hymn replicates the way that the fire is slowly and carefully kindled and then emerges from its hiding place, flaming up, when it catches. The kindling is cryptically depicted in verse 2, while the burst of light and energy takes over verse 3. In the final two verses (4–5) he is identified as Hotar, a standard role for Agni, and he is revealed as fully grown, powerful, and a partner in the sacrifice with the mortal worshiper. Thus the hymn reflects Dīrghatamas's usual preoccupation with the birth of Agni, though it is treated somewhat differently here.

1. The lord of the house hastens toward great riches—the forceful one here in the footprint of the forceful good thing.
   The stones just honor him as he soars near.
2. He who is the bull of the two world-halves as of men by his renown, whose surge is swelled [/drunk] by living beings, who, though running forward, would still remain fixed in his womb, 3. Who has illuminated the low-lying flatland like a stronghold—a steed, a poet, like a charger bursting forth, shining like the sun, possessing a hundred selves [=flames?].
4. Possessing two births he has surmounted the three luminous realms, blazing through all the airy spaces—
   the best sacrificing Hotar in the seat of the waters.
5. Here he is, the Hotar possessing two births, who with desire for fame has granted all desirable things (to him), the easily spurred mortal who performs ritual service for him.

I.150 Agni

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
3 verses: uṣṇih

A curious pendant to Dīrghatamas's Agni cycle, with many puzzles despite its brevity. The poet seems to begin by declaring his allegiance and service to Agni and making his claim for guest-friendship (hence the "stranger" in vs. 1) and protection on that basis. In verse 2 he rejects the patronage of a non-sacrificer, despite his riches, while in verse 3 he returns to the benefits that accrue to the devotee of Agni.

1. Performing much ritual service for you, I call myself a stranger (under the protection) of you, o Agni, as if under the protection of the great goad [=sun].
2. (I go) away (from the protection) of the rich man who lacks force, who gives nothing even when oblations are made, who, not seeking the gods, is never forthcoming.

3. O inspired one, (I) a mortal (call myself) the luminous one, great, the proudest in heaven.
   Zealous for you, o Agni, might we become more and more preeminent.

I.151 Mitra and Varuṇa

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
9 verses: jagatī

The second part of this hymn (vss. 6cd through 9) is fairly straightforward, depicting Mitra and Varuṇa as the focus of the sacrifice and the patrons of the sacrificer. The first part is a different story—enigmatic in reference and convoluted in expression. However, it appears to concern the same topic: Mitra and Varuṇa's presence at and participation in the sacrifice. We can therefore think of the hymn as an example of large-scale "poetic repair," with the second part rephrasing the first in less contorted expressions. (On poetic repair see Jamison 2006.)

The hymn begins with the birth of Agni, presented both as ritual fire and as formidable god. The first half of verse 1 places the birth at the sacrifice itself, "amid the cows and the waters," in our opinion referring to the two auxiliary substances necessary for soma preparation, the milk for mixing and the water for rinsing and diluting. But in the second half of the verse the birth causes cosmic consternation, with the two worlds set atremble by his size and his "song," presumably a reference to the crackling of a blazing fire.

Mitra and Varuṇa make their appearance in verse 2, as sacrificial partners of a named soma-offerer; they are brought to the ritual ground and urged to aid the ritual participants. But the theme of birth returns in verse 3. Contrary to most interpretations, we consider the birth in question to be Agni's birth, treated already in verse 1, not the birth of Mitra and Varuṇa. (The dual pronoun vām in 3a is in Wackernagel's Position, and we construe it later in the verse, as often.) As in verse 1, humans assist at the birth of the ritual fire, a birth that has cosmic resonances. Mitra and Varuṇa also assist, bringing their skill to bear for the sacrifice (here referred to as "truth" [ṛtá]) and the fire. Their contributions to the sacrifice are also treated in verse 4; the skill mentioned in verse 3 they bring from heaven (4c), while they also make ready the soma-preparing waters mentioned in verse 1 (4d). Soma preparation is also the subject of the next verse (5). The cows (that is, their milk) are depicted turbulently milling around the ritual ground, bellowing at the three times of day associated with soma-pressing—dawn, midday, and sunset. (It should be noted that vs. 5 is the most puzzling verse in the hymn, and our interpretation does not entirely match those of others scholars.) In the first half of verse 6 we return to the ritual fire, kindled in verse 1—or rather to its flames, conceived of as "long-haired females." (The poet, Dīrghatamas, uses the same image and the same word in I.140.8, where the reference to flames is clearer.)

As mentioned above, the highly wrought and cryptic treatment of the sacrifice and Mitra and Varuṇa's place in it is succeeded, starting with the second half of verse 6, by a fairly uncomplex restatement of the major themes.

1. Whom [=Agni] like an ally [/Mitra] those very attentive ones, seeking cattle, begot with energy at the ceremony amid the cows and the waters—the two world-halves trembled by reason of his dimensions and his song, in confronting him, the dear help of (all) the races, worthy of the sacrifice.
2. Just now when the associates of Purumīḍha the soma-offerer, like allies [/Mitras], have brought you two forward, now find the will and the way for the one who chants, and listen to the possessor of the dwelling place, you two bulls.
3. The settlements attended upon (his) birth, which was worthy to be proclaimed in the two world-halves, for the sake of your great skill, o bulls.
   When you bring it [=skill] for truth, when for the steed [=Agni?], with the oblation you energetically pursue the rite.
4. It is the settlement greatly dear (to you) that (gets) ahead, o lord(s)—o truthful ones, you two loudly sound your lofty truth—
   You (hitch up) your skill from lofty heaven (to be) ready at hand; you hitch up the waters like an ox to a yoke-pole.
5. (Like) the two great (world-halves) in their greatness you two propel the desirable reward here. The milk-cows, pushing and shoving (though) not raising dust, are at the (ritual) seat.
   They cry out to the sun at its zenith (and) up to its setting (and) through the dawns, like a bird (screeching) in swooping pursuit.
6. The long-haired females [=flames] have bellowed to you for truth, where [=ritual seat] you are chanting the way, o Mitra, o Varuṇa.
   Send (them) surging down by yourselves; swell our insights: you two have control over the thoughts of the inspired poet.
7. (The man) who as he labors piously serves you with sacrifices, the poet and Hotar who performs the sacrifice, bringing his thoughts to success—it's him that you come near; you pursue his rite. Seeking us, come here to our songs and our good thinking.
8. They anoint you first with sacrifices and with cows. O truthful ones, as if at the yoking of mind they bring you songs along with uninterrupted thought. With undistracted mind you have attained rich (vigor).
9. You have acquired rich vigor; you have attained it—rich, great, and enduring—with your magic arts.

Through the days neither the heavens nor the rivers have attained your divinity, nor the Paṇis your bounty.

I.152 Mitra and Varuṇa

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The nub of this hymn may be found in verse 5c, "(Though it cannot be) comprehended, the youths enjoy the formulation," and the poet almost seems to be recommending this course of action to us, the audience: to enjoy poetic formulations whether we understand them or not. The hymn provides a number of examples on which to test this advice.

The power of formulated truth and the frequent opacity of its verbal form are both treated early in the hymn. In the first verses the poet affirms the close association of Mitra and Varuṇa with truth and their power to defeat untruth (see 1cd, also indirectly 3d), while in both 2a and 3b he questions the ability of ordinary people to comprehend. The object of the comprehension is left undefined ("this," 2a; "that," 3b), but in our opinion it is the formulation, or the "truth," or the speech of the gods and/or poets. He then implies that whether or not we comprehend is immaterial, for mantras proclaimed by poets come true (2b) regardless of whether or not they were understood by their hearers.

Verse 3 seems to contain a few test formulations (3a, 3c) and comments on them (3b, 3d). The formulations are constructed as paradoxes: the footless one who is first of the footed (3a); the embryo who carries its own burden, contravening the usual expectation that the embryo is the burden that the mother bears (see, e.g., III.46.5, VI.67.4, X.27.16). The next three verses (4–6) concern the familiar mysteries of the ritual day: the rising of the sun following the dawns (vss. 4–5) and the flaring up of the fire fueled by streams of melted butter (vs. 6). These predictable daily occurrences are implicitly identified as conforming to "the ordinance of Mitra and Varuṇa" (vss. 4d, 5d).

The final verse is a simple invitation to the sacrifice with prayers for the gods' aid.

1. You two wear garments of fat; your counsels are unbroken torrents.
   You have brought low all untruths; you keep company with truth.
2. Many a one will not comprehend this (formulation?) of theirs, (but) the virile mantra, proclaimed by poets, comes true.
   The mighty four-edged (weapon) smites one with three edges; the scorners of the gods were the first to waste away.
3. "Footless she [=Dawn] goes as the first of the footed." Who comprehends that (formulation?) of yours, o Mitra and Varuṇa?

"The unborn child bears his burden even here." He guides the truth across; he has brought down untruth.

4. We look him over, the lover of maidens [=Sun], only when he is going forth but not when he is settling down near (them)—
   (the Sun) wearing (garments) not removed (from the loom), (still) stretched out (on it)—following the dear ordinance of Mitra and Varuṇa.
5. Born without a horse, a steed without a rein, ever whinnying he [=Sun] flies with arched back.
   (Though it cannot be) comprehended, the youths [=Maruts? Aṅgirases? gods?] enjoy the formulation, as in (the presence of) Mitra and Varuṇa they hymn their ordinance.
6. Aiding the son of Mamatā [=Dīrghatamas], the milk-cows will swell the one who gives pleasure with formulations [=Agni?] in the same udder.
   Knowing the ritual patterns he should seek a share of the food. Seeking to win her with his mouth, he should make broad space for Aditi [/Boundlessness].
7. Might I turn you two here, Mitra and Varuṇa, to the enjoyment of our oblation by my reverence, o gods, and with your help.
   Ours is the formulation that should prevail in battles; ours is the heavenly rain that provides deliverance.

I.153 Mitra and Varuṇa

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
4 verses: triṣṭubh

This little collection of Dīrghatamas's Mitra-Varuṇa hymns (I.151–153), which have especially concerned their presence at and participation in the sacrifice, ends with this short piece announcing the present sacrifice offered to the two gods. It focuses on the ritual details and on the priestly personnel.

1. Of one accord we shall sacrifice greatly to you two, o Mitra and Varuṇa, with oblations, with reverence, and with ghee, you ghee-backed ones, as when the Adhvaryus among us bring (soma) to you along with their insights.
2. A well-turned preliminary praise song, like the yoking up (of mind), has been offered to you two, (following) your ordinance, o Mitra and Varuṇa;
   when the Hotar anoints you at the ritual distributions, the patron is striving to attain your favor, o bulls.
3. Aditi, the milk-cow, swells for truth and for the person who gives offerings, o Mitra and Varuṇa, when serving you at the ceremony, he spurs you two on. The one upon whom the oblation is bestowed [=Agni] is like the human Hotar.

4. When the clans are to be exhilarated, the cows and the goddess Waters swell the (soma) stalk for you, and the lord of this house of ours is foremost. Pursue (the rite); drink of the milk of the ruddy cow.

I.154 Viṣṇu

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

One of the only hymns dedicated entirely to Viṣṇu, this composition reads almost like a round, with phraseology that is constantly repeated and recombined. The focus of the hymn is narrow: the three strides made by Viṣṇu, which measured out the cosmic spaces, earth, midspace, and heaven, and provided room for the creatures to live. These strides are also conceived of as footsteps, which contain the good things sought by the poet, and which he aspires to reach (vss. 5–6). This goal provides a forward thrust to the poem, despite the uniformity of the vocabulary throughout. Viṣṇu's footsteps are also credited with somewhat surprising actions: in verse 4 they "find elation by their own power" and in verse 6 the highest step "shines down amply."

1. Now shall I proclaim the heroic deeds of Viṣṇu, who measured out the earthly realms, who propped up the higher seat, having stridden out three times, the wide-ranging one.
2. In this way Viṣṇu will be praised for his heroic deed—(he who is) like a fearsome wild beast, living in the mountains and roaming wherever it wants, in whose three wide strides dwell all living beings.
3. Let my fortifying thought go forth to Viṣṇu, the mountain-dwelling, wide-ranging bull, who alone with just three steps measured out this dwelling place here, long and extended, 4. Whose three steps, filled with honey, never becoming depleted, find elation through their own power, who alone supports heaven and earth in their three parts and all living beings.
5. Might I reach that dear cattle-pen of his, where men seeking the gods find elation, for exactly that is the bond to the wide-striding one: the wellspring of honey in the highest step of Viṣṇu.
6. We wish to go to the dwelling places belonging to you two [=Viṣṇu and Indra], where there are ample-horned, unbridled cows.
   There that highest step of the wide-ranging bull shines down amply.

I.155 Viṣṇu and Indra (1–3), Viṣṇu (4–6)

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
6 verses: jagatī

This hymn starts by praising Indra and Viṣṇu jointly (vss. 1–2), but by verse 3 (pace the Anukramaṇī) it is entirely Viṣṇu's. The beginning seems to offer alternative scenarios for the creation of the wide space that is ordinarily attributed to Viṣṇu's three strides. In verse 1 the two gods standing on the back of the mountains seem to enlarge the space, and in verse 2 their clash (presumably with unnamed enemies) creates breathing room, while they also deflect the arrow of the archer Kr̥śānu, whose presence here is not explained. (Kr̥śānu is best known as the archer who shoots at the falcon that steals the soma from heaven; cf. IV.27.3, IX.77.2.)

The first half of verse 3 showcases two contrastive pairs: unspecified females (possibly hymns?) who strengthen his masculine nature, and (by implication) a son who induces his two mothers (Heaven and Earth?) to enjoy the semen. The paradoxical quality of these actions is clear, but the exact contents are not. The second half of the verse introduces the "three" so characteristic of Viṣṇu, though used of names, not strides; nonetheless, the same expansion of space, into highest heaven, seems to be at issue. Verse 4 seems almost like a "repair" of verse 3: it is clear in 4a who is tending to "his great masculine nature" (unlike 3a), and in the second half we have the familiar three strides, not three names. Verse 5 continues the theme of the three strides, while a different numerological topic, the year, closes the hymn (vs. 6).

The paired verses 3 and 4, with their mysteries and paradoxes, appear to constitute an omphalos.

1. Announce in chant the drink from the stalk to the great champion who exercises insight [=Indra] and to Viṣṇu, the two undeceivable ones who stand on the back of the mountains mightily like (riders) on a steed heading straight to the goal.
2. The turbulent clashing of you two vehement ones is right to the point: it makes wide space for you two soma-drinkers, o Indra and Viṣṇu, who cause (the arrow) to go wide just as it is being aimed at the mortal, the shot of the shooter Kr̥śānu.
3. These (females) strengthen that great masculine nature of his; he leads his two mothers down to enjoy the semen.
   The son sets in place the lower and the higher names of the father and the third name in the luminous realm of heaven.
4. It is just this very masculine nature of his that we sing—of him, the forceful rescuer who gives rewards and keeps the wolf away, who strode widely across the earthly (regions) with just three paces, for the wide-ranging to live.

5. On catching sight of just two strides of him of sunlike appearance, a mortal bestirs himself.
   His third no one will dare, not even the winged birds in their flight.
6. With the four times ninety names [=days], he has caused the paired (horses) [=days and nights] to quiver like a wheel set rolling.
   Having a lofty body, measuring out (the realms?) with verses, the youth who is no boy returns to the challenge.

I.156 Viṣṇu

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: jagatī

The primary deed of Viṣṇu, his claim to fame—the three strides—is not mentioned directly in this hymn. Instead, he is presented as a protean divinity, likened to or identified with a number of other gods, especially Agni. This superimposition begins with the first pāda of verse 1, where he is compared to Mitra, and in verse 2b the association with the Wives of the Gods immediately brings Tvaṣṭar to mind. In verse 4d he is identified either with Indra/Br̥haspati or with an Aṅgiras in the allusion to the Vala myth, and earlier in that verse (pāda b) "the ritual expert associated with the Maruts" may be a reference to Indra, who may be called "ritual expert of the Maruts" (vedho marútām) in I.169.1. But the primary association appears to be with Agni. The title "ritual expert," though used of other gods (like Indra, see above), is especially characteristic of Agni, and the references to Viṣṇu as embryo and to his birth (vss. 2–3) are typical Agni themes (compare 3b especially with VI.48.5, of the birth of Agni). The "three seats" in verse 5 also recalls Agni with his three hearths, and this word may in fact signal the point of contact between Viṣṇu and Agni, since "three" is the number that defines Viṣṇu's great deed, and the "three seats" could be the three footprints left by his strides. (See the footprints as places in I.154.4–6.)

The theme of Viṣṇu's multiple identities is announced, in typically oblique fashion, in the middle verse of this hymn: "recognizing him, announce his very names" (3c).

1. Become kindly like an ally [/Mitra]—you with ghee as your drink, traveling your ways, extensive and having far-reaching brilliance.
   Then for you, o Viṣṇu, praise can be brought to success only by one who knows, and sacrifice can be made to succeed by one who offers an oblation.
2. Whoever will do service to the ancient ritual expert and to the newer one, to Viṣṇu together with the Wives (of the Gods), who will speak of his birth, the great birth of the great one, just he will surpass in renown even his yokefellow.

3. You praisers, carry him to term in the way that is known—the ancient one who is by birth the embryo of truth.
   Recognizing him, announce his very names. Let us share in the favor of you who are great, o Viṣṇu.
4. That resolve of his does king Varuṇa follows, that do the Aśvins, the resolve of the ritual expert associated with the Maruts.
   Viṣṇu upholds the highest skill that knows the days, when with his comrade(s) he opens up the pen.
5. The divine one, Viṣṇu, who sought for Indra to accompany him, sought for the one of good action as the one who acts (even) better, the ritual expert, possessing the three seats, he enlivened the Ārya. He apportioned to the sacrificer a portion of truth.

I.157 Aśvins

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
6 verses: jagatī 1–4, triṣṭubh 5–6.

As is usual for the Aśvins, this hymn is a morning hymn (vs. 1) recited at the beginning of the sacrificial day. Less typical but elsewhere attested (e.g., VIII.5) is its implicit representation of the Aśvins as bringers of rain. This theme is most obvious in verse 2, for in 2b ukṣatam, translated "increase," is a śleṣa, to be read also as "sprinkle." The "ghee and honey" by which the Aśvins bring increase to the dominion are the rain they sprinkle on it. If "honey" refers to rain in verse 2, then so also do their "honey-bearing chariot" (vs. 3) and their "honeyed whip" (vs. 4). At least here the latter probably refers to lightning (Pirart 1995: 296, with reference to Blair 1961: 152–54). The rain they bring is fertilizing for all beings, both animals and plants (vs. 5). Likewise, the description of the Aśvins' sending fire and water into the trees (vs. 6) refers to the water, which not only allows the trees to grow but also carries fire that emerges when wood is kindled.

The theme of the Aśvins as bringers of rain is interwoven with that of their chariot as a reflection of the sacrifice. The sets of three often associated with them and their chariot refer to the three soma-pressings (cf. also I.34). Here, significantly, in verse 3 their chariot has three wheels and three chariot boxes. And finally, the Aśvins are not only bringers of rain, but they are also bringers of healing (4cd, 6). These two functions are connected because they both give and extend life.

One last note: in verse 6 ráthyebhiḥ "through the parts of your chariot" is a hapax and there are several other plausible interpretations of it: among them the chariot-horses (Sāyaṇa), chariot-skills (Geldner), and reins (Pirart). Since the hymn mentions the chariot itself and its boxes, wheels, whip, and horses, we suggest that the word encompasses all those things that constitute the chariot—and therefore the rain and the sacrifice—and that complement the healing remedies they bring.

1. Agni has awakened; the Sun rises from the earth; great, glowing Dawn has dawned widely with her ray of light.
   The Aśvins have harnessed their chariot to make their journey. The god Savitar has spurred the living world in all directions.
2. When you harness the bull that is your chariot, Aśvins, then increase [/sprinkle] our dominion with ghee and honey!
   Enliven our sacred formulation in the contests! We would share the riches in the heroes' victory.
3. Let the three-wheeled, honey-bearing chariot of the Aśvins with its swift horses, which is well-praised, journey near.
   With its three chariot boxes, the generous (chariot), bringing all good shares, will carry good fortune here to both the two-footed and four-footed.
4. Carry nourishment to us, Aśvins, and mix us with your honeyed whip.
   Extend our lifetime, wipe away our diseases, repel hatred, and be companions to us.
5. You place the embryo in the females of moving beings; you place it within all living things.
   You, o bulls, have sent fire and water here into the trees, Aśvins.
6. You are healers through your healing remedies, and you are also charioteers through the parts of your chariot.
   And again, o powerful ones, you set dominion upon him who ritually serves with his oblation and by his thought.

I.158 Aśvins

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
6 verses: triṣṭubh 1–5, anuṣṭubh 6

This is an elusive hymn, but a particularly interesting one since it appears to be autobiographical—although whether it refers to the actual life of the poet or to the life of the poet as his own literary creation is not entirely clear. The best starting point may be the final verse, in which the poet describes himself as old, but nevertheless as the "chariot-driver" of the waters and a "formulator (of the truth)." He is still a poet and a powerful one at that. The problem the hymn addresses, therefore, could be an attempt by the poet's patrons or fellow poets to retire him, and therefore he calls upon the Aśvins to help him show his mettle as a poet. One of the wondrous acts of the Aśvins is to rejuvenate, and therefore it is not surprising that he would turn to them.

Even if this is the right approach to the hymn, a fair number of difficulties remain. In verse 2 the poet asks who will serve the Aśvins, if not he, so that the two gods will take their place "in the track of the cow." As often elsewhere, the cow is the inspired hymn, and therefore the "track of the cow" should be the place of the sacrifice, where the inspired hymn is recited. In praising the Aśvins

the poet alludes to the two gods' great deeds of rescue, which turn on the theme of water. In verse 3 the poet mentions the story of Bhujyu, who was rescued from the water by the Aśvins. In verse 5 is the story of a man whom Dāsas bound and tossed into the rivers. The story is unknown, but presumably that person was also rescued from the waters. These rescues anticipate the poet's final claim in verse 6 to be the master of the waters. The significance of this is not clear, but it may mean that he can bring the rain through the power of his recitations and rituals. These stories of drowning, of too much water, also contrast to the poet's plea in verse 4 not to be dried out by time and not to be burnt up, as if he were like kindling. Despite his age the poet is and wishes to remain vital, not to become a dried-out old stick of a man.

The Bṛhaddevatā (IV.21–25) presents the story or stories mentioned in verse 5 as the story of Dīrghatamas himself. According to it, his slaves (dāsas) tied up the old, blind Dīrghatamas and immersed him in the waters of the river. One of them, called Traitana, tried to strike him with sword, but ended up cutting to pieces his own head, shoulders, and chest. Eventually Dīrghatamas washed up near the country of the Aṅgas, where he was rescued. Later he had a son, Kakṣīvant, by a servant of the king. It is unlikely that this is the story known to the Ṛgveda or even that verse 5 tells the story of Dīrghatamas, unless metaphorically. Still, the reference to the Dāsas seems to be of particular significance. The earlier part of the hymn develops a repetitive phonological pattern with daśasyátam (1b), dásrā (1c), dā́śat (2a), and dáśatayaḥ (4c). These words, most of which have a marked position in the pāda, seem to lead toward the story of the Dāsas. These Dāsas did try to destroy someone but ended up destroying themselves, and perhaps this is the message that the poet wishes to impress upon those who are trying to push him aside.

1. You two Vasus, Rudras, who give many counsels, strengthening (our praise) in preeminence—favor us, o bulls, since the son of Ucathya [=Dīrghatamas] is the legacy (left) for you, wondrous ones, since you two have run forth (to him) with unstinting help.
2. Who will serve you two for this very favor, when, Vasus, by his homage you two will take your place in the track of the cow?
   Awaken for us plentiful gifts filled with riches, acting as if with a thought to fulfill our wishes.
3. Because your harnessed (chariot)—swelling, rugged—was set apart in the middle of the flood for the son of Tugra [=Bhujyu],
   I would come to your sheltering help by flying ways, as a hero (flies) his course.
4. The praise song should give wide space to (me), the son of Ucathya. Let these two winged females [=Night and Dawn] not milk me dry.
   Let the piled-up, ten-stick kindling not burn me, when he [=Agni], whom you bound by the trunk of his body, chews at the earth.

5. "The rivers, best of mothers, will not swallow me!" (he cried,) when the Dāsas sank him, tightly bound.
   When Traitana hewed away the head, the Dāsa himself ate his own chest and shoulders.
6. Dīrghatamas, the son of Mamatā, though having grown old in the tenth stage (of life), becomes the chariot-driver of the waters that are moving toward their goal and the formulator (of the truth).

I.159 Heaven and Earth

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: jagatī

The various, and sometimes paradoxical, relationships between (masculine) Heaven and (feminine) Earth, and their joint relationship with their sons, the gods, are the topic of this hymn. The two are named in the first and last (5) verses of the hymn, while in between they are only referred to by kinship terms. In the first half of verse 2 their parental roles are kept separate: father and mother, but in the second half they are subsumed in a pregnant dual, "two fathers." The tables are turned in verse 3, where they appear as "two mothers." Although both of these duals are frequently used in the R̥gveda for the paired parents of both genders (and such is their reference here), the alternation in this hymn seems meaningful and contextually appropriate. Minds are not associated with either gender exclusively, so that "the mind of the... father and of the mother" in verse 2ab belongs to each individually, whereas in 2c it is, properly, two fathers who "possess good semen." The reason for the feminine "two mothers" in verse 3 is less clear, though as objects acted upon they may evoke the feminine. After these various parental designations, the poet branches out in verse 4b, identifying the two as both siblings and a married couple, with a subtle but unmistakable suggestion of incest.

In the meantime, the beloved paradox of children giving birth to their parents is given full play in verses 3 and 4.

As discussed in the introduction to I.160, this hymn is a virtual twin to the one that follows.

1. I shall start up the praise, along with sacrifices, to Heaven and to Earth, the two great ones growing strong through truth, the discerning ones, at the rites of distribution, those of wondrous power, whose sons are gods, who together with the gods tender things of value (to the mortal) who has an insight right to the point.

2. And I turn my mind to the great and self-powerful mind of the undeceivable father and of the mother, with my invocations.
   The two fathers possessing good semen have made the land wide for offspring and immortal in its expanses.
3. These their sons, good artisans with wondrous powers, begot the two great ones, two mothers, to be first in their thought.
   You two protect what is real in upholding the standing and the moving; you protect the footprint of your son who is unduplicitous [=Agni?].
4. Masters of magical power, having good forethought, they measured [=created] the kindred pair who share the same womb, the married couple who share the same dwelling place.
   They stretch an ever newer thread to heaven and within the sea—the very brilliant poets.
5. The desirable largesse of Savitar shall we think upon today at the impulse of the god.
   For us, o Heaven and Earth, through your kind attention establish wealth consisting of goods and a hundred cows.

I.160 Heaven and Earth

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
5 verses: jagatī

Like I.159 this hymn is dedicated to Heaven and Earth and consists of five verses in jagatī meter, but the similarities are stronger than those bare facts suggest: I.160 is structurally identical to 159, and they share phraseological and thematic patterns. Like 159, 160 names Heaven and Earth only in its first and last verses, with the references in between conveyed by kinship terms and adjectival duals, patterning in much the same way as in 159—first separate designations for father and mother (159.2ab, 160.2b), then duals identifying the pair with one gender or another ("two fathers" 159.2c, "two mothers" 159.3b versus "two world-halves/rodasī" [fem., depicted as girls] 160.2c, "two fathers" 160.3a).

One of the notable features of 159 is the relationship between Heaven and Earth and their sons, the gods. The same parental relationship is depicted in 160, but with a single son, the Sun. As in 159, this son is first introduced in verse 1, but also as in 159 the theme is developed primarily in verses 3–4, where the same paradox of the child begetting his parents is employed (esp. in 160.4, but note the child milking out his own milk from his parents in vs. 3). Similar or identical words are used: the son in 160.4a is "the best artisan of the artisans (apás) of the gods," while the sons in 159.3a are "good artisans" (svápas); the two fathers of 159.2c "possess good semen" (surétas), just as the bull representing Heaven does in 160.3c. Two verbs are used to express the sons'/son's begetting of the parents: the literal √jan "beget" (jajñuḥ 159.3b, jajñā́na 160.4b) and the metaphorical √mā "measure out" (mamire 159.4a, ví... mamé 160.4c); both the sons of 159 and the son of 160 possess magical power (māyínaḥ 159.4a, māyáyā 160.3b).

Once seen, the pervasive underlying identity of these two hymns cannot be denied, but it is an index of the art of Dīrghatamas that the poems strike the audience as completely distinct and that, as far as we are aware, their patterned similarity has not previously been recognized—unlike other such pairs, like the Vālakhilya hymns VIII.49–50, 51–52, or IV.13–14, IX.104–105, as discussed by Bloomfield (1916: 13–14).

1. Because these two, Heaven and Earth, beneficial to all, truthful, are those who uphold the poet of the airy realm, he speeds between the two Holy Places of good birth—the god, the blazing Sun, between the two goddesses, according to his ordinance.
2. The two great ones of broad expanse, inexhaustible, the father and mother, protect living beings—the two world-halves, the very boldest ones, who are like (girls) inviting admiration, when their father has decked them out with their forms.
3. That draft-horse, the son of the two fathers, the insightful one provided with the means of purification purifies living beings by his magical power.
   Out of the dappled cow and the bull possessing good semen he has milked his blazing milk all the days.
4. This one here, the best artisan of the artisans of the gods, who begat the two world-halves beneficial to all, who measured out the two airy realms with a display of his good resolve, with unaging props—he has been universally praised.
5. While being sung, o great ones, you will establish great fame for us and lofty dominion, o Heaven and Earth, by which we will extend (our control) over the communities all the days. Jointly impel to us power worthy of wonder.

I.161 Ṛbhus

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
14 verses: jagatī 1–13, triṣṭubh 14

This is a difficult hymn, but one essential for understanding the Ṛbhus and their relation to the Third Pressing. Its narrative tells how the Ṛbhus attained immortality and entered among the gods—or seems to. This theme is stated in verse 2 and elaborated in verses 11–14. The Ṛbhus were priests who attained status as gods by their sacrificial performance. As gods they are worshiped in the Third Pressing, and therefore it is not surprising that the ritual acts by which they became gods are those of the Third Pressing. For a detailed discussion of these acts, see the discussion by Brereton (2012).

The hymn begins by reference to one of the great acts of the R̥bhus, their transformation of a single soma cup into four soma cups. This act signifies their divinization because the four cups represent four soma offerings to Indra and the three R̥bhus. A single cup would have restricted the soma offering only to Indra. The hymn opens with the R̥bhus' address to Agni, who has been sent by the gods. This dialogue takes place in the middle of the action, for apparently Agni has pointed to the camasá, the ritual soma cup, and the R̥bhus are concerned that Agni thinks that they have insulted this soma cup in some way (vs. 1). But Agni reaffirms the command of the gods that the R̥bhus create four cups out of this one, and he offers to make them gods (vs. 2). However, the R̥bhus reply that they have much more to do as priests before they themselves become the objects of worship. First, they need to make a horse. Elsewhere they fashion the two horses of Indra, and it is to this act that verse 3 likely refers. The making of these horses points toward the Hāriyojanagraha, an offering to Indra as he harnesses his horses to leave the ritual ground at the end of the Third Pressing (see also I.61–63, 82). Second, they need to make a chariot, which can represent the hymn or the whole ritual. Third, they need to make a milk-cow, which represents the already-pressed soma stalks, which are made to yield additional soma in the Third Pressing. And finally they need to make young two who are old. The two might be the sacrificer and his wife or another pair. Once the R̥bhus have accomplished all their great sacrificial deeds, then they will be worthy to follow Agni to heaven (vs. 3). Tvaṣṭar is introduced in verse 4 probably in connection with another rite in the Third Pressing in which the Wife of the Sacrificer receives indirect access to the soma. Verse 5 returns to the four cups and we now learn that Tvaṣṭar, who had originally made the one cup, is angry that the R̥bhus are modifying his creation. The R̥bhus protect themselves by taking on "other names." These "other names" may be their priestly offices, and by these names or priestly offices the "maiden" will rescue them. The hymn gives little clue to identity of the "maiden," but she may be Sarasvatī (cf. VI.49.7) or even Speech (Vāc) herself. In either case, the words that the R̥bhus master or the knowledge that they possess somehow protects them from the anger of Tvaṣṭar. Vs. 6 affirms that the R̥bhus did succeed in becoming gods and divine recipients of soma.

In verse 7 the hymn returns to the sacrificial acts that made them immortal: the soma-pressing (see vs. 10), the rejuvenation of the aging pair, the creation of a horse, and the harnessing of the chariot that is the sacrifice or the hymn. Verse 8 marks a return to a dialogue, now between the R̥bhus and the gods. According to Sāyaṇa, the "water" and the "rinse-water of muñja-reeds" that the gods offer the R̥bhus are the soma of the first two pressings. This interpretation is contextually justifiable, but such a denigration of these first two pressings is unlikely. Oldenberg suggests that the gods first offer the R̥bhus two inferior drinks and only then and finally the soma. If we take this approach, the first offering would be water, and the second might be a kind of faux-soma. The word múñja approximates mū́javant, the mountain from which the real soma comes, and therefore the "rinse-water of muñja-reeds" may represent an inferior approximation of soma. It is only the third time and in the third soma-pressing that the gods offer the Ṛbhus the real soma. Structurally verse 9 continues verse 8, since again three things are mentioned, of which the third is the best. However, it is difficult to say what the feminine noun described as vadharyántī "weapon-wielding" in pāda c might be, since the adjective is otherwise unattested. According to Sāyaṇa, it is either the earth or a line of clouds and its weapon is lightning. Along similar lines, Geldner suggests that it is the rainy season and again that its weapon is lightning. Interpreting vadharyántī slightly differently, Witzel and Gotō understand it as the axe (svádhiti) "serving as a weapon." We resolve the ellipsis by drawing its sense from the verb pra √brū "proclaim" in pāda c and the reference to spoken truths in pāda d. The first two Ṛbhus praise water and fire, which are essential to the sacrifice, but the third Ṛbhu recognizes true speech as the most essential element.

Verse 10 returns once again to the great sacrificial deeds of the Ṛbhus and this time especially to the soma that is prepared in the Third Pressing. In the Third Pressing soma stalks from the first two pressings are pressed again to yield additional soma. In verse 10 these stalks are the "lame cow"—lame because they have already been pressed—which are then soaked in water. The "carving" of the cow is the re-pressing of the stalks, and the dung is the now thoroughly mangled stems of the soma plant. The place of 10d is not clear. Whoever the "parents" may be, the "sons" are likely the Ṛbhus or the priests that they represent.

The last sequence of verses, 11–14, probably describes the ascent of the Ṛbhus to immortality, but even if this is correct, the details are obscure. At best we can point out a few possible identifications and a few possible interpretations. Agohya in verse 11 is probably the Sun as the "Unconcealable One," although he might also be Savitar. In I.110.2–3 the Ṛbhus' attainment of immortality is connected with Agohya, and if Agohya is the Sun, then perhaps one stage in the Ṛbhus' ascent is to the sun. The Sun governs the year, and therefore the "grass on the heights" may represent the summer pasturage, and "the waters in the valleys" the winter pasturage. In verse 13 the identification of the goat and the dog as the sun and moon is doubtful. It assumes that the bastá "goat" is ajá ekapád, "the one-footed goat," which elsewhere is the Sun. The identification of the moon as "the dog" follows Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa XI.1.5.1, in which the moon is called the heavenly dog. In the last verse, the gods move throughout the visible world seeking the Ṛbhus, but perhaps they do not find them because they have gone from the visible world.

1. [The Ṛbhus:] "Why has the best, why has the youngest one come here to us? For what messenger's duty does he speed? What is it that we have said?
   We have not insulted the cup with its great hollow. Brother Agni, we have spoken only of the excellence of the wooden (vessel)."

2. [Agni:] "'Make the one cup to be four'—that the gods said to you. For that I have come to you.
   Sons of Sudhanvan, if you will do thus, you will become worthy (recipients) of the sacrifice along with the gods."
3. When you replied to the messenger Agni, "A horse must be made, and a chariot also must be made here.
   A milk-cow must be made, and the two must be made young. When we have done these things, brother, we will follow you [=gods]."
4. Having done these things, Ṛbhus, you asked this: "Just where has he gone who came here to us as a messenger?"
   When he caught sight of the four cups that were made, just then Tvaṣṭar was anointed among the Wives (of the Gods).
5. When Tvaṣṭar said, "We shall smash those who have insulted the cup that gives drink to the gods"— they [=the Ṛbhus] make other names for themselves during the soma-pressing—by their other names the maiden will rescue them.
6. Indra has hitched up his two fallow bays, and the Aśvins their chariot. Bṛhaspati drove near (the cow) of all forms.
   You—Ṛbhu, Vibhvan, and Vāja—went to the gods. By your skillful work you came to a share in the sacrifice.
7. From the hide you made the cow to flow (milk) by your insights. You made those young who were the aging pair.
   O sons of Sudhanvan, you fashioned a horse from a horse, and having hitched up the chariot, you journeyed toward the gods.
8. [The Ṛbhus to the gods:] "You said, 'Drink this water, or drink this, the rinse-water of muñja-reeds.
   Sons of Sudhanvan, if you do not in any way find satisfaction in this, you shall find exhilaration in the Third Pressing rite.'"
9. One (Ṛbhu) said, "Waters are most important," and the other said, "Fire is most important."
   (The third) one proclaimed the weapon-wielding (speech?) from among the many. Speaking truths, you carved the cups.
10. One drives the lame cow down to the water. One carves the flesh, carried here with a basket.
    Up till sunset one bore away the dung. Have the parents given help to their sons?
11. You made grass for him on the heights and waters in the valleys by your skillful work, o men, when you slept in the house of Agohya: you do not continue that here today, o Ṛbhus.
12. When, having shut your eyes, you crept around the living worlds, where were your loving parents?

You cursed him who took your arm. Who made a declaration (to you), to him you also made a declaration.

13. After you slept, R̥bhus, you asked this: "Who awakened us here, o Agohya?"
The billy-goat [=the Sun?] said the dog [=the Moon?] was the awakener.
Here today, after a year, you opened your eyes.
14. The Maruts travel through heaven, Agni along the earth; the Wind here travels through the midspace;
Varuṇa travels through the waters and seas—seeking you, o sons of strength.

The following two hymns treat the Horse Sacrifice (Aśvamedha) and are the only absolutely clear reflections of this ritual in the R̥gveda.

I.162 Praise of a Horse (Aśvastuti)

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
22 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 3, 6

The first of the two Aśvamedha hymns focuses on the actual sacrifice, with an almost cinematic treatment of the proceedings and an unflinching look at the gory details. The hymn begins with the parading of the horse on the day of sacrifice: the year-long preliminaries in the classical Aśvamedha are not mentioned here, and it is not easy to tell how much elaboration accreted to this ritual in the post-R̥gvedic period—though it seems likely that the R̥gvedic version was a much simpler affair.

After an initial verse calling on an array of gods to bear witness to the celebration of the horse, there follow three verses (2–4) devoted to the goat that is led in front of the horse and that is itself sacrificed before the killing of the horse. The goat is the only sacrificial animal mentioned in the hymn besides the horse, in contrast to the classical version of the rite in which a multitude of wild and domestic animals are, at least theoretically, bound for sacrifice (and in general then released). In verses 5–6 a variety of priests (5) and minor ritual functionaries (6; see also the cooks in vs. 12) are mentioned—the priests being urged, somewhat shockingly, to "fill your bellies" on the sacrifice. This group of officiants seems to correspond on the human level to the gods assembled in verse 1, and all are thus implicated in the performance of the sacrifice, as are the poet himself and his fellow seers in verse 7.

The gaze then turns to the sacrifice proper (vss. 8–17) and to the equipment associated with the horse (vss. 8, 14, 16), the equipment for cooking the oblation (vs. 13), and, most dramatically, the physical evidence of the slaughter: the fly-blown flesh and the sticky blood and guts (vs. 9), the bloated belly and the smell of the butchered animal (vs. 10), the cooking juices running off the skewered beast on the fire (vs. 11). All of the mentioned paraphernalia and the gore are meant to accompany the horse itself to the gods. This section of the hymn gains much of its power from a dual focus: the gritty reality of an actual sacrifice competes with the reverential attitude to the victim, regularly addressed in the 2nd person—such that the horse is endowed almost with personhood while at the same time being dismembered, cooked, and consumed. For this reason, in 3rd-person contexts we use the pronouns "he, him, his" for the horse, rather than "it," et cetera: the poet will not allow us to objectify or neuter-ize the animal and requires us to come to terms with what "we" are doing to "him."

The description of the dismembering becomes more detailed beginning in verse 18, where the axe approaches the horse's ribs. Although this carving up logically precedes some of the sacrificial actions treated before—especially the cooking of the already butchered horse—there is a reason for its positioning here. We are entering the third and last part of the hymn, in which the horse is sent on his journey to the gods. The emphasis in these carving verses (18–20) is on the proper order of the cutting and the patterned positioning of the pieces of the horse, so that he can make its own way on his "undamaged" legs (vss. 18, 20). The pieces of the horse are arranged to re-form the actual body of the horse, and this reconstituted body is complemented by the lifebreath (ātman) that is also making the journey to the gods (vs. 20). The climax is reached in verse 21, where the horse is assured that he is not dead or injured and that his journey to the gods will be made easily, in company with the mounts of the gods. The hymn ends (vs. 22) with the hope that the sacrificed horse will bring us good things, and with an unemphatic prayer for our "guiltlessness," presumably because of the potential guilt associated with the killing of the horse.

To those who know the classical śrauta version of the Aśvamedha the most striking omission in this hymn is any mention of the sexual intercourse (or simulated intercourse) of the chief wife of the king and sacrificer with the just slaughtered horse. If our interpretation of X.86, the Vr̥ṣākapi hymn, is correct—that it is a burlesqued version of an Aśvamedha with a randy monkey as victim—the missing sexual element in our hymn here was omitted out of delicacy rather than being unknown to the R̥gveda.

1. Let not Mitra, Varuṇa, Aryaman, Āyu, Indra the lord of the R̥bhus, and the Maruts disregard us when we shall proclaim the heroic deeds of the prizewinning, god-born racehorse at the ritual distribution.
2. When they lead the gift [=goat] held fast in front of (the horse, which is) decked out with a fresh garment and with family treasure, facing well forward, constantly bleating, the goat, representing all forms, passes into the fold of Indra and Pūṣan.
3. This billy-goat, belonging to all the gods, is led in front, along with the prizewinning horse, as Pūṣan's portion.
   When (they lead the goat) as the pleasing fore-offering along with the steed, it is Tvaṣṭar himself who stimulates him for (the deed) that brings good fame.

4. When the sons of Manu lead around the horse to be offered three times along (the path) that goes to the gods in proper order, then the goat, Pūṣan's portion, goes first, announcing the sacrifice to the gods.
5. The Hotar, the Adhvaryu, the Expiator [?], the Fire-kindler, the Handler of the Pressing-stones, and the well-inspired Reciter—with this sacrifice, well prepared and well offered, fill your bellies.
6. The hewers of the sacrificial post and its conveyors, those who fashion the knob for the post for the horse, and those who assemble the equipment for cooking the steed—let the applause also of those urge us on.
7. (When) he went forth, at that same time my thought was produced—(when) the straight-backed (horse went forth) to the regions of the gods.
 The inspired seers cheer him on. We have made him well connected to the prospering of the gods.
8. The lead-rope of the prizewinner, the harness of the steed, the halter on his head and his bridle, and the grass brought up into his mouth—let all this of yours be also among the gods.
9. What of the horse's flesh a fly has eaten, or what is smeared on the sacrificial post or on the axe, what is on the hands of the Queller-priest and what on his nails—let all this of yours be also among the gods.
10. The contents of his belly that bloats up, the odor of his raw flesh—let the Queller-priests make that well-done and let them cook the ritual offering until it's cooked to readiness.
11. What runs down from your leg as it's being cooked by the fire when you have been impaled on the spit—let that not stick to the ground nor to the grasses; let it be given to the gods, who are eager for it.
12. Those who inspect the prizewinner when cooked and who say about him: "It smells good! Take it off (the fire)!"
 and those who draw near in hopes of a share of the meat of the steed—let the applause also of those urge us on.
13. The probe for the meat-cooking cauldron, the cups for the pouring of broth, the covers of the bowls that keep them warm, the hooks, and the baskets are in attendance around the horse.
14. (The gear) that made him set his stride, come to a halt, and turn aside, and the foot-fetter of the steed, and what he drank and what fodder he ate—let all this of yours be also among the gods.

15. Let the fire that smells of smoke not besmirch you; let the blazing hot cauldron not topple over.
    The one sacrificed, sought out, and greeted when the cry "vaṣaṭ" is made: that horse do the gods receive.
16. The mantel they spread out for the horse, the over-mantel, and the gold (trappings) that are for him, the harness, and the foot-fetter—(all these), his own dear things, hold the steed fast among the gods.
17. If, in riding you, anyone goaded (you) with his heel or with a whip, along with too much "come on, come on,"
    I make all these sweet for you with a sacred formulation, as (priests) sweeten them [=oblations?] by the ladling of the oblation at the rites.
18. The axe converges on the thirty-four ribs of the prizewinning horse, who has connection with the gods.
    Arrange his legs, undamaged, into patterns, and carve them up joint by joint, having called them out in order.
19. There is one carver of Tvaṣṭar's horse and two to hold him fast: such is the proper way.
    The (sacrificial portions) I make from your legs according to the proper order, just those lumps, one after the other, do I offer in the fire.
20. Let your own dear lifebreath not burn you as you go along; let the axe not bring the parts of your body to a standstill.
    Let a greedy man who is no carver, skipping steps, not make your legs damaged with a knife gone awry.
21. Truly in this way you do not die nor are you harmed: you go to the gods by paths easy to travel.
    The two fallow bays (of Indra) and the two dappled mares (of the Maruts) have become your yokemates. The prizewinning (horse) has taken his place at the chariot-pole of the (Aśvins') donkey.
22. (Let) the prizewinner (win) for us a mass of good cattle and good horses, male children, and all-prospering wealth.
    Let Aditi make guiltlessness for us. Let the horse, accompanied by our oblations, win sovereignty for us.

I.163 Praise of a Horse (Aśvastuti)

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
13 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn, the other one devoted to the Horse Sacrifice, is very different in tone, style, and intent from its predecessor, but they clearly form a pair. In fact, this hymn can be taken as the concrete fulfillment of the announcement in the first verse of the prior hymn (I.162.1): "...when we shall proclaim the heroic deeds of the...horse." That hymn did not itself actually accomplish this claim, for there was no real praise of the horse or what he did. But this hymn has all the trappings of a proper praise hymn. It begins with a number of verses (vss. 1–4) about the miraculous birth and mythic history of the horse and its cosmic connections and divine identifications.

In our opinion, the rest of the hymn concerns the horse's journey to heaven, the very journey presented also at the end of 162 (esp. vs. 21). But this is now no ordinary horse: he is now identified with the sun and described in exalted and enigmatic language. After a brief mention of the horse tackle in verse 5, the journey begins in verse 6. That the traveler is the sacrificed horse is strongly suggested by the language, which connects it to the horse's journey in 162: the poet mentally sees the lifebreath (ātman) as it flies, reminding us of the horse's lifebreath in 162.20, and this lifebreath as bird is moving on "paths easy to travel," the same phrase spoken reassuringly to the horse in 162.21. With the identification of the sacrificed horse with the sun-bird thus firmly established, the poet is free to elaborate and complicate his mental vision of the journey in the following verses (7–11), not all of which are entirely clear. The poet's vision also seems to identify the horse/sun-bird with poetic inspiration, in phraseology that is reminiscent of the "Pataṃga" hymn (X.177), where poetic inspiration takes the form of a bird.

As this lyrical passage comes toward its end, the figure of the horse reasserts itself, and the connections to 162 become stronger again. In the much-discussed verse 10, in our opinion the arrangement of the divine horses, compared to the V-shaped formation of geese in flight, refers to the divine mounts that accompany the sacrificed horse in 162.21. Verse 11 addresses the horse as it flies in the guise of the sun-bird, but we return to the real world of the sacrifice in verse 12, which in ring-compositional fashion picks up the procession of goat and horse to slaughter that began 162, reprising some of the language of that hymn as well (úpa prā́gāt "has gone forth" in 163.12–13 and 162.7; puró nīyate "is led in front" in 163.12 and 162.3). The summary verse (13) sends the horse on his way and again expresses hopes for a return on our sacrificial investment.

1. When you whinnied on first being born, rising from the sea or from the fertile soil,
 (having) the two wings of a falcon, the two forelegs of an antelope—your great birth was worthy of praise, o steed.
2. Trita yoked him, who had been given by Yama; Indra was the first to mount him;
 the Gandharva grasped his halter. O Vasus, you carved the horse out of the sun.
3. You are Yama; you are Āditya, o steed. You are Trita by reason of your hidden commandment.

You were separated all at once from Soma [=the moon?]. They say that you have three (kinship) bonds in heaven.

4. Three bonds they say you have in heaven, three in the waters, and three within the sea.
And you will appear to me like Varuṇa, o steed, (in the place [=sea]) where they say is your highest means of begetting.

5. Here are (the waters?) to rub you down, o prizewinner, and here places for the winner to set his hooves.
Here I saw your good halters, over which the herdsmen of the truth keep guard.

6. With my mind I recognized your lifebreath from afar, a bird flying below heaven.
I saw your winged head panting along the dustless paths easy to travel.

7. Here I saw your highest form, seeking to win refreshments in the track of the cow.
When the mortal attained the benefit from you, just after that the foremost devourer of plants [=Agni] awakened (you?).

8. The chariot (goes) after you, after you the dashing youth, o steed; after you the cows, after you the good fortune of maidens.
The troops have gone after your companionship. The gods have measured themselves against your heroic strength.

9. Having golden horns [=rays], his feet copper, swift as thought he was (an) Indra in the lower (realm).
The gods themselves came to eat the oblation of him, who first mounted the steed.

10. The heavenly chargers take their places like geese in formation—with the edges (of the formation) their legs, its middle hollow, its nose a hero [=the lead horse], when the horses have driven their heavenly drive.

11. Your body is flying, o steed; your perception is swooping like the wind.
Your horns [=rays], dispersed in many places, keep flickering in the wilderness.

12. The prizewinning steed has gone forth to slaughter, reflecting with a mind turned to the gods.
The goat, his umbilical kin, is led in front. The poets and singers come along behind.

13. The steed has gone forth to the highest seat, to his father and mother [=Heaven and Earth].
He should go to the gods today, for he is most pleasing (to them); then he expresses his hope for desirable things for the pious man.

I.164 All Gods (Riddle Hymn)

Dīrghatamas Aucathya
52 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 12, 15, 23, 29, 36, 41; prastārapaṅkti 42; anuṣṭubh 51

The Anukramaṇī assigns this hymn to a variety of gods: All the Gods (1–41), Speech (42a, 45), the Waters (42b), Dung-smoke (43a), Soma (43b), Agni, Sūrya, Vāyu (44), Sūrya (46, 47), the Wheel of the Seasons (48), Sarasvatī (49), the Sādhyas (50), Sūrya or Parjanya or Agni (51), Sarasvant or Sūrya (52). Such diversity creates the impression that this hymn is a fairly loose assemblage, although its thematic and structural programs indicate that the hymn, or the bulk of it, constitutes a coherent composition. Among the more recent and significant studies of the hymn are those of Brown (1968) and Houben (2000), which also discuss older interpretations and upon which we have drawn extensively and gratefully.

The hymn has continued to attract scholarly attention in part because it has continued to escape satisfying interpretation. One reason is that the hymn was composed to be enigmatic, to be never fully decipherable. But even if we will never be able to solve all its puzzles, we can appreciate how it functions as an enigma and perhaps why. Since the hymn makes both implicit and explicit reference to Vedic ritual, including rites other than the soma ritual, one way into the hymn is through its connections to ritual. Even though the later ritual application of R̥gvedic hymns is not always a reliable guide to their original ritual contexts, it offers a place to start. According to Aitareya Āraṇyaka V.3.2, verses 1–41 are part of the Vaiśvadevaśastra, a recitation at the midday offerings of the Mahāvrata ceremony, and Śāṅkhāyana Āraṇyaka II.18 places the whole of the hymn in the Mahāvrata rite. This Mahāvrata rite is a variation of the Agniṣṭoma soma ritual that was performed on the next to last day of the year-long Gavāmayana rite. It may well be that the application of the hymn in the Mahāvrata rite is secondary (Houben 2000: 502), since there is no explicit reference to the Mahāvrata in the hymn and, for such a long hymn, little even to the soma sacrifice more generally. But there is a thematic connection between this hymn and the Mahāvrata. According to Kauṣītakī Brāhmaṇa XIX.3, the Mahāvrata fell on the winter solstice. Whatever else I.164 may be about, much of it concerns the sun in one way or another (e.g., vss. 2, 7, 8, 10, 11, 14, 25, 33, 44, 46, 48). The winter solstice, when the sun has halted its southward movement and is about to turn northward, would be a natural time to consider the sun and its appearance and therefore may provide the seasonal context for the hymn.

A second ritual context for the hymn is the Pravargya rite, which is an offering of heated milk and ghee to the Aśvins. In the classical Agniṣṭoma soma ritual, the Pravargya was performed twice daily on the three days leading up the soma-pressing day; originally, however, it may have been a rite independent of the soma ritual. The śrautasūtras (cf. van Buitenen 1968: 93, 96–98) prescribe the recitation of verses 26–28, 31 (=X.177.3), and 49 in the Pravargya, and at least verses 26–29 refer directly to the Pravargya rite. Thus, as Houben (2000) has demonstrated, significant parts of this hymn are concerned with the Pravargya.

These two rituals, the Mahāvrata and the Pravargya, have one thing in common: they are the principal subjects of Āraṇyaka texts. The Āraṇyakas or "forest" books are later Vedic works that explored rituals and the interpretations of rituals thought to be too dangerous to be taught within the village. The R̥gvedic Āraṇyakas concern especially the Mahāvrata rite, and the Yajurvedic Āraṇyakas, the Pravargya. In our view this hymn was not primarily composed for recitation in a particular rite, although to be sure some of its mantras were ritually employed. Rather, this poem is an early example of Āraṇyaka-like interpretation. Its function is to disclose the meaning of the rites, particularly the Mahāvrata and Pravargya rites. It might seem odd that a R̥gvedic hymn could anticipate the later Āraṇyaka literature. However, according to the Śāṅkhāyana Gr̥hya Sūtra II.11.13, once a student has learned the saṃhitā, his teacher may guide him though the rahasya, the secret teaching, which the sūtra defines as the Āraṇyaka (cf. Oldenberg 1888: 291). Even if, as Oldenberg (293) argues, study of the rahasya meant the recitation of the mantras of the Mahāvrata, not study of the interpretation of the rite, the sūtra still points toward a direct pathway between the R̥gveda and the study that eventually came to constitute the R̥gvedic Āraṇyakas.

Key to grasping the meaning of the ritual is understanding the links between ritual acts and both the cosmos and the person. The complexity of the hymn derives especially from the multiplicity of reference of its verses, which connect ritual, cosmos, and person. Thus, the verses frequently refer simultaneously to the ritual (adhiyajñam) and to the world (adhidevatam), especially to the sun, and sometimes also to the human body or the human being (adhyātmam). There is no unproblematic verse in this hymn, but as an example, consider the possibilities of the first verse. Lines abc of that verse describe three brothers: the gray Hotar, the ravenous middle brother, and the brother with ghee-smeared back. Scholars have offered a variety of identifications for the brothers: the sun, wind, and fire (Sāyaṇa); the Āhavanīya or offering fire, the Dakṣiṇa or southern fire, and the Gārhapatya or household fire (Geldner); the original form of Agni, lightning, and the terrestrial Agni (Brown); and the sun, lightning, and the fire heating the Pravargya pot (Houben). It is likely that ancient hearers of the hymn made not one but several of these sets of identifications. In our view the verse has both a ritual (adhiyajñam) and a cosmic (adhidevatam) meaning. On the one hand, the three brothers can be a triad of ritual fires—either the three that Geldner sees or perhaps three phases of the sacrificial fire (gray embers, flaming fire, and fire flaring as it receives ghee). But they can also be a triad of cosmic fires (perhaps the sun, moon, and earthly fire, which correspond to the three ritual fires, or another of the identifications proposed above). In 1d the clanlord and his seven sons refer primarily to the sacrificer and the seven priests (cf. II.1.2). But the sacrificer might also be embodied in the Sun and the seven priests in Agni, or the clanlord might be the Sun and his seven sons, the stars of the constellation of the Seven Seers, Ursa Major. We will never know which of these or what other interpretations the poet intended, but it is likely that the verse operates on several levels that connect ritual and cosmos.

The brief exegetical possibilities we have provided in the translation at best suggest primary referents, even though other secondary identifications may also be implied. So, for example, verses 2 and 3 move back and forth between adhiyajñam and adhidevatam meanings. The "seven" in 2a appear to be the "seven" of 1d, who are primarily priests (an adhiyajñam interpretation). However, the "single wheel" in 2a suggests the sun (adhidevatam) more than the ritual fire. This interpretation is supported by verse 48, since there the single wheel is the disk of the sun, which is drawn by the "single horse," Etaśa, the horse that pulls the Sun's chariot. In verse 3 the poet foregrounds ritual referents: the seven may again be priests, and, as is often the case, the chariot has now become a symbol of the sacrifice itself.

Another characteristic of this hymn, and another reason for its obscurity, is its frequent use of word play. The poet favors words that are not etymologically or semantically related but that sound as if they ought to be. For example, in verse 13d sanā́d "from of old" is echoed by sánābhiḥ "along with its nave" and in 14a sánemi "along with its felly." Or again, in 14a ví vāvr̥ta "has turned away" anticipates 14c ā́vr̥tam "covered over." In verse 5 ajá "unborn" can also mean "goat," and therefore can suggest Aja Ekapad, the "One-Footed Goat," a symbol of the Sun. According to Thieme (1987: 338), the poet even uses an implied homophone in verse 16. The stars of the constellation called "the Kr̥ttikās" are envisioned as women. The word for "women" in pāda a is stríyaḥ from the stem strī́. There is also a closely homophonous masculine stem stŕ̥ "star," which does not occur in the verse but which would have been known to its hearers. The poet is saying that although the Kr̥ttikās are strī́ "women," people call its constituents stŕ̥ "stars," and therefore they speak of those Kr̥ttikās, even though they are women, as masculine "stars." As the verse concludes, only a poet who a master of words would understand this, and a poet who does understand it becomes even greater than his father, who would likely have been his teacher.

Thematic continuities and repeated use of similar poetic devices help unify the hymn. The hymn is also unified by its recursive structure created by parallelisms in its beginning and conclusion. For example, the poet speaks of the One (éka) in verse 6 and again toward the end of the hymn, in verse 46. In verse 6 that which is the "One" assumes the form of the Sun. At the other end of the poem, in verse 46, the One reappears and, through speech, takes the form not only of the Sun, but also of Agni, of Mātariśvan (the fire-bringer), and of other deities as well. Verses 7cd and 47 (as well as verse 51) describe the course of the waters upward by means of the rays of the sun and then downward as rain. Verses 2–3 and verse 48 describe the Sun's chariot and especially its single wheel. The final verses, 49–52, form an independent recursive unit. Verses 49 and 52 concern respectively the feminine Sarasvatī, the river goddess, and the masculine Sarasvant, who is Agni and the Sun according to 52ab. The linkage of fire and water or sun and rain is a constant throughout the hymn. It is reasserted in the verses fitted between those to Sarasvatī and Sarasvant. Verse 51 describes the cycle of the water to heaven and then back down to earth and the correspondence between the sacrificial fire that invigorates the gods in heaven and the rain that invigorates the earth. Verse 50, which is quoted from X.90.16, refers to the cycle of the sacrifice, which like the water cycle operates between heaven and earth. The sacrifice has its origins in heaven, but it is now performed on earth and directed back toward heaven. Such formal devices help maintain a sense of coherence in a hymn that covers substantial ritual and thematic territory.

We do not propose to discuss the verses of the hymn in detail, but we do want to provide some additional information and to illustrate especially the movement in this hymn between different levels of meaning. Verse 8 refers to the story of Dawn's incest with her father, who is sometimes the Sun and sometimes Heaven. Depending on which of the two is her father—and either is possible in this verse—Dawn's child might be the Sun or Agni, the ritual fire. Verse 14 describes the movement of the Sun, but here it is its movement at night, when its bright side is turned away from earth and it moves from the west to the east. Verse 15 continues the description of the night (cf. Thieme 1987). The seven who are born at the same time might be the seven stars of the constellation of the Seven Seers. Of these stars six are paired (15b) and one is single (η Ursae Majoris).

In verses 20–22 is the famous riddle of the tree that has continued to remain a puzzle. The two birds have been interpreted as the waxing and waning moon (Thieme 1949: 55–73) the moon and the sun (Kuiper 1970: 127–28), the sun and the gharma pot (Houben 2000: 520–22), and two seekers of knowledge (Geldner). Whatever the birds may be, the verse ultimately concerns the acquisition of knowledge or inspiration, the "sweet fig" (vs. 22) at the top of the tree. Given the enigmatic character of this hymn, it is not surprising that this knowledge remains out of reach. Following the riddle of the two birds are three verses (23–25) that present the development of ritual speech that perhaps embodies the knowledge represented in the "sweet fig." According to verse 23 gāyatrī, triṣṭubh, and jagatī lines are extracted from hymns composed in the gāyatrī, triṣṭubh, and jagatī meters. That is to say, the shorter constituent, the poetic line, is drawn from the larger, the whole poem. But then verse 24 begins with the gāyatrī line, which is the basis for the "chant" (arká), the hymn that is sung, and the chant is the basis of the "melody" (sā́man) on which many verses may be sung. If so, then this verse begins with the shortest constituent, the line, from which develop the longer songs and chants. Similarly, the triṣṭubh line is the basis for longer recitations, śastras in the later tradition. The reason that the verse divides the chant and the recitation between the gāyatrī and triṣṭubh lines is that the eight-syllable gāyatrī line could be used as the basis for chants in the R̥gvedic tradition, while the eleven-syllable triṣṭubh line was used in recitations. Thus in lines ab, reversing verse 23, the shorter (the chanted or recited line) is the basis for the longer (the chant or recitation). This order is continued in c, which moves from individual lines to the complete recitation. In d the shortest constituent of all, the syllable, is the basis for the largest constituent, everything that is chanted or recited by the seven priests. This movement from long (the composed hymn) to short (the poetic line) to long (chants and recitations), and finally from shortest (the syllable) to longest (everything chanted or recited) knits together the entirety of ritual speech and ultimately concentrates it in the syllable. As such, these two verses anticipate verse 46, in which the "One" is the basis for many names. Verse 25 also presents the smallest constituent as the basis for the larger. According to it the gāyatrī stanza is the foundation for the longer jagatī stanza and the rathantara chant. The gāyatrī verse is the basis of the jagatī, because the jagatī verse has twice the number of syllables as a gāyatrī (48 and 24 respectively). It is the basis of the rathantara chant because the rathantara melody is set to VII.32.22–23, verses in bṛhatī and satobṛhatī meters. Verses in these two meters are combinations of jagatī and gāyatrī lines. The gāyatrī is thus the foundation of both the jagatī and rathantara and as such surpasses both of them.

The theme of inspired Speech (Vāc) is taken up again in verses 36–42. It is introduced in verses 36 and 37, in which the poet shifts attention to ancient *ṛ́ṣi*s "seers," whose "insights" and "thought" are brought into the present by poet. However, the poet does not understand his own inspiration (vs. 37), which is finally a gift of the gods or, more specifically, a gift of Agni. According to verses 39–42, this inspired Speech descends to the human realm like water in order to sustain life on earth. While the emphasis in these verses is on Speech as a cosmic principle and human possession, a specific ritual reference is also not far away. As Geldner observes, verse 40 accompanies I.164.26–27 in Atharvaveda Śaunaka 7.73, a hymn to the gharma drink of the Pravargya rite.

In verses 26–29 the hymn focuses on the Pravargya rite. Verse 26 begins with the cow, whose milk will be the offering, and then describes the heating of the gharma pot, into which milk will be poured. In 27a the gharma pot makes a sound hiṅ as it is heated, and because it contains milk, the pot now becomes the cow. Her calf is probably Agni, an identification supported by 28ab, which can describe a pot placed on the fire. In verse 29 the meaning of the cow has shifted again, and she is now the milk "enclosed" within the gharma pot. When milk is poured into the heated pot, a pillar of flame erupts in what is the most dramatic visual moment in the entire soma rite as now performed. In 29cd the milk or the cow thus becomes lightning, exploding upward from the pot. Although the reference to the Pravargya rite is less obvious in verse 30, the verse may refer to the boiling ghee in the gharma pot to which the milk is added (Houben 2000: 510) and therefore to an earlier stage of the ritual than does verse 29. Houben's interpretation of verse 30 is partly based on the observation that verse 31 is the mantra prescribed by the śrautasūtras for the rite of heating and gazing at the gharma pot, which also belongs to an earlier stage of the ritual. Houben may be correct in seeing a reference to the Pravargya rite, but both verses 30 and 31 are also open to additional interpretations. For example, the "herdsman" in 31a could be the breath (cf. Geldner; also Houben 2000: 508–9) or the Sun (Sāyaṇa) or both.

Similarly, Houben (2000: 523) also explains verse 43 as reflecting the Pravargya rite. He understands the "dung-smoke" to be smoke from the fire fueled by horse dung that is used to fumigate the gharma pot. The "dappled bullock" could then be the mixture of milk and ghee that is heated in the gharma pot. But again, this verse can be more than a description of the Pravargya. The "first foundations" (pāda d) should refer not just to the beginning of a particular ritual performance, but to the institution of the sacrifice (cf. X.90), and therefore point to an additional interpretation that locates the form and origin of the sacrifice in the cosmos. The "midpoint" (viṣūvánt) can refer to the Viṣūvant day (as in I.84.10), the summer solstice, which is the ritual midpoint of a year-long sattra ceremony. This suggests that the fire beyond the earthly fire is the sun, perhaps wrapped in cloud, the "dung-smoke," since the solstice should occur around the beginning of the rainy season. The sun can also be the "bullock," which is "dappled" because of clouds or sunspots. The "heroes" can be priests, but they may also be gods, who are gathered around the sun. All these ritual and macrocosmic interpretations are not exclusive since, according to the Āraṇyakas and Brāhmaṇas, the heated gharma pot can represent the sun (e.g., KauB VIII.3, TĀ V.8–9).

In verse 33 the Sun is the likely speaker, although Geldner's idea that the speaker is the Wind and Breath would maintain the dual reference to cosmos and person. The imagery of these verses appears again in verse 38, in which the subject of lines ab may be the breath (Geldner) or the Sun. The image of the birth of an embryo in verse 33 leads to verses 34–35, which speak of "the navel of the living world" and the "seed" or semen of the horse. These two verses form a brahmodya, a ritual exchange of question and answer, in the Horse Sacrifice (ĀśvŚS X.1–3, ŚāṅkhŚS XVI.6.5–6). The verses are appropriate to the Horse Sacrifice and may have been adopted into this hymn from that sacrifice. Here the verses continue the reference to heaven and earth and to the sacrifice, which becomes the image of the world.

1. This treasured one, the gray Hotar—his middle brother is the ravenous one;
   his third brother is the one with ghee-smeared back. In him I saw the clanlord with his seven sons.
2. The seven harness the chariot with a single wheel [=the Sun]. A single horse with seven names draws it.
   Triple-naved [=with three seasons?] is the unaging, unassailable wheel, on which all these living beings rest.
3. As its seven horses, the seven [=the priests] who stand upon this chariot [=the sacrifice] draw the seven-wheeled (chariot).
   Seven sisters [=voices of the priests] together cry out (the words) in which the seven names of the cows [=poetic speech] are imprinted.
4. Who has seen the first one [=the Sun/Agni] as he is being born, when his boneless (mother) [=the Waters?] carries the one having bones [=the one who is a living being]?
   Where is the life, blood, and breath of the earth? Who will approach the knowing one to ask this?

5. Naïve, not understanding, in my mind I ask about these imprinted tracks of the gods.
   Upon the full-grown calf [=the fire] the poets have stretched the seven warp-threads (of the sacrifice) in order to weave.
6. Unperceptive, I ask also the perceptive poets about this in order to know, since I am unknowing:
   What also is the One in the form of the Unborn [=the Sun] that has propped apart these six realms (of heaven and earth)?
7. Let him speak here, who knows the imprinted track of this treasured bird [=the Sun].
   The cows [=rain clouds] yield milk [=rain] from his head [=the Sun]. Clothing themselves in a cloak, they have drunk water with the foot [=the Sun's rays].
8. The mother [=Dawn] gave her father [=the Sun/Heaven] a share in the truth, for in the beginning, through her insight, she united (with him) by her mind.
   Recoiling, she whose essence was her child [=Agni/the Sun] was pierced (by her father). Just those offering their reverence went to the (morning) invocation.
9. The mother was harnessed to the yoke-pole of the sacrificial reward; her child stood up amid the penned cows.
   The calf [=Agni] bellowed and looked toward the cow of every color [=Dawn], three wagon-treks (in the distance).
10. Carrying three mothers [=earths] and three fathers [=heavens] alone, he [=the Sun] stands upright: they do not cause him to weary.
    On the back of yonder heaven they [=the gods] recite the speech that knows everything but does not inspire everyone.
11. Twelve-spoked, the wheel of truth [=the Sun] ever rolls around heaven—yet not to old age.
    Upon it, o Agni, stand seven hundred twenty sons in pairs [=the nights and days of the year].
12. They speak of the father [=the Moon] with five feet [=the seasons] and twelve forms [=the months], the overflowing one in the upper half of heaven.
    But these others speak of the far-gazing one [=the Sun] in the nearer (half) fixed on (the chariot) with seven wheels [=the Sun, Moon, and visible planets] and six spokes [=the seasons, in a different reckoning].
13. In the five-spoked wheel [=the year] that rolls round—on that do all living beings take their stand.
    Its axle does not become hot, though its load is heavy. From of old it, along with its nave, does not break apart.

14. Along with its felly, the unaging wheel [=the night Sun] has turned away. Harnessed to the outstretched (yoke-pole) [=the airy realm?], ten (horses) draw it.
Covered over, the eye of the Sun moves through the airy realm. All living beings are fixed upon it.
15. They speak of the seventh of those who are born at the same time as the one born alone, saying, “the twins, the Seers born of the gods, are only six.”
What (places) are desired by these [=the Seven Seers] are distributed according to their spheres. While (the one) [=the pole star] stands still, the ones varied in appearance [=the stars of the Seven Seers] quiver.
16. Though they [=the Kr̥ttikās, the Pleiades] are women, yet they speak of them as men to me. He who has eyes sees; the blind man does not differentiate.
One who is a poet, a (poet’s) son, perceives them. One who recognizes these (women), he will be the father of his father.
17. Below the upper (realm), above the lower here [=at the horizon], the cow [=Dawn] carrying her calf [=the Sun] has stood up by her foot.
In which direction is she? Toward which side did she go away? Where does she give birth, for it is not within the fold?
18. Below the upper (realm), above the lower here is he [=the Sun] who knows his father.
Showing himself to be a poet, who will proclaim this here: from whence has divine thought been born?
19. What (chariots [=sacrifices?] come) this way—they say that those (will go) away; what (chariots go) away—they say that those (will come) this way.
O Soma and Indra, (the deeds) that you two have done, these draw (those chariots) like (horses) harnessed to the yoke-pole of the airy realm.
20. Two well-feathered (birds), yokemates and companions, embrace the same tree.
Of those two the one eats the sweet fig; the other, not eating, keeps watch.
21. Where the well-feathered (birds), never blinking, cry out for a share of immortality and for the ritual distributions, here the forceful herdsman of the whole living world, the insightful one, has entered me, the naïve one.
22. Just that tree on which all the honey-eating, well-feathered ones settle and give birth, they say, has the sweet fig at its top. He who does not know the father will not reach up to that.

23. How the gāyatrī (track) [=gāyatrī line] is based upon a gāyatrī (hymn) or how a triṣṭubh (track) [=triṣṭubh line] was fashioned out of a triṣṭubh (hymn), or how the jagat track [=jagatī line] is based on the jagat [=jagatī] (hymn)—only those who know this have reached immortality.
24. By the gāyatrī (track) [=line] one measures the chant; by the chant the melody; by the triṣṭubh (track) [=line] (one measures) the recitation;
    by the two-footed and the four-footed recitation the (full) recitation. By the syllable the seven voices assume their measure.
25. By the jagat [=jagatī] (stanza) he buttressed the river in heaven; in the rathantara (chant), he watched over the Sun.
    They say that there are three kindling sticks [=three lines in a gāyatrī stanza] belonging to the gāyatrī (stanza). By its greatness it [=the gāyatrī stanza] has passed beyond those in greatness.
26. I summon this milk-cow giving good milk, and the deft-handed milker will milk her.
    Savitar will impel the most excellent impetus in us. The gharma pot has been heated: this shall I proclaim.
27. Making the sound hiṅ, the goods-mistress of goods, seeking her calf, has come near through (my) thinking.
    Let this inviolable cow give milk to the Aśvins. Let her increase for our great good fortune.
28. The cow bellowed after her blinking calf. She made the sound hiṅ against his head (for him) to bellow.
    Lowing toward his hot jaw, she bellows her bellow and swells her swell of milk.
29. This hums—that by which the cow is enclosed. She bellows her bellow, resting upon the smoky (fire).
    Because she has put down (what is) mortal with the sound "chit-chit," becoming lightning, she pushed away her covering.
30. Breathing, life rests (though remaining) on its headlong course, stirring (though) steadfast in the midst of the dwelling places.
    The living one keeps moving by the will of the dead one; the immortal one shares the same womb with the mortal one.
31. I saw the herdsman who never settles down, roaming here and afar along his paths.
    Clothing himself in those that converge and diverge, he moves back and forth among living beings.
32. He who created him does not know him. He is far away from him who has seen him.
    He is surrounded within the womb of his mother. Having many offspring, he has entered into destruction.

33. [The Sun:] "My father, my progenitor, is Heaven; here is my navel. My mother, this great Earth, is my relation.
My womb is within the two open cups [=Heaven and Earth]. Here my father placed the child [=the Sun] of his daughter [=Dawn]."
34. I ask you about the farthest end of the earth. I ask where is the navel of the living world.
I ask you about the seed of the bull(-like) horse. I ask about the highest heaven of speech.
35. This altar here is the farthest end of the earth. This sacrifice here is the navel of the living world.
This soma here is the seed of the bull(-like) horse. This formulator here is the highest heaven of speech.
36. The seven children of the (two world-)halves [=the Seven Seers], the seed of the living world, take their place by the direction of Viṣṇu in the spreading expanse.
By their insights and their thought these encompassing perceivers of inspired words encompass (everything) everywhere.
37. I do not understand what sort of thing I am here: though bound, I roam about in secret by my thinking.
When the first-born of truth [=Agni] has come to me, only then do I attain a share of this speech here.
38. He goes inward and outward, controlled by his own will—he, the immortal one of the same womb as the mortal one.
Those two are ever going apart in different directions. They observe the one; they do not observe the other.
39. The syllable of the verse, upon which all the gods have settled, is in the highest heaven—he who does not know that (syllable), what will he accomplish by his verse? Only those who know it sit together here.
40. Because you would become blessed, feeding upon good pasturage, so then we would also be blessed.
Feed on grass always, o inviolable cow [=Speech]! Coming here, drink pure water!
41. The buffalo-cow [=Speech] has bellowed, fashioning oceans. One-footed and two-footed, she is four-footed, having become eight-footed and nine-footed: she has a thousand syllables in the highest heaven.
42. Seas flow everywhere from her: by that the four directions live, from that the syllable flows, upon that does everything live.
43. At the midpoint, beyond this nearer (fire), I saw dung-smoke from afar.
Heroes cooked the dappled bullock. These were the first foundations (of the rite).

44. Three long-haired ones gaze out in succession: in a year one [=Agni] of them shears away (the land) for himself;
 another [=the Sun] gazes upon everything with his powers; the rush of another [=Wind] is visible, but not his form.
45. Speech is measured in four feet [/quarters]. Brahmins of inspired thinking know these.
 They do not set in motion the three that are imprinted in secret; the sons of Manu speak the fourth (foot/quarter) of speech.
46. They say it is Indra, Mitra, Varuṇa, and Agni, and also it is the winged, well-feathered (bird) of heaven [=the Sun].
 Though it is One, inspired poets speak of it in many ways. They say it is Agni, Yama, and Mātariśvan.
47. Along the dark course, tawny well-feathered (birds) [=flames], clothing themselves in the waters, fly up toward heaven.
 These have returned here (as rain) from the seat of truth [=heaven]. Only then is the earth moistened with ghee.
48. The chariot-wheel (of the Sun) is one, its wheel-segments are twelve, its wheel-naves are three: who understands this?
 They [=the days] that wander on and on are fitted together on that, like three hundred pegs, like sixty (more).
49. Your breast, which is ever full, which is joy itself, by which you make all desirable things prosper, which confers treasure and finds wealth, which brings good gifts—o Sarasvatī, you prepare that to suckle us here.
50. With the sacrifice the gods performed the sacrifice: these were the first foundations.
 These, its greatnesses, followed to heaven's vault, where the ancient Sādhyas and the gods are.
51. This water remains the same: it goes up and down throughout the days.
 Thunderstorms vivify the earth, and fires vivify heaven.
52. The heavenly well-feathered, lofty bird, child of the waters, and beautiful (child) of the plants, the one bringing satisfaction by the rains from what is bounded by waters: Sarasvant!—him do I call upon again and again for help.

The last collection of hymns in the first maṇḍala, I.165–191, is attributed to Agastya, who according to later tradition was the son of Mitra and Varuṇa and of the Apsaras Urvaśī. Several times in his hymns, however, Agastya refers to himself as Mānya, the son of Māna (e.g., I.165.14–15, 177.5, 184.4). The collection opens with hymns to the Maruts or to Indra and the Maruts (165–173) and hymns to Indra (174–178). Somewhat oddly placed after these is a hymn that takes the form of a dialogue between Agastya and his wife Lopāmudrā (179). Next are hymns to the Aśvins (180–184), followed by a series of single hymns, first hymns to Heaven and Earth (185) and to the All Gods (186), then a praise of food (187), an Āprī hymn (188) and an Agni hymn (189), a hymn to Bṛhaspati (190), and the concluding hymn of the first maṇḍala, a charm against poisonous animals (191). Like the collection of Dīrghatamas, the Agastya hymns thus form an unusual sequence.

Also like the Dīrghatamas hymns, the Agastya hymns are stylistically creative, especially in his hymns to Indra and the Maruts. He uses puns and verbal play (e.g., 167), suppression of key words and ambiguous reference (171, 174), intricate similes and unexpected turns of phrase (168, 169), syntactic innovation (168, 173, 174), and striking imagery (173, 176). This lively and difficult poetry marks Agastya as one of the great masters of the Ṛgvedic tradition. He is best known for three hymns, 165, 170, and 171, which together describe how Indra and the Maruts argued over a sacrifice offered by Agastya and were finally reconciled with one another, and for his dialogue with Lopāmudrā (179), which turns on the tension between the ascetic ideal and the responsibility to continue the family lineage. But both the set of Indra and Marut hymns and the dialogue with Lopāmudrā also concern questions of ritual innovation that define Agastya not only as a great poet but also as a significant figure in the development of Vedic ritual practice.

In all but six of his hymns Agastya concludes with his signature pāda vidyā́meṣáṃ vṛjánaṃ jīrádānum "May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters." Also 165–168 share the same final verse, as do 175 and 176, and 183 and 184.

I.165 Indra and the Maruts

Indra (1, 2, 4, 6, 8, 10–12), the Maruts (3, 5, 7, 9), and Agastya (13–15)
15 verses: triṣṭubh

Ṛgveda I.165, 170, and 171 together tell a story in which Indra and the Maruts argue over their rights to a sacrifice offered by the sage Agastya. In the absence of a full, contemporary narrative, it is difficult to reconstruct the events of this story. Apparently Agastya's sacrifice was originally intended for the Maruts. Indra arrived at the place of the sacrifice first, however, and complained that nothing was being given to him (170). Agastya, frightened by the god (cf. 171.4), then gave the sacrifice to Indra. At this point the Maruts arrived expecting that the sacrifice would be offered to them. Agastya tried to appease the Maruts (171), who were understandably angry that the sacrifice had gone to Indra. Indra and the Maruts then confront one another (165), and each side asserts its power and worthiness to receive the sacrifice. Ultimately, however, the Maruts concede Indra's superiority (165.9), and Indra and the Maruts become reconciled with one another (vs. 11) and share the sacrifice. At the very end of the hymn the poet states one of the reasons that he recalls this story: he hopes to be reconciled to the gods, just as the Maruts were reconciled to Indra.

Stanley Insler has proposed the attractive theory that this group of hymns forms a small Aindramāruta epic, whose purpose was to justify a ritual change that occurred during the time of the poet. In the classical Vedic ritual the Midday Pressing is dedicated to Indra along with the Maruts, but for much of the core R̥gveda the Midday Pressing belongs to Indra alone. This narrative tells how the Maruts also came to share the soma along with Indra.

In verse 9d we read kariṣyā́ḥ with Oldenberg and others, and in verse 15c we read 'vayā́m, also with Oldenberg.

1. [Indra:] With what beauty have the Maruts—all of the same age, all of the same nest—joined altogether?
   With what thought? From where have these antelopes come? With a desire for good things (these) bulls chant explosively.
2. In whose sacred formulations have the youths found delight? Who turned the Maruts here to the rite, (thinking,) "By what great thought shall we bring them to rest, soaring like falcons in the midspace?"
3. [Leader of the Maruts:] Why do you travel alone, Indra, although you are great, o lord of the settlements? Is this proper for you?
   Confronting us, are you going to negotiate with us beautiful ones? You should tell us what you have for us, o master of the fallow bays.
4. [Indra:] The formulations, the thoughts, the pressed soma are good fortune for me. My explosive power rises; the pressing-stone is brought forth to me.
   The hymns hope for, receive me joyfully. These two fallow bays carry us here to them.
5. [Leader of the Maruts:] For this reason, yoking (our chariots) with nearer (horses) that guide themselves and making our bodies beautiful, we now yoke antelopes also (as our lead team) by our great powers, for you have experienced our independent will, Indra.
6. [Indra:] Where was this independent will of yours, Maruts, when you tasked me alone to smash the serpent?
   For I, the powerful and mighty, possessed of might, humbled with my weapons those of every rival.
7. [Leader of the Maruts:] You did many things when we were there, with our united manly powers (ready) to be deployed, o bull;
   we shall do many things in accordance with your purpose, o most powerful Indra, when we, o fellow Maruts, shall wish it.
8. [Indra:] O Maruts, I smashed Vr̥tra with my Indrian strength, having become mighty through my own rage.
   Bearing my mace in my arms, I made these all-gleaming waters go easily to Manu.

9. [Leader of the Maruts:] This is conceded to you, generous one: There is no one like you known among the gods.
   Neither one who is born nor one who was born will attain you. What *you will do, do!—o you who are grown fully strong.
10. [Indra:] Even if I am alone, let my force be far ranging (to do) what in my daring I shall now do according to my inspired thinking, for I am known as the powerful one, Maruts. What things I shall set in motion, just I, Indra, am master of these.
11. The praise song here has exhilarated me, o Maruts, the formulation worthy to be heard that you created for me, o men—for me, (who am) Indra, the bull and strong combatant—for (me), your companion as my companions, for me myself by you yourselves.
12. It is just so: Reflecting me here and receiving fame and refreshments as my irreproachable (warrior band), you, who are to be seen all around with your shimmering colors, have pleased me, and you will please me now, o Maruts.
13. [Narrator:] Now who has given liberally to you here, Maruts? Journey forth to your companions here, o companions!
   Knowing our thoughts intimately, o you shimmering ones, be aware of these, my truths.
14. [Indra:] Since the praise poet will here offer friendship (to you) as if to his friend, (and since) the wisdom of the son of Māna [=Agastya] has brought us here, turn here to the inspired poet, o Maruts. The singer chants these formulations for you.
15. [Narrator:] This is your praise song, Maruts—this song of the praise poet Māndārya, son of Māna.
   With his refreshing offering he would beg *reconciliation (with you) for himself. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.166 Maruts

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 14–15

Many of the usual Marut themes are present in this hymn: the awesome and terrifying power of the thunderstorm (vss. 4–6), their glittering bedecked bodies and chariots (vss. 9–11), their aid to pious men (vss. 2–3, 7–8), their role as singers for their comrade Indra (vss. 7, 11). Although the order of elements seems somewhat random, these praises are set within a tight frame. Verse 1 begins “we shall proclaim their greatness,” which is echoed exactly by verse 12 “this is your greatness”: the promised proclamation has reached its end. Verse 13 is similarly structured, beginning "this is your kinship. . . ," and the final verse (14) before the refrain sets forth what the poet wishes from the Maruts.

Punctuating the hymn is an awareness of the balance between their past glories and benevolence and the ones of the present day (see esp. vss. 1, 8, 13), and the model of their previous generosity to sacrificers is given embodiment in verse 13, where Manu's offering of poetry induces the Maruts to appear to him with their favors.

1. We shall now proclaim this to the overpowering race—proclaim their previous greatness to the beacon of the bull.
   As if through kindling on your course, you powerfully noisy Maruts, as if in battle, produce your powers, o able ones.
2. Holding their honey close like their own son, the playful ones play, eager at the rites.
   The Rudras [=Maruts] approach the reverent man with help; the self-powerful ones do not neglect the maker of oblations.
3. To whom the immortal helpers have given riches and prosperity—to the man who does pious service with the oblation—for him the Maruts, like (steeds) spurred on, sprinkle the many realms with milk—they are joy itself.
4. Of you who with your powers enveloped the realms—your spontaneous dashes swooped forth.
   All creatures and habitations take fright. Brilliant is your course when your spears have been extended.
5. When the manly ones of turbulent course make the mountains roar, or have stirred the back of heaven, every tree takes fright at your drive; every plant bends forward as if driving a chariot.
6. You, mighty Maruts, you invulnerable band—with kind attention deliver us to your benevolence.
   Where your missile with its gory teeth scrapes (a path), mightily it liquefies (the trees) as a well-placed (goad) sets the livestock flowing.
7. (The Maruts) whose generosity is (as steady as) a pillar, whose gifts are not withdrawn, the restless ones, well-praised at the rites—they chant forth the chant for the drinking of the exhilarating (soma); they know the foremost manly deeds of the hero [=Indra].
8. With your strongholds with a hundred coils, o Maruts, guard that man from crookedness and evil whom you (previously) aided, whom you (now) protect from (evil) utterance amid the flourishing of his descendants, you mighty, powerful ones who confer abundance.
9. All good things are set on your chariots, Maruts—like powers competing with each other.

On your shoulders, in the vanguard, are spangles; your axle turns the wheels separately but at the same time.

10. Many good things are on your manly arms, on your breasts brilliants, dazzling ornaments, on your shoulders antelope (skins), on your wheel-rims razors. Like birds their wings, your splendors have spread out.
11. Great by their greatness, extending, extensive, visible from afar like the heavenly (realms) with their stars, gladdening, good with their tongues, sounding with their mouths, the Maruts, linked to Indra, encircling him with their rhythm.
12. This is your greatness, o well-born Maruts: your gift is long(-lasting), like the commandment of Aditi.
    For the person of good action to whom you gave it, not even Indra makes it go awry through dereliction.
13. This is your kinship to the earlier generation, o Maruts, that as immortals you many times favored its laud.
    By reason of this poetic insight (of Manu's), having favored his attentive hearing, the superior men [=Maruts] showed themselves to Manu all at once through their wondrous deeds.
14. The abundance stemming from you, o powerful Maruts—through which we shall stay powerfully swollen for a long time, toward which the people in the community will stretch out—to that might I attain, *to my desire, with these sacrifices.
15. Here is a praise for you, o Maruts, here a hymn from Māndārya, the respectful bard.
    With refreshment he would beg propitiation for himself. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.167 Maruts (except Indra 1)

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: triṣṭubh

A particularly fine example of Agastya's poetic skill. The first few verses invite first Indra (vs. 1) and then the Maruts (vs. 2) to come to us; the last few verses (8–10) before the refrain (vs. 11) celebrate the massive strength of the Maruts (vss. 8cd–9), and again express the hope that Indra and the Maruts will stand by us (vs. 10), with a curious detour through the topic of the Ādityas' protective powers (vs. 8ab).

But the heart of the hymn (vss. 3–7) is devoted to the Maruts' relationship with their consort Rodasī, whose name is identical, save for accent, with the dual referring to the "two world-halves" (rodasī́ versus ródasī, though the latter can also sometimes be used for Rodasī). The verses are marked by what in Classical Sanskrit poetry would be called śleṣa ("punning"), and the tone is curiously mixed: Rodasī is both extravagantly praised and at the same time scornfully compared to a loose woman, with those two incompatible attitudes conveyed in the same words. (Unfortunately, the understated deftness of these verbal plays is overwhelmed by our necessarily labored and clumsy explanations.) For example, in verse 3 Rodasī is compared to a young woman running after men by going to the public gaming hall, but also compared to fine ceremonial speech appropriate to a public occasion. The same word (sabhā́vatī) is used both for her shameful appearance in the public hall and her role as speech honored in public. In verse 4 the word sādhāraṇyā́ "common" is used both of the Maruts' joint cherishing of Rodasī and in a simile comparing her to a whore. (This kind of verbal condemnation of a polyandrous woman is familiar in later Sanskrit in the taunts sometimes directed to the noble Draupadī, wife of the five Pāṇḍavas in the Mahābhārata.) A complex pun in the second half of verse 4 plays with the partial identity of Rodasī and the two world-halves; the grammatical aspects of this pun cannot be treated here. Despite the somewhat slighting treatment in the similes of verses 3–4, Rodasī takes on the role of bride in verses 5–6 by mounting the nuptial chariot like the mythological model of the bride, Sūryā. This depiction of ceremonial marriage provides a transition to the ritual here-and-now (vss. 6cd–7), where not only the Maruts, but also Rodasī along with the Wives of the Gods, appear at our ritual.

1. A thousand are your forms of help to us, o Indra, a thousand your most welcomed refreshments, o possessor of the fallow bays, a thousand your riches, to exhilarate us. Let your thousandfold prizes come near to us.
2. Let the Maruts, masters of artifice, drive hither to us with their help, or with their preeminent, heaven-lofty (riches?), even when they, while furthest away, are running their teams on the far shore of the sea—
3. (The Maruts), to whom (Rodasī) has been joined, positioned well, up close to them like their own spear—she ghee-rich, garbed in gold, roving in secret, like a young woman going to men when she's bound for the public hall [/provided with a public forum] like ceremonial speech.
4. Away (went) the resplendent, irrepressible Maruts in their flood; they joined (with her) in common, as if with a common (whore).
   The fearsome ones did not push Rodasī away as they did push the two world-halves apart. The gods took pleasure in strengthening (her/them), for companionship.
5. If it please her ladyship to accompany them—Rodasī with unloosened braid had her mind set on the men—like Sūryā she mounts the chariot of the one who does honor, she whose face is turbulent like the approach of a cloud.
6. The youths caused the young woman to mount for beauty, she steadfast and commingling (with them) at the ceremonies.
   When the chant is accompanied by oblations for you, o Maruts, and the one who has pressed soma, seeking friendship, sings the song,

7. I proclaim what of theirs is worthy of proclamation, that the greatness of the Maruts is truly present, when in company with them, her mind set on the bulls, she, self-reliant and firm, brings with her the well-portioned Wives (of the Gods).
8. Mitra and Varuṇa (and Aryaman) protect from the unspeakable (fault); Aryaman makes the unlaudable (men) atone.
   And the unstirrable fixed things stir, (when) your wish-granting (flock) has grown strong, o Maruts.
9. For they have not reached the limit of your swelling strength, o Maruts, nearby to us nor even in the distance.
   These (Maruts), swollen with bold swelling strength, have boldly hemmed in hatred like a flood.
10. Might we today, might we tomorrow call ourselves dearest to Indra in the competition,
   (as) we (did) before, and let this be a great thing for us through the days: let the R̥bhu-ruling (flock) consisting of (these) superior men [=Maruts] stay by us.
11. Here is a praise for you, Maruts, here a hymn from Māndārya, the respectful bard.
   With refreshment he would beg propitiation for himself. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.168 Maruts

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8–10

After an appeal to the Maruts from the poet-sacrificer (vs. 1), the hymn settles down with gusto to a description of the Maruts as thunderstorm, a description executed with all of Agastya's artistry. It is rich with elaborate and trickily constructed similes and with striking images and jarring turns of phrase. For the latter, consider the first simile in verse 2: "self-produced like fissures." Neither the contents of the simile itself nor its application to the Maruts is immediately clear, but on further reflection the "self-produced fissures" call to mind earthquakes and their sudden and unpredictable power to open fissures in the ground, and this image seems an apt comparandum with the Maruts and their impetuous exercise of their power. Agastya plays with syntax, too, as in 5b where the verb "quiver" is used transitively in the frame of the simile and intransitively in the simile itself. In fact, in this hymn Agastya seems to want to deploy as many different types of structurally and conceptually twisted images as he can (the technical details of all of which we cannot treat here).

The theme throughout is that, although the Maruts display great violence in their stormy onslaught, the result is the welcome and fructifying rain (see most clearly vs. 7). This theme is nicely expressed in 3cd, which juxtaposes and combines the warlike and the peaceful: a spear compared to a woman (see also the previous hymn, 167.3), and dagger and bangle placed together in their hands, a pairing emphasized by their phonological similarity: khādíś ca kr̥tíś ca.

1. With sacrifice after sacrifice to you (performed always) in the same way (am I) victorious. Thought after thought have you received, as they travel to you, the gods.
   With well-twisted (hymns) might I turn you our direction, for the welfare of the two world-halves, for great help.
2. They who, self-produced like fissures, self-strong, were born to refreshment, to sun(light)—the shakers—numbering in thousands like the waves of the waters, to be extolled [/*bound?] by the mouth like cows, like oxen.
3. They who, like soma drinks, pressed when their stalks are satiated, once they have been drunk, sit in the hearts like friends—on their shoulders (a spear) clings tight like a clinging woman; in their hands both bangle and dagger are placed together.
4. Self-yoked, (their horses) have driven down from heaven at will. Spur (them) on with your own breath, (as if) with a whip, you immortals.
   Dustless, powerfully born, the Maruts with their glinting spears make even the fixed places stir.
5. O you Maruts with lightning as your spears, who is the one among you who sets (the fixed places) to quivering by your own breath, like someone with his tongue quivering between his jaws?
   (You) who stir up the wastelands on your journey as if stirring refreshments [=rain], who propel many, like Etaśa [=Sun's horse] on his daily round.
6. Where is the farther (part) of this great dusky realm, where the closer (part), o Maruts, in which you have driven?
   When you stir up the firmly compacted entity like loose pieces, you fly through the turbulent flood with a stone.
7. Violent like your winning yet bringing sun(light), turbulent yet ripening and swelling, o Maruts—your gift [=rain] is welcome like the ritual gift-cow of a donor, and it is of broad expanse and scintillating like lordly (Rodasī).
8. The rivers sound in response to your wheel-rims, when they raise up the speech coming from the (storm) clouds.
   The lightning-flashes smile down on the earth, when the Maruts sprinkle ghee upon her.
9. Pr̥śni gave birth to the turbulent face of the unruly Maruts for great joy [/battle].
   They, in shared delight, begat the formless (cloud) mass. Just after that they surveyed their vigorous self-power.

10. Here is a praise for you, Maruts, here a hymn from Māndārya, the respectful bard.
With refreshment he would beg propitiation for himself. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.169 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh, except virāj 2

The subject of this hymn is the tense ritual standoff and negotiated settlement between Indra and the Maruts—who both came to Agastya's sacrifice expecting it as exclusive offering—a situation also depicted in I.170–171 and the great dialogue hymn I.165. Although the Anukramaṇī names Indra as sole dedicand, the Maruts appear in every verse but 4 (though not by name in 6); however, Indra is the only god addressed—in fact, a vocative indra and a form of the 2nd singular pronoun appear in each of the first six verses and in the last one (8)—while the Maruts are always in the 3rd person. There is thus a definite imbalance in their roles.

The poet begins by flattering Indra and suggesting that he is superior to the Maruts, but soon implies that the Maruts are getting ahead (vs. 2), and cooperation is suggested (vss. 1ab, 3). In the middle verses (4–5) the poet begs Indra for wealth in the sacrificial context (as shown by the priestly gift cow in verse 4), and this sets the stage for the reconciliation between Indra and the Maruts on the sacrificial ground (vss. 6–7). In the final verse Indra is urged to join with the Maruts in giving us wealth, and is promised in return that he will be praised by the gods, that is, by the Maruts, who, however, will also receive praise—from the poet-sacrificers.

Not surprisingly, since Agastya is the poet, the hymn is full of intriguing difficulties and studied similes, such as the superficially puzzling maxim in the second half of verse 3, which turns on the paradox of waters producing dry land (by silting up the channel?).

1. Indra, you are the one who goes (before) even the great one [=Marut flock] as it *drives; you are the defender even from great dereliction.
O ritual adept, as observant one win the favors of the Maruts for us, for they [=favors] are dearest to you.
2. They have hitched themselves up, Indra—your (Maruts), who know as their own the tributes stemming from all communities among mortals.
The battle-thrust of the Maruts is racing ahead in the winning of the prize-contest whose reward is the sun.
3. This spear of yours has been fixed among us, Indra; the Maruts speed the formless (cloud) mass, with all its gear.
For even a fire blazing in the brushwood can produce pleasurable offerings, as waters do an island.

4. You, Indra—give us wealth, like a present in the form of a most formidable priestly gift cow.
   And the praises that will be enjoyable to you and to Vāyu will swell with victory-prizes, as (priestly gift cows) swell their breast of honey.
5. In you, Indra, are most overflowing riches, the leaders of whoever seeks the truth.
   Let the Maruts have mercy upon us, the gods who up till now have provided the way, as it were.
6. Drive forth toward the men who grant rewards [=Maruts], Indra. Take your place on the earthly seat of the great one [=Marut flock], now when their wide-striding antelopes have come to a standstill, like the manly forces of a stranger at a ford.
7. The trampling of the antelopes of the fearsome, irrepressible Maruts is heard opposite as they come here, those who fly with their helpers in swarms to the mortal who seeks battles, as if to a debtor.
8. You, Indra, along with the Maruts—for the Mānas dig out proliferating riches, tipped with cows, destined for all men.
   You will be praised, o god, by the gods [=Maruts] (also) being praised.
   – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.170 Indra

Indra (1, 3), Agastya (2, 5), Indra or Agastya (4)
5 verses: bṛhatī 1, anuṣṭubh 2–4, triṣṭubh 5

For this hymn see the introduction to I.165. This hymn is the opening of the story, in which Indra confronts Agastya, who has prepared an offering for the Maruts rather than for him. Indra asks Agastya if there is really is to be nothing for him and how can one understand how such a thing could happen (1ab)! Indra warns Agastya that he may be able to fool someone else with promises of future offerings, but he cannot deceive or deny Indra (1cd). In fear, Agastya tries to convince Indra that he should not take the offerings intended for the Maruts, since they are his warriors, but rather come to some sort of accommodation with them (2). But Indra insists and accuses Agastya of ignoring him altogether (3). Agastya quickly capitulates and orders the sacrifice to be readied for Indra (4), but he still hopes that Indra will come to an agreement with Maruts to share the offering (5).

Curious is the use of the 1st dual verb tanavāvahai "we two shall extend (the sacrifice)" in verse 4, for it is unclear who the second subject, besides Agastya, would be. It might perhaps be Indra, taking an active role in his own sacrifice, but we suggest rather that it is Agastya's wife Lopāmudrā, who is his ritual partner in I.179.

1. [Indra:] Now is there nothing? And tomorrow nothing? Who understands this (nothing), which is unmistakable (to me)?
   The thought of another can be bewitched and what he expected is lost.
2. [Agastya:] Are you going to strike us down, Indra? The Maruts are your brothers.
   Make a proper arrangement with them. Do not strike us down in your confrontation (with them).
3. [Indra:] If you are our companion, brother Agastya, why do you overlook us?
   For we understand what your thinking is: it is only to us that you do not wish to give.
4. [Agastya:] Let them ready the altar. Let them kindle the fire in front (of it).
   The appearance of the immortal (soma will be) there. We two shall extend the sacrifice for you.
5. You are the master of good things, o lord of goods. You are the foremost institutor of alliances, o lord of alliances.
   O Indra, come to an agreement with the Maruts, and then eat the oblations in the proper ritual order.

I.171 Maruts (1–2) and Indra and the Maruts (3–6)

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

For this hymn see the introduction to I.165. In this episode Agastya pleads with the Maruts to reconcile themselves with Indra and with him. He first addresses the Maruts (1–4) and then turns to Indra himself (5–6). In verse 4 Agastya explains to the Maruts that Indra terrified him and although the offerings were prepared for them, Agastya was forced to give them away to Indra. Then he addresses Indra and asks that Indra together with the Maruts prosper the "sons of Māna." Māna is Agastya's father, and therefore Agastya is seeking prosperity for his extended family. In verse 6 he pleads with the god not to attack the Maruts, who are his own men (6a), for ultimately Indra will be even greater because of his alliance with the Maruts (6cd).

In 5a usrā́ḥ "ruddy" primarily describes the dawns, but it could also modify the "sons of Māna." This ambiguity associates the luster of the dawns with the luster that Agastya wishes for his family. The ruddy color of the dawns is also the characteristic color of cattle and further suggests that the luster of the sons of Māna will be based in their wealth of cattle.

1. [Agastya:] I come before you with this, my reverence. With my hymn I beg the favor of you overpowering ones.

Through your generosity and knowing ways, o Maruts, put aside your anger! Unhitch your horses!

2. Fashioned by my heart and mind, this praise song with my reverence is set in place for you, o Maruts, o gods.
   Being pleased in mind, travel here to it, for you are those growing strong by just (such) reverence.
3. Praised, let the Maruts have mercy on us, and praised, let the generous one [=Indra] (have mercy)!—he who is the greatest good luck.
   Let our carved [?] wooden (cups) stand upright throughout all (our) days, o Maruts, in accordance with our desire to win.
4. (Then was) I retreating from this mighty one, Maruts, trembling from fear of Indra.
   These oblations (of soma) were sharpened for you, but we have sent them away. Have mercy upon us!
5. (The fame) by which the sons of Māna will shine with power during the ruddy (dawns), at the dawning of the ever-constant (dawns)— grant (that) fame to us, o bull!—You together with the Maruts, you the mighty one together with the mighty ones, you the enduring one giving strength.
6. O Indra, protect your men from the stronger one [=Indra]. Be one whose anger with the Maruts is appeased, establishing yourself as the strong one through (the Maruts) bearing their good signs. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.172 Maruts

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
3 verses: gāyatrī

A brief and simple pendant to Agastya's Indra/Marut cycle. The Maruts as bringers of rain are celebrated as sudā́nu "having good drops" (vss. 1–3), an epithet that can also mean "having good gifts." The poet asks that the negative aspects of the thunderstorm stay far away from him and his people.

1. Bright be your course, bright with your help, o Maruts rich in drops, who gleam like snakes.
2. In the distance be your straight-aiming arrow, you Maruts rich in drops, in the distance the stone that you hurl.
3. Avoid the clans of Tr̥ṇaskanda ("Grasshopper"), you rich in drops.
   Set us upright, to live.

I.173 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
13 verses: triṣṭubh

The opening of the hymn (vss. 1–4) depicts the beginning of a sacrifice, as the priests assemble and raise the song of praise and the other features of the sacrifice take their places. The expectation of Indra's arrival and enjoyment of the sacrifice ends verse 4. The next three verses (5–7) constitute a formal praise of Indra, with a lovely image (vs. 6) of the god dressed in all the parts of the cosmos. These three verses, especially verse 7, also depict Indra as a feisty combatant whom competing forces wish to have on their side; the striking image in 7ab is of a tug-of-war. In the next verses (8–9) we redouble our efforts to secure him for our sacrifice. Verse 10 reprises the theme of Indra as the focus of competing factions, in a very dense and complex set of images, while verse 11 expresses the ritualists' belief that a properly performed sacrifice will bring Indra here, however long it takes. The meandering route of the sacrifice in that verse is replicated in form by the meandering syntax. Verse 12 is a thematic departure, as well as a return to the rivalry of Indra and the Maruts over Agastya's sacrifice; here the poet once again offers sacrifice to both parties. The hymn ends (vs. 13) with a familiar type of summary verse, with internal reference to the poem that is ending.

As a product of Agastya, this hymn poses many verbal puzzles and provides many verbal rewards.

1. He sings the sāman bursting out like (the song of) a bird; we chant this (chant) that is growing strong, bringing the sun.
   The cows, the milkers, the undeceivable ones are on the ritual grass, so that they will entice here the one whose seat is in heaven.
2. The bull chants along with the bulls whose sweat is an oblation, like a ravenous wild beast, when he would out-sing (them).
   The exuberant Hotar sings forth his zeal. The young blood, deserving the sacrifice, supports the pair (of priests).
3. The Hotar approaches, circling around the fixed seats (of the sacrificial beasts). He bears the embryo of the earth through the years.
   The horse neighs while being led; the cow bellows. Speech wanders between the two worlds like a messenger.
4. We have done these more attainable *deeds [=ritual activities] for him. Those seeking the gods carry the actions further.
   He will enjoy them—Indra of wondrous luster, coming easily like the Nāsatyas, standing upon his chariot.
5. Praise this Indra, who is the "real thing," who is a champion, who is a benefactor, standing upon his chariot.
   More combative even than his opponent, provided with bulls, he's the one who smashes apart even the enveloping darkness.
6. Since he stands out from (other) superior men in just this way by his greatness, the two worlds befit him, like belts.

Indra has enwrapped himself in the earth, like a circlet. The autonomous one wears heaven like a headdress.

7. O champion, you who are the choice of those who are in battle, you most in the vanguard, you who are to be yanked around (by the opposing sides)— to Indra do they of one accord (direct?) their battle-cries in exhilaration, they who applaud you also as patron by reason of your victory prizes.
8. Thus, because the soma-pressings in the sea [=mixing of soma with water] are luck for you, when the waters, the goddesses, reach exhilaration among these (cows) [=mixing with milk] for you, every cow will yield to you to be enjoyed, if you pursue the people, also the patrons, with holy fervor—
9. So that we shall be in good fellowship with him and through him possess good dominance, as if through the lauds of men—so that Indra will be there for us, standing upon our praise, leading our hymns, like a powerful one (leading) the work [/ritual performance].
10. The contenders—(crying) "Indra with mace in hand will be ours!"—seeking (the one in) the middle [=Indra], try to win him over with their sacrifices, as those seeking an ally, (approaching) a lord of strongholds in regard to his good command, (try to win him over) with lauds of men.
11. For any sacrifice that reaches fulfillment, even though it swerves along, meandering in mind, brings Indra to the house, as if bringing a thirsting man to a ford—as a long road brings home a man who reaches his goal.
12. Don't (involve?) us here in your battles with the gods [=Maruts], o Indra. For there is propitiation for you, tempestuous one, from the one offering oblations, whose song in its flood also extols the great Maruts, who grant rewards.
13. This praise for you, Indra, is in us. With it you will find the way to us, you of the fallow bays.
You should turn us here to good faring, o god. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.174 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

Another hymn bursting with Agastya's tricks, here especially in the realm of daring syntax and deliberate omission of key words. The hymn celebrates Indra's great deeds, especially his victories over multiple named and unnamed opponents. Allusions to the Vṛtra myth and the release of the waters recur throughout the hymn (vss. 2, 3, 9), though the name Vṛtra is mentioned only once (vs. 2). The first verse urges Indra to "guard the gods," and he appears in that role as protector of Agni and his ritual activities (vs. 3) and enforcer of the norms of Ārya society, as embodied in the three principal Ādityas (vs. 6). Others who break the Ārya social contrast—the impious, the godless, the speakers of scorn, and the breakers of alliances (vss. 2, 6, 7, 8)—also fall victim to Indra as enforcer. Thus, though the tone is martial, the message is moral.

Two separate devices structure the hymn. On the one hand, the vocative indra (always to be read trisyllabically) appears in the first pāda of every verse immediately after the caesura. On the other hand, there is ring composition: the first and last (10) verses name Indra as "giver of victorious power" and "protector of men," while verse 2 has numerous echoes in verses 7–9.

1. You are king, Indra: guard those who are gods and the superior men; protect us, lordly one.
   You, as lord of settlements, are our surpassing benefactor, you the real possessor of goods and giver of victorious power.
2. You subdued the clans whose speech was scornful, Indra, when you split the seven autumnal strongholds, their shelter.
   You set the flooding waters in motion, faultless one. You made Vṛtra subject to the youth Purukutsa.
3. Drive the troops whose lord is a champion [=you], Indra, and (those [=Maruts?]) with whom now (you gain?) heaven, much invoked one.
   Guard insatiable Agni going in triumph; like a lion, (guard) his labors in the house at dawn.
4. They [=enemies] will lie now in the same womb, Indra, for the glorification of your metal-edged weapon in its greatness.
   When by battle he sent the floods, the cows surging downward, he mounted his two fallow bays; boldly he swiped the battle-prizes.
5. Convey Kutsa, Indra, in whom you take pleasure. Eager for the halter are the two silvery horses of the Wind.
   Then tear off the wheel of the Sun at the moment of encounter. Mace in hand, he will charge the opponents.
6. Once you had smashed those who rout their allies, and had smashed the impious when you were strengthened by the stimulant, o Indra of the fallow bays,
   those who saw before them Aryaman in company with these two [=Mitra and Varuṇa], they were shattered by you, taking their progeny along.
7. The sage poet [=Uśanā Kāvya?] murmured, o Indra, at the winning of the chants [/(sun's) rays]: "He has made the earth a pillow for the Dāsa.
   The bounteous one will make the three (worlds?) bright with drops; he has embedded in a woeful womb the one who speaks evil in scorn."

8. These are your old (deeds), Indra; new ones have come: you overpowered and exploded the many (strongholds) for the lack of joy [/end of battle] (of the godless).
   You split the godless (clans) into pieces, like strongholds; you bowed the weapon of the godless reviler.
9. You, the tumultuous one, Indra, set the tumultuous waters in motion, flowing like streams.
   When you will cross the sea, o champion, make Turvaśa and Yadu cross to well-being.
10. You, Indra, should be at all times our man-protector of men, who best keeps the wolf away and giver of victorious power over all our contenders. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.175 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: anuṣṭubh, except skhandogrīvī 1, triṣṭubh 6

The shorter compass of dimeter meter (vss. 1–5) seems to cramp Agastya's style somewhat. The most obvious device in this hymn is the relentless repetition of forms derived from a very few roots: mad "become exhilarated" (vss. 1, 2, 5), sah "be victorious" (vss. 2–3), san/sā "win" (vss. 1, 2, 3, 5). These three roots create an inescapable poetic logic of cause (exhilaration) and effect (conquer [enemies] and win [prizes]), but the effect is still rather clumsy.

Verse 4 stands out as the exception, as it contains no forms of any of the signature roots, and it compresses within it a whole mythological complex: the stealing of the wheel of the Sun, and the involvement of Kutsa, the horses of the Wind, and, by implication, Uśanā Kāvya in that obscure story—a myth also alluded to in the preceding hymn (I.174.5, 7, as well as often elsewhere, e.g., I.130.9).

One other feature is worthy of note: the image in verse 3cd, of Indra "firing" the Dasyu like a piece of pottery.

1. Become exhilarated: might has been drunk by you, like the cup's exhilarating exhilaration, you of the fallow bays.
   The bullish drop is for you the bull, the drop that is the competitor that best wins thousands.
2. Let it come here to us—your exhilarating bullish exhilaration worthy to be chosen, possessing victorious power, winning, victorious in battle, immortal.
3. For you are a champion, a winner; you impel the chariot of Manu.
   Possessing victorious power, you fire the Dasyu who follows no commandment, like a cup with flame.

4. Steal the wheel from the Sun, o poet, showing mastery with your strength.
   Convey Kutsa, bane for Śuṣṇa, with the horses of the Wind.
5. For most unbridled is your exhilaration and most brilliant your resolve.
   By reason of (the exhilaration?) that smashes Vṛtra and (the resolve?) that finds wide space, might you be thought the best winner of horses.
6. Just as for the previous singers, Indra, you became like joy, like waters for the thirsty,
   (so) I keep invoking you according to the formal invocation [/nivid].
   – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.176 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

Though also in dimeter meter, this hymn displays an exuberance that the previous one (I.175) lacks. Both hymns begin with the same imperative (mátsi "become exhilarated") and end with the same verse (6), but in this hymn the soma drop is generally the addressee, urged to mastermind Indra's great actions, and especially to help Indra destroy his, and our, enemies. The language is lively and the images unclichéd; note for example verse 2cd, where the scattering of power is likened to the sowing of seed in furrows just plowed by a bull.

1. Become exhilarated, to seek betterment for us. O drop, as bull, enter Indra.
   Showing your mettle, you drive the rival; you do not find a rival facing (you).
2. Make the hymns enter into him, who is sole (king) of the domains, following whom autonomous power is strewn, like grain whenever a bull is plowing,
3. In whose hands are all the goods of the five settlements.
   Cause our deceiver to be spied out. Like a heavenly missile, smash him.
4. Smash anyone who doesn't press soma, anyone difficult to get at who is no joy to you.
   Give his possessions to us, even though he will laud himself as a patron.
5. You aided (him,) the doubly exalted (Indra), so that the ridge-frequenter [=soma] will be his at the chants.
   In the contest, o drop, you helped Indra's prize-seeker to the prizes.
6. Just as for the previous singers, Indra, you became like joy, like waters for the thirsty,
   (so) I keep invoking you according to the formal invocation [/nivid].
   – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.177 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Bloomfield (1916: 155) remarks of this hymn, "[It] is certainly late clap-trap. The jingly use of stems vṛ́ṣan and vṛṣabhá furnishes its main claim to attention. All its repeated pādas are suspect." Although we moderns might tend to be less outspoken, this is certainly one of Agastya's lesser efforts. The standard tropes of invitation to the sacrifice (vs. 1ab), journey (vss. 1cd–3), and arrival (vs. 4) are presented without complexity, and with a certain recycling of vocabulary—not only the "bull" words scornfully noted by Bloomfield, but also "right up here" (arvā́ṅ vss. 1, 2, 5), "one such as me" (madrík vss. 1, 3), and the usual lexicon of the journey. The only really notable feature of the hymn is the first half verse, which uses a number of different terms to situate Indra in relation to the human populations, while implicitly asking him to choose us as his destination among these populations.

1. Here (let) the bull of the peoples, filling the domains, the king of the communities, much-invoked Indra (come).
   Praised, seeking fame, having hitched up the two bullish fallow bays, drive right up to one such as me with help.
2. Your bullish bulls, Indra, which are yoked by sacred formulations, the steeds provided with a bullish chariot—mount them; with them drive right up here. We invoke you, Indra, when the soma is pressed.
3. Mount the bullish chariot. The bullish soma is pressed for you, the honeyed drinks poured forth.
   Having hitched up, with the two bulls, o bull of the settlements, with the two fallow bays, drive on an easy slope up to one such as me.
4. Here is the sacrifice, proceeding to the gods; here is the ritual meal, here the sacred formulations, here the soma, Indra.
   The ritual grass is strewn. Drive forth toward it here, able one. Drink, having sat down on it. Unharness your two fallow bays here.
5. Well-praised, drive right here, Indra, up to the sacred formulations of the bard of Māna's lineage.
   May we know through your aid, as we sing at dawn… – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.178 Indra

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
5 verses: triṣṭubh

One might fancifully suggest that all the difficulties that were stripped out of the immediately preceding hymn (I.177) to produce that elementary composition have been piled into this one, which has a number of intractable problems in grammar (see especially the plural verb with apparent dual subject in verse 2b) and interpretation. Nonetheless, the overall intent of the hymn is clear.

In the first two verses the poet asserts the usual relationship between mortal praise and divine aid. Indra gives his attention to the current poet as he did to previous ones, it is hoped, and therefore should fulfill our desire. The content of this desire is expressed in an obscure phrase, "all things around the waters of Āyu," which has been explained by Paul Thieme (1949: 41 n. 2) as the territories that can be inhabited by men because water is available. Verse 2 more or less repeats the sentiments: Indra will surely not deprive us, and he will surely come to our sacrifice. The question is what Indra will not deprive us of: the grammatical difficulties of pāda b alluded to above add to the interpretational puzzle. If the two sisters here are Night and Dawn, as most scholars believe, it is presumably whatever these two temporal entities (treated as plural, not dual, because they consist of many days and nights?) produce in the progress of time. The sisters could also be the two hands (treated as plural because each consists of five fingers). The waters make another appearance in this verse, with no more clarity than in verse 1.

The next verse (3), which is the center of the hymn, predicates of Indra (in agent nouns difficult to render literally) an array of roles in which he gives aid to mortals, and the final two verses (4–5), beginning with a summary evā́ "even so, in the same way," urge Indra to fulfill some of these roles.

1. Since, Indra, the same attentive hearing of yours still exists by reason of which you stood by the (previous) singers with your help, don't let our wish that magnifies (you) come up short. Might I attain all things of yours (that are) around the waters of Āyu.
2. King Indra will not cheat us (of those things) that the two sisters [=Dawn and Night? hands?] will make in their own womb.
   The easily goaded waters also toiled for him. Indra will come to our fellowship and vitality.
3. Indra, champion in battles, is the one who conquers with his superior men, the one who hears the call of the bard crying in distress, the one who brings the chariot of the pious man to the fore (when he is) nearby, and the one who raises up the songs, if he is there in person.
4. Even so, (let) Indra with his superior men, with a desire for good fame, the devourer of strengthening nourishment, overcome the allies.
   He will be praised in the competition for refreshment and at the debate—as the one active in every way, as the (very) laud of the sacrificer.
5. With you, bounteous Indra, may we overcome our rivals who think themselves mighty.
   You be our rescuer and be for our strengthening. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.179 Agastya and Lopāmudrā [Anukramaṇī: Rati "Delight"]

Lopāmudrā 1–2, Agastya 3–4, student 5–6 (so the Anukramaṇī)
6 verses: triṣṭubh, except br̥hatī 5

This justly famous and memorable hymn compresses much matter in a few verses. The first four verses consist of a dialogue between the seer Agastya, the poet of this hymn cycle (I.165–191), and his wife Lopāmudrā. It concerns, and contains in embryo, a persistent theme in Indian religious literature and thought, the competing and incompatible goals of male religious figures: ascetic practice and the production of sons, and it also presents the figure who mediates these goals: the sexually eager woman who seduces the ascetic, who can thus attain the second goal without actively abandoning the first (see, e.g., Jamison 1996a: 15–17).

Lopāmudrā speaks the first two verses, urging her husband to allow them both to cease their ritual labors and have sex. She mentions the deleterious effects of old age (vs. 1c) and cites as a precedent for her proposed course of action the pious ancients who nevertheless also stopped working from time to time (vs. 2). In our view (and that of the Anukramaṇī and Sāyaṇa, inter alia, contra a number of modern scholars, who assign vs. 4 to Lopāmudrā), Agastya speaks the next two verses (3–4). In verse 3 he counters her proposal with a vigorous call to renewed religious endeavor, which he casts as a battle against a tricky and numerous enemy that they, as a married couple (mithunaú), can defeat together. The word mithunaú is a charged one, because it of course can refer specifically to a sexual pairing. And this is what appears to be rather graphically illustrated in verse 4, where Agastya succumbs to his lust, as Lopāmudrā engages him in intercourse. The "steadfast" (dhī́ra) man is undone by the "flighty" (ádhīra) woman.

The next two verses (5–6) are assigned by the Anukramaṇī to a student, and at least verse 5 may contain the expiatory statement of someone, quite possibly a brahmacārin or Vedic student, who has broken a vow, quite possibly the vow of chastity, and has undertaken ritual purification. The myth embodied in the previous dialogue acts as a Legendenzauber, a magic spell that provides a mythological precedent for the misdeed and its expiation. (See Thieme 1964: 76.) The final verse (6) summarizes the happy results for Agastya, despite—indeed because of—his lapse: he attained offspring as well as power and a place among the gods.

Although verse 5 provides support for the expiatory theory, we are inclined to think there is something more going on, and that the conflict between Agastya and Lopāmudrā reflects a theological struggle dimly perceptible beneath the surface of the late R̥gveda—the struggle between the innovative theologians who favor introducing the new ritual model involving the Sacrificer's Wife as partner on the ritual stage, and the conservatives who consider it a dangerous model with potentially disastrous side-effects. Agastya in verse 3 appears to be a spokesman for the innovators, urging an energetic ritual partnership between husband and wife—a partnership that deteriorates in the next verse into a mere sexual encounter. In this reading Agastya must undertake the penance in verse 5, and although everything comes out right for him, the hymn cannot be seen as a ringing endorsement of the introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife.

1. [Lopāmudrā:] "For many autumns have I been laboring, evening and morning, through the aging dawns.
   Old age diminishes the beauty of bodies. Bullish (men) should now come to their wives."
2. [Lopāmudrā:] "For even those ancients, who served truth and at one with the gods spoke truths, even they got out of harness, for they did not reach the end. Wives should now unite with their bullish (husbands)."
3. [Agastya:] "Not in vain is the labor that the gods help. Let us two take on all contenders; let us two win here the contest of a hundred stratagems, when as a united couple we will drive on."
4. [Agastya:] "The lust of a mounting bull [/waxing reed = penis] has come to me, lust arisen from here, from there, from everywhere.
   Lopāmudrā makes the bullish one flow out; the steadfast man does the flighty woman suck while he is snorting."
5. [Student or Agastya:] "This soma within my heart, just drunk, do I adjure:
   Whatever offense we have committed, let him forgive that, for of many desires is mortal man."
6. Agastya, digging with spades, seeking offspring, descendants, power—with regard to both "colors" [=offspring and ascetic power] the mighty seer throve. He arrived at his hopes, which came true among the gods.

I.180 Aśvins

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
10 verses: triṣṭubh

Agastya's trickery and virtuosic obscurity are fully on display in this hymn. As a consequence we are uncertain about the correctness of many details of our interpretation, but puzzling out the hymn provides an exhilarating ride—perhaps appropriately, since the hymn begins and ends with the Aśvins' chariot-drive around the cosmic spaces. This ring composition is signaled by the responsions between verses 1 and 10: the chariot "flies around" the airy realms and the (cosmic) floods in 1ab and "speeds around" heaven in 10c (a parallel with a clever twist in the Sanskrit, where the verb "flies" [dī́yat] is a close phonological match with the word for "heaven" [dyā́m]), and a physical feature of the chariot, its wheel-rims or fellies, is mentioned in both verses, but with different words (paví 1c, -nemi 10c). This ring composition provides a structure in which both the Aśvins' journey to and participation in the sacrifice and the poet's exploration of the boundaries of language can be anchored.

In our view the flying journey begun in verse 1 brings the Aśvins to the sacrificial ground and its ritual fire in verse 2, a fire that is itself characterized as having "wide flight," that is, as physically spreading out and up when kindled. The next two verses depict several of the Aśvins' earlier deeds as creating a reciprocal benefit for them at the current sacrifice. Verse 3 notes that they (primordially) put the milk in cows, a fact of nature that is often marveled at in the R̥gveda—that a "cooked" (that is, ready to consume) substance, milk, is derived from its container, the "raw" flesh of the living cow. Now this same milk is going into cups to provide the Aśvins' oblation. Similarly, in verse 4 the sweet gharma drink that they produced for the mythological figure Atri comes back to them at this sacrifice. Both of these verses, particularly 3, bristle with difficulties.

With verse 5 the poet turns to his own situation and, in subsequent verses, that of his fellow singers and their patrons. In 5 he presents himself, in the 1st person singular, as a poor man beset with difficulties, expressing the hope that with his praise he can bring the Aśvins to his sacrifice and induce them to make gifts. Verse 6 has as its subject the poet's patron, depicted in two punning verbs (6c) as actively involved in the sacrifice; the poet here (6d) hopes that this patron will act in good faith and according to his proper duty by receiving the Aśvins' gifts and then redistributing them to the poet and his fellows. Verses 7 and 8 present a series of interlocking causal clauses with shifting subjects. In 7ab because "we singers" do our job of praising the gods, our patron is not stingy. "We singers" (of 7ab) in the 1st person plural transform into Agastya in the 3rd person singular (8cd) via a set of clauses in which the human half of the divine/human interface is left unspecified, and indeed other crucial grammatical information, like the verb in 8ab, is missing. In our interpretation, Agastya, who is of course the poet (who appeared in the 1st person singular in vs. 5), is the subject of the whole of verse 8, and he is calling the Aśvins to the Morning Pressing, the sacrifice appropriate to them, whose ritual substance, the soma, is characterized by the difficult hapax vírudra "apart from/without Rudra/the Rudras [=Maruts]." We believe (after a suggestion of Geldner's) that this word encodes a reference to Agastya's mythological engagement with the Maruts (see especially the dialogue hymns I.165, 170, 171) and his attempts to ensure that the Maruts get a share in the sacrifice. Here, since the Maruts are associated with the Midday Pressing, the offering of soma to the Aśvins in the early morning would be made without the Maruts, despite Agastya's loyalty to the Maruts and his general eagerness to provide them offerings. In any case, clearly Agastya has had ritual success, crowned both by widespread praise (8c) and by the possession of thousands (presumably of cows or other livestock).

Verses 9–10 return to the gods' chariot journey and are relatively straightforward, with a particularly uncomplicated demand for horses for us and our patrons in 9cd.

1. Your easily controlled horses (fly around) the airy realms, when your chariot flies around the floods.
   Your golden wheel-rims spray (honey); drinking of the honey you accompany the dawns.
2. You descend to the movement of the steed of wide flight [=ritual fire], the one belonging to men, foremost at the sacrifice, when your sister [=Dawn] will bring you, o you welcomed by all, and (the singer) solemnly invokes you for victory's prize and for refreshment, o honey-drinkers.
3. You set milk in the ruddy (cow)—the cooked in the raw—(set) down the cow's primordial (substance), which (milk) is (now) going within the wooden (cups) for you, as a blazing twisting (snake [=fire]) goes among the trees, o you whose breath is truth. The one with the oblation is performing sacrifice.
4. You chose the honeyed hot drink for Atri, to send it here like a surge of water.
   Now (the refreshing drinks) of honey come back to you, like chariot wheels on the quest for livestock, o Aśvins, superior men.
5. With a laud might I turn you here for the giving of a cow, as the time-worn son of Tugra did, o wondrous ones—a great roar (as if) of water accompanies you two great ones—(might I,) worn out from anxiety and without cattle, (turn) you (here), o you who are worthy of the sacrifice.
6. When you team up your teams, o you of good gifts, you send abundance nearby by your own autonomous powers.
   Our patron gives the ritual prompt [/will please]; he toils [/will pursue] like the wind. Like one who well follows his commandments, he has taken victory's prize, in order (to show) great (generosity?).
7. Since we, your trusty singers, are expressing our admiration for you, the niggard with his hoard is far away.
   And since, o Aśvins, (you are) irreproachable, because you protect (the man) who has the gods nearby, o bulls,
8. And since (Agastya summons) you, o Aśvins, through the days at the winning of the first outpouring of (soma, offered) apart from the Rudras [=Maruts], Agastya, proclaimed of men among men as if with a tumult of praise songs [?], is conspicuous by his thousands (of cows).
9. When by the greatness of your chariot you carry yourselves forward, you drive forth like the Hotar [=Agni] of Manu, o streaming ones.

Provide an abundance of good horses to our patrons and (to us): might we be companions of wealth, o Nāsatyas.

10. Today, o Aśvins, we would call your chariot here with praise songs for ever newer good faring—
(the chariot) that speeds around heaven with undamaged fellies. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.181 Aśvins

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
9 verses: triṣṭubh

Although not at the same degree of difficulty as Agastya's immediately preceding hymn to the Aśvins, this one certainly has its share of puzzles—though, as so often, it restricts itself almost entirely to the Aśvins' journey to the sacrifice and the sacrifice itself. The hymn begins at the sacrifice, with the Aśvins acting as priests (vs. 1), but then draws back temporally to the usual invitation to travel to the sacrifice (vss. 2–3). Verse 4 gives us a tantalizing glimpse of a potential differentiation between the two Aśvins, who are otherwise almost always treated as identical and identically functioning twins.

Verses 5–6 are entirely parallel to each other in structure and return to the journey theme, but introduce another, though unnamed, figure by way of a slippery use of the word anyá "other." In verse 4 paired anyá's referred to the two individual Aśvins, but in the following two verses, each containing an anyá in pāda c, the Aśvins are jointly established in the first half of the verse and implicitly contrast with the unidentified "other" of pāda c. In our opinion this "other" must be Indra, identifiable because of the pair of fallow bay horses in 5c, a pair of horses that are uniquely Indra's in the Ṛgveda. It is not surprising that the Aśvins and Indra should be journeying at the same time, since both are recipients of parts of the Morning Pressing.

The final verses (7–9) take place on the sacrificial ground. Verse 8 is especially rich in striking images of the ritual: the sacrificial fire is depicted as a "gleaming wasp" whose sound is likened to a praise hymn, and the imminent mixing of soma and milk gives rise to a complex erotic image, with the soma a swollen "bullish cloud" at the "pouring out" (séka) of the milk—its swelling attributed to its sexual excitement at the "insemination" (séka) of the cow. In general, swelling as a sign of abundance is a consistent theme in the latter part of the hymn (vss. 5c, 6c, 8b, 8c).

1. What (portion) of nourishments and riches (do) you two dearest ones (draw up), when, acting as Adhvaryus, you draw up (a portion) of the waters?
This sacrifice here has made its own encomium for you, o you depositories of goods, helpers of the peoples.

2. Your blazing, milk-drinking horses, the heavenly steeds whose speed is the wind's, the mind-swift, straight-backed bulls—let (those) self-ruling [/self-directing] ones convey you Aśvins here.
3. Your chariot with its glossy chariot-box should come here like a forward-coursing stream, for good faring—
   (the chariot) that is worthy of the sacrifice and swifter than mind, (saying) "I am in front," o you mounters of the bull [=chariot], you holy ones.
4. Born (one) here, (one) there, the two have always bellowed together with (one) flawless body but with their own (multiple) names.
   One of you is lauded as the victorious patron of the good battler, the other as the son of heaven dispensing a good portion.
5. The attentive lead (horse) of you two, your sorrel, should go forth, following your will, to the (sacrificial) seats,
   (as should) the two fallow bays of the other [=Indra]. They will become swollen with prizes—the skittish (horses) as they (go) through the airy realms with their cries, o Aśvins.
6. Like a bull setting out to conquer, your (lead horse) of (many) autumns, dispatching many refreshing drinks of honey, goes forth along the routes of the other [=Indra]. (The horses) will become swollen with prizes; (like) high, roiling rivers they have come to us.
7. A substantial song has been sent surging to you, flowing in three parts to the plumped-up (ritual grass?), o ritual experts, Aśvins.
   When you are approached with praise, help the man in need; whether on your journey or not, hear my summons.
8. And this very song of the gleaming wasp [=sacrificial fire] swells in the seat of men, which has three layers of ritual grass.
   O bulls, the bullish cloud [=soma] is swollen as if at the insemination of a cow [/at the pouring out of the cow (=milk)], showing favor to the sons of Manu.
9. Just as Pūṣan and Plenitude (summoned) you, o Aśvins—the one with the oblation sings (to you, as if) to Agni, as if to Dawn, when I summon you, singing to you, with a longing for wide space.
   – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.182 Aśvins

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 6, 8

The hymn begins (vs. 1) by addressing the ritual participants (in the plural) and announcing the Aśvins to them; the poet then addresses the Aśvins themselves with extravagant praise (vs. 2), but in the next verse (3) he expresses some impatience with them: why are the gods wasting their time with a non-sacrificer? They should destroy such people and reward us, the faithful sacrificers and poets (vss. 3–4). The "baying hounds" of verse 4 may well be a reference to rival poets.

Most of the remainder of the hymn (vss. 5–7) is devoted to the tale of Bhujyu, son of Tugra, whom the Aśvins rescued with a marvelous boat (or boats) when he was set adrift in the sea. This exploit was alluded to briefly by Agastya in I.180.5 and is treated several times in Kakṣīvant's Aśvin hymns (esp. I.116.3–5, I.117.14–15) as well as elsewhere in the Ṛgveda.

The final verse (8) is a typical summary verse, referring to the poem just recited and ending with the Agastya refrain.

1. This (ritual) pattern has now been set: (all of you,) attend upon it!
 The chariot has its bulls: become exhilarated, (all) you of inspired thought!
 (Here are) the two holy ones who quicken thought, who provided the goods to (the mare) Viśpalā, the sons of heaven whose commandments are bright for the good performer (of ritual).
2. Because you holy ones are the first of Indras and the first of Maruts, the most wondrous wondrous ones and the best chariot-driving chariot drivers, you bring your full chariot loaded with honey. With it you drive right up to the pious man, o Aśvins.
3. What are you doing here, wondrous ones; why are you sitting (by) some man, who, though offering no oblations, makes a great show of himself.
 Pass him by; wear away the life of the niggard. Make light for the eloquent inspired poet.
4. Crush the baying hounds on every side; smash the scornful. You know how (to do) these things, o Aśvins.
 Make every speech of the singer adorned with treasure. Both of you, o Nāsatyas—help my laud.
5. For Tugra's son (Bhujyu) in the rivers you made the boat, with a body [=cockpit?] and wings [=sails?], with which you carried him out with (your?) mind directed toward the gods. With good flight you flew out of the great surge.
6. The son of Tugra, thrust down within the waters, thrust forth into darkness that offered nothing to grab onto—the four welcome boats of paunchy (shape?), sent by the Aśvins, deliver him up to safety.
7. What tree emerged in the midst of the flood to which the son of Tugra clung in his distress, to grab hold of its leaves as if to the feathers of a wild bird in flight? You carried him up, o Aśvins, for (his story) to be heard.

8. O Nāsatyas, superior men, it should stay by you—the solemn speech that the sons of Māna have spoken for you today from this seat belonging to soma. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.183 Aśvins

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

A simple and straightforward hymn, especially in comparison with the first two of Agastya's Aśvin hymns (I.180–181), almost entirely concerned with the Aśvins' chariot and their journey to the sacrifice. In this hymn they travel with Dawn (vs. 2). The dangers of the journey and their possible neglect of us are briefly touched on (vs. 4ab), but with little anxiety, before the offerings are announced to them.

1. Harness that which is swifter than mind, which has a triple chariot-box and three wheels, o bulls, with which you drive right up to the dwelling of the good performer (of rituals). You fly with the tripartite (chariot) like a bird with its feathers.
2. The smooth-rolling chariot rolls on as it goes toward earth, when you stand on it, resolved to fortify (us).
Let this hymn here accompany the wonder with wonderment; you keep company with Dawn, the Daughter of Heaven.
3. Mount your smooth-rolling chariot, the one providing the oblations that rolls on according to your commandments, by which you two, o Nāsatyas, superior men, drive your circuit for our descendants and ourselves to prosper.
4. Let neither the wolf nor the she-wolf venture against you. Do not avoid (us) nor pass (us) by.
Here is the portion deposited for you, here the hymn, o wondrous ones, and here the deposits of honey for you.
5. Gotama, Purumīḍha, Atri—(each one), providing the oblations, summons you two for help, o wondrous ones.
Like those going in a straight line to the directed direction, drive here to my summons, o Nāsatyas.
6. We have crossed to the further shore of this darkness. A praise hymn has been set out in response to you, o Aśvins.
Drive just here along the paths leading to the gods. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.184 Aśvins

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This last hymn in Agastya's series to the Aśvins is a symmetrically shaped five-verse composition, since the final verse (6) is simply repeated from the previous hymn (183.6). The first two verses call the gods to the sacrifice and urge them to enjoy the sacrifice and be attentive to the poet. Verses 4–5 return to the scene of the sacrifice, requesting that the gifts and attention of the Aśvins be directed to us, not to others (vs. 4), while verse 5 contains a common type of summary of the hymn in which it's found, announcing its completion (5ab), and ends with the Aśvins in the company of Agastya (5d). The poet's positioning of his own name directly adjacent to that of the Aśvins (voc. Nāsatya) in the final pāda of this series was surely deliberate.

The middle verse (3) makes a brief detour into mythology: the participation of the Aśvins in the bridal journey of Sūryā, Daughter of the Sun (5ab). The verse is addressed, in the first instance, to Pūṣan, who also participates in this episode elsewhere. Several obscure images are found in this verse—the simile comparing the Aśvins to arrow-makers (3a) and the journey of their lead horses (3cd) with the well-nigh-impenetrable simile involving "vast Varuṇa," which may refer to the sea and reflect the generally later association of Varuṇa with waters. These difficulties are, of course, appropriate to a structurally isolated middle verse.

1. We would summon you today and you later on. When dawn is breaking, the conductor (of words) with solemn words (summons) the Nāsatyas, the sons of Heaven, wherever they are, for the man who gives even more than the stranger.
2. Bring yourselves to exhilaration in our company, o bulls! Beat up the niggards when you are exhilarated by the wave (of soma).
   Listen to me, you superior men, brought here through sacrifice by the invitations of my thoughts, and (be) attentive with your ears.
3. O Pūṣan, the two gods, the Nāsatyas, as if making arrows ready for glory, (made ready) the bridal procession of Sūryā.
   Your lead horses, born in the waters, zig-zag along the wagon-treks as if over the worn (surfaces) of the vast Varuṇa [=the sea?].
4. Let your (honeyed) gift be for us, honeyed ones. Spur on the praise song of the bard, the son of Māna, when the separate peoples applaud your (deeds) worthy of fame, in order to (attain) an abundance of good heroes, o you of good gifts.
5. This praise song with a good twist has been made for you by the sons of Māna, o bounteous Aśvins.
   Drive your circuit for the sake of our descendants and ourselves, becoming exhilarated in company with Agastya, o Nāsatyas.

6. We have crossed to the further shore of this darkness. A praise hymn has been set out in response to you, o Aśvins.
   Drive just here along the paths leading to the gods. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.185 Heaven and Earth

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This eleven-verse hymn falls into two connected sections. Verses 2–8 all end with a pāda-long refrain; since this refrain seems to be an implicit response to verse 1, we believe that 1–8 form a coherent whole, ending with an expiatory verse (8) and then followed by a three-verse summary referring to the hymn-within-a-hymn that precedes.

The refrain addressed to Heaven and Earth, "protect us from the formless void," expresses the Vedic fear of the darkness and lack of definition characteristic of pre-creation chaos. Heaven and Earth help dispel that fear and provide protection from the void in several ways. They are the defining structures of the cosmos, and within the shaped space they produce between them, all separate forms, animate and inanimate, exist. This seems to be the point of verse 1c, "they carry everything that is a name"; we take this as a version of the later Sanskrit nāma-rūpa "name and form," the multiplicity of individual entities, defined by the conjunction of a physical form and a word for it. Heaven and Earth are also the parents of the Sun, the light that allows the individual forms to be seen. Their parentage of the Sun is, in our opinion, the subject of verses 2–4, though the Sun is not mentioned directly. The embryo of verse 2 is the "gift of Aditi" in verse 3 (the Sun is already called ādityá, son of Aditi in the late Ṛgveda; see, e.g., I.191.9), while verse 4 describes the wonder that Heaven and Earth are never burned by the Sun, their son. (On this kinship relation, see also the Heaven and Earth hymn I.160.)

Heaven and Earth define space, but they also, in part via their son, define time: the regular alternation of day and night is first mentioned in verse 1d. The two complementary pairs, Heaven and Earth and Night and Dawn, are treated together in verse 4c, and in our opinion the siblings of verse 5 are more likely Night and Dawn than Heaven and Earth, since they are located "in the lap of their parents," that is, Heaven and Earth. However, the latter pair are definitely the subject of verses 6–7, and their role in conception is highlighted again. The final verse of the refrain-bounded section (8) seeks expiation for an unnamed offense, and offers the current hymn ("this hymnic vision") to that end.

The last three verses (9–11) develop this theme. The poet expresses the hope that the verbal products he has just produced will help him: his "lauds belonging to men" (a variation on the technical term nárāśáṃsa, vs. 9), and the "truth" he addressed to Heaven and Earth (vss. 10–11).

1. Which of these two is the earlier, and which the later? How were they born, o poets? Who fully understands?
   By themselves the two carry everything that is a name. Day and Night roll through (them) like two wheels.
2. The two, unmoving and footless, conceive an ample embryo, moving and footed, like a natural son in the lap of his parents. – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.
3. I invoke the gift of Aditi, which is without fault, without aggression, without weapon, and provided with sunlight and reverence.
   O you two world-halves, beget it for the singer. – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.
4. We should be devoted to the two who are never scorched, (always) giving help with their help, to the two world-halves whose children are the gods, to the pair among the gods, along with the pairs among the days. – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.
5. The two young women, sisters, siblings [=Night and Dawn?], contiguous and uniting with each other in the lap of their parents, sniff-kissing the navel of the world. – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.
6. The two broad and lofty seats do I invoke with truth, the begetters of the gods with their help, they of lovely countenance who conceive the immortal one. – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.
7. The two, broad and wide, voluminous and of distant boundary, do I address with homage in this sacrifice, who, bringing good fortune and advancing well, conceive (the embryo). – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.
8. If we have ever committed any offence at all against the gods or against a comrade or against the lord of the family, this hymnic vision should be propitiation to them. – O Heaven and Earth, protect us from the formless void.

9. Let both lauds belonging to men help me; let both (Heaven and Earth) accompany me with aid, with help.
   There is much for him who gives even more than the stranger. Becoming exhilarated by the refreshment, might we be refreshed, o gods.
10. I of good wisdom have spoken this truth to Heaven and to Earth to hear first.
   Let the two of them protect from disgrace and difficulty in close quarters. Let the mother and father guard (us) with their help.

11. Let this come true, Heaven and Earth, which I address to you two, o Father and Mother.
 Become the nearest of the gods with your help. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.186 All Gods

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: triṣṭubh

Although this hymn provides numerous small difficulties and twists of phrase characteristic of Agastya, its basic outline is very simple: god after god is urged to come to our sacrifice, beginning with Savitar (vs. 1) and ending with the gods collectively (vs. 10d), and working through a list of divinities both major (e.g., the Ādityas [vs. 2], Indra [vss. 6cd–7], the Maruts [vss. 8–9]) and minor (e.g., Ahi Budhnya [vs. 5]), in no apparent order. There is much emphasis on shared activity, with expressions like "in concert" (sajóṣas vss. 2–3, 6), "along with" (smát vss. 6–8), "like-minded" (sámanas vs. 8). The invitations end with verse 10; as so often, the final verse (11) is an internal reference to the hymn itself and its power to satisfy the gods.

The beginnings of the verses and half-verses display an intricate pattern of repetition that cannot be rendered in translation: with matching preverbs in verses 1–2 and 9–10 (the latter showing an especially complex phonological pattern), and the verses of the middle section (5–8) all opening with utá "and" (as well as additional matching material). The "and" especially contributes to our sense of the additive quality of the invitations to the gods.

1. Let god Savitar, who belongs to all men, come to us here at the rite with ritual refreshments and a good laud, so that you, o youths [=gods], will reach exhilaration nearby us—(let) inspired thought (come) to the whole moving world at the evening mealtime.
2. Let all the gods together come here to us: Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa in concert, so that they all will become our strengtheners and will make (all things) easy to overcome, like faltering power.
3. I will sing for you to the dearest guest, to Agni, with my lauds, I who prevail in concert with (him?), so that our good praise will be Varuṇa. And he [=Agni] will deliver refreshments like a patron praised by a stranger.
4. With a desire for gain I hasten for you with homage to Dawn and Night, (who are) like a cow that is easily milked, as in one and the same day I measure out my chant in milk of dissimilar forms (though found) in the same udder.

5. And let Ahi Budhnya create joy for us. As a (cow) swelling (with milk) pursues her young, the River pursues (the hymn?)
with which we will speed the Child of the Waters, whom the bulls having the speed of thought convey.
6. And let Tvaṣṭar come right here to us, in concert with the patrons, at the evening mealtime.
Indra, the Vr̥tra-smasher, who fills the domains, the most powerful of men, should come here to us.
7. And our horse-yoked thoughts lick him like cows their tender young.
Our songs approach him, the sweetest smelling of men, like wedded wives.
8. And let the like-minded Maruts along with Rodasī sit here for us—their weapons grown strong, their horses dappled, their chariots like streams—the gods who care for the stranger, like yokemates in alliance.
9. Now that they have become conspicuous in their greatness, they hitch up their advance teams with a well-twisted (hymn), then, when, like a (lightning) bolt on a clear day, their weapons spray all the salt-land.
10. Bring the Aśvins forward to help; bring Pūṣan forward, for they are powerful by nature, (as are) Viṣṇu without hatred, the Wind, and the Master of the R̥bhus.
I would turn the gods here for their good favor.
11. Here among us is this visionary hymn, o you who are worthy of the sacrifice; it should provide you your fill and a place to sit—
(the hymn) that, seeking goods, takes its place among the gods. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.187 Praise of Food (Annastuti)

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: anuṣṭubgarbha 1, gāyatrī 2, 4, 8–10, anuṣṭubh 3, 5–7, anuṣṭubh or br̥hatī 11

On the surface a charming address to food, couched throughout in the 2nd person, this hymn nonetheless enfolds some mysteries. In the straightforward verses (esp. 1–3, 6), the poet praises food as the necessary support and help for both gods and men, a theme summarized in the final verse (11).

But the nature of food and of its "juices" (rásāḥ) is also explored in several obscure verses (esp. 4–5), where they have a cosmic dimension. In our view, the juices of verse 4, "dispersed throughout the (cosmic) realms and adjoined to heaven like the winds," are the rains, localized in the midspace like the winds—and more generally the endlessly circulating cosmic waters that fall as rain, produce food in the form of plants and animals, and return to heaven by evaporation and by ritual offering. In verse 5 these juices both yield food (as the nurturing rains) and are part of, or belong to, food (as the juicy parts of plants and animals).

The hymn takes a ritual turn in the last four verses (7–10) before the summary verse (11). Verse 7 seems to introduce the early-morning ritual; in the next three verses (8–10), marked by a refrain, food is sacralized—made equivalent to soma (vs. 9) and to a plant, perhaps the soma plant (vs. 10), each addressed as "friend of the winds" (see vs. 4 for food's association with the winds)—and transformed into ritual offerings. The generic "waters and plants" of verse 8 become the milk and grain mixed with soma in verse 9. (The exact application of vs. 10 is unfortunately unclear.) In each case, the addressee is urged to "become just the fat," in other words (in a more robust society than ours) the choicest part of the food substance.

1. Now I shall praise food, the support and power of the great, by whose might Trita shook Vr̥tra apart till his joints were parted.
2. O sweet food, honeyed food, we have chosen you:
   for us be a helper.
3. Draw near to us, food—kindly with your kindly help, joy itself, not to be despised, a very kind companion without duplicity.
4. These juices of yours, food, are dispersed throughout the realms, adjoined to heaven like the winds.
5. These (juices) are those that yield you, o food, and they also are part of you, sweetest food.
   Those who receive the sweetness of your juices press forward like strong-necked (bulls).
6. On you, food, is the mind of the great gods set.
   A dear (deed) was done at your signal: he smashed the serpent with your help.
7. When yonder dawning light of the mountains has come, o food, then you should also come here to us, honeyed food, fit for our portion.
8. When we bite off a full share of the waters and plants,
   o you friend of the winds—become just the fat.
9. When we take a share of you when mixed with milk or mixed with grain, o Soma,
   o you friend of the winds—become just the fat.
10. Become the gruel, o plant, the fat, the steaming [?] suet [?],
    o you friend of the winds—become just the fat.
11. We have sweetened you with words, o food, as cows [=milk] (do) the oblations—you as feasting companion for the gods, you as feasting companion for us.

I.188 Āprī

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
11 verses: gāyatrī

Like the other nine Āprī hymns in the R̥gveda, this one treats a set series of sacrificial elements in a set order, using the same key words, italicized in translation. It is not as bare-bones as some examples of the genre (such as I.14, the first in the text), and phraseologically it closely resembles X.110.

1. Kindled today you rule as a god with the gods, o conqueror of thousands.
   As messenger and poet, convey the oblations.
2. O Tanūnapāt, for the one following truth the sacrifice is anointed with honey, while providing refreshments in thousands.
3. Being libated, as the one to be solemnly invoked, convey to us the gods worthy of the sacrifice.
   O Agni, you are the winner of thousands.
4. With their power they strewed the ritual grass, which brings a thousand heroes, toward the east, where, o Ādityas, you rule widely.
5. Wide-ruler and Complete-ruler, wide-ranging and preeminent, those which are many and many more—the Doors flowed ghee.
6. Because, having lovely ornaments and lovely adornments, the two rule [/shine] widely with splendor, let Dawn (and Night) take their seats here.
7. Because they are the two foremost Divine Hotars, poets possessing lovely speech, let them perform this sacrifice of ours.
8. O Bhāratī, Iḍā, and Sarasvatī—all of you whom I implore—spur us on to splendor.
9. Because preeminent Tvaṣṭar anointed all the beasts (with) their forms, by sacrifice win their fat for us.
10. By yourself send (the sacrificial animal) to the fold of the gods, o Lord of the Forest.
    Agni will sweeten the oblations.
11. Agni, the leader of the gods, is anointed by the gāyatrī-chant.
    He shines at the svāhā-calls.

I.189 Agni

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Although this hymn begins with a hope for an easy journey to wealth, it is clear that the poet sees menace everywhere, from which he begs Agni for protection. The imaginative catalogue of possible hazards and enemies continues through verse 6. Verse 7 breaks this pattern, but implicitly suggests why Agni will remain on the poet's side: the god distinguishes between sacrificers and non-sacrificers, and he makes himself available to the former.

The hymn ends with a typical summary verse characterizing the hymn that precedes. The poet's claim that he has spoken "enigmas" seems overblown; in the universe of R̥gvedic discourse this hymn is remarkably straightforward, and Agni is unlikely to find interpreting it particularly challenging. The final verse does, however, draw attention to a structural feature of the hymn: the first seven verses all contain the vocative of the god's name, in insistent initial position in the first three, then somewhat postponed in the next four. In the summary verse the direct address to Agni is absent, and he appears instead in the locative, a grammatical shift that underlines the change of topic.

1. O Agni, lead us to wealth by an easy path, since you know all the (ritual) patterns, o god.
   Keep from us transgression, going its crooked way. Might we offer you the greatest expression of reverence.
2. O Agni, deliver us anew to the far shore, beyond all hardships, with your blessings.
   And become a wide fortress, thick and broad, for us, and luck and lifetime for our progeny and posterity.
3. O Agni, keep from us afflictions, (so) they will afflict peoples without Agni's protection.
   Renew the earth for us to go easily upon it, o god worthy of the sacrifice, along with all the immortals.
4. Protect us, Agni, with your unwearying protectors, and when you blaze here in your own dear seat.
   Let not fear find your singer, neither now nor later, o youngest mighty one.
5. Do not release us, Agni, to the evil man, nor to the greedy one, the cheat, nor to misfortune.
   Do not hand us over to the toothed one who bites nor to the toothless, nor to one who does harm, o strong one.
6. One like you, o Agni born of truth, when hymned, will stretch wide a shield for our body from everyone who seeks to harm or to revile—for you watch widely over crooked ways, o god.

7. Distinguishing between the two [=sacrificers and non-sacrificers?], you pursue the sons of Manu at the early mealtime, o Agni worthy of the sacrifice.
At the later mealtime you become tractable for Manu, to be groomed like a foal [?] by the fire-priests.
8. We have spoke enigmas in his presence—I, the son of Māna, (have spoken them) in the presence of mighty Agni.
May we win a thousand together with the seers. – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.190 Bṛhaspati

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Bṛhaspati, the lord of formulations, is here presented as both producer and receiver of sacred speech and sound. This theme is established in the first verse, where my chants strengthen Bṛhaspati, who himself is the "leader of song." The physical movement of words and sound—between mortals and gods, between earth and heaven—is a repeated theme in the hymn (see esp. vss. 2, 4, 7). The difficult verses 3 and 4 concern a particular kind of sacred sound, the signal-call (ślóka) that Bṛhaspati launches daily, most likely a call announcing the sacrifice or some part of it.

The Bṛhaspati depicted in this hymn is no mere gentle wordsmith, but militant and aggressive, compared to a bellowing bull (vs. 1), a fearsome wild beast (vss. 3, 4), a bird of prey (vs. 7). His words are missiles (vs. 4), and those who underestimate him and seek to exploit him receive his punishment (vs. 5).

1. With chants I will strengthen anew the unassailable bull of gladdening tongue, Bṛhaspati, the brightly shining leader of song to whom the gods and the mortals harken as he bellows.
2. Words follow close upon him in proper sequence, like a gush that has been sent gushing from those serving the gods, for Bṛhaspati, far-ranging straightway through the wide spaces, has become equal to Mātariśvan in regard to truth.
3. A praise song and an offering of reverence, as well as his signal-call, will he hold forth, like Savitar his two arms—(the call) that happens every day according to his will, (the call) of the undemonic, which is powerful like a fearsome wild beast.

4. When his signal-call speeds in heaven and on earth like a steed, the discriminating one [=Bṛhaspati?], bringing wondrous apparitions, will control it, *like a steed—as also when these missiles [=words] of Bṛhaspati, like the charges of wild beasts, go to the heavens that possess serpentine wiles.
5. Those who are wicked and tough, who live off you who are good, taking you for a ruddy little bullock, o god—to the evil-minded one you do not concede anything of value; you just punish the reviler, Bṛhaspati.
6. (You are) easy to approach like a path leading to good pastures, but difficult to hold onto like an ally gratified by (all those) around.
   The unassailable ones who watch over us have taken their stand, unclosing the enclosed (cows).
7. On whom the chants, like streams, converge, like rivers on the sea with their banks as wheels, Bṛhaspati, the knowing one, gazes between both, the ford and the waters, (like) a bird of prey.
8. Just so has the great, powerful one, powerfully born, the bull Bṛhaspati, the god, been established in his place.
   When praised, let him establish for us what brings heroes and cows.
   – May we know refreshment and a community having lively waters.

I.191 Against Poisonous Animals

Agastya Maitrāvaruṇi
16 verses: anuṣṭubh, except mahāpaṅkti 10–12, mahābṛhatī 13

Very Atharvan in style, this hymn, directed against stinging and poisonous insects, does indeed have a number of parallels and near-parallels in the Atharvaveda. Like that text, it frequently uses expressions of the immediate past (especially in the aorist) as a triumphant predictor of successful measures taken in the present. That is, a statement like "they have been wiped out" (vs. 1d), though apparently referring to the past, probably instead announces, hopefully, that the current verbal spell along with whatever physical magic practices have been undertaken will ensure that the desired effect will have happened this instant. Unfortunately we have no real idea what the physical rites involved, though judging from parallels like Atharvaveda VII.56, entitled by Whitney "Against poison of snakes and insects," it may well have involved healing plants and insect-eating birds.

The first nine verses of the hymn are directed particularly against adṛ́ṣṭa—"the unseen, invisible"—apparently small biting insects. English has a remarkably close counterpart in the colloquially named "no-see-ums," which also share behaviors with their Sanskrit counterparts: clinging to grasses (vs. 3) and becoming especially virulent in the early evening (vss. 4–5). And anyone who has ever attempted to swat a flying bug ruefully recognizes the commands given in verse 6: “stand still! come to rest!”

In the rest of the hymn (vss. 10–16) the speaker works to render ineffective and harmless the poison of poisonous insects more generally. One of the most salient features of this part of the hymn is the density of diminutivization, that is, of the use of the colloquial, low-register -ka-suffix, which appears not only on nouns referring to bugs and birds, but also on pronouns and demonstrative adjectives (vss. 11, 15) and even on a participle (vs. 16). (For further on the sociolinguistics of the -ka-suffix, see Jamison 2009b). Though for the most part the tools deployed against the poison are homely ones—little birds and plants, insofar as we can tell—this section of the hymn begins with higher rhetorical ambitions and a mythic model. In verse 10, whose interpretation is much disputed, the speaker fastens the poison on the sun and the skin containing the poison (in our view) “on the house of the possessor of liquor (surā).” Although most commentators, beginning at least with Sāyaṇa, interpret the latter action as an unmarked simile likening this action to the fastening of the poison on the sun, in our view it is a parallel mytho-ritual action and provides the mythic model for the ritual actions that follow. Again in our view, the possessor of liquor is Indra—a reference to a myth well known in the Brāhmaṇas and already clearly present in the late R̥gveda (X.131.4–5), in which Indra, sickened from drinking an excess of soma, is made to drink the usually forbidden alcohol surā by the Aśvins and Sarasvatī. The surā was not pure but mixed, and both the Aśvins and Indra perform the singular feat of separating the two mixed liquids in the course of drinking them—a detail found in the R̥gvedic treatment just cited. The ability to separate liquids, to get rid of (or nullify the effects of) the noxious one and preserve the beneficial one, is what the ritual performer desires here, as the last two pādas of the refrain (vss. 10–13ef) make clear.

1. The stinger that isn’t a stinger, and the one that’s a real stinger—these are the two—they’re called fleas. The no-see-ums have been wiped out.
2. As she comes, she smashes the no-see-ums, and as she goes away, she smashes them.
   Smashing them down, she smashes them, and crushing, she crushes them.
3. The reeds and the damn reeds, the darbha-grasses and (the bugs) on the sira-plants [?], the no-see-ums on the muñja-grass and on the vīraṇa-grass—all have been wiped out at once.
4. The cows have sat down in the cowshed; the wild animals have settled down—down (also) the lights of the peoples. The no-see-ums have been wiped out.
5. And these very ones have come into sight in the early evening, like thieves.
   You no-see-ums seen by all, you have become recognized.

6. Your father is Heaven, and your mother the Earth. Your brother is Soma, and your sister Aditi.
   You no-see-ums seen by all, stand still! come to rest!
7. The ones on (my) shoulders, the ones on (my) limbs, the little needle bugs with their stingers out—you no-see-ums, there is nothing at all for you here. All of you, get worn down at once!
8. Up from the east comes the Sun—the smasher of the no-see-ums, seen by all, crushing all the no-see-ums and all the sorceries.
9. Up has flown yonder Sun, incinerating all the many—the Āditya (up) from the mountains, the smasher of the no-see-ums, seen by all.
10. I fasten the poison on the Sun, the skin (containing it) on the house of the possessor of liquor [=Indra].
    Even now he will not die, and we will not die.
    The mounter of the fallow bays [=Indra] has (made) its [=poison's] trek far in the distance; the honeyed (plant) has made you honey.
11. Such a little teeny śakunti-bird—that itty-bitty thing has eaten your poison.
    Even now she will not die, and we will not die.
    The mounter of the fallow bays [=Indra] has (made) its [=poison's] trek far in the distance; the honeyed (plant) has made you honey.
12. Three times seven, the little sparks [=small birds?] have swallowed the bloom of poison.
    Even now they will not die, and we will not die.
    The mounter of the fallow bays [=Indra] has (made) its [=poison's] trek far in the distance; the honeyed (plant) has made you honey.
13. Of the nine and ninety tormentors of poison,
    I have mentioned the names of all.
    The mounter of the fallow bays [=Indra] has (made) its [=poison's] trek far in the distance; the honeyed (plant) has made you honey.
14. The three-times-seven peahens, the seven spinster sisters, these have carried away your poison, like women with jugs (carrying) water.
15. Such a little teeny kuṣumbha-bug—I split that itty-bitty thing with a rock.
    Thence has the poison rolled forth, following channels facing away (from us).
16. The little teeny kuṣumbha-bug said this, as it made its teeny turn forth from the mountain:
    "Without juice is the poison of the little scorpion, without juice is your poison, little scorpion."

II

Maṇḍala II

The eponymous poet of Maṇḍala II, the first of the Family Books, is Gr̥tsamada, who was the son of Śunahotra Āṅgirasa and the adopted son of Śunaka Bhārgava according to Sāyaṇa and the Anukramaṇī. The hymns refer to the people of the poet as Gr̥tsamadas four times, but also as Śunahotras three times. Of the forty-three hymns in this maṇḍala, the Anukramaṇī ascribes all but seven to Gr̥tsamada himself. It attributes II.4–7 to Somāhuti Bhārgava, who would have thus belonged to the lineage of Gr̥tsamada's father by adoption, and II.27–29 either to Kūrma Gārtsamada or to Gr̥tsamada. One of the characteristic features of the hymns of this maṇḍala is that twenty-one of its hymns, almost half, end with the signature refrain of the Gr̥tsamadas, "May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes."

The maṇḍala has ten hymns in the Agni series, including one Āprī hymn (II.3), and twelve in the Indra series (II.11–22). Among the latter is one of the best-known Indra hymns, II.12, with its famous refrain, "he, o peoples, is Indra." Characteristically, Gr̥tsamada connects the heroic deeds of Indra to the acts of the ritual, so that the ritual practice becomes the guarantee that Indra will again perform his great deeds. Following the Indra series are four hymns to Brahmaṇaspati or Br̥haspati, the "lord of the sacred formulation" (II.23–26). In the first of these, Brahmaṇaspati or Br̥haspati appears as both a priestly companion of Indra and as Indra himself in his role as a priest-king, and in the second, Br̥haspati is Indra. Both refer to the Vala myth, in which Indra and his accompanying priests release the cattle by the power of the formulated truth. After two hymns, one to the Ādityas (II.27) and one to Varuṇa, the foremost of the Ādityas (II.28), there are a series of hymns to the All Gods (II.29, 31) or to various gods (II.30, 32). The last of these is a composite hymn in two different meters, honoring minor deities, including four female deities concerned with childbirth. Most of the remaining hymns of the maṇḍala are single hymns to other deities. Noteworthy among them are II.33, one of only three hymns in the R̥gveda to Rudra, II.35, the only hymn in the R̥gveda dedicated to Apām Napāt, the "Child of the Waters," and II.38, a hymn to Savitar that shows his role as the god of the evening who brings the world to rest. The final two hymns, II.42 and 43, are hymns to omen-birds, asking them to cry only auspicious cries and comparing their auspicious cries to the words and chants of the poets.

II.1 (192) Agni

Gr̥tsamada Bhārgava Śaunaka, originally Āṅgirasa Śaunahotra
16 verses: jagatī

This hymn is structured as a series of identifications—of the god Agni with priests, other gods, kin/social relations, qualities, body parts, and so on, with the identification mediated by the quality held in common.

Although the equations may at first seem randomly ordered, in fact they follow a logical progression. The first ones (vs. 2) identify Agni with human priests. (Priestly identifications are also found extensively in II.5. And for the relationship between particular priests and particular gods, see also the R̥tugraha hymns I.15, II.36–37.) In the next five verses (3–7) the variety of functions Agni discharges invite identification with a series of gods. Verses 8–9 then set Agni in the web of human relationships, of varying degrees of close kinship. We return to the divine (or semi-divine) world in verses 10–11, but the identifications here link him especially to ritual activity (the R̥bhus in vs. 10, who are associated with the Third Pressing and who achieved divinity by their ritual feats; the female divinities in vs. 11, who are regularly mentioned in the Āprī hymns) and prepare for the last section of the hymn (vss. 12–14). The R̥bhu verse (10) also contains an elaborate pun, while the identification of Agni with three female divinities in verse 11 would surely provoke attention in the audience. Agni's own ritual service, especially to the gods, provides the subject of verses 12–14. The last pāda of this last section (14d) provides a ring with the first verse (1d): "you were born blazing" (jajñiṣe śúciḥ 14d), reprising "you are born blazing" (jāyase śúciḥ 1d), in both cases with a mention of the plants as his source. This neat ring, which closes the series of individual identifications, sets the stage for the climactic verse 15 (before the refrain of 16), which proclaims Agni's complete superiority throughout heaven and earth.

The identifications are themselves structured by an extraordinary density of rhetorical repetition. Of the sixteen verses, the first fourteen begin with a form of the 2nd-person singular pronoun tvám "you," followed by the vocative agne "o Agni." In fact fifty-four pādas out of fifty-six open with a 2nd-person singular pronoun, in addition to other pronominal forms scattered in non-initial position. For example, there are seven forms of tvám in the first verse alone. The fifteenth verse (and the last before the refrain) begins, as usual, with tvám, but the vocative ágne is postponed till the opening of the second pāda—distracting the formula. As often, rhetorical patterns established earlier in a hymn are varied as the hymn comes to a close, and the change of pattern here draws attention to the climactic contents of verse 15 discussed just above. Though the rhetorical tool, repetition, is a blunt instrument, its effects are powerful.

This rhetorical pattern is especially striking because so many of the pronominal forms are nominatives and therefore unnecessary, since pronominal subjects need not be expressed in Sanskrit. Though some of these nominatives occur in equational sentences (cf. tvám agníd r̥tāyatáḥ "you [are] the Agnidh of the one who follows truth") where a pronominal forms is often used in place of a copula, a surprising number of these equational sentences also employ a 2nd-person singular copula (asi [e.g., 3a, 5d] or equivalent), rendering a pronominal subject unnecessary. For further discussion see Jamison (2007: 59–60). Poetics, not grammar, is the driving factor.

The effect of this incantatory repetition of "you, Agni," taking place in front of the sacrificial fire on the ritual ground, combined with the sweep of equations identifying Agni with what comes to seem like everything on earth and in heaven, is to concentrate all of the cosmos into this small space, the sacrifical ground, and this single entity, the sacrificial fire—indeed making the sacrificial microcosm the equivalent of the macrocosm. The ordering of the identifications—starting and ending at the sacrifice, but in between ranging through both the divine and human realms—models the centrality of the sacrifice and of its focus, the sacred fire. It is a powerful beginning to the maṇḍala and to the Family Books in general.

1. You, Agni, (are born) throughout the days, you who are eager to blaze here; you (are born) from the waters, you from the stone, you from the trees, you from the plants, you, men-lord of men, are born blazing.
2. Yours, Agni, is the office of Hotar; yours that of Potar in its turn; yours that of Neṣṭar; you are the Agnidh [=Fire-Kindler] of the one who follows truth.
   Yours is the office of Praśāstar; you act as Adhvaryu; you are both the Brahman-priest and the houselord in our home.
3. You, Agni, as bull of beings, are Indra; you, wide-going, worthy of homage, are Viṣṇu.
   You, o lord of the sacred formulation, finder of wealth, are the Brahman [=Formulator]; you, o Apportioner, are accompanied by Plenitude.
4. You, Agni, whose commandments are steadfast, are King Varuṇa; you, wondrous to be invoked, become Mitra.
   You, as the lord of settlements who (offers) a common meal, are Aryaman; you, apportioning at the ritual distribution, o god, are Aṃśa [/Share].
5. You, Agni, (giving wealth) rich in heroes to the one who does honor, are Tvaṣṭar—yours is kinship, o you accompanied by the Wives (of the Gods) and possessing Mitra's might—
   You have given (wealth) rich in horses as the impeller of swift (horses) [=Child of the Waters]. You of many goods are the troop of men [=Maruts].
6. You, Agni, as lord of great heaven, are Rudra; you, as the troop of Maruts, are master of strengthening nourishment [=rain].
   You, as luck for livestock, drive with the ruddy winds (as horses); you, as Pūṣan, protect the ones doing honor, in your own person.

7. You, Agni, are Wealth-Giver to the preparer (of the offering); you, as the conferrer of treasure, are god Savitar.
   You, lord of men, as Bhaga [/Fortune] are master of goods; you are a protector in the house of him who has done you honor.
8. Toward you, Agni, as clanlord in the house do the clans stretch out straight—toward you, the king, easy to find.
   You, lovely-faced one, are lord over all; you are the counter(part) to thousands, hundreds, tens.
9. To you, Agni, as father, (do) men (approach) with their desires—to you, for brotherhood, (do they approach) with their (ritual) labor, you who are bright in body.
   You become the son of him who has done you honor; you as affectionate comrade—protect (him) from assault.
10. You, Agni, as [Ṛbhu/] the craftsman at hand, are to be rendered homage; you are master of the cattle-rich prize [/Vāja], of wealth.
   You radiate widely [/(are) Vibhvan]: burn through to giving! You seek to carve up and to stretch out the sacrifice.
11. You, god Agni, are Aditi for the pious; you, as Hotrā Bhāratī, are strengthened by song.
   You are Iḍā, bestowing a hundred winters in return for skill; you, o lord of goods, as obstacle-smasher, are Sarasvatī.
12. You, Agni, when well kept, are highest vigor. In your coveted color there are beauties in sight.
   You are the prize, furthering and lofty; you are wealth, ample, broad on all sides.
13. You, Agni, did the Ādityas make their mouth; you did the pure ones make their tongue, o poet.
   You do the Gift-Escorts escort in the ceremonies; in you do the gods eat the poured oblation.
14. O Agni, through your mouth do all the undeceptive immortals, the gods, eat the oblation poured into you.
   With you the mortals sweeten their pressed drink. You, as embryo of the plants, were born blazing.
15. You are both equal and a counter(part) to these by your might, and, o Agni, well-born god, you surpass them, since your strengthening nourishment here extends in its greatness through heaven and earth, through both world-halves.
16. The patrons—those who dispatch to the praisers a gift tipped with cows and ornamented with horses, o Agni—lead both us and them forth to a better state. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.2 (193) Agni

Gṛtsamada
13 verses: jagatī

The solar aspects of fire are emphasized, with a number of comparisons to and identifications with the sun, some of which are obscure and enigmatic (e.g., vs. 4). The twin themes of the whole hymn are encapsulated in the first verse: Agni installed in the ritual ground, performing the role of Hotar, and receiving oblations and hymns; Agni as the earthly counterpart of the blazing sun.

The hymn falls into two nearly equal parts. The first five verses are primarily descriptive, with Agni generally referred to in the 3rd person; verses 6–12 (13 is repeated from II.1.16) consist primarily of requests, addressed to Agni in the 2nd person. The first half establishes Agni's cosmic role, mediating between and watching over the heavenly and earthly realms and maintaining his position through the regular temporal alternations (for the latter, see esp. vs. 2). With Agni's cosmic dominance thus affirmed, the second half seeks to utilize these wider powers of his to enhance our own position in the cosmos. See, for example, verse 9, where the poet describes his poetic vision (dhī́) taking its place among the immortals in heaven, and verse 10, where he compares the brilliance of his own people with the sun, the same sun with which Agni is identified earlier.

There is also an emphasis on Agni perceiving and being perceived, enhanced by a pun in the Sanskrit on the verb citaya, which can mean both "appear, be perceived" and "perceive," sometimes simultaneously (vss. 4, 5, 10).

Stylistically the hymn seems designed deliberately to contrast with the preceding one (II.1). In that hymn Agni is identified with various beings and elements, whereas in this one, especially in the first half, Agni is compared to such third parties: the simile is the dominant figure. It is striking that II.1, by contrast, contains not a single simile.

1. With sacrifice increase Jātavedas; sacrifice to Agni with oblation, with song at length when he is kindled—(Agni) receiving pleasurable offerings, possessing solar glory, the heaven-ruling Hotar, sitting at the chariot-pole in the (ritual) enclosures.
2. Toward you have the nights and the dawns bellowed, o Agni, like milk-cows in good pastures to their calf.
   As the spoked wheel of heaven [=sun] (does) through the human (life-) spans, through the successive nights you shine, o you of many favors.
3. Him of wondrous power have the gods fitted down at the base of the airy realm [=on earth], as their spoked wheel of heaven and earth—
   Agni with his flaming flame—like a chariot worthy to be acquired, to be proclaimed like an envoy (installed) among the settled peoples.

4. Him, growing in the airy realm (as) in his own house, very bright like gold, they have set on a meandering (course), appearing (like) the flying (udder) of Pṛśni [=cloud], observing with his eyes along (the whole length of) both races [=gods and men], like the protector of a path [?].
5. As Hotar let him encompass the whole ceremony. Toward him do the sons of Manu stretch out, with oblations and with song.
Golden-lipped, growing on these (hearths), quivering, appearing like heaven with its stars, he perceives along (the whole length of) the two world-halves.
6. When you have been kindled, (shine) richly for our well-being; even after you are entirely extinguished, shine wealth upon us.
Turn the two world-halves toward here, for our easy progress, o god Agni, (for them) to seek out the oblations of Manu.
7. Give us, Agni, lofty (prizes), give (prizes) in thousands. Open up the prize like a door, for (it) to be famed.
Turn heaven and earth eastward with a sacred formulation. Like the blazing sun, you have made the dawns flash forth.
8. On being kindled through (all) the dawns and the nights, like the sun he has shone with red radiance.
With the libations of Manu he conducts good ceremonies—the king of the clans, the guest dear to Āyu.
9. In this way, o foremost Agni, (hymnic) vision swells for us among the immortals dwelling in lofty heaven through the human (lifespans)—
(a vision like) a cow giving milk to the bard in the (ritual) enclosures, (bringing) by herself multiform (prizes) in hundreds at her impulsion.
10. May we, o Agni, by our steed get in sight of (wealth) in good heroes, or by our sacred formulation distinguish ourselves beyond (other) men.
Let our brilliance blaze upward among the five peoples like the sun, difficult to surpass.
11. O mighty one, become the one for us to proclaim—(as him) in whom the well-born patrons find nourishment, whom the prize-winners approach to sacrifice, o Agni, as you shine amid (our) own offspring in (your) own house.
12. May we both, the praisers and the patrons, be in your protection, o Agni Jātavedas.
Over goods and wealth—much glittering, very abundant, consisting of offspring and good descendants—exert your control for us.
13. The patrons—those who dispatch to the praisers a gift tipped with cows and ornamented with horses, o Agni—lead both us and them forth to a better state. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.3 (194) Āprī

Gr̥tsamada
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 7

This is one of the ten so-called Āprī hymns in the R̥gveda, a litany recited at the animal sacrifice: the subjects of the verses appear in a fixed order, each signaled by a key word (italicized in the following translation), though the exact wording of each differs from hymn to hymn. This type of flexible composition around a set of fixed themes and terms in a fixed order may give us some insight into R̥gvedic compositional techniques. This version is somewhat fuller and verbally richer than most, encouraged by the relatively capacious measures of triṣṭubh meter. For a minimalist version, see I.13.

1. Agni, kindled, deposited on the earth, has stood up facing all beings.
   The pure, very wise Hotar from olden days—let Agni the god sacrifice to the gods, (himself) deserving (it).
2. Narāśaṃsa, who anoints, counter(part) to the foundations (of the earth) and to the three heavens with his greatness, he of lovely flames, with his ghee-sprinkling mind wetting the oblation—at the head of the sacrifice let him anoint the gods altogether.
3. Solemnly invoked by (our) mind, o Agni, deserving (it), sacrifice today to the gods for us in front of the descendant of Manu.
   Convey here the unstirrable troop of the Maruts. You men, sacrifice to Indra who sits on the ritual grass.
4. O divine Ritual Grass—growing strong, affording good heroes, having a lovely burden [=the gods], strewn on this altar here for wealth.
   Good ones, sit here on it, which is anointed with ghee—all you gods, Ādityas, worthy of the sacrifice.
5. Let them gape open widely—the Divine Doors, easy to approach—when invoked with reverences.
   Expansive, let the unaging ones spread forth, purifying their own "color" [=people] (so that it is) glorious, rich in heroes.
6. Strengthened of old for us, Dawn and Night, like happy weavers on target at their labors, jointly interweaving the stretched thread, the ornament of the sacrifice—the good milk-cows rich in milk.
7. The first two Divine Hotars, more knowing, more wondrous, together will sacrifice rightly with their chant.
   Sacrificing to the gods according to the proper season, they jointly anoint them on the navel of the earth, on the three backs (of the fires).
8. Sarasvatī, who sends our poetic thought to its target, divine Iḍā, Bhāratī outstripping all—let the three goddesses, having sat down on this ritual grass here, with their own power protect (its?) unbroken shelter.

9. Of tawny form, of good support [/easy to bear], conferring vigor, a hero desirous of the gods is born because of (Tvastar's?/the gods'?) attentive listening—let Tvaṣṭar unbind (our) navel and release the offspring to us. Then let (the sacrificial victim) go into the pen of the gods.

10. The Lord of the Forest [=sacrificial post] stands by on releasing (the victim). Agni will sweeten the oblation with his poetic thoughts.
Let him who knows (the way) lead the thrice-anointed one—(let) the divine Butcher (lead) the oblation up to the gods.

11. Ghee is attached (to him); ghee is his womb. He is propped in ghee, and ghee is his foundation.
In accord with your own power convey (the gods) hither; invigorate yourself. O bull, you will convey the oblation, prepared with the svāhā-call.

II.4 (195) Agni

Somāhuti Bhārgava
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn first concerns itself with the installation of the ritual fire (vss. 1–3). There follows a naturalistic description, rich in metaphor and simile, of a fire first catching and then flaming up (vss. 4–7). The hymn ends with two verses requesting benefits for the Gr̥tsamada clan (8–9). Oblique references to the myth of the recovery of the vanished fire in verses 2 and 9 provide the hymn with a larger ring-like structure.

1. I call for you upon the one of good brilliance, on Agni, the guest of the clans, who receives well-twisted (hymns), who receives very pleasurable offerings, who, like an envoy, has become desirable to install as god among the god-directed people, as Jātavedas.

2. This one here—having done honor (to him) in the seat of the waters— once again the Bhr̥gus have installed among the clans of Āyu.
Let him surmount all the worlds—Agni, the spoked wheel of the gods whose horses are lively.

3. Agni have the gods installed among the clans stemming from Manu, their own dear one, as those desiring to dwell peacefully (install) an envoy.
He will shine toward the nights desirous (of him), he whose skill is to be besought for the one rich in gifts in (his own) house.

4. His thriving, like one's own, brings delight; delightful is his whole appearance when he is being urged on, about to burn.
   He who is flicking his tongue hither and yon among the plants, like a steed at a chariot he keeps twitching his tail.
5. The formless mass [=smoke] of the wood-eater that they (first) marveled at to me, (that) color he changed as if for the fire-priests:
   he is (now) perceived in delight with his bright light, he who, having grown old, in an instant has become young.
6. Who, (eating) wood like one athirst, shines here; like water along a path, like chariot (wheels) he has sounded.
   Having a black road, red-hot, he appears bringing delight, smiling like heaven with its clouds [=his clouds of smoke].
7. He who has spread out, burning the broad (earth), like livestock without a herdsman he goes seeking his own way.
   Agni, enflamed, scorching the brushwood, with his black wayward course, has "sweetened," as it were, the ground.
8. Now, upon consideration of your previous help, a prayerful thought has been proclaimed to you at the third rite:
   o Agni, grant to us a prize of an array of heroes, a lofty cattle-rich one, and wealth in good descendants.
9. So that with you, o Agni, the Gr̥tsamadas, gaining (the one deposited) in secret [=Agni], might surmount those below,
   (the Gr̥tsamadas) possessing good heroes and overcoming hostility—(so) establish this vital energy for the singer along with his patrons.

II.5 (196) Agni

Somāhuti Bhārgava
8 verses: anuṣṭubh

As in II.1 we find an enumeration of various priestly functions/titles, but the identifications are more strictly tied to the ritual than in the former hymn, and each priest receives a verse of his own. Only in the last verse (8) does Agni appear as himself, without a separate priestly identity, to ensure the entire success of the sacrifice.

In verses 5–6 the references are somewhat obscure, but the ritual situation depicted seems to be the offering of melted butter into the fire; the butter offerings are identified as females, under the leadership of Agni as Neṣṭar, the priest who leads the Sacrificer's Wife in the later śrauta ritual. The referent of the "three" of verse 5 is quite obscure, though it must be feminine in gender. It is perhaps the "three watery maidens" associated with the sacrifice in III.56.5 and the three "women goddesses," also associated with water, who desire to provide food to Apām Napāt in II.35.5: their watery nature may explain Agni's preference for the buttery sisters.

Their number of three may allude to the trio of goddesses in the Āprī hymns (see, e.g., II.3.8), Sarasvatī, Iḍā, and Bhāratī.

The hymn provides valuable evidence for the technical details and the personnel and their duties of R̥gvedic ritual, which, though sharing much terminology and many procedures, nonetheless differs from the later, very well-documented, classical śrauta ritual of middle Vedic times.

1. As Hotar he has just been born, conspicuous, as a father to help his fathers [=priests], displaying noble goods. May we be able to control his prize-winning (horses [=flames]).
2. He to whom the seven reins are stretched—to the leader of the sacrifice—he, like Manu, (sets in motion) the heavenly eighth one—as Potar he sets in motion all this.
3. Or, when he has run after it, he will speak sacred formulations [bráhmāṇi] and pursue this (office of Brahman-priest):
   he has encompassed all poetic skills, like a felly a wheel.
4. Because simultaneously with his flame the flaming one has been born as Praśāstar by virtue of his will, the knowing one [=Agni] grows like (tree) branches, following his own firm commandments.
5. The lively milk-cows [=butter offerings] follow the "color" [=flame] of him (when he is) Neṣṭar.
   Surely the sisters [=streams of ghee] who have come here are (more) to his taste than the three ([watery] goddesses?)?
6. When the sister, bearing the ghee of the mother, has approached him, at the arrival of these, he, as Adhvaryu, is delighted, as grain is by rain.
7. Let him, as R̥tvij, make himself R̥tvij, to suckle himself.
   Praise and sacrifice have we given. Then fittingly may we win (their reward).
8. So that the knowing one [=Agni] will make (it) fitting for all those (gods) worthy of the sacrifice, this, o Agni, (should be) here in you—the sacrifice which we have performed.

II.6 (197) Agni

Somāhuti Bhārgava
8 verses: gāyatrī

There is nothing particularly striking in this hymn, which treats the usual themes of our ritual service to Agni and the rewards we expect in turn. But it is deftly done and economically expressed in the short gāyatrī meter, with patterned repetitions perceptible even in translation (see, e.g., vss. 1, 3, 5). The final two verses present the common image of Agni as envoy and messenger between the human and divine worlds.

1. This kindling stick of mine here, o Agni, this reverence may you long for, and these songs—hear them well.
2. With this (song) we would do honor to you, o Agni, child of nourishment, seeker of horses—with this well-said (hymn), o well-born one.
3. You who have a longing for songs (we would serve) with songs; you seeking chattels, o chattel-giver, we would serve, ourselves seeking service.
4. Become our bounteous patron, o lord of goods who gives goods.
   Keep hatreds away from us.
5. Do you (give) us rain from heaven; do you (give) us an unassailable prize; do you (give) us refreshments in the thousands.
6. To the one reverently invoking, to the one seeking help, o youngest messenger,
   o Hotar most deserving the sacrifice, come here at our song.
7. For, o Agni, sage poet, as the one who knows, you speed between both breeds [=human and divine]
   as messenger—like one serving both his own people and their allies.
8. As the one who knows, you will please (the gods) here, and, o observant one, you will sacrifice to them in due order, and you will sit here on this ritual grass.

II.7 (198) Agni

Somāhuti Bhārgava
6 verses: gāyatrī

In this short hymn Agni is twice (vss. 1 and 5) identified as a Bhārata, "son of Bharata" or "belonging to the Bharata lineage," a name and designation that becomes very prominent in later times and, of course, furnishes the name of the great epic, the Mahābhārata. The family is less prominent in the Ṛgveda, but is mentioned in telling passages in Maṇḍalas III, VI, and VII; the Bhārata fire is mentioned in several other passages like the ones in this hymn. As Proferes argues (2007: 36–37), Agni is often identified with the tribal king, and "the most commonly mentioned tribal fire is that of the Bharata," which is "specifically linked to the military power of the tribe." Although that theme is not insistent here, the hostilities and hatreds mentioned in verses 2–3 against which Agni's aid is besought evoke this idea.

The hymn also illustrates, more clearly than usual, the poetic use of the metaphorical extension of ritual practices. In verse 4 the fire is "bepoured" (ā́hutaḥ) with streams of melted butter, a standard ritual action, which therefore would arouse no special interest in the audience; in verse 5 it is also "bepoured"—the same adjective in the same position in the verse—but with entities considerably less liquid: various bovines, expressed in technical stock-breeding language, which serve as animal sacrifices in the later śrauta ritual. The audience would certainly take note of this clash of concepts and metaphorically extend either the adjective (from "bepoured" to "offered to") or the offerings (not the cows, but their product, the ghee). What is unusual in this hymn is that verse 4 explicitly provides the normal template against which verse 5 must be interpreted. Ordinarily we encounter only the off-balance expression, and must ourselves summon the normal one from the formulaic and conceptual stock held in common by the audience.

1. Youngest Agni, belonging to the Bharatas, bear hither the best brilliant wealth, craved by many, o good one.
2. Let hostility of god and mortal not gain mastery over us.
   Rescue us from it and from hatred.
3. And with you may we, as if across watery streams, plunge across all hatreds.
4. O pure Agni, to be extolled, blazing you shine out loftily, when you are bepoured with ghee(-stream)s.
5. You, o Agni belonging to the Bharatas, are "bepoured" [=offered to] with our mated cows, with bulls, with eight-footed [=pregnant] (cows).
6. His food is wood, his potion melted butter—the primordial Hotar worthy to be chosen, son of strength, infallible.

II.8 (199) Agni

Gr̥tsamada
6 verses: gāyatrī

A simple hymn in many ways, but with a small twist. The mention of the seer and poet Atri in verse 5 is surprising: Atri is the poet of the Vth Maṇḍala and is otherwise not found in II. However, in the immediately preceding verse the apparently innocent simile "like the sun with its radiance" (svàr ṇá bhānúnā) encodes a reference to a famous myth in which Atri rescues the sun from a supposed demon Svarbhānu. As I have argued (Jamison 1991: 264–67), Svarbhānu is actually Agni, and therefore this little hymn makes sly reference to the myth of the Sun, wounded by Agni (because of the Sun's incest with his own daughter) and healed by Atri.

1. As a prize-seeker (praises) his chariots, now praise the yoke(d teams) of Agni, the most glorious one, who grants rewards,
2. Who offers good guidance to the one doing pious work, himself unaging but aging the other, whose countenance is lovely when he is bepoured,
3. Who with his beauty is proclaimed in the houses at evening and at dawn, whose commandment is not confounded,
4. Who, like the sun with its radiance, shines forth bright with his flame, anointing himself with his own unaging (flames).
5. Atri and Agni, (each) according to his own sovereignty, have the solemn pronouncements strengthened.
   He has laid on himself all beauties.
6. May we be accompanied by the help of Agni, of Indra, of Soma, of (all) the gods—not suffering harm. May we surmount those who do battle.

II.9 (200) Agni

Gr̥tsamada
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins with a 3rd-person past-time reference to the installation of Agni, and seems also to refer obliquely to the myth of Agni's disappearance and recovery by the gods. After verse 1 it switches to the 2nd person and present/future time, with standard praise of Agni and prayers for benefits from him.

1. (As) Hotar, once found, he sat down in the Hotar's seat, glittering, shining, very skillful, giving forethought to his unfalsifiable commandments, the best one bringing a thousand (goods), flame-tongued Agni.
2. You are the messenger, and you are our protector afar; you, bull, are our leader to a better (state).
   O Agni, for the prolonging of our progeny and of our own selves, become, as you shine, a herdsman who does not stay away.
3. We would do honor to you, Agni, in your highest birth; we would do honor with praises in your seat below.
   The womb from which you arose, I sacrifice to that. The oblations have been poured forth into you, when kindled.
4. O Agni, perform sacrifice yourself with an oblation, as superior sacrificer. With attentive hearing greet giving and generosity, for you are the wealth-lord of wealth, you the minder of brilliant speech.

5. As you are born day after day, wondrous one, your goods of both types are not exhausted:
   Agni, make the singer rich in cattle; make him lord of wealth in good descendants.
6. With your visage here, (be) easy to find, the sacrificer to the gods who best brings them to sacrifice with blessing.
   Undeceivable herdsman and our protector afar, o Agni, brilliantly and richly shine for us.

II.10 (201) Agni

Gr̥tsamada
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This last hymn in the brief Gr̥tsamada Agni cycle is defined by a ring: the first word (johū́traḥ "invoked on every side") is echoed by the last word (johavīmi "I constantly invoke"), and there are a number of word plays throughout the hymn. The hymn's structure defines as an omphalos verse 3, especially the second half, which contains the opaque hapax śíriṇāyām, here tentatively rendered as "(birth-)canal." Verse 3, the mysterious center of the poem, describes the creation of fire in terms of human conception and birth and expresses the paradox that such a powerful force can be invisibly confined in the inert wood. The last verse (6) contains a pun, "with a tongue seeking speech," applicable to both Agni and the poet: for Agni it is the flame as tongue, seeking the poet's praise hymn; for the poet, it is his own tongue, seeking efficacious wording for the same hymn.

1. Agni is invoked first on every side like a father, when he is kindled by Manu in the footprint of refreshment, dressing himself in beauty, immortal and discriminating, frequently to be groomed and worthy of fame: he is the prize-winning (steed).
2. May he please hear my call—Agni of bright radiance—along with all my songs—he immortal and discriminating.
   Two dark brown horses convey his chariot, or two red ones. And two ruddy ones certainly he has made his (team), he who is dispersed in many places.
3. In her with (legs) agape [=kindling sticks] they engendered him whose birth is easy. Agni becomes the embryo in the (women) of many ornaments [=logs].
   In (the birth-)canal [?] also he dwells by night, (though) because of his powers he cannot be confined, the discerning one.
4. I sprinkle Agni with an oblation, with ghee, as he abides peacefully facing all the creatures,

(and he then) takes on (this) appearance: broad across, lofty in his vigor, most voluminous through his foods [=wood], overpowering.

5. Him who faces out in all directions do I sprinkle: with an undemonic spirit may he enjoy it.
(Though) he has the beauty of a young blood and questing "color" [=flame], Agni is not to be touched when he is quivering with his body.
6. May you please recognize (your) share, (though you can) display your might at will. With you as messenger may we speak like Manu.
Agni, without deficiency, mixing with honey, with (my/his) tongue seeking speech, do I, winning prizes, continually invoke.

II.11 (202) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
21 verses: virāṭsthānā triṣṭubh, except triṣṭubh 21

Judging from its frequent references to the winds, this Indra hymn was composed to accompany the day's first soma-pressing, which anciently belonged especially to Indra and Vāyu, the Wind. It is also a good example of the complexity of R̥gvedic poetry. The poet uses ellipses and ambiguous reference to suggest the union of the acts of the accompanying ritual and the action of the myth. In verse 3, for example, the "resplendent" (śubhrá) ones who run to the wind are the Maruts, the gods who so often accompany Indra. But the adjective "resplendent" is also used of soma, and therefore the verse carries a second, suggested meaning that the offering of soma goes to the Wind, who receives the soma along with Indra. Or again, in verses 7–8, it appears at first as though the mountain described there is one of the mountains settled by Indra when he made the world habitable. But this mountain is described in odd ways: it does not falter; it bellows with its mothers; and it roars—descriptions that force a reconsideration of its identity. Elsewhere these epithets characterize the fire, which is "settled" by priests on the sacrificial area. Thus, the creative actions of the god and the ritual actions of the priests are placed in parallel and made reflexes of one another. For a detailed analysis of this hymn, which seeks to demonstrate its double reference to myth and ritual, see Brereton (1985).

1. Hear our summons, Indra! Intend us no harm! We would be those to be given good things by you.
For these nourishments, like flowing rivers, strengthen you in their quest for good things.
2. You let loose the great (waters), Indra, which you swelled—the many (waters) surrounded by the serpent [=Vr̥tra], o champion.
You cut down the Dāsa [=Vr̥tra], even though he thought he was immortal, when you became strong through the hymns.

3. (Delight) now in just these hymns in which you delight, o champion, and in Rudrian praise songs, Indra.
These (waters), in which you are finding exhilaration, run forth just to you as the resplendent ones (run forth) to the Wind [=Vāyu].
4. Now (that we) are strengthening your resplendent explosiveness, are placing in your arms your resplendent mace, resplendent are you, Indra, as you have become strong among us. Along with the sun, you should overcome the Dāsa clans.
5. The one placed in hiding, the hidden one hiding amid the waters, the wily one dwelling under cover and blocking the waters and the heaven—(that) serpent you smashed by your heroic deed, o champion.
6. Now I shall praise your ancient, great deeds, Indra, and we shall praise your present deeds.
I shall praise the eager mace in your arms. I shall praise your fallow bays, twin beacons of the sun.
7. Now your two fallow bays, competing for the prize, Indra, have cried out their cry, dripping with ghee.
The land has spread out equally in all directions. Even the mountain, which was about to run, has come to rest.
8. The mountain, never faltering, has been set down. Bellowing with its mothers, it roared.
Making their voice strong to the furthest distance, they [=priests or Maruts?] spread out the vein [=the sap-rich soma stalk or a watercourse?] that was impelled by Indra.
9. Indra kicked away wily Vr̥tra, lying upon the great river.
The two worlds trembled in fear before the mace of him, the bull roaring and roaring again.
10. The mace of him, the bull, bellowed again and again when (Indra), the ally of Manu, was about to grind down (Vr̥tra), the enemy of Manu.
He brought low the wiles of the wily son of Dānu, when he had drunk of the pressed soma.
11. Drink and drink the soma, o Indra, our champion! Let the exhilarating soma-pressings exhilarate you.
As they fill your cheeks, let them strengthen you. When properly pressed among the Paura, (the soma) has helped Indra.
12. We inspired poets have abided by you, Indra. Serving according to the truth, we would gain insight.
Seeking your help, we would create for ourselves a proclamation of your praise. On this very day, we would be those to be given wealth by you.
13. Indra, might we be those of yours who are accompanied by your help, since, seeking your help, we make your nourishment strong.
Grant us the most explosive wealth in which we will delight, o god—that consisting of heroic men.

14. Grant us peaceful dwelling. Grant us alliance. Grant us a Marutian warrior band, o Indra.
    And they who jointly are finding exhilaration—(those) Winds drink the first offering.
15. Now let just those (soma juices) pursue you—those among whom (you) are becoming exhilarated. Steadfastly drink our soma to your satisfaction, Indra.
    (Be) near to us in battles, o surpassing one. You have strengthened heaven through lofty chants.
16. Now just those lofty ones [=priests], who will try to win your favor, o you surpassing one, either by their hymns or in strewing the ritual grass that provides (you) a dwelling place, have come to the prize, helped just by you, Indra.
17. Now, finding exhilaration among just these powerful (soma drops), o champion, drink the soma among the Trikadrukas [=the Maruts?], Indra, again and again shaking out (the soma) in your beard, becoming pleased. Travel to the soma-drinking with your two fallow bays.
18. Take to yourself the vast power, o champion, by which you cut down Vṛtra, the son of Dānu, that son of a spider!
    You uncovered the light for the Ārya; the Dasyu has been set down to the left, Indra.
19. We would win!—we who by your help are overcoming all rivals, the Dasyus along with the Ārya.
    That was for us: that you made Viśvarūpa, son of Tvaṣṭar, submit to Trita, one of your circle of companions.
20. Having grown strong on this, Trita's exhilarating (soma) that was being pressed, he laid low Arbuda.
    He rolled (Namuci's head) like the sun its wheel. Together with the Aṅgirases, Indra split the Vala cave.
21. Now should the generous priestly gift yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
    Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.12 (203) Indra

Gṛtsamada
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This is one of the better known and most widely anthologized hymns to Indra. Its distinctive rhetorical mark is its refrain, "he, o peoples, is Indra." The "peoples" (jána) refer to the Vedic peoples, and the hymn repeatedly returns to Indra's past victories over non-Vedic beings with the promise of future victories.

The hymn portrays Indra as a successful warrior. It begins with his origin (vs. 1) and then refers to his great deeds through which the world was created and made inhabitable (vss. 2–3). The poet then announces Indra's victory over Dāsas, Dasyus, and other enemies and his aid for his worshippers and allies (vss. 4–10). Toward the end of the hymn, the poet mentions Indra's famous victories over his demonized, if not quite demonic, enemies (vss. 11–12). Then he returns to Indra's rule over the cosmos (vs. 13) and his help for those now making ritual offerings to him (vss. 14–15).

One verse that has attracted particular attention is verse 5, which says that there are some who wonder where Indra is and who declare that Indra "does not exist." These appear to be Vedic people who question Indra's power and who, in denying Indra and refusing to perform the rituals, approximate the Dāsas, whom Indra defeats (vs. 4). The poet insists that they should be aware of Indra as the "terrifying" (ghorá) one and trust in him. At the end, in 15b, after recounting his great exploits, the poet himself confidently asserts that Indra is indeed real. The reality of Indra may signify not only his existence as a powerful god, but more especially his actual presence at the poet's sacrifice.

1. Who, even when just born, was the foremost thinker, the god who by his own will tended to the gods, before whose explosiveness the world-halves trembled in fear because of the greatness of his manliness – he, o peoples, is Indra.
2. Who made firm the wavering earth, who settled the quaking mountains, who gave the midspace wider measure, who propped up the heaven – he, o peoples, is Indra.
3. Who, having smashed the serpent, let flow the seven rivers, who drove away the cattle by uncovering Vala, who produced the fire between two stones, gathering the winnings in contests – he, o peoples, is Indra.
4. By whom all these exploits have been done: who has put the Dāsa tribe below and hidden away, who, has taken the riches of the stranger, as a winning gambling champion does the wager – he, o peoples, is Indra.
5. The terrifying one about whom they always ask, "Where is he?"—and they say of him, "He does not exist!"— he diminishes the riches of the stranger like the stakes. Put trust in him! – he, o peoples, is Indra.
6. Who is the invigorator of the enfeebled, who of the starving, who of the formulator of hymns, of the weak one needing help, who with fair lips is the helper of the one who has yoked the pressing stones, of him with soma pressed – he, o peoples, is Indra.
7. Under whose direction are the horses, under whose the cows, under whose the nomadic bands, and under whose all the chariots, who has given birth to the sun and who to the dawn, who is the guide of the waters – he, o peoples, is Indra.

8. Whom the two war-cries, clashing together, call upon in rivalry—the enemies on both sides, here and over there—even the two who have mounted the same chariot [=the chariot-warrior and charioteer] call on him separately – he, o peoples, is Indra.
9. Without whom peoples do not win, whom they call upon for help as they fight, who has become a match for everyone, who is the mover of the immovable – he, o peoples, is Indra.
10. Who has struck with his arrow those constantly creating for themselves great guilt, the unthinking ones, who does not concede arrogance to the arrogant man, who is the smasher of the Dasyu – he, o peoples, is Indra.
11. Who in the fortieth autumn discovered Śambara dwelling in the mountains, who smashed the serpent displaying its strength, the son of Dānu, (thereby) lying (dead) – he, o peoples, is Indra.
12. The mighty seven-reined bull who let loose the seven rivers to flow, who, with his mace in his arms, kicked away the son of Rohiṇī as he was ascending to heaven – he, o peoples, is Indra.
13. Even heaven and earth bow to him; even the mountains fear his explosiveness.
The soma-drinker who is renowned as the one bearing the mace in his arms, as the one bearing the mace in his hands – he, o peoples, is Indra.
14. Who helps through his help the one pressing soma, the one cooking (an offering), the one praising, the one laboring, whose is the strengthening formulation, is the soma, is this gift – he, o peoples, is Indra.
15. You who rip free the prize of victory for the one pressing, the one cooking, even before a stubborn (foe)—you are certainly real!
We (will be) dear to you throughout all the days, Indra. Having good heroes, we would announce the ritual distribution.

II.13 (204) Indra

Gṛtsamada
13 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 13

The opening verses of this hymn leave the subject often unstated and often unclear in part because, as in the preceding hymns, there is often a double reference to ritual acts and either mythical or natural events. Thus, while details remain uncertain, the first verses describe the soma sacrifice, seen as a creation of Indra. This ritual context is established in verse 1, in which the subject is likely the soma or the soma plant. The birth of the soma plant occurs in its proper time of year, and therefore its mother is the ṛtú, its "season." However, the soma is also born at the proper ritual moment, and therefore its mother is also ṛtú, which can also refer to the "ritual sequence." Then in verse 2, again without naming him, the poet introduces Indra—or apparently does so—through associating Indra's release of the waters with the flowing, soma-bearing waters of the rite.

Verses 3–4 describe the acts of the ritual, although in 4b, the identity of several of the actors is not certain. The one "who comes" could be soma or Indra or even the fire (as Geldner suggests with a different interpretation of the ellipsis). The poet turns to Indra's heroic deeds in verse 5—although the waters which he released connect these deeds to the ritual—and then in verse 6, to an explicit description of Indra's ritual acts. Verse 7 poses a number of interpretive difficulties, but in pāda a, the "flowering and fruitful" might be plants generally or the soma plants; in pāda b, the streams might be waters or specifically ritual waters; and in pāda d, the ūrvá, the "containers," might refer to the oceans as containers of water in a cosmic register or the containers of soma in a ritual one.

Verses 8–12 mention other of Indra's deeds. In verse 9 Geldner suggests that Indra bound his enemies by a magically induced sleep and thus by that "which has no ropes." See also II.15.9, where Indra conquers his enemies by putting them to sleep. Verse 12, returning to the conjunction of heroic and ritual deed and to the theme of rivers and waters, may speak not (or not only) of Indra's rescue of a person who was blind and lame, but of Indra's role in producing the soma hidden in the plant before it is pressed out (cf. II.15.7).

1. His mother is the season. From her, as soon as he was born, he [=soma] entered among the waters, in whom he grows strong.
   Then he became a voluptuous woman, swelling with milk. The plant's first beestings—that one is worthy of hymns.
2. Toward a single goal they [=the waters] come, bringing milk throughout. They bring forth sustenance for him [=Indra?] who is all mother's milk (for us).
   The downward sloping (watercourses) share the same road to flow along. You, who did these things first, are worthy of hymns.
3. One [=the Hotar] accompanies what he gives with his speech. Another [=the Adhvaryu] hastens at his work, changing the forms (of the soma).
   He [=soma] withstands all the blows of another [=the pressing stone]. You, the one who did these things first, are worthy of hymns.
4. They [=the priests] sit, apportioning prosperity to their children [=their fires], apportioning, like wealth, the back (of the fire?) as it arches forth to him [=the soma?] who comes.

Insatiable, he [=the fire] eats the food of his father [=the priest] with his teeth. You, the one who did these things first, are worthy of hymns.

5. Then you made the earth to see heaven—you, who cleared the paths of the streams, o smasher of the serpent.
The gods gave birth to you, the god, by their praise songs, like a winning horse by waters. You are worthy of hymns.
6. You, who distribute sustenance and increase, have milked the dry [=the soma plant] together with its honey [=the soma] out of the wet [=rain].
You have hidden a treasure [=soma] in Vivasvant [=the sun]. You alone are the master of everything. You are worthy of hymns.
7. You, who established separately the flowering and fruitful (plants) according to the foundation (of each) and the streams at their division; and you, who gave birth to the unequalled flashings of heaven; you, the wide one surrounding the containers—you are worthy of hymns.
8. You, who, in order to strike down Pr̥kṣa and Dāsaveśa, conveyed the son of Nr̥mara together with his goods to the impregnable mouth of the Ūrjayantī (River) and who even today (would do likewise); you, who do many deeds—you are worthy of hymns.
9. Or when you helped him, the hard-driving one—at whose obedience (to you), though he was alone, you bound his hundred times ten (enemies) all at once—you tied up the Dasyus for Dabhīti in what has no ropes, and you belonged to him who ritually pursues you well. You are worthy of hymns.
10. All things that obstruct have conceded that manliness is his. They have set themselves as the stakes for the successful gambler.
You propped up the six far-flung (spaces), and you were on every side of the five sights [=the visible directions] and beyond. You are worthy of hymns.
11. Your heroism, o hero, is good to proclaim: that by your resolve alone you take possession of goods.
The vigor (belonging to you, who are) born steadfast and possessing strength, is preeminent. All the things that you have done—(for these) you, Indra, are worthy of hymns.
12. You halted the course of the Sarapas (River) for Turvīti and Vayya to cross.
You led him up who was sunk down and shunned, making famed the blind one and the lame. You are worthy of hymns.
13. Make your aim to give that gift to us, o good one—your store of goods is great—the bright (gift), o Indra, through which you will seek fame throughout the days. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.14 (205) Indra

Gṛtsamada
12 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is a surprisingly straightforward summons to the Adhvaryu priests to offer the soma and a catalogue of the heroic deeds that have earned Indra the offerings. Verse 7 is particularly interesting since Kutsa (or Purukutsa), Āyu, and Atithigva Divodāsa are normally allies rather than enemies of Indra as they are here. Elsewhere (I.53.10 and VI.18.13), however, Indra appears as an ally of the little-known ruler named Tūrvayāṇa and helps him defeat these three.

1. Adhvaryus! Bring the soma to Indra. With the tankards, pour here the exhilarating stalk, because the hero is ever desirous of his drink. Offer to the bull: he wishes just that.
2. Adhvaryus! Who struck, like a tree with a spear, Vṛtra, who had enclosed the waters, to him bring this (soma) since he desires it. This Indra deserves to drink it.
3. Adhvaryus! Who struck Dṛbhīka and who drove up the cattle—for he had opened the cave—to him (bring) this (soma), (rushing swiftly) like the wind within the midspace. Cover Indra with the soma juices, as a fast horse (is covered) with blankets (after a race).
4. Adhvaryus! Who smashed Uraṇa, who had stretched forth his nine and ninety arms, and who pressed Arbuda down to the depth—urge Indra onward at the bringing of soma.
5. Adhvaryus! Who struck Aśna, who the voracious Śuṣṇa, who the cobra [=Vṛtra], who Pipru and Namuci, who Rudhikrā—to Indra offer of the soma plant.
6. Adhvaryus! Who split the hundred, the many fortresses of Śambara as with a stone, and who scattered afar the hundred, the thousand (warriors) of Varcin—to him bring soma.
7. Adhvaryus! Who, having struck them, scattered here the hundred, the thousand on the lap of the earth, and slung down the heroes of Kutsa, Āyu, and Atithigva—to him bring soma.

8. Adhvaryus! What you will desire, o men, you will attain that with Indra, by bearing (offerings) in obedience.
Bring what is purified by your hand to the one who is famed. To Indra offer soma, o you eager to sacrifice.
9. Adhvaryus! Act in obedience to him! Lead upward in the wood [=the soma cup] what is purified downward in the wood [=the soma vat]!
Being pleased, he has bellowed toward your handiwork. To Indra offer the exhilarating soma.
10. Adhvaryus! Like the udder of a cow with milk, fill Indra the Provider with soma juices.
I know of him; this has been brought home to me: the one worthy of the sacrifice takes notice of him who strives to give more.
11. Adhvaryus! Who is king of the heavenly good, who of the land's earthly good, fill Indra with soma juices, like a granary with barley. Let that be your labor.
12. Make your aim to give that gift to us, o good one—your store of goods is great—the bright (gift), o Indra, through which you will seek fame throughout the days. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.15 (206) Indra

Gṛtsamada
10 verses: triṣṭubh

As the hymn announces at the beginning, this is a proclamation of Indra's great deeds, a fact that is underlined in the refrain, "Indra did these things." With some exceptions, the deeds are straightforwardly described. In verse 5, as Geldner remarks, the reference is to the story of Turvaśa and Yadu and that of Turvīti and Vayya, whom Indra rescued from the waters. They were "non-bathers" because they could not swim through the roaring waters, but Indra held back the strong currents so that they could cross. The story in verse 6a that Indra made the síndhu, the Indus (or perhaps simply "the river"), flow backward is otherwise unknown. The story that Indra fought and defeated Dawn in 6c is mentioned elsewhere (cf. esp. IV.30.8–11), but it is unclear who the "unswift" males and "swift" females in 6c might be and why they are described as "hewn apart." In verse 7, as in II.13.12, the verse may conceal Indra's ritual act of bringing forth the soma. In support of this interpretation are the echoes of ritual acts also in preceding verses, such as the references to the ritual seats and possibly the laying out of the ritual ground (in vs. 3) and bathing (in vs. 5). Or verse 7 may allude to Indra's cosmogonic acts. Verse 8 refers to the Vala story, in which Indra splits the cave and freed the cattle for the Aṅgirases. In 9c, the description of an elderly man (cf. VIII.45.20) or infirm man who finds riches despite his ailments may simply underline Dabhīti's unexpected success.

1. Now I shall proclaim the great deeds of him the great one, the real acts of the real one.
   He drank of the pressed soma among the Trikadrukas [=the Maruts?].
   In its exhilaration Indra smashed the serpent.
2. He propped up lofty heaven on (the midspace) that has no pole. He filled the two world-halves and the midspace.
   He held the earth fast and spread it out. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
3. Like (ritual) seats, he fixed (the rivers) eastward with his measuring rods: by his mace, he drilled out channels for the rivers;
   by his choice, he released them along paths stretching far away. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
4. Having surrounded the raiders against Dabhīti, he burned their every weapon in the kindled fire.
   He brought him together with cows, horses, and chariots. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
5. He stopped the great, tumultuous (river) from going. He made the non-bathers cross over safely.
   Having risen from this bath, they set out toward wealth. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
6. By his greatness he made the Sindhu to flow northward, and with his mace he completely crushed the ox cart of Dawn, while hewing apart the unswift ones by the swift ones. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
7. Knowing the maidens' concealment (of him but) becoming manifest, he stood up—he who was shunned:
   the lame one stood firm; the blind one looked afar. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
8. Being sung by the Aṅgirases, he split the cave. He broke apart the fortifications of the mountain and cleared their fashioned obstructions. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.
9. Having scattered sleep on Cumuri and Dhuni, you smashed the Dasyu and helped Dabhīti.
   Though leaning on a staff, he found gold there. – In soma's exhilaration Indra did these things.

10. Now should the generous priestly gift yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.16 (207) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 9

The hymn begins with an announcement of the sacrifice to Indra, whose greatness and strength entitle him to it. The middle verses of this hymn (vss. 4–6) present Indra as the bull of the sacrifice and indeed describe all the other principal constituents of the sacrifice also as bulls. The portrayal of Indra as a bull in these verses contrasts with that in verse 8, in which Indra is compared to a cow. However, this image of Indra as a cow sets up the final verse (9). In this verse, which is also the final verse of II.15–20, the poet compares the dakṣiṇā, or priestly gift he hopes to receive, to a generous cow.

1. I carry forward your good praise, like an oblation into a fire being kindled, for him who is the most preeminent of beings:
we call upon Indra for help—himself unaging but causing to age, a full-grown youth from of old.
2. Lofty Indra, without whom there is nothing, in him all facets of a hero are gathered:
in his belly he carries the soma, in his body great strength, in his hand a mace, and in his head resolve.
3. Your Indrian power cannot be encompassed by the twin battle cries [=heaven and earth], nor can your chariot by the seas and the mountains, o Indra.
No one is equal to your mace when with your swift (horses) you fly through many leagues.
4. Since all carry their resolve to him, the one worthy of the sacrifice, the daring one, to the bull following (that resolve),
(so), as a bull who knows more, perform the sacrifice for yourself with the oblation: drink the soma, Indra, by means of the bull [=Agni], by means of his radiance.
5. The vat of the bull [=soma], the wave of honey, purifies itself for the bull [=Indra], whose food is the bull, to drink it.
The two Adhvaryus are bulls, and the pressing stones are bulls. They press soma the bull for the bull.

6. Your mace is a bull and your chariot is a bull. Your two fallow bays are bulls, and your weapons are bulls.
   O bull, you are the master of the bull that is the exhilarating drink. Indra, take your fill of the bull soma.
7. Within the assembly, (I send) forth to you my eloquent (formulation), like a boat, and through my poetic formulation I travel daringly among the soma-pressings.
   He will be aware of this speech of ours, will he not? We will draw upon Indra as upon a wellspring for what is good.
8. Before distress (strikes), turn here toward us, like a cow, milk-swollen from the pasture, toward her calf.
   At once we would happily unite with your favors, o you of a hundred resolves, like bulls with their wives.
9. Now should the generous priestly reward yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
   Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.17 (208) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8–9

This hymn encourages Indra to show the power that he showed at the beginning—both his beginning and the beginning of the world. There are several references to Indra's youth: the time when he received his mace from his father, Tvaṣṭar (vs. 6), and when he obtained his first nurture (vs. 2). The first nurture may refer to the first soma offering in the rite and also to the first soma Indra ever drank. His origins are also the origins of the world, and the hymn catalogues his great, creative deeds: he established heaven and earth and settled the mountains (vs. 5), he opened the cave to release the cattle (vs. 1), he defeated Vr̥tra (vs. 6), and he sent the waters flowing (vss. 3, 5). The poet calls upon Indra to give sustenance to him just as he has received sustenance (vss. 7, 8) and to give to him a measure of wealth just as Indra showed the measure of his power in creating the world (vs. 7).

Striking is pāda 6b, which says that Tvaṣṭar made Indra's mace "from every race," meaning from both gods and mortals, and "out of his knowledge," perhaps his knowledge of all creatures (cf. IV.42.3, cited by Geldner although to make a different point) or alternatively, "out of their possessions." That is to say, the weapon by which Indra performs his great deeds draws on the totality of humans and gods for its power. Oldenberg observed that the juxtaposition of the words janúṣo védas ("race… knowledge [/possession]") recalls the epithet

Jātavedas, which describes Agni as the continuous presence throughout the sacrificial day and the guarantor of the continuity of the human lineage. Perhaps this constitutes an oblique reference to the totality of gods and mortals that becomes Indra's weapon.

1. As did the Aṅgirases, chant this new (chant) to him, so that his explosive powers rise up as in ancient times when, through his strength and in the exhilaration of soma, he razed all the firmly fixed cow pens, enclosed on every side.
2. Let him (once again) become the one who, showing the measure of his power, crossed beyond greatness to obtain the first nurture.
   The champion, who girded his body in battles, fastened heaven in its greatness on his head.
3. Then you did the first, great heroic deed, when, at its beginning, you roused your explosive power through the poetic formulation.
   Spurred by the chariot-rider with his fallow bay horses, the lively (waters) flow forth separately toward the same goal.
4. Then he who grew strong over all the worlds by his greatness, acting as their master, projecting his youthful vitality, after that, (becoming a) draft-horse, he spanned the two world-halves with light; upon sewing up the bilious shades of darkness, he wrapped them all together.
5. Through his power, he fixed firmly the mountains sliding forward, and he made the labor of the waters to be sliding downward.
   He made fast the all-nurturing earth, and by his wiles he propped up the heaven (to keep it) from falling.
6. That was fit for him, for his two arms—what his father made from every race and out of his knowledge—that mace by which he, with mighty roar, smashed the worm and twisted it down to lie upon the earth.
7. Like a woman aging at home, remaining with her parents, from our common ritual seat, I beg you to be our Fortune.
   Make a visible sign, give us a measure, and bring it here. Give a portion to me myself by which you will show your readiness to give.
8. We would call upon you, Indra, to be our sustainer. You are the giver, Indra, of labors and of victory's prizes.
   Help us, Indra, with your shimmering help! Indra, you bull, make us better!
9. Now should the generous priestly gift yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
   Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.18 (209) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
9 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn centers on Indra's chariot, which, the poet hopes, will carry Indra to his sacrifice and not to the sacrifice of any of his rivals (vss. 3, 7). Indra's chariot is also the sacrifice itself. According to Sāyaṇa, its four yokes are the four soma-pressing stones; the three whips are the three pitches used in recitation; the seven reins are the seven meters; and—the least likely of Sāyaṇa's identifications—the ten oars are the ten planets "that rescue from evil beings" (etymologizing arítra "oar" as ari "enemy" + trā "rescue") or the ten Camasādhvaryus. In a lengthy note Witzel and Gotō suggest other possibilities for such numbers. With regard to the world, three may be the three worlds or the three positions of the sun, four the four directions, seven the seven rivers, and so on. In relation to the sacrifice, three might be the three sacrificial fires or the three soma cups, four (or four times four) the number of priests, seven the three (fires, cups) plus the four (priests) or the seven priests mentioned in II.5.2, ten the seven (priests) plus the three (fires, cups) or ten fingers, ten fires, ten soma vessels, et cetera. All that said, however, the specific identifications are less important than the possibility of finding many identifications and the generally increasing numbers (4, 3, 7, 10). These project a picture of the chariot as encompassing all aspects of the sacrifice and of the world.

Verse 2 begins with another enumeration. Here the first, second, and third might be the three soma offerings of the sacrificial day or the three fires of the sacrificial ground. The second half of verse 2 turns to a key moment in the sacrifice, the birth of Agni out of the fire-kindling stick. The newly born Agni keeps company with "the others," but once again who or what these others are is unclear: they might be the sacrificial fires, the sacrificial offerings, the gods, or even other priests. From verse 3 the poet's attention turns especially to Indra's chariot-horses, whose number progressively increases from two (vss. 3, 4) to a hundred (vs. 6). This increasing number suggests that these horses might correspond to an aspect of the sacrifice that carries Indra to the sacrificial area. For the poet there are few greater attractions for Indra than the ritual recitations, and therefore these horses may be the words of these recitations, which like these horses multiply as the hymn is recited. Note that śaténa "with a hundred" is the hundredth word of the hymn. Once again, however, the multiplication of horses is also an indication of the fluidity of this hymn's numerology and another signal that Indra's chariot comprehends the whole of the sacrifice and the world.

1. Early in the morning a new, victorious chariot is yoked up with four yokes, three whips, and seven reins.
   Having ten oars, the sun-winning (chariot) belonging to the sons of Manu becomes swift through our wishes and thoughts.

2. He is fit for him [=Indra] for the first time, for the second, for the third— he the Hotar of Manu [=Agni].
   Some [=priests] give birth (to him [=Agni]), the infant of another [=ará̄ṇi fem., the fire-kindling stick], and he keeps company with the others— he the noble bull.
3. Now I shall yoke the two fallow bays to Indra's chariot by a new, well-spoken speech in order that he come.
   Let other sacrificers—for inspired poets are many—not stop you in this.
4. With your two fallow bays, Indra, journey here, with your four and with your six, when you are summoned, with your eight and your ten, to the soma-drinking. Here is the pressed soma, generous one: do not disdain it.
5. Journey here, right nearby, with your twenty and your thirty, yoking up with your forty fallow bays, with your fifty pulling your good chariot, Indra, with your sixty and your seventy, to the soma-drinking.
6. Journey here, right nearby, with your eighty and your ninety, being conveyed by your hundred fallow bays, for here is your soma among the Śunahotras, Indra, which has been poured all around seeking you for your exhilaration.
7. Journey here to my poetic formulation, Indra. Put all the pairs of fallow bays on the yoke-pole of the chariot, for you have become the one to be competitively summoned in many places. In this soma-pressing, you warrior, find your exhilaration.
8. No one will keep my companionship away from Indra. The priestly gift should yield its milk to us.
   In his preeminent protection and in his hand, we would be those having victory in our every advance.
9. Now should the generous priestly gift yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
   Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.19 (210) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn invokes Indra in his many roles as a warrior. It begins with Indra's greatest deed, the destruction of Vr̥tra (vss. 2–4). Although the Vr̥tra story concerns principally the release of the waters, verses 4–5 connect it also with the release of the sun, which takes place "in a single day." This may be a reference to the ritual day, since the Morning Pressing may be connected with the release of the dawns and the Midday Pressing with the release of the waters, or it may reflect the tendency elsewhere to fold the release of light into the effects of the Indra's victory over Vr̥tra (cf. I.32.4). The poet then evokes Indra's help for Kutsa and Divodāsa (vs. 6) before announcing that the Gr̥tsamadas, in exchange for their offerings, also deserve Indra's support in overcoming their enemies.

The hymn is dominated by racing imagery that describes both divine and human action. This imagery is reflected in Indra's deeds: the waters "charge forth" after Indra destroyed Vr̥tra (vs. 2), and Indra's horse Etaśa won wealth like the prize in a race (vs. 5). But it is reflected also in mortals' efforts: men contend to win the sun (vs. 4d), and the sacrificers strive to win as if in a race (vs. 7).

1. The drinking of this plant for exhilaration has begun, o men of inspired thought, (the drinking) of the delightful soma-pressing, at which Indra, having grown strong (thereby) from of old, has found a home, as have the men creating the poetic formulations.
2. Becoming exhilarated from this honey, Indra with the mace in his hand hewed apart the serpent blocking the flood, so that the rivers' pleasing offerings (of water) charged forth like birds toward rich fields.
3. That great Indra, smasher of the serpent, roused the flood of waters forth toward the sea.
   He gave birth to the sun and found the cattle. He perfected the patterns of the days through the night.
4. And he—(though) many and impregnable are (the obstacles) for Manu—serves his servant: he smashes Vr̥tra [/Obstacle]— he who in a single day became the unshakeable one for the men contending to win the sun.
5. Receiving praise, the god Indra ceded the sun to the soma-pressing mortal, when, doing service (to him), Etaśa bore him fault-concealing wealth like a share (of a stake).
6. In a single day, he subdued the voracious, barley-destroying Śuṣṇa for the charioteer Kutsa, and Indra razed the ninety and nine fortifications of Śambara for Divodāsa.
7. So we have sent to you our recitation, Indra. Like those seeking fame, racing by themselves for victory's prize, we would obtain the sevenfold (prize), panting after it. You will bend the weapon of the godless reviler.
8. So the Gr̥tsamadas have fashioned their thought for you, o champion, and the (ritual) patterns, like those seeking help.

Those creating the formulations, Indra, would obtain anew refreshment and nourishment, a good dwelling place, and your good favor.

9. Now should the generous priestly gift yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
   Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.20 (211) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
9 verses: triṣṭubh, except virāḍrūpā 3

This hymn contains a number of metrical peculiarities: verses 2c, 8b, and possibly 6d are one syllable short. On the other hand, the name "Indra"—and the poet draws attention to the name in verse 6—is clearly disyllabic only in the first and in the final verse. Everywhere else, a trisyllabic pronunciation will restore the meter. Again, the poet emphasizes this since in verses 2a, 3a, and 4a the vocative indra, nominative índraḥ, and accusative índram, all in the same metrical position, can be recited trisyllabically. There is also a double sandhi contraction in verse 2b, where *abhiṣṭipā́ḥ asi > abhiṣṭipā́si. Verse 2b contains a śleṣa, in which the same word can function in two different roles, since tvā́vataḥ "such as you" can be both a genitive singular with "good favor" and an accusative plural modifying "men." Verse 2a has ūtī́ for ūtíbhiḥ. None of these forms is unprecedented in the R̥gveda, but the persistent and deliberate use of such semi-irregularities suggests that the poet has a particular purpose in employing them. Perhaps he wished to call special attention to the inspired thinking and insight (vss. 1, 2), the praises and lauds (vss. 3, 4, 5, 7), and the poetic formulations (vss. 4, 5) of the poet by using words that would in some way call attention to themselves. It is these words that Indra "makes powerful" (vss. 5, 7).

The hymn ends by contrasting the poets and their people, whom Indra helps, to the Dāsas and Dasyus, whom he defeats. Again, there may be a suggestion that what differentiates the fates of the poets and their enemies is precisely the mastery that the former have over words.

The mythical references in 5cd are obscure, but they may have something to do with the conquest of darkness by light. If so, then they anticipate Indra's victory over the Dāsa fortresses "with their dark wombs" (vs. 7).

1. We bring forward vitality for you, Indra—know of us!—as one seeking victory's prize (brings forward) a chariot, as marveling we reflect through our inspired thinking and seek to obtain (both) the good favor of one such as you and men (such as you).

2. You, Indra, with your help are by your dominance the protector of us, the people devoted to you.
   You are the forceful guardian of the pious man, who, possessed of right insight, attains you.
3. Let that youth, Indra, who is invoked on every side, be for us a benevolent companion and protector of our men—he who with his help will lead forth the one reciting lauds, the one laboring, the one cooking and singing praises.
4. I shall praise him—Indra—I shall sing to him, alongside whom long ago they grew strong and exulted.
   Being implored, he carries to success the desire for the good thing, (that desire) of the present Āyu creating (these) poetic formulations.
5. Having found pleasure in the hymns of the Aṅgirases, Indra made their formulations powerful, sending them along their way.
   Robbing the dawns by means of the sun, receiving praise, he has pierced the primordial (establishments) even of the Devourer.
6. The god famed as Indra by name, he the most wondrous, rose upright for Manu.
   The able, independent one carried away the Dāsa Arśasāna's very own head.
7. Smasher of Vr̥tra, splitter of fortresses, Indra razed the Dāsa (fortresses) with their dark wombs.
   He gave birth to the earth and the waters for Manu. In every way he makes the sacrificer's laud powerful.
8. In every way might was conceded by the gods to him, to Indra, at the winning of the flood.
   When they put his mace in his arms, after smashing the Dasyu he trampled their metal fortresses.
9. Now should the generous priestly gift yield your boon for the singer as its milk, Indra.
   Exert yourself for the praise singers. Let fortune not pass us by. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.21 (212) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
6 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 6

In its first three verses the hymn announces the various offerings to Indra: the soma, the homage, and the proclamation of Indra's heroic deeds. The god merits these because of his overwhelming power to defeat any who stand in his way and to win whatever he wishes. In verses 4–5, the poet recalls the Vala story, in which Indra and his priestly allies obtained the cattle and the dawns through the hymns that both the priests and Indra recite. He ends with an appeal that his people will find the intellectual ability that will allow them both to continue to implore the gods successfully and to gain the wealth and safety that will flow from that ability.

1. To him winning everything: winning the stakes, winning the sun; to him winning in every way, winning men, winning fields; to him winning horses, winning cattle, winning waters; to Indra, worthy of the sacrifice, bring his beloved soma.
2. To him dominating, breaking, conquering, to the never-overpowered, overpowering adept;
   to him, the powerfully spirited draft-horse, impossible to surpass; to him overpowering in every way—to Indra speak homage.
3. He, overpowering in every way, consuming the peoples, and overpowering the peoples; he, the fighter rousing to action, grown strong at his pleasure;
   he, punishing opposition, overcoming, and acknowledged among the clans—I shall proclaim Indra's heroic deeds that he has done.
4. The bull who cannot be pushed aside, the deadly blow against those raging; the deep and lofty one, whose verbal craft is unequalled;
   spurring on the weak, piercing, firmly set and wide—Indra, whose sacrifice is good, gives birth to the dawns and the sun.
5. By means of the sacrifice, the fire-priests of inspired thinking, crossing the waters, found for themselves a way, sending forth their insights.
   By their cry and assembly, seeking help (they obtained) cows; sending forth (their insights) to Indra, they obtained goods.
6. Indra, grant to us the best goods, the perception that belongs to (sacrificial) skill, and the possession of a good share, as well as a prospering of our riches, freedom from harm for our bodies, sweetness of our speech, and the blessing of good days for our days.

II.22 (213) Indra

Gr̥tsamada
4 verses: aṣṭi 1, atiśakvarī 2–3, atiśakvarī or aṣṭi 4

The theme of the hymn is the bond between Indra and the soma, which enables Indra to perform "his great deed," the destruction of the serpent, the "worm," Vr̥tra. The god Soma ever accompanies the god Indra, and the refrain running through the first three verses emphasizes their connection by referring to Soma as índu, "(soma-)drop," echoing the name "Indra." By describing both Soma and Indra as "real" (satyá), the poet reminds his hearers that just as soma was real when it was prepared by the gods for Indra before he destroyed Vr̥tra, so also it is real now in the present sacrifice, as is Indra himself.

1. Among the Trikadrukas [=the Maruts?], the buffalo, snorting mightily, drank to his satisfaction the barley-mixed soma pressed by Viṣṇu, (as much) as he wished.
   It exhilarated the great and broad one to do his great deed.
   – The god attends upon the god—the real Indu upon the real Indra.
2. Then through his power, the fiery one dominated the worm in battle.
   By his greatness, he filled the two world-halves and grew stronger.
   He received the other in his belly, and there was more (soma) left over.
   – The god attends upon the god—the real Indu upon the real Indra.
3. Born at once with resolve, at once with power, you increased—you, grown strong at once with heroic powers, overpowering the scorners, and knowing no boundaries, you, the giver of bounty to him who sings praises, (the giver of) the desirable good.
   – The god attends upon the god—the real Indu upon the real Indra.
4. This manly deed of yours, o dancing Indra, the foremost work done by you, is to be proclaimed early in the day—that by the power of a god you let life flow forward by letting the waters flow.
   He will overcome every godless one by his strength. He of a hundred resolves will find nourishment; he will find refreshment.

II.23 (214) Br̥haspati

Gr̥tsamada
19 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15, 19

The relation between the god Br̥haspati and Indra is fluid within the R̥gveda. As Schmidt (1968) has demonstrated, bŕ̥haspáti and bráhmanas páti "lord of the sacred formulation" are usually names of Indra in the context of the Vala myth. At times, however, Br̥haspati emerges as an independent deity, though closely linked to Indra. Here the poet once describes Br̥haspati as the "yokemate" of Indra (vs. 18), but beyond this statement, there is otherwise little to distinguish Indra and Br̥haspati.

Framing the hymn's description of Br̥haspati are overt references to the Vala myth, in which Indra as Br̥haspati leads the Aṅgirases and, by the power of their song, opens the cave that releases the cattle and dawns (vss. 2, 3, 18). The intermediate verses expand the theme of the power of the verbal formulation, of which Br̥haspati is the master. It is by means of knowledge of the truth that Br̥haspati and the poet, who possesses mastery of the truth through Bṛhaspati, are able to overcome their enemies. They defeat scorners (vs. 8), slighters (vs. 13), chatterers (vs. 14), and speakers of ill (vs. 10). They overcome those who hate the real formulations of the truth (vs. 4), who lay snares (vs. 6), and who are deceitful (vss. 5, 16, 17). Perhaps because of his powerful speech, Bṛhaspati's mouth even "snaps at" the poet's enemies (vs. 9). At least in some instances, the rivals of the poet are rival sacrificers. At best, however, these know the words to recite, but not the truth that produces the songs or that lies behind them (vs. 16). Through the truth and the truth formulations, the poet and his people are freed from distress (vs. 4), hostility (vss. 5, 9), and injury (vss. 7, 8, 12) and instead prosper (vss. 10, 15).

1. We call upon you, the troop-lord of troops, the most famous poet of poets, the preeminent king of sacred formulations, o lord of the sacred formulation. Hearing us, sit down upon your seat together with your help.
2. Even the prescient gods attained their sacrificial portion from you, lordly Bṛhaspati.
   As the great sun is (the begetter) of ruddy dawn through its light, you are the very begetter of all formulations.
3. Having pressed away evasive chatter and darkness, you mount truth's light-bearing chariot, which terrifies, which vanquishes enemies, o Bṛhaspati, and which smashes demons, splits cowpens, and finds the sun.
4. You guide with good guidance, and you rescue the man who will do (ritual) service for you. Distress will not reach him.
   Confounding his fury, you are the scorcher of him who hates the sacred formulation. Bṛhaspati, great is that greatness of yours.
5. Neither distress nor difficulty from anywhere overcomes him, nor hostilities nor the duplicitous ones.
   You press away all that harms from him whom you protect as his good herdsman, o lord of the sacred formulation.
6. You are our herdsman, creating paths and seeing afar. We are awake to your command with our thoughts.
   Bṛhaspati, let grasping disaster, rightfully his, grind to pieces him who sets a snare for us.
7. Or if a hostile mortal, a lone wolf, is about to injure us who are without offense, Bṛhaspati, turn him away from our path. Make an easy way for this our pursuit of the gods.
8. We call upon you as the rescuer of our bodies, as our defender who inclines toward us, o deliverer.
   Bṛhaspati, lay low those who scorn the gods. Let evil-doers not gain higher favor.

9. Through you growing very strong, o lord of the sacred formulation, we would receive the eagerly sought goods belonging to the sons of Manu.
   The hostilities that loom over us from afar or hard by—snap at these, (now) profitless.
10. Through you, o Bṛhaspati, we would receive the utmost vigor—you, our providing, winning yokemate.
    Let not the speaker of ill, trying to deceive, be master of us. As speakers of good, we would advance through our thoughts.
11. You are a bull unable to be pushed aside, going toward a challenge, scorcher of his rival and overwhelming in battles, the real redeemer of debts, o lord of the sacred formulation, and the tamer even of the powerful one, excited to tough resistance.
12. Who, through his godless thinking, intends harm and, thinking himself powerful in his commands, tries to smash us—o Bṛhaspati, let his deadly weapon not reach us and let us thwart the fury of the evil-doer who vaunts himself.
13. Who is to be invoked in raids and to be approached with reverence, who goes among the prizes of victory and wins every stake, Bṛhaspati has ripped apart all the stranger's slights that strive to deceive, like (enemies') chariots.
14. With your sharpest scorching, scorch the demons who have put you of manifest heroism to scorn.
    Reveal that of yours which will be worthy of a hymn. Shake evasive chatter to pieces, Bṛhaspati.
15. Bṛhaspati! That which will be worth more than what belongs to the stranger, (that which) will radiate among the peoples with brilliance and purpose, and that which will shine by means of your power, o you born through the truth—set that shimmering possession among us.
16. (Give) us not to thieves, the cheats, lurking in the track of deceit, who have become greedy for our supplies and (who) declare the crushing power of the gods (but set it) aside in their heart. Bṛhaspati, they do not know (anything) beyond the sāman-chant (itself).
17. Since the sage Tvaṣṭar gave birth to you from all beings and from each sāman-chant, so then (you), as the lord of the sacred formulation, are the collector of debts and redeemer of debts, and the smasher of deceit in your upholding of the great truth.
18. The mountain gaped open for (their) glory to be yours when, Aṅgiras, you set loose the cowpen of cows.
    With Indra as your yokemate, Bṛhaspati, you forced out the flood of waters, enclosed by darkness.

19. Lord of the sacred formulation, become the guide of this hymn and give life to our lineage.
 All that is fortunate which the gods aid. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.24 (215) Bṛhaspati

Gṛtsamada
16 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 12, 16

As Schmidt (1968: 230–37) points out in his translation and extensive analysis of this hymn, the poet frames his hymn with references to the Vala myth in verses 2–7 and 14. The poet does expand the scope of the myth, however, since the cave contains not only cattle (vss. 3, 14), but also the sun (vss. 3, 9) and honey and water (vs. 4). In verses 3 and 14 the cows likely refer also to the dawns. Inside of this frame, the poet describes the present, in which Bṛhaspati inspires the sacrificial hymns and receives the sacrificial offerings. These present events are partly blended with mythical ones. In verse 8, for example, the present hymns created by Bṛhaspati are his arrows, but this description of words as arrows recalls the ancient heroic deeds of Bṛhaspati and Indra. More explicitly, in verse 9cd Bṛhaspati's victory causes the sun to blaze, which echoes the release of the dawns in the Vala myth. And in verse 10 both gods and humans receive nourishment through the ritual offerings and the goods won by him.

This blending of the mythic and the present may also occur in the opening verses of the hymn. Where later verses refer to the present but echo the past, in verses 2–7 the overtly mythic events occasionally suggest present ritual acts. In verse 4 the cistern "containing streams of honey," which Bṛhaspati opens and from which all living beings drink, recalls the ritual cups with their soma-honey. Priests are the heroes of the battle in verses 6 and 7, and again this recalls the present ritual action of priests. Such double reference may contribute to the obscurity of the most difficult verse in the hymn, verse 5. A number of interpreters, such as Witzel and Gotō, understand pādas ab to mean that from ancient times "these beings," either the waters or the cattle, were destined to come forth, but for a long time the door was shut on them. That is to say, the basic reference is to the Vala myth, as in its surrounding verses. On one level, this interpretation is surely right: there likely is a reference to the Vala myth. At the same time, the poet's extraordinary obscurity suggests that he may have more in mind, and indeed pāda a explicitly connects past and present. The verse may suggest the idea that what has happened in the past happens again, and therefore the action of Bṛhaspati is again necessary to free the cattle or the waters.

1. Help this offering, since you are its master—with this new, great song we would make the ritual distribution—and, Bṛhaspati, bring our thought to success, so that your companion [=Indra], who grants rewards to us, will be praised.

2. Who bent down by his power the things that had to be bent and split apart the things of Śambara by his fury, the lord of the sacred formulation moved the immovable forward, and he entered into and throughout the mountain filled with goods.
3. That had to be done by the foremost god of gods: what was firm became loose, what was hard became pliant.
   He drove up the cattle; he split the cave by the sacred formulation. He hid the darkness and made the sun visible.
4. The cistern with its mouth of stone, containing streams of honey, which the lord of the sacred formulation drilled out by his power—from that all those who see the sun have drunk. Copiously and all at once, they poured out the water-filled well.
5. All those beings of long ago, whoever they be, are to come to be (again). Through months and years they [=hinderers] block the doors for all of you.
   The two [=the sun and moon], not lining up (next to each other), move to one (pattern) or the other, to the patterns (of light and dark) that the lord of the sacred formulation has made.
6. These knowing (poets), who, upon reaching (there), reached the Paṇis' most distant treasury, hidden away, after observing the (Paṇis') untruths again, went up to enter there from where they came.
7. The truth-possessing poets, after observing the (Paṇis') untruths again, from there mounted the great paths.
   They (mounted) the fire, fanned by arms, within the stone. It [=the fire] is not one foreign (to them), for they left it behind.
8. The lord of the sacred formulation with his swift bow whose string is truth—where he wishes, there he reaches.
   To him belong the straight-flying arrows [=the hymns] with which he shoots—(arrows) to be seen, drawing the gaze of men, and whose womb is the ear.
9. Placed to the fore, he who leads together and leads apart, he who is well praised—he is the lord of the sacred formulation in battle.
   When the penetrating one bears away the prize and the stakes through his thinking, just then does the blazing sun blaze at will.
10. Far-going and fore-going is the first (gift) of him who gives abundantly. The things easily found by Br̥haspati are to be realized.
    These are the things won by the intent seer, the prize-winner, through whom both races [=gods and humans], their clans, find satisfaction.
11. Far-going everywhere within the lower settlement [=among humans], you, who are great and joy-bringing, increase in power—the god spreads out widely before the gods; the lord of the sacred formulation encompasses all those things.

12. All that is real belongs just to you two, o generous ones. Even the waters do not confound your commandment.
    O Indra, o lord of the sacred formulation, do you two come here to our offering, like two prize-winning yokemates to their food.
13. Also the swiftest draft-horses obey him. In the public hall the inspired poet bears away the stakes through his thinking.
    Hating the hard and collecting the debt according to his will is he, the lord of the sacred formulation, the prizewinner in the contest.
14. The battle-fury of the lord of the sacred formulation, who will do the great deed, became real according to his will:
    He who drove the cattle up also distributed them to heaven. Like a great stream, (the stream of cattle) ran in separate ways through his power.
15. O lord of the sacred formulation, may we be the charioteers of easily controlled, vigorous wealth throughout all our days.
    Mix heroes among heroes for us, when, being the master through my formulation, you pursue my call.
16. O lord of the sacred formulation, become the guide of this hymn and give life to our lineage.
    All that is fortunate which the gods aid. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.25 (216) Brahmaṇaspati

Gr̥tsamada
5 verses: jagatī

The focus of this hymn is identified in the refrain found in all five verses: the mortal who is in the favor of Brahmaṇaspati, the lord of the sacred formulation. The first three-quarters of each verse then specifies the ways in which this mortal thrives, especially in winning battles and besting his enemies. The first hemistich of the first verse makes it clear that the fortunate man in question has won the favor of Brahmaṇaspati by ritual activity, and especially by making his own sacred formulations (bráhman), though the ritual context is not mentioned again.

1. Kindling the fire, he will win against those who seek to win. Just he by whom the sacred formulations are made and by whom the oblations are bestowed will swell with strength.
   With his offspring he keeps extending himself beyond the offspring (of others)—whomever the lord of the sacred formulation makes his own yokemate.

2. With his heroes he will win against the heroes who seek to win. With his cows he will expand his wealth. He (thus) attends to himself, and his progeny and posterity increase—whomever the lord of the sacred formulation makes his own yokemate.
3. Vehement like a river in its surge, with his might he asserts his will over those who seek to act with balls, like a bull over castrated steers.
   Like the onslaught of fire he is not to be obstructed—whomever the lord of the sacred formulation makes his own yokemate.
4. The heavenly (waters), never drying up, stream to him. As the first, he goes with his warriors to (the contests for) cows.
   Having power that cannot be blunted, he strikes with might—whomever the lord of the sacred formulation makes his own yokemate.
5. Just to him do all the rivers roar. They have provided many unbroken shelters.
   In the favor of the gods, having good fortune, he blazes forth—whomever the lord of the sacred formulation makes his own yokemate.

II.26 (217) Brahmaṇaspati

Gr̥tsamada
4 verses: jagatī

The subject of this hymn is very similar to that of the preceding (II.25)—the ways in which a mortal favored by Brahmaṇaspati will prosper—and the same phrase "he will win against those who seek to win" (vanavad vanuṣyatáḥ) found in the first pāda of each hymn signals their relationship. However, II.26 lacks the refrain found in II.25, and it also varies the 3rd-person description of the favored mortal with a 2nd-person address to the same mortal in verse 2. The series of abrupt imperatives in that verse enlivens the hymn.

Unlike II.25, where the importance of ritual activity is established in the first half-verse but not mentioned again, this hymn constantly emphasizes the power that the performance of the sacrifice gives to the sacrificer, in contrast to the impious man, who is weaker by nature, even if he is a good warrior.

1. Just he *whose laud is straight (on target) will win against those who seek to win. Just he who is devoted to the gods will dominate the one not devoted to the gods.
   Just he who pursues (his ritual duties) well will win against the one difficult to surpass in battles. As sacrificer, he will apportion out the sustenance of the non-sacrificer.
2. Perform the sacrifice for yourself, hero. Pursue those who display their zeal. Set your mind well on the overcoming of obstacles.

Make offering so that you will have good fortune. We choose the help of the lord of the sacred formulation.

3. Just he with his people, he with his clan, he with his race, he with his sons bears away the prize of victory, the spoils, with his superior men, who, with a mind of trust (in ritual hospitality), seeks to attract the father of the gods, the lord of the sacred formulation, with his oblation.
4. Whoever has done honor to him with ghee-drenched oblations, that one does the lord of the sacred formulation lead to the fore.
   He makes a wide place for him from narrow straits; he protects him from harm—the unerring one who creates a wide place for him even from narrow straits.

II.27 (218) Ādityas

Gr̥tsamada or Kūrma Gārtsamada
17 verses: triṣṭubh

The first part of the hymn (vss. 1–7) calls on the Ādityas for protection against all sorts of dangers encountered during journeys to settlements and between settlements. They have the power to protect because they are gods who govern the world and the heavens according to the truth, which defines the order and nature of things as they are and ought to be (vss. 8–10). The poet then returns once more to the theme of a journey protected by the Ādityas and looks forward to his finding a place to settle, a place of good pasturage (vs. 13) and a place that is open and secure (vs. 14). The poet insists that he is worthy of the Ādityas' protection: like the gods themselves (vss. 2, 9), he is śúci "gleaming, pure" (vs. 13), free of any taint. And if he has committed any offense, he begs the Ādityas' mercy (vs. 14) and hopes that he would never fall to the punishments of the Ādityas (vs. 16). The meaning of verse 15cd is not quite clear. The two dwelling places mentioned there could be heaven and earth, to which pādas ab refer, or possibly, as Geldner suggests, to opposing sides from whose conflict the poet hopes to benefit.

1. These ghee-backed songs I pour out to the Ādityas, kings from of old, with my tongue (as offering ladle).
   Let each one hear us: Mitra, Aryaman, and Bhaga, mighty-born Varuṇa, Dakṣa, and Aṃśa.
2. Today, they of common resolve—Mitra, Aryaman, and Varuṇa—will enjoy this praise song of mine—they, the gleaming Ādityas, pure as a stream (of soma) and free of crookedness, disgrace, or injury.

3. These broad and deep Ādityas, undeceivable but ready to deceive (the deceitful), having many eyes, see within the crooked and the straight. Everything is in front of the kings, even the farthest things.
4. The Ādityas sustain what moves and what stands still—(these) gods, the herdsmen of the whole living world, they of far-reaching care, guarding their lordship, possessing the truth, and collecting debts.
5. Might I know this help of yours, o Ādityas, which even in time of fear is joy, o Aryaman.
   Under the leadership of you all, o Mitra and Varuṇa, might I avoid difficulties like clefts in the earth.
6. Since easy is your path, o Aryaman, Mitra, and Varuṇa—harmless to men and leading straight—therefore speak in our defense, Ādityas. Offer us protection impossible to smash on any side.
7. Let Aditi, whose sons are kings, and Aryaman help us cross beyond hostilities by easy (paths).
   We would draw near to the lofty protection of Mitra and Varuṇa, as those with many heroes and free of injury.
8. They uphold the three earths and the three heavens. Three are their commandments within the ritual distribution.
   By truth is your greatness great, Ādityas. That is dear (to you), o Aryaman, Mitra, and Varuṇa.
9. They uphold the three heavenly realms of light—(themselves) golden, gleaming, and pure as a stream (of soma).
   (They are) unsleeping, unwinking, undeceivable, and widely proclaimed for the straightforward mortal.
10. You are the king of all, Varuṇa, both gods and mortals, o lord.
    Give us a hundred autumns to gaze far. We would reach the secure lifetimes of former times.
11. I see far neither to the right nor to the left, neither forward nor behind, Ādityas.
    Be it in naïveté or in wisdom, you good ones, led by you, might I attain the light free from fear.
12. Who has served the kings leading by truth [=the Ādityas] and whom they—and his own prosperity—make strong, he travels by chariot as the foremost man of wealth, proclaimed at the ritual distributions as the giver of goods.
13. Gleaming and undeceivable, he dwells near waters that provide good pasturage, with his own vigor strengthened and with his good heroes.
    Neither from near nor from afar do any strike down the man who comes to be under the leadership of the Ādityas.

14. O Aditi, Mitra, and Varuṇa, have mercy if we have committed any offense against you.
    Might I reach the broad light that is free of fear, Indra. Let the long darkness (of death) not reach us.
15. Both (heaven and earth) jointly make heaven's rain swell for him: (he is) Subhaga, the "Man of Good Fortune," by name, the one who thrives.
    Conquering both dwelling places, he drives amid the battles. Both sides are straightforward for him.
16. O Ādityas, worthy of the sacrifice, your wiles that are ready for the deceitful one, your unbound fetters ready for the cheat—like a horseman, might I travel in my chariot beyond these! Might we never be harmed under your wide protection!
17. Let me not find the lack of a dear benefactor, of a friend with many gifts, o Varuṇa.
    Let me not stand down from wealth easy to control, o king. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.28 (219) Varuṇa

Gr̥tsamada or Kūrma Gārtsamada
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This is the only hymn to Varuṇa alone in Maṇḍala II, but it resembles the famous Varuṇa hymns of book VII (86–89), especially in its confessional tone and its plea to escape punishment from the god. The ellipses in the first verse point to Varuṇa's double role in this hymn. "This belonging to the Āditya sage poet" is in the first instance the hymn itself that is being recited for the god. The poet hopes that his hymn will dominate all things, or, perhaps better, be dominant over all other hymns. At the same time, "this" is also the god's own commandment, which the poet describes in the hymn and which dominates everything in the world. Varuṇa's function as a speaker is underscored by the description of him as a kaví "sage poet" since a kaví is one who knows and who speaks, and as mandrá "pleasing," which frequently characterizes the Hotar priest, who recites the hymns. Verse 2 carries forward the argument, mentioning both the commandment of the god and the insights of the poet. The poet calls upon Varuṇa to keep him safe from various threats (vss. 3, 6, 10), interspersing his petition with pleas not to fall victim to the punishment from the god for his misdeeds (vss. 5, 7, 9). Toward the end of the hymn, the poet once again calls attention both to his own speech and also to the commandment spoken by the god (vs. 8), thus returning to the initial theme of the hymn.

1. Let this belonging to the Āditya sage poet, the independent king, dominate all existing things in its greatness—

(this belonging to) the god who excels as the pleasing one for the sacrifice. I beg good renown of abundant Varuṇa.

2. Might we be possessed of good fortune under your commandment, since with great attention we have recited your praises, Varuṇa,
(now) at the approach of the cattle-rich dawns, since we are awakening like fires throughout the days.

3. Might we be under the protection of you, who bring many heroes, who receive wide praise, o Varuṇa, our leader.
O undeceivable sons of Aditi, indulge us to be yoked (with you), o gods.

4. As their distributor, the Āditya sent them gushing forth: the rivers move to the truth of Varuṇa.
These do not weary, nor are they unharnessed. Like birds they have flown swiftly on their earth-encircling course.

5. Loosen my offense from me like a halter. We would succeed in reaching the wellspring of your truth, Varuṇa.
Let my thread not be cut as I weave my insight. Let not the full measure of my work be broken before its season.

6. Unfasten fear from me, o Varuṇa! Hold me close, o truth-possessing, universal king!
Like a rope from a calf, untie confining straits (from me), for I cannot be away from you even for the blink of an eye.

7. (Strike) us not with your deadly weapons, o Varuṇa, which, in your hunt (for him), injure the one who commits an offense, o lord!
Let us not go from light into foreign lands! Loosen our lapses for us to live!

8. Before, Varuṇa, and also now, and in the future, we will speak our homage to you, o you who are mighty-born, for on you, as on a mountain, there rest immovable commandments, o you who are difficult to deceive.

9. Send my debts far away and (other) things done by me. Let me not suffer for what was done by another, o king.
Surely many more dawns have not yet dawned: direct us, Varuṇa, (in order to be) alive at them.

10. If in a dream one who is yoked with me or who is my companion speaks a frightening thing to me, who become fearful, o king, or if a thief or a wolf tries to deceive us—protect us from (all) that, Varuṇa.

11. Let me not find the lack of a dear benefactor, of a friend with many gifts, o Varuṇa.
Let me not descend from wealth easy to control, o king. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.29 (220) All Gods

Gr̥tsamada or Kūrma Gārtsamada
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet calls on various gods, especially the Ādityas, for protection from perils, some vividly imagined, and for forgiveness for his previous offenses. The poet does not seem entirely confident that his prayers will be answered.

1. You vigorous Ādityas of steadfast commandments, put at a distance from me my offense, as a woman who gives birth in secret (does her baby).
   You who listen, Varuṇa, Mitra, (other) gods—knowing what is favorable, I call to you for aid.
2. You, gods, are solicitude; you are strength; you—keep hatreds far away.
   As apportioners, be indulgent and be merciful to us, both today and for the future.
3. What shall we do now with your future (friendship), what, good ones, with your old friendship?
   You—Mitra, Varuṇa, and Aditi, Indra and the Maruts—establish well-being for us.
4. Hail, gods: only you are our friends. Be merciful to me who am in need.
   Let our chariot not come to be without you when it is travelling in the middle (of battle/a journey?); let us not become weary while we have friends like you.
5. I alone have perpetrated a great offense against you, for which you have chastised me, like a father (his son, who is) a gambler.
   In the distance (be) your fetters, in the distance evils, o gods; do not seize me in my son, like a bird.
6. Become inclined our way today, you who are worthy of the sacrifice. Being fearful, I would fasten onto your heart.
   Rescue us, gods, from the "rubbing out" of the wolf; rescue us from falling into the pit, you who are worthy of the sacrifice.
7. Let me not find the lack of a dear benefactor, of a friend with many gifts, o Varuṇa.
   Let me not stand down from wealth easy to control, o king. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.30 (221) Indra (1–5, 7, 8cd, 10), Indra and Soma (6), Sarasvatī (8ab), Bṛhaspati (9), Maruts (11)

Gṛtsamada
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 11

Despite the number and variety of divine dedicands in the Anukramaṇī ascription reproduced above, this is essentially an All God hymn, dominated by Indra. It appears between two All God hymns, although in its number of verses (eleven), it is out of order, since both II.29 and II.31 have seven verses. There is no easy way to adjust this discrepancy.

The first part of the hymn (vss. 1–3) presents, however obliquely, the story of the Indra–Vṛtra battle, but it leads up to the battle with a timeless or contemporary image. It describes the current daily rushing of waters (waters implicitly identified, as commonly, with the dawns), and then asks when the waters first began to surge. The unexpressed answer is—only when they were released after Indra's defeat of Vṛtra. Verse 2 has been interpreted in multiple ways, and many difficulties remain. Interestingly, it contains the first and almost the only example of a conditional verb in Vedic, and the isolation of this grammatical form makes the interpretation of the verse more difficult. In the tentative interpretation given here, the verse concerns an unidentified figure (possibly Sūrya, who is sometimes an opponent of Indra), who was planning to give aid to Vṛtra in the battle (pāda a), but (pāda b) his plan was detected and announced by an unidentified female figure (possibly Earth, possibly Indra's mother) to yet another unidentified figure (possibly Indra), thus foiling the plan. The verse pivots in pāda c, which can have reference both to the mythological past—the free flowing of the waters after their release on the killing of Vṛtra and their creation of paths for Indra—and to the timeless daily round—the continual (re-)creation of paths for the sun by the dawns, since the formula in 2c is also sometimes used exactly of this situation. Thus the second half of verse 2 returns us to the timeless daily realm of verse 1 and the double interpretation of waters and dawns. The third and last verse about the Vṛtra battle (vs. 3) is much more straightforward, and may have been designed to resolve for the audience what the topic of the first two, obscurely phrased, verses was.

The rest of the hymn begs the gods, particularly Indra but, as the hymn progresses, other gods, to use the same powers that led to victory in the Vṛtra battle to combat the poet's enemies. The importance of sacrifice in winning the gods' favor is emphasized in verses 6–7.

The hymn contains some striking expressions, for instance the "night" of the waters in verse 1: the image evoked may be a naturalistic one, that waters in full flow can appear dark, but with the identification waters = dawns the image can also describe the progress from night/darkness to dawn. Note also that the phrase "every day" defines the hymn as a ring composition, though it has different lexical realizations in verse 1 (áhar-ahar) and as the last word of the last verse 11 (divé-dive).

1. For the god who creates truth, for Savitar, for Indra who smashes the serpent, the waters do not stay still.
   Day after day the "night" of the waters drives on. How long ago was their first surging?
2. The one [=Sūrya?] who was going to carry the gear here for Vr̥tra—the mother [Earth? Indra's mother?] announced him to the knowing one [=Indra?].
   Excavating the paths for him [=Indra/Sūrya] at their pleasure, the boisterous ones [=dawns as waters] go every day to their goal.
3. For he took his stand, erect, in the midspace. Then he bore his murderous weapon down toward Vr̥tra.
   Clothing himself in mist, he [=Vr̥tra] ran up to him. Having sharp weapons Indra conquered his rival.
4. O Br̥haspati, with searing heat, as if with a stone, pierce the heroes of the (rival) lord, with their wolfish gait.
   Just as you also smote boldly before, so smite our rival, o Indra.
5. Hurl down from heaven the stone on high, with which you, exulting (in soma), will rub out your rival.
   After that go halves with us in the winning of progeny, of abundant descendants, and of cattle, o Indra.
6. For you two rip away the resolve (of him) whom you combat, but you are stimulators of (even) a feeble man who performs sacrifice.
   You, Indra and Soma—help us. In this fearful place create wide space.
7. It will not tire nor weary me, and there will be no flagging. We will not say, "Don't press soma (for him [=Indra],)" (Indra,) who will grant to me, who will give, who will be attentive, who will approach me with cows, as I press it.
8. You, Sarasvatī—help us. As a bold one accompanied by the Maruts, conquer the rivals.
   Even this vaunting one, the bull of the Śaṇḍikas, displaying his power, does Indra smash.
9. Whoever, distant or (near), wishes to harm us, on catching sight of him, pierce him with a sharp (weapon).
   Br̥haspati, with your weapons conquer the rivals. Deliver to deceit him who does harm, o king.
10. With our warriors, our champions, o champion, do the manly deeds that are yours to be done.
    For a long time they have been "besmoked" [=befuddled]. Having smashed them, bring their goods to us here.
11. Seeking favor, I address this Marutian troop for you with a hymn, with reverence I address the divine folk, so that we will attain wealth consisting of hale heroes, bringing descendants in its train, worthy of fame from day to day.

II.31 (222) All Gods

Gṛtsamada
7 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 7

The common identification of the sacrifice, and particularly the praise hymn at the sacrifice, with a chariot in a race is the backgrounded theme of this hymn, which becomes foregrounded in the final verse. The controlling chariot image in turn gives rise to other comparisons, as when in verse 1 charioteers sitting on the wooden chariot are compared with birds sitting in trees.

The word "those seeking fame" (śravasyávaḥ) defines the hymn as a ring composition, as it occurs in both the initial and final verses, and the middle verses, 3–5, all open with utá syá [/tyá] "and this," a cluster that marks a simple omphalos. Though most of the hymn is relatively straightforward, the end of the final omphalos verse, 5d, is difficult and has elicited several different interpretations.

The designation "all gods" as the dedicand of the hymn is quite accurate: a wide variety of gods and divinized powers are addressed in the hymn and begged for help.

1. Help the chariot belonging to us, o Mitra and Varuṇa, in partnership with the Ādityas, Rudras, and Vasus, when those seeking fame, excited, sitting on/in wood, fly forth like birds from their dwelling.
2. Then help out our chariot, you gods of one accord, as it seeks prizes among the clans, when the swift ones, crossing through the airy realm with their strides, keep trampling on the back of the earth with their forefeet.
3. And this Indra, belonging to all domains, of good resolve, with the Marutian troop of heaven will stand beside our chariot with help that keeps the wolf away, for great gain, to win the prizes.
4. And this god, the conqueror of the world, Tvaṣṭar, in concert with the Wives (of the Gods), will speed the chariot—Iḍā, Bhaga, Bṛhaddivā, and Rodasī; Pūṣan, Plenitude—and the Aśvins as husbands.
5. And these two well-portioned goddesses of opposite appearance, Dawn and Night, also speeders of moving creatures, (will speed the chariot), when, (o Heaven and) Earth, I will praise you two with a newer speech, I possessing triple vigor to strew vigor as the underlayer for the still (world).
6. And we want a laud for you like that of the fire-priests. Ahi Budhnya, Aja Ekapad, and Trita, the Master of the Ṛbhus, and Savitar take delight, also the Child of the Waters who impels the swift (horses), through (our) thought and labor.
7. I want these (words) raised up for you, o you who are worthy of the sacrifice. The Āyus fashioned (them) together into a newer (hymn).

Seeking fame, desiring the prize, like a chariot span might they attain the visionary thought.

II.32 (223) Various Gods

Gr̥tsamada
8 verses: jagatī 1–5, anuṣṭubh 6–8

This is a composite hymn, whose structure is not entirely clear. The first three verses seem to belong together, addressing first Heaven and Earth (vs. 1) and then an unidentified male divinity (2–3), while the remaining five verses are addressed to various female divinities who are especially concerned with childbirth. However, the metrical structure does not accord with the conceptual structure, as the meter divides the hymn into verses 1–5 and 6–8.

1. O Heaven and Earth, become the helpers of this speech for me, who am acting according to truth and seeking to gain.
   You two whose lifetime is extended do I, seeking goods, greatly install here in front, when you are approached with praise.
2. Let secret swindles not deceive us on the day of Āyu [=offering day?]. Do not make us subject to these misfortunes.
   Do not keep us far away from your companionship. Know this (speech?) of ours. With a mind seeking favor we beseech you for this.
3. With a mind without anger bring here your attentive hearing, a swelling cow who gives milk, inexhaustible.
   With steps [/(verses measured) in feet] and with speech I impel you, the swift prize-winner, through all the days, o much invoked one.
4. Rākā who is good to invoke I invoke with good praise. Let her of good portion hear us; let her attend (to us) in person.
   Let her stitch her work with a needle that cannot be broken. Let her give a hero with a hundred shares who is worthy of hymns.
5. O Rākā, your benevolent thoughts, well-ornamented, with which you give goods to the pious one—with those approach us today, benevolently, granting thousandfold thriving, you of good portion.
6. O Sinīvalī with broad braids, you who are sister of the gods, enjoy the oblation that is poured. Allot offspring to us, goddess.
7. She who has lovely arms, lovely fingers, bearing easily, bearing amply, to her, mistress of the clan, to Sinīvalī, pour an oblation.
8. Guṅgū, Sinīvalī, Rākā, Sarasvatī—
   (on them and) on Indrāṇī I have called for help and on Varuṇānī for well-being.

II.33 (224) Rudra

Gṛtsamada
15 verses: triṣṭubh

Although under his transferred epithet Śiva ("kindly one"), Rudra has a grand career ahead of him in post-Vedic Hinduism, his role in Vedic, especially early Vedic, is relatively restrained. Only three complete Ṛgvedic hymns are dedicated to him (I.114 and VII.46, in addition to this one, as well as two hymns conjointly dedicated to Rudra and Soma, I.43 and VI.74). He is known especially as the father of the Maruts, and he has a dual nature: on the one hand, he is prone to anger and quick to dispatch his weapons, especially his arrows, at those who enrage him; on the other, he is a provider of healing remedies and of good luck.

The major part of this hymn is devoted to begging the god Rudra for his indulgence and his healing powers, but it also nervously expresses the hope that his vengeful assaults will be directed elsewhere. The dual nature of Rudra as both healer and avenger is thus on display, and his parentage of the Maruts begins the hymn (vs. 1) and is mentioned several times in the course of it.

1. Let your favor come here, o father of the Maruts. Do not keep us away from the sight of the sun.
   The hero on horseback should be indulgent. Might we be further propagated through our offspring, Rudra.
2. Through the remedies given by you that bring best luck, Rudra, might I reach a hundred winters.
   Banish hatred away from us, very far away, distress away, and afflictions away, widely scattered.
3. In glory you are the most glorious of anyone born, Rudra, the most powerful of the powerful, o you with the mace in your arms.
   Take us across to the far shore of distress, to well-being. Keep away all assaults of malady.
4. Let us not anger you, Rudra, through our acts of reverence, nor through poor praise, nor through an invocation shared (with other gods), o bull.
   Set up our heroes with your remedies: I hear that you are the best healer of healers.
5. Whoever invokes him with invocations and offerings, (thinking,) "With my praises might I cut off Rudra as my own exclusive portion," to the zeal (of this person) let the red-brown one with powerful lips [=Rudra] not subordinate us—(Rudra) being tender-hearted and easy to invoke.

6. The bull, in the company of the Maruts, roused me up when I was in need, with his more energetic vitality.
   Free of malady, might I reach (this), like shade during the heat: might I attract here the favor of Rudra.
7. Where, o Rudra, is that merciful hand of yours, which is a healing remedy, the bearer away of malady that comes from the gods? You should now be indulgent toward me, o bull.
8. To the red-brown, bright-faced bull, I rouse forth greatly a great good praise hymn.
   I shall do reverence to the sparkling one with acts of reverence. We sing the turbulent name of Rudra.
9. With sturdy limbs, the mighty red-brown one of many forms has adorned himself with gleaming golden (ornaments).
   From Rudra, who is master over the abundant living world, lordly power will surely not be distant.
10. Worthily you bear the arrows and the bow and worthily the sacrificial neck ornament of all forms.
    Worthily you parcel out the whole formless void. Surely there exists nothing more powerful than you, Rudra.
11. Praise the famed youth, sitting upon the high seat, the mighty one, pouncing like a terrifying wild beast.
    Being praised, have mercy on the singer, Rudra. Let your weapons cast down another than us.
12. Even a little boy bows in response to his approving father as he approaches, o Rudra.
    I will hymn the giver of much, the master of settlements. Praised, bestow on us your remedies.
13. Your gleaming remedies, o bullish Maruts, which bring best luck, which are joy itself, which our father Manu chose—those of Rudra's do I want as luck and lifetime.
14. Might Rudra's lance avoid us. The hostile thought of the turbulent one, though great, shall go around us.
    Slacken the taut (bows) for our bounteous (patrons). Be merciful to our progeny and posterity, o munificent one.
15. You red-brown bull, constantly visible—(let it be) so, that you do not become angry, o god, and you do not smite.
    Hearing our calls, be aware of us here, Rudra. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.34 (225) Maruts

Gr̥tsamada
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 15

Following immediately on a hymn dedicated to the Maruts' father Rudra, this hymn describes the Maruts, with the extravagant and imaginative phraseology typically used of them, as the thunderstorm, while urging them to come to the singer's sacrifice. About midway through the hymn (starting in vss. 6–7), the focus shifts to the benefits the Maruts can provide the singer, in inspiring his hymn, protecting him against enemies, and offering gifts. The naturalistic description remains, however; note, for example, the sequential imagery in verse 13, which proceeds from thunder, through lightning and rain, to the post-storm clearing and rainbow.

The hymn also contains a reference (vs. 2) to the enigmatic and sometimes paradoxical parentage and birth of the Maruts from Pr̥śni and Rudra. The motif of the cow, especially the milk-cow with her swollen udder, runs through the hymn (e.g., vss. 1, 2, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12), with reference sequentially or simultaneously to dawns, clouds, the sacrificer's soma-pressings, and the Maruts' gift to him. This multivalent image helps to unify the hymn as it moves from naturalistic description to ritual entreaty.

1. Wooers of the gushing streams, the Maruts of audacious power, like wild beasts fearsome through their forces, provided with chant, blazing like fires, possessing the silvery drink, blowing a whirlwind—they unclosed the cows.
2. Like the heavens with their stars they appeared with their spangles. They flashed forth like the rains from the storm clouds, when Rudra was begotten for you as the blazing bullish (semen [=rain?]) in the udder of Pr̥śni, o you Maruts with brilliants on your breasts.
3. They sprinkle their horses, like steeds at contests. With [=at the impetus of] the "ears" of the reed(-whip) they speed with the swift ones.
   You of the golden lips, Maruts, constantly setting (them [=lips]) aquiver—you drive to fortifying nourishment with your dappled mares, o you of equal spirit.
4. The ones with lively drops have waxed strong, to fortify all the creatures or for alliance (with them) always.
   With their dappled horses, with their unreceding generosity, they sit at the chariot-pole like the straight-flying (birds) on the traceries (of the branches?).
5. (Come here) with your enflaming [?] milk-cows with teeming udders [=clouds?], along unbesmirched paths, o you with glinting spears—like geese to good pastures come here for the exhilaration of the honey, you Maruts of equal spirit.
6. (Come) here to our sacred formulations, you Maruts of equal spirit; like Narāśaṃsa [/him who receives men's praise = Agni?] come to our pressings.

Make (them) swell like a mare, a milk-cow in her udder. Make for the singer a visionary thought that has prizes as its ornament.

7. Give us, o Maruts, a prizewinner (attached) to a chariot, a sacred formulation that attains its object, conspicuous day after day.
(Give) refreshment to the praisers; to the bard in the (ritual) enclosures (give) as his gain wisdom and invulnerable might difficult to surpass.

8. When the Maruts with brilliants on their breasts yoke their own horses to the chariots for good fortune—they of good drops [/gifts]— as a milk-cow in good pastures swells for her young, they (swell) great refreshment for the person who has bestowed oblations.

9. The cheating mortal who set us among wolves— o Maruts, good ones, protect (us) from his harm; roll over him with your searing wheel. O Rudras, strike down the murderous weapon of the one who lacks proper pronouncements.

10. This bright course of yours, Maruts, appears ever more brightly, when the close friends have milked the udder of Pr̥śni, or when (they have set) Trita [/the third (heaven)] to scorning (as does) a roarer [=thunder], (set him) to aging (as do) those who age, you undeceivable sons of Rudra.

11. Those great Maruts, travelling their ways, do we invoke for you at your ritual offering for quick Viṣṇu.
With offering spoons extended, creating sacred formulations, we implore the prominent ones of golden hue for generosity worthy to be proclaimed.

12. The Daśagvas were the first to conduct the sacrifice. Let them rouse us at the brightenings of dawn.
As Dawn with her ruddy (beams) uncloses the nights, (so did they unclose the cows) with the greatly blazing light flooding with cows.

13. With their cries [=thunder], with their ornaments like (Dawn's) ruddy (beams), the Rudras have grown strong in the seats of truth.
Pissing downward in a steed's shape, they have assumed their much gleaming, well-bedizened hue.

14. While one [=poet?] is imploring them for a great defense, for help, we hymn them with this reverence right here—they whom he [=poet?] will cause to roll down here with their wheel for aid, as Trita [/the third one] (brought here) five Hotars for dominance.

15. That with which you carry the feeble one across difficult straits, with which you free your celebrant from scorn, that is nearby—that help of yours, o Maruts. May your benevolence come here like a bellowing (cow).

II.35 (226) Apām Napāt (Child of the Waters)

Gr̥tsamada
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This is the only R̥gvedic hymn devoted to the divinity Apām Napāt "Child of the Waters," though he is mentioned on a number of occasions elsewhere in the text. This divine name is also found identically in Avestan, but in the R̥gveda it is in the course of becoming an epithet of Agni. In this hymn we see aspects both of the identification with and assimilation to Agni and of the original independent divinity.

After an opening (vss. 1–2) in which the poet in the 1st person offers his praise to the divinity, the heart of the hymn (3–11) describes his birth, care, and feeding by women, who at least in the early verses are the Waters, in sometimes enigmatic phrasing.

The fiery aspect of Apām Napāt is introduced gradually in the hymn, first by the use of vocabulary regularly but not exclusively used elsewhere of Agni, for example the "shining" words (vss. 3–4); as the hymn continues, vocabulary and imagery point more and more strongly to fire, for example the twigs and plants in verse 8, the emphasis on golden color in verses 9–10. But it is not until the second half of verse 11 that unambiguous reference to physical fire is found (the verb "kindle" as well as the identification of ghee as his food—though ghee first made its appearance in verse 4). It is doubtless no accident that the first half of verse 11 announces Apām Napāt as his "secret name": this explicit reference confirms that the poem heretofore has been framed as a riddle or enigma, for which "Apām Napāt" is the solution. (Verse 13 also codes the same distinction between the originally separate identities of Apām Napāt and Agni, by connecting the name Apām Napāt with "the body of another," namely Agni.)

After the climactic verse 11, the hymn then takes a more ritual turn, and the 1st-person ritualist of verse 1 returns in verse 12. In this ritualistic section, the paradox of Apām Napāt being nurtured by the waters and his double, Agni, being nurtured by the fire-tenders is resolved (or the images are superimposed) by having the waters bring ghee to him.

1. I, seeking prizes, have set loose my eloquence. The offspring of the rivers should take delight in my hymns.
   The Child of the Waters who impels swift (horses)—surely he will make them well-ornamented? For he will savor (them).
2. This well-crafted spell we would speak to him from our heart. Surely he will take cognizance of it?
   The Child of the Waters, our compatriot, with the greatness of his lordly power begat all beings.
3. Some come together; others go directly (to the sea): (but) it is the same vessel that the rivers fill.

The gleaming, shining Child of the Waters do the gleaming waters surround.

4. The youth do the youthful waters, (though) unsmiling, circle around while they groom him.
   With his gleaming, dexterous (flames) he shines richly for us, (though) without fuel, with his garment of ghee, in the waters.
5. To him, the unfaltering god, do the three women goddesses desire to provide food.
   For he keeps stretching himself out in the waters as if toward (just) "made" [=deflowered] women. He sucks the beestings of those who give birth for the first time.
6. Here is the birth of the horse and of this sun [=Agni?]. From deceit, from harm—from the infusion (of them)—protect the patrons.
   Neither hostilities nor untruths shall reach him in the "raw" fortifications, him who is not to be forgotten (though) far away.
7. Whoever has a good-milking cow in his own house, he swells his own power; he eats food of good essence.
   The Child of the Waters, being nourished within the waters, radiates widely to give goods to the one who honors him.
8. He who in the waters, truthful and inexhaustible, radiates far and wide with his heavenly gleaming—the other entities are propagated just as twigs of him, and the plants propagate themselves through their progeny.
9. Because the Child of the Waters has mounted the lap of those who are sloping, (himself) erect, clothing himself in the lightning flash, as they carry his preeminent greatness, the golden-hued exuberant maidens circle around him.
10. Golden-formed, he has a golden appearance—the Child of the Waters—and he is also golden-hued, (coming) out of a golden womb when he sits down (on the ritual ground). The givers of gold give food to him.
11. This his face and his dear secret name grow strong—(the name) of the Child of the Waters—whom the youthful women together kindle just so: golden-hued ghee is food for him.
12. To him, the closest comrade of many, we would do honor with sacrifices, with reverence, with oblations.
    I groom his back; I seek to provide (him) with wood-shavings. I provide (him) with food; I extol (him) with verses.
13. As bull he begat the embryo in these (waters). As infant he sucks them; they lick him.
    The Child of the Waters, whose color never fades, has toiled here as if with the body of another.

14. Him standing in this highest footprint here, shining always along unbesmirched (paths)— the waters bringing ghee as food to the Child (of the Waters), the exuberant maidens fly encircling (him) with themselves as his cloaks.
15. I have proffered a good dwelling-place to the people, o Agni, and I have proffered a well-twisted (hymn) to the bounteous ones.
    All that is fortunate which the gods aid. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.36 (227) Sequential Deities (for the R̥tugrahas)

Gr̥tsamada
6 verses: jagatī

This hymn concerns a particular set of ritual offerings (R̥tugrahas "sequential cups") made to a prescribed set of gods in a fixed order, and, with the following hymn, II.37, provides the complete set, which is also found in the single hymn I.15. As was clearly seen already by Oldenberg (1888: 193), II.36–37 in fact themselves form a single hymn, not only because of their shared ritual content but also because at six verses apiece, they violate the rule of maṇḍala organization, whereby hymns within a single group contain descending number of verses. II.36–37 fall between a hymn of fifteen verses and one of eleven; when combined, their twelve verses fit perfectly in the sequence.

Each verse identifies a different god (or groups of gods) and the priest whose duty it is to make the offering. Several of the verses are structured as riddles, with the name of the god either suppressed or postponed until near the end; the audience would have had no trouble solving these riddles, since the vocabulary and the actions are stereotyped for each god. (Our solutions to such riddles are given at the end of the verses in question.) Nonetheless, II.36–37 show rhetorical ambitions almost entirely absent from the bare-bones and poetically inert I.15.

In this hymn Indra is honored twice (vss. 1 and 5) but by two different priests, and in the second instance it is probably Indra in the guise of Br̥haspati. In both these verses the exhilarating drink soma, Indra's special potion, is also referred to in a riddling fashion. For further discussion of the ritual and its litany, see I.15.

1. Being impelled for you, it has clothed itself in cows, in waters; the men have milked it with the stones through the sheep('s wool).
   At "Hail!," o Indra, drink from the Hotar's cup the soma poured out when the vaṣaṭ-cry is made—you who first have dominion over it.
2. Commingling with sacrifices, with your dappled (mares), with your spears, resplendent on your journey and in your ornaments, and dear, having sat on the ritual grass, you sons of Bharata, drink soma from the Potar's cup, you men of heaven [=Maruts].

3. As if to home, come to us here, all you of easy call; then sit on the ritual grass and take pleasure.
   Then, o Tvaṣṭar, become exhilarated on the stalk, having delighted in the call, flocking with the divine ones, (namely) the Wives (of the Gods).
4. Convey the gods hither, you inspired poet, and perform sacrifice. Willingly, o Hotar, sit down in your three wombs.
   Receive the somian honey that has been set forth. Drink from the Agnīdh's cup. Reach satiety from your portion. [=Agni]
5. This one here strengthens the manly powers of your body; as might, as strength it was laid in your arms (already) on a distant day.
   For you it is pressed, bounteous one, for you it is borne here—you, drink it to satiety from the Brahman's cup. [=Indra/Bṛhaspati]
6. You two, enjoy the sacrifice; take heed of my call. The Hotar is seated, following the ancient invitations [/nivids].
   Homage goes to you two kings to turn (you) hither. From the Praśāstar's cup drink the somian honey. [=Mitra and Varuṇa]

II.37 (228) Sequential Deities (for the Ṛtugrahas)

Gṛtsamada
6 verses: jagatī

See the remarks on the previous hymn, as well as I.15.7–10. In that latter hymn, as in this one, four verses are devoted to the offerings to the shadowy figure of the Wealth-Giver (Draviṇodā); these verses may be there merely to bring the number of offerings to twelve, to correspond with the secondary interpretation of ṛtú as season, and hence to match the number of offerings to the months of the year, as discussed in the introduction to I.15.

1. Become exhilarated on the stalk, from the Hotar's cup at your pleasure. O Adhvaryu, he desires a full outpouring.
   Bring this to him. Such is the desire of the giver. The soma from the Hotar's cup, o Wealth-Giver—drink it at your turns.
2. The one I invoked previously, him I invoke right now. Just he is to be invoked, who owns the name "Giver."
   The somian honey has been set forth by the Adhvaryus. The soma from the Potar's cup, o Wealth-Giver—drink it at your turns.
3. Let your draft-animals become fat, with which you go speeding. Allowing no harm to befall, make yourself firm, o lord of the forest [=chariot].

Having drawn it to you, bold one, having greeted it: the soma from the Neṣṭar's cup, o Wealth-Giver—drink it at your turns.

4. He has drunk from the Hotar's cup, and from the Potar's he has become exhilarated, and from the Neṣṭar's he has enjoyed the pleasurable offering set out.
   The fourth cup, indestructible and immortal, let the Wealth-Giver, descendant of the Wealth-Giver, drink.
5. You two, today yoke your coursing, man-conveying chariot in our direction: here is your unhitching.
   Mix the oblations with honey. Come hither! Then drink the soma, you who possess prizewinning mares. [=Aśvins]
6. Enjoy the kindling, Agni; enjoy the oblation; enjoy the sacred formulation stemming from your people; enjoy the lovely praise.
   With all (the gods?), good one, eagerly make all the great gods eagerly drink the oblation in their turn.

II.38 (229) Savitar

Gr̥tsamada
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is typically, and in our view rightly, identified as an evening hymn, in which Savitar quiets the world for the night. The hymn is closely analyzed by Falk (1988), who argues that the occasion of the hymn is the evening of the summer solstice, which marked the beginning of the rainy season. According to Falk, in the second millennium BCE on this night the Milky Way rose from the horizon at dusk. The arc of the Milky Way, he says, was pictured as the outstretched arms of Savitar. Be that as it may, most of the images in the hymn are applicable to evening in general.

The first six verses present a lovely series of images of the quiet and rest that evening brings to the natural and the human world—almost ironically because the daily round of busy movement ceases at the "impulsion" of the "Impeller" (the literal meaning of Savitar). In the following two verses (7–8), Savitar's ability to bring each creature to its home place at night is extended: he also has assigned to all categories of creatures their proper position in the natural world. The remainder of the hymn celebrates the power of Savitar even over the gods (vs. 9) and asks for his gifts (10–11). The latter verse makes reference to Savitar's distribution of beings to their separate realms by asking for gifts from heaven, the waters, and the earth. Savitar's apportioning of benefits in these last verses return us to the theme of the first verse (1cd), which announced his gifts to gods and to the mortal sacrificer.

1. God Savitar has stood up to impel again as always—the draft-horse whose work this is—for now he distributes treasure to the gods, and he has also given a share in well-being to him whose oblations are worth pursuing.

2. Because the god, erect and with broad hands, extends his arms for all to obey, even the waters are submissive to his commandment and even this wind here rests in its circling.
3. Even the one who drives with swift (horses) will now unhitch. He has brought to rest even the wanderer from his travelling.
   He has held in check the greed even of the snake-stickers [?]. Following the commandment of Savitar, "Release" [=Evening] has come.
4. Once again the weaver has wrapped up what was stretched out; in the middle of his work the mindful (worker) has set down his craft.
   Having pulled himself together, he [=Savitar] has stood up. He has always kept the seasons separate. As Proper Thinking, god Savitar has come.
5. The domestic blaze of fire is dispersed prominently throughout the houses, one for each, for (each one's) whole lifetime.
   The mother has set out the best portion for her son, according to his intention, which has been aroused by Savitar.
6. (Whatever) was dispersed seeking gain has been gathered together. Desire for home has arisen in all who roam.
   Each and every one has come, abandoning unfinished work, following the commandment of the divine Savitar.
7. The watery (race) has been placed by you among the waters; the wild beasts have been dispersed throughout the wastelands, as their share;
   the forests are for birds. No one violates these commandments of god Savitar.
8. As far as (Savitar's) benefit extends, Varuṇa (has come) to his watery womb, restlessly darting about at (every) blink (of the eye).
   Every mortal creature, (every) domestic beast has come to its pen. Savitar has distributed the races according to their stations.
9. Whose commandment neither Indra nor Varuṇa, neither Mitra nor Aryaman, nor Rudra violates, nor do hostile powers—for well-being I call him here with homage: god Savitar.
10. As (we) arouse Fortune, Insight, and Plenitude—Praise of Men, the husband of the Wives, should help us—might we be dear to god Savitar at the approach of a desirable thing and at the gathering of riches.
11. That desirable benefit given by you has come to us from heaven, from the waters, from earth, (a benefit) that will become weal for your praisers and your friend, the singer whose recitations extend widely, o Savitar.

II.39 (230) Aśvins

Gr̥tsamada
8 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet of this hymn takes quite an original approach in matching every description of the Aśvins with a simile. He avoids the monotony that might otherwise result both by the cleverness of his similes and by the occasional pun, in which a descriptive word fits the object in the simile in one meaning but the target, the Aśvins, in another. In verse 2, for example, jáneṣu "in the presence of the people" or "peoples" refers to witnesses at a wedding in the simile, but in the target phrase they are the tribes who perceive the united resolve of the Aśvins. Or again, in verse 7a, within the simile the word śaktí probably refers to a "spear," but in the target it is the "power" of the Aśvins. In 7b, the rájāṃsi are all the spaces gathered between heaven and earth in the simile, but regions given by the Aśvins, through which the poet and his people can wander, in the target phrase. In verse 1, jarethe, here translated "you awaken," could equally well mean "you sing," especially since the pressing stones elsewhere are said to "sing."

Another feature of the hymn is that the poet often describes the Aśvins as variously beneficial for one's tanū́, one's "body" or simply "oneself." Normally we might take the word as a reflexive, but the poet compares the Aśvins to various limbs and makes direct reference to bodies, so we have kept the stronger reference to the body in the translation.

In verse 7—the last verse of the poem proper since verse 8 is a signature verse standing outside it—there is a final simile. This is the only one in which the object is not in the dual and not compared to the Aśvins. Rather the object, an axe, is in the singular and compared to "these songs" chanted for the Aśvins. This twist at the end thus breaks the pattern of the hymn and marks its conclusion.

1. Like pressing stones, you two awaken to just this purpose: like vultures toward a tree, (you awaken to go) toward what provides hidden treasures (of honey); like formulators, you recite hymns at the ritual distribution; like messengers, you, serving your people, are to be called upon in many places.
2. Journeying early in the morning like heroes in chariots, like twin goats you follow what you choose;
   (Beautifying your bodies) like exchange-wives beautifying their bodies, like a married couple (in the presence of the people) you find (a common) resolve in the presence of the peoples.
3. Like the horns (of a butting animal), come in front toward us, darting like hooves endowed with staying power.
   Like cakravāka-geese (reuniting) at every dawn, o you ruddy ones, journey this way like chariot-drivers, o able ones.

4. Like boats, take us across—like yokes, like wheel naves, like a wheel's cross-pieces, like its outer-pieces, (take) us (across).
   Allowing no injury to our bodies like dogs, like amulets [?] protect us from collapse.
5. Never growing old like winds, (forming a single) current like rivers, (endowed) with sight like eyes, journey here this way.
   Becoming the best blessing for the body like hands, like feet, lead us toward the better thing.
6. Speaking honey for the mouth like lips, swell like breasts in order that we live.
   Guardians of our body like noses, like ears be good hearers for us.
7. Like hands (clasping a spear), clasping power for us, herd together spaces for us as heaven and earth (herd together the airy spaces).
   Sharpen these songs that are seeking you, Aśvins, like an axe with a whetstone.
8. The Gr̥tsamadas have made these that strengthen you, Aśvins—the holy formulations and the praise song.
   Having delighted in them, drive nearby, you two superior men. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.40 (231) Soma and Pūṣan

Gr̥tsamada
6 verses: triṣṭubh

Soma and Pūṣan are addressed jointly in just this one hymn, and it is difficult to see what brings them together here. The last three verses of this six-verse hymn contrast their functions; in the first three they act jointly, but these actions are not particularly characteristic of either of the two.

1. O Soma and Pūṣan, you, the two begetters of riches, begetters of heaven, begetters of earth, born as the herdsmen of every living thing, did the gods make as the navel of the immortal.
2. These two gods here, as they were being born, did (the gods) enjoy. These two hid the unenjoyable shades of darkness.
   For these two, for Soma and Pūṣan, Indra begot the cooked [=milk] within the raw, within the ruddy ones [=cows].
3. O Soma and Pūṣan, the chariot [=sacrifice?] with seven wheels and five reins that measures out the airy realm but does not speed everyone, rolling in various directions, being yoked with mind, that do you quicken, you bulls.

4. The one made his seat in heaven high above; the other on earth and in the midspace.
   Let those two unleash for us thriving of wealth that brings many rewards and many cattle; let them unloose the navel for us.
5. The one begat all living things; the other goes along watching over everything.
   Soma and Pūṣan, give help to my insight. With you two would we win all battles.
6. Let Pūṣan quicken insight, he who speeds everyone. Let Soma, the master of wealth, establish wealth.
   Let the goddess Aditi, who is without assault, help us. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.41 (232) Various Gods

Gr̥tsamada
21 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 16–17, and br̥hatī 18, arranged in tr̥cas

This is a composite hymn: its composite nature is clear from its position in the maṇḍala, for with twenty-one verses it is far longer than the preceding hymn, which contains six. The hymn has been assembled from the three-verse units known as tr̥cas. It is also of mixed meter, though gāyatrī prevails for most of the hymn (vss. 1–15 and 19–21).

Nonetheless, with the exception of the final three verses (19–21), the hymn forms a ritual unity, treating in order the gods addressed in a structured recitation forming part of the Morning Pressing, which is found also in later Vedic śrauta ritual, known as the Praügaśastra. Other instantiations of this recitation in the R̥gveda are found in I.2–3 (see remarks there) and I.23. The order of divinities is Vāyu (1–2), Indra-Vāyu (3), Mitra-Varuṇa (4–6), Aśvins (7–9), Indra (10–12), the All Gods (13–15), Sarasvatī (16–18). The last three verses (19–21) are, according to Oldenberg (1888: 197 and n. 4), an independent tr̥ca, relating to the carts holding the oblation (havirdhāna carts), that was mistakenly incorporated into the hymn. Even if this last tr̥ca was a late addition, it is worth noting that the first and last verses of the hymn end with the word sómapītaye "for soma-drinking," forming at least a nominal ring.

1. O Vāyu, the chariots in thousands that are yours—with them come here, you with your teams, for soma-drinking.
2. You with your teams, Vāyu, come here. This clear (soma) has been held out to you.
   You are wont to come to the house of the presser.
3. Of the clear (soma) today and of the one mixed with milk, with its teams, o Indra and Vāyu—drive here and drink it, men!

4. Here is the soma pressed for you, o Mitra and Varuṇa, who are strong through truth.
Heed just my call here.
5. The two kings without deceit—in the highest, steadfast seat with its thousand pillars they sit.
6. These two sovereign kings, whose potion is ghee, Ādityas, the lords of the drop, accompany him who does not go astray.

7. Nāsatyas, Aśvins, drive (your circuit) bringing cows, bringing horses, your circuit protective of men, o Rudras,
8. So that no distant mortal nor one close by will dare against (you), you of bullish goods—
(and no) defaming cheat.
9. Aśvins, convey to us here wealth of tawny aspect that finds a wide realm, o holy ones.

10. Indra, certainly, will drive away great fear as it looms, for he is steadfast, boundless.
11. And if Indra will have mercy on us, no evil will reach us from behind.
There will be good for us in front.
12. Indra will make (us) without fear from all the regions round about.
He is the one who conquers rivals—the boundless one.

13. All you gods, come here; hear this call of mine.
Sit down here on this ritual grass.
14. The sharp and the honeyed invigorating (soma) are here for you among the Śunahotras.
Drink this desirable (drink).
15. Having Indra as chief, the Maruts as troop, and the gifts of Pūṣan, o gods, all of you, hear my call.

16. O best mother, best river, best goddess, Sarasvatī—we are like ones unlauded: make a laud for us, mother.
17. In you, the goddess, are all lifetimes fixed, o Sarasvatī.
Become exhilarated among the Śunahotras. Allot offspring to us, goddess.
18. Enjoy these sacred formulations here, o Sarasvatī rich in prize-winning mares, the thoughts dear to the gods that the Gr̥tsamadas pour for you, truthful one.

19. Let the two advance who are beneficial to the sacrifice. Just you two we choose here and Agni, the conveyor of the oblation.

20. Let Heaven and Earth today hold fast this effective, heaven-touching sacrifice of ours among the gods.
21. Let the gods, deserving the sacrifice, sit in the lap of you two who are without deceit, here today for the soma-drinking.

II.42 (233) Omen-Bird

Gr̥tsamada
3 verses: triṣṭubh

The last two brief hymns in Maṇḍala II have a popular character and call on the "omen bird" (śakúni / śakúnti) to produce only auspicious cries. The second of the two (II.43) playfully compares the bird to various priests in the ritual and is thus reminiscent of the famous "Frog Hymn" (VII.103), which identifies the behavior of frogs in the monsoon with that of priests.

1. Ever screeching, announcing its kind [=species], it directs its speech like an oarsman his boat.
   And if you will be of good omen, bird, let no evil eye at all find you.
2. Let not the falcon tear you up, nor the eagle. Let not a hero with arrows, an archer find you.
   Ever screeching in the direction of the fathers, you of good omen, speaking auspiciously, speak here.
3. Screech down to the right of the houses, as one of good omen, speaking auspiciously, o bird.
   Let not a thief gain mastery of us, nor an utterer of evil. – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

II.43 (234) Omen-Bird

Gr̥tsamada
3 verses: jagatī 1, 3, atiśakvarī or aṣṭi 2

See the remarks on II.42.

1. Turning toward the right the bards sing welcome—the birds speaking at their proper season, the birds of omen.
   It speaks both speeches like a sāman-singer: it regulates both gāyatrī and triṣṭubh meters.

2. Like the Udgātar, o omen-bird, you sing the sāman. Like the Son of the Sacred Formulation, you recite at the pressings.
   Like a bullish prize-winner [=stallion] when he has approached (mares) with young, speak auspiciously to us in every way, omen-bird—speak pleasantly to us in all ways, omen-bird.
3. When you are speaking, omen-bird, speak auspiciously; when you are sitting silently, take note of our good thought.
   When, as you fly up, you speak like a lute… – May we speak loftily at the ritual distribution, in possession of good heroes.

III

Maṇḍala III

With a few exceptions, the hymns of Maṇḍala III belong to Viśvāmitra Gāthina and other members of his family. Of the sixty-two hymns in the maṇḍala, the Anukramaṇī states that Viśvāmitra himself composed all or parts of forty-six, along with two others that might be his or that might belong to another poet (III.31, 38). The Anukramaṇī attributes four hymns in the Agni series (III.19–22) to Viśvāmitra's father, Gāthin Kauśika, and one Indra hymn (III.31) either to Viśvāmitra or to his grandfather, Kuśika Aiṣīrathi. Vaiśvāmitras, Viśvāmitra's sons or descendants, are also represented in the maṇḍala: Kata (III.17–18), R̥ṣabha (III.13–14), and possibly Prajāpati (III.38, 54–56), as is one grandson, Utkīla Kātya (III.15–16), the son of Kata Vaiśvāmitra. Outside of III, a few verses (IX.67.13–15; X.137.5) and one jointly composed hymn (X.167) are also attributed to Viśvāmitra. Likewise, other Vaiśvāmitras appear among the composers of hymns in IX and X: Madhuchandas (IX.1), Reṇu (IX.70, X.89), Aṣṭaka (X.104), and Pūraṇa (X.160). Among the remaining poets of III mentioned by the Anukramaṇī are Devaśravas Bhārata and Devavāta Bhārata, who, it says, together composed the Agni hymn, III.23. The Anukramaṇī's attribution may be drawn from the hymn itself, which mentions the two. However, the Bhārata king Sudās was the patron of Viśvāmitra, and the inclusion of a hymn ostensibly by two Bhāratas may reflect the close connection between the clans of the poet and the king.

The Viśvāmitra collection is dominated by hymns to Agni (1–29) and to Indra (30–53). It concludes with four hymns to the All Gods (54–57) and single hymns to the Aśvins (58), Mitra (59), the R̥bhus (60), and Dawn (61). The hymn to Mitra is the only hymn dedicated solely to this god in the R̥gveda and perhaps shows a special affinity between Mitra and his partial namesake, Viśvāmitra. The last hymn (62) is a collection of tr̥cas to six different deities or pairs of deities, including some not otherwise represented in the maṇḍala. The hymn would not be especially noteworthy, except that verse 10, dedicated to Savitar, is the Gāyatrī mantra, the best-known verse in the R̥gveda.

Within the Agni series is a hymn (III.8) to the sacrificial post or posts, to which sacrificial animals would have been tied. Also in this series is a hymn (III.12) to the dual divinities, Indra and Agni. They are brought together here because Agni, representing the sacrifice, and Indra, representing the warriors, jointly lead the clans' victorious march across the rivers. Another unusual Agni hymn is III.26, which follows the process of kindling the sacrificial fire and anticipates the later Āgnimāruta śastra. In the Indra series, a historically and literarily significant hymn is III.33, which addresses the Rivers, Viśvāmitra himself, and Indra, and which the Anukramaṇī attributes to the Rivers and Viśvāmitra. The reason for the Anukramaṇī's attribution is that this hymn is a dialogue between Viśvāmitra and the Vipāś and Śutudrī Rivers. The poet approaches the Rivers and asks them to stop in order to allow the Bhāratas to cross. These two rivers are the modern Beas and Sutlej, which are part of the Indus river complex, and crossing these rivers may mark a raid, seasonal migration, or resettlement from the west toward the east. In III.33, which likely marks a later period in the Bhāratas' migration, they are in the area of the Sarasvatī, Dṛṣadvatī, and Āpayā rivers, and although the identification of these rivers is controversial, they probably place the Bhāratas in Kurukṣetra, east of the Vipāś and Śutudrī. Also in the Indra series is a cosmogonic hymn, III.38, which describes the origin of the material of creation and the division of that material into names and forms. Like the even more famous X.129, the hymn compares the creativity that founded the world to the creativity of the poet. The last hymn of the Indra series and a supplement to it is III.53, which is a praise of Viśvāmitra and his family and of King Sudās and the Bhāratas, whom they serve.

One of the distinctive characteristics of this maṇḍala is that its poets mark seven of its Agni hymns (1, 5, 6, 7, 15, 22, and 23) and twelve of its Indra hymns (30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, 43, 48, 49, and 50) with a final verse that identifies the hymn as a Vaiśvāmitra creation. Other poetic families also have such signature verses, but the Viśvāmitras have one for their Agni hymns and a different one for the Indra hymns.

III.1 (235) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
23 verses: triṣṭubh

In our interpretation, Agni opens the hymn with a declaration that the priests have kindled him to carry the oblations. The poet and the priests then confirm that they have indeed laid the fire to begin the rite. Implied in the first two verses is thus the birth of the sacrificial fire, and the birth of Agni then becomes the central theme of the hymn. The first part of the hymn (vss. 3–14) reflects not only on the birth of the ritual fire, but also on Agni's ultimate birth from the waters. Indeed, throughout much of the first half of the hymn, the verses can be taken as describing either the birth of the ritual fire or the ultimate birth of Agni or both. The poem thus merges Agni's original or ultimate birth among the waters and his birth here in the sacrifice to the accompaniment of the priestly recitations. This poetic strategy complicates the translation and interpretation of the hymn. For example, verse 4 refers to the "seven young women," who are also the mares who tend to Agni (4cd) and who reappear again in verses 6 and 9. In verse 4 these seven women are likely the rivers, as Geldner rightly notes, but in verse 6 they are identified, unexpectedly, as the voices of the seven priests of the soma rite. Retrospectively, therefore, we can view these women as both the rivers and the voices. Similarly in verse 11 the "kindred sisters" might be the rivers, or they might again be the voices of the priests.

The identity of Agni's father also complicates the story of Agni's birth. In verse 10 Agni gives rise to Agni, and therefore Agni is also his own father. But then who is the father in verse 9? Geldner and Renou think that his father there is Heaven, Heaven's udder the raincloud, and therefore the fire here is lightning. More likely, however, the reference is to the ritual fire. If so, then the father in verse 9 might be the priest churning the fire, the udder his voice, and the udder's "spurts and streams" the words of the priest. Or, again in light of verse 10, the father might be Agni, who nurtures himself through the "spurts and streams" of his spreading flames. Or, just as in the case of the "seven young women," the poet may intend several of these possibilities.

As Geldner notes, from verse 15 the poet more unambiguously addresses the ritual fire, though he does return to the theme of Agni's births in verse 20. This time, though, the reference may be not only to the ultimate origins of Agni but also and primarily to the ritual fires of long ago and the ritual fire of the present.

1. [Agni:] "You have made me your draft-horse, who am mighty from soma—(saying,) 'Convey (the oblations), o Agni'—in order (for me) to offer the sacrifice at the ritual distribution."
   [The poet:] "As you shine toward the gods—I harness the stone and I labor, o Agni—take delight in your own body."
2. [The priests:] "We have made the sacrifice turned to the east (in order to begin). Let our song become strong." (So saying) they befriend Agni with kindling wood and with reverence.
   From heaven they [=the gods?] have directed the ritual distributions of the sages. They have sought the way for (Agni), even for the clever and mighty one.
3. The wise (Agni) of refined skill created joy for himself—he who through his birth is the close kin of heaven and of earth.
   The gods found the lovely one within the waters; (they found) Agni in the work of the sisters [=rivers or fingers of the priests].
4. The seven young women strengthened him of good fortune, who is white as he comes to birth, red in his greatness.
   (Those) mares came to him (newly born) as to a new-born colt. The gods marveled at Agni at his birth.
5. Stretching through the airy realm with his blazing limbs, purifying his resolve through the sage poets as his purifying filters, clothing himself all around in flame, and being the life of the waters, he measures out his splendors, lofty and never wanting.

6. He wandered toward them, who neither speak falsely nor can be deceived, who are the young women of heaven, neither clothing themselves nor naked.
   Here the young women of long ago, who came from the same womb, conceived their single embryo—they, the seven voices.
7. Strewn about and pressing together are his (flames) of all colors in the womb of ghee and in the stream of the honeyed (soma juices).
   Here have the swelling cows [=milk offerings] taken their stand. The two mothers of wondrous (Agni) [=the two fire churning sticks?] are the two great ones, the two united.
8. Being carried (as an embryo), o son of strength, you have flashed out, assuming your wondrous forms that blaze and rage.
   Streams of honey and ghee drip where the bull has grown strong through our poetic craft.
9. At his birth, he found the udder even of his father. He let loose its streams and spurts in every direction.
   Him who moves in hiding from his kind companions [=the priests]—(though) he was not hidden from the young women of heaven—
10. (Him) who was the embryo of his father and begetter did he himself carry. Alone, he suckled upon the many swelling females.
    (Protect) his two kindred cowives for the blazing bull, protect the pair [=the fire-churning sticks?] belonging to the sons of Manu for him.
11. The great one has grown strong in the broad and unrestricted (place). The waters (go) to Agni, for glory gets the girls.
    In the womb of truth lay the lord of the house, Agni, within the work of the kindred sisters.
12. Like a burden-bearing foal [?], at the meeting place of the great (waters?), the one desirable for a son to see and foaming with radiance, the begetter who gave birth to the ruddy (cows of dawn), the embryo of the waters, and the best of men is the young Agni.
13. The (fire-churning) Wood—she who brings good fortune—has given birth to the lovely embryo of the waters and of the plants, to him of various colors.
    Since they have united in their thinking, even the gods befriend the most admired and powerful one as soon as he is born.
14. Like blazing flashes of lightning, lofty radiant beams accompany Agni, foaming with radiance, as they yield as their milk the immortal (Agni), grown strong within his own seat as if in hiding, within the unbounded container.
15. I call upon you, sacrificing with my offerings, and I call upon your companionship and your favor with desire.
    With the gods, give help in full measure to the singer, and guard us with your faces that belong to the house.

16. As your dependents, o well-guiding Agni, receiving all riches and thrusting ourselves forward with a fame that comes with good seed, we would prevail over the godless battle-mongers.
17. Here have you come to be the beacon of the gods, o Agni, delighting and knowing all poetic crafts.
As the lord of the household, you allowed mortals to settle down, and as a charioteer bringing success, you journey following the gods.
18. The immortal king has taken his seat in the house of mortals, bringing success to the ritual distributions.
His face covered in ghee, he flashed out widely—Agni knowing all poetic crafts.
19. Come to us together with your kind companionship, hastening as the great one together with your great help.
Make for us abundant wealth that brings us safely across, and a share for us that brings beautiful speech and glory.
20. These your births of long ago, o Agni, and your present ones I shall proclaim for the ancient one.
Great soma-pressings for the bull have been made here. Jātavedas has been installed in one birth after another.
21. Having been installed in one birth after another, Jātavedas, the inexhaustible, is kindled by the Viśvāmitras.
We would be within the good will of him who is worthy of the sacrifice, even within his favorable benevolence.
22. O you endowed with strength, you of strong resolve, place this sacrifice among the gods for us, giving (it to them).
Hold forth the lofty refreshing drinks for us, o Hotar. O Agni, win great wealth by sacrifice.
23. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.2 (236) Agni Vaiśvānara

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
15 verses: jagatī

The first verse announces the two themes of this hymn: the establishment of the fire in the sacrifice and its connection with the words recited by the priests. The poet begins by announcing that the priests are creating the dhiṣáṇā, the "Holy Place" for the fire. The meaning and etymology of dhiṣáṇā are not transparent, but it is synchronically associated with the root √dhā "place, establish"—allowing the reference to the Holy

Place of fire to be carried through this hymn by the frequent use of derivatives of √dhā (vss. 2, 5, 7, 8, 9, 13, and 15, echoed in vs. 6 when √dhā is used not to describe the placement of fire but the establishment of wealth for the sacrificers). The placement of fire is also connected to the words of the priests. The chanters "bring together" Agni as their Hotar (vs. 1); gods originally gave rise to Agni through their "insights" (vs. 3); and Agni flourishes "through our good thoughts" (vs. 12). The close connection between the words of the sacrificial performers and the kindling of fire is reflected in the poet's description of Agni as a kaví, a sage poet (vss. 4, 7, 10).

This hymn also explicitly describes or refers to the rites surrounding fire, sometimes connecting them with the character of the god Agni and often his role as Vaiśvānara, the sun. In 4d, for example, the poet puns on rā́jantam, which can describe Agni as both "ruling" (as it is translated there) and "shining" with his heavenly flame as fire is kindled. In verse 9 the three kindling sticks may refer to the three fires set to the west, south, and east that surround the sacrificial area, which represents the earth. Thus Agni as the ritual fires around the sacrificial ground is also Agni as the sun, which encircles the earth. And in verse 12, as Geldner rightly remarks, the course of Agni is both the course of the sun and the paryagnikaraṇa, the rite of carrying the fire around the sacrificial animal.

At the end of the hymn, having set the fire in place, the poet turns to the Fire to beg for easy travel, for the prizes of victory in the sacrificial contest, and for wealth.

1. We give birth to the Holy Place for Vaiśvānara, who grows strong through the truth, like purified ghee for Agni.
 Once again, as an axe brings together a chariot, the chanters (bring together) with their insight the Hotar [=Agni], (who was) also (the Hotar) of Manu.
2. He made both world-halves shine through his birth. He became the son to be invoked by his two parents [=Heaven and Earth?].
 Agni is the conveyor of oblations, unaging and placed for delight, difficult to deceive, the guest of the clans, rich in radiance.
3. In accordance with their will and upon the broad foundation of their skill and power to surpass, the gods gave birth to Agni through their insights.
 I speak to the great one, shining with his radiance and his light, as one who wants to win the prize (speaks) to his steed.
4. Wanting to win it, we choose the desirable, audacious, verse-worthy prize of the delighting (Agni), the gift of the Bhr̥gus, the fire-priest with a poet's resolve—Agni (himself), who rules with his heavenly flame.
5. With twisted ritual grass, the peoples have placed Agni in front, him who brings fame as a prize, for the sake of his favor, and with offering ladle extended, they (have placed) him, brightly shining, belonging to all the gods, the Rudra of the sacrifices, bringing success to the offerings of the (ritual) workers.

6. O you of pure flame, because our men with twisted ritual grass in the sacrifices are all around your dwelling, o Hotar, they are drawing near, seeking your company, your friendship, o Agni. Establish wealth for them.
7. The great sun filled both world-halves, when the (ritual) workers supported him when he was just born.
   And he, the sage poet, is led around for the rite, like a steed, for the winning of the prize, being placed for delight.
8. Revere him who gives the oblation, who makes the rites good. Befriend the domestic Jātavedas.
   The charioteer of the lofty truth who has no boundary, Agni has become the one placed in front of the gods.
9. The deathless fire-priests purified three kindling sticks for the youthful, earth-encircling Agni.
   While they placed one of these as a benefit for the mortal, two also went up to the wide world (of heaven) kindred (to the earth).
10. The refreshments of the sons of Manu [=the oblations of ghee] have perfected him, the poet of the clans, the clanlord, to be sharp like an axe.
    He journeys to the heights and the depths, being ever active. He supports his embryo among these living beings.
11. Since he understands how, the bull enlivens himself in his shimmering bellies like a loudly roaring lion—deathless Vaiśvānara of broad visage, who distributes goods and treasures to the pious man.
12. As of old, Vaiśvānara mounted the vault of the sky, the back of heaven, becoming joyful through our good thoughts.
    As before, producing the winnings for the (human) race, being awake, he goes around the same course.
13. The inspired one, possessing the truth, worthy of the sacrifice, and worthy of hymns, the dwelling in heaven whom Mātariśvan placed here—him do we beseech, him whose path is shimmering, whose hair is tawny, beautifully shining Agni, for a newer easy passage.
14. Like the blazing (sun) in its course, the vigorous one of sunlike appearance, the beacon of heaven, standing within the realm of light and awakening at dawn—
    Agni, the unstoppable head of heaven, him do we beseech with our reverence on high as our prizewinner horse.
15. The delighting Hotar, the blazing one free of duplicity, the lord of the household, worthy of hymns and belonging to all lands, like the shimmering chariot [=the sun?], lovely to see for his beautiful form, the one placed by Manu, do we ever beseech for wealth.

III.3 (237) Agni Vaiśvānara

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: jagatī

In this hymn the poet stresses the dual role of Agni as fire and sun and therefore as belonging to mortals and to gods. The movement between Agni as the sacrificial fire and as the sun is announced in the first verse: Agni befriends the gods, and he also maintains the integrity of the sacrifice for humans. Because he belongs to both gods and mortals, Agni moves between the two world-halves, the sphere of the gods in heaven and the place of mortals on earth—a theme repeated in verses 2, 4, 6, and 10. Some of the more enigmatic aspects of this hymn may reflect the location of Agni in both heaven and earth and the unity of Agni as sacrificial fire and as the sun. In verse 8 Agni's simultaneous connection to gods and mortals reaches a climax, in which it is not clear which of the two is being talked about. Who or what is being strengthened? Is it the gods, the kin of Manu, the sacrifice, or even Agni himself? In verse 2 Agni's "lofty dwelling place" could refer both to the place of the sun in heaven or the place of the sacrificial fire.

A special mystery concerns the last verse of the hymn, verse 11. In 11b, following the suggestion of Geldner, we have taken Agni as the subject, and Agni's semen as the suppressed object. The reference, he suggests, is the mystery and paradox of Agni as his own father, which is also found in III.2. The image is an unusual one, but several elements of verse 11 suggest that it is Agni's semen (rétas) that "flows on high." First, rétas is both present in pāda d and suggested by √rī "flow" in pāda b. Second, that which is "flowing on high" in pādas ab results in Agni's birth in cd. Finally, the ellipsis of the object, which occurs between bṛhád / áriṇād, is solved in pāda d by bhū́ri-retasā "having abundant semen," which echoes bṛhád / áriṇād phonologically and thereby suggests "semen" as the missing object. The mystery also brings back the theme of the Agni as sun and as sacrificial fire, since the fire who is single and who makes semen flow on high is likely the sun. In any case, that theme is restated in the last lines, which identify the parents of Agni as both Heaven and Earth.

1. To honor Vaiśvānara of broad visage, our inspired words offer him treasures so that he goes upon strong supports.
   Since immortal Agni befriends the gods, therefore, from of old, he has never corrupted the foundations (of the sacrifice).
2. The wondrous messenger journeys between the two world-halves. The Hotar of Manu has taken his seat, placed to the fore.
   He attends upon his lofty dwelling place throughout the days. Bringing goods through his insight, Agni is urged on by the gods.
3. Beacon of the sacrifices, bringer of success to the ritual distribution—Agni do the inspired poets exalt with their thoughts.
   In whom they have gathered their tasks and their songs, in him the sacrificer desires to find favors.

4. The father of sacrifices and the lord of those perceiving the inspired words, Agni is the measure and pattern for the chanters.
   He has entered the two world-halves with their abundant forms. Dear to many, the poet becomes joyful through his manifestations.
5. Shimmering Agni, whose chariot is shimmering and whose commandments are golden, Vaiśvānara, who sits amid the waters and finds the sun, the one who sinks deep and moves swiftly, surrounded by his powers—him, ardent and very splendid, have the gods placed here.
6. Agni, who, together with the gods and with the kin of Manu, extends the much-adorned sacrifice by his insight, speeds between (the two worlds) as a charioteer by means of those [=the gods and the kin of Manu] who bring the offerings to success—he the lively houselord, who dispels curses.
7. O Agni, be awake to a lifetime rich with descendants (for us). Swell with nourishment, and shine refreshments on us.
   Quicken our vital powers and the (gods) on high, o you who are awake, as the fire-priest of the gods. You are the one of strong resolve for inspired words.
8. Clanlord, youthful guest, controller of insights, and fire-priest of the chanters, sign of the rites, and Jātavedas—him do our men ever proclaim with reverence, (for him) to give strength by his spur.
9. The far-radiant god, the great delight, Agni with his chariot and through his vast power has surrounded the settlements.
   We would attend to the commandments of him who prospers abundantly here in our house by means of our well-twisted hymns.
10. Vaiśvānara, I desire your manifestations, by which you became the one who finds the sun, o far-gazing one.
   As soon as you were born, you filled the living worlds and the two world-halves. Agni, you surround all these in your own person.
11. By the wondrous powers of Vaiśvānara and by his good work, the single poet [=Agni?] made it [=his semen?] flow on high.
   Agni was born, exalting both his parents, Heaven and the Earth, who have abundant semen.

III.4 (238) Āprī

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh

One of the ten Āprī litanies found in the R̥gveda. This is one of the eleven-verse versions, with Tanūnāpāt in position 2 and no Narāśaṃsa. It is a trickier Āprī hymn than most, in that not all the key words are overtly expressed but are implied by derivationally related (vs. 1) or phonologically similar (vs. 3) words or are simply gapped (vs. 5). For example, rather than the usual past participle samíddha "kindled" in the first verse, this hymn has the āmreḍita nominal samít-samid "kindling stick after kindling stick." In verse 3 iḷáḥ "of the milk libation" substitutes for the usual īḍitá "solemnly invoked," with similar phonology though they are etymologically and semantically unrelated. In verse 5 the expected Divine Doors do not appear but can be supplied with the feminine adjective pūrvī́ḥ "many." As usual, the key words (or their substitutes) are italicized in this translation. The final four verses are identical to VII.2.8–11.

1. Kindling stick after kindling stick—become favorable to us. With flame after flame, give the favor of the good one.
   Convey here the gods, o god, for the sacrifice. As our companion, favorable (to us), sacrifice to your companions, o Agni.
2. You to whom the gods—Varuṇa, Mitra, and Agni—offer sacrifice three times in a day, day after day, make this sacrifice to be honey-filled for us, o Tanūnapāt, and, with its womb of ghee, to give honor (to the gods).
3. The insight that fulfills all wishes goes forth to the Hotar [=Agni] of the milk-libation in order to offer sacrifice first and to celebrate the bull here with acts of reverence. When prompted, he will sacrifice to the gods as the superior sacrificer.
4. High above has the path for you two been created in the rite. High above have the flames advanced into the airy spaces, or rather the Hotar has been seated at the navel of heaven. We strew the ritual grass widely, providing an expanse for the gods.
5. Choosing in their mind the seven offices of the Hotar, driving everything onward, they [=the gods] return in accordance with the truth.
   They wander forth to this sacrifice through the many (Divine Doors), which have excellent men [=the gods?] as their adornment and which are born at the ritual distributions.
6. Becoming joyful here, Dawn and Night are close by, and they both smile, though in body they have different forms, so that Mitra will rejoice in us, and Varuṇa, and also Indra along with the Maruts, through their great powers.
7. I direct the two foremost Divine Hotars downward. The seven (priests), giving strength, become exhilarated by their own will.
   Reciting the truth, they speak just the truth, reflecting upon their commandments as the protectors of commandments.
8. Bhāratī along with the Bhāratīs, Iḷā along with the gods, Agni along with the sons of Manu, and Sarasvatī along with the Sārasvatas are near: let the three goddesses sit here on the ritual grass.

9. O god Tvaṣṭar, unbind for us this flow of semen and what prospers, granting (that) from which a hero is born, fit for action and very skilled, who yokes up the pressing stones and desires the gods.
10. O Lord of the Forest, send it [=the sacrificial animal] to the gods. Agni, the Śamitar, will sweeten the offering.
And it is he, the more real Hotar [=Agni], who will offer sacrifice, since he knows the births of the gods.
11. Journey near here, o Agni, as you are kindled, on the same chariot with Indra and the swift gods.
Let Aditi of good sons sit on our ritual grass. Svāhā! Let the immortal gods rejoice!

III.5 (239) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The address is to Agni as the fire kindled in the morning rites, whose appearance anticipates that of the dawns and the sun. His advent inspires the recitations of the priests and Agni himself grows stronger through those recitations and through the rites, if Geldner has rightly identified "the many manifestations of truth" in verse 2 as the acts of the sacrifice. The poet's major theme, though, is the identification of Agni with various deities whose functions intersect with those of Agni. In verse 4 and briefly reprised toward the end of the hymn in verse 9, Agni is Mitra, the god of alliances, because his kindling marks the re-creation of the alliance between gods and mortals through the performance of the sacrifice. Agni's identification with the Adhvaryu, the priest in charge of the action of the rite, follows from his role as Mitra. In 4d, however, the appellative sense of mitrá "ally" comes to the fore, and Agni is not only part of the rite and household, but the ally of the rivers and mountains, all the territories of the earth. More unusually, in verse 4 he is also identified in his form as Jātavedas as Varuṇa, the god of commandments. Neither Agni's identification as Jātavedas nor his authority to command are central to this hymn, so the introduction of Varuṇa here is the result of Varuṇa's close connection with Mitra, and Jātavedas, although normally a name of Agni, is here semiautonomous from him, like Tanūnapāt in the previous hymn.

Verses 5 and 6, occupying the mysterious middle of the hymn, are the most difficult. Verse 5ab might continue from 4d, proclaiming that the highest limits of the earth and even the sky are governed by Agni. Alternatively, the "summit's tip" could be the reach of the sacrificial fire and the track of the bird could be the track of the sun. In the latter case the verses connect two forms of Agni as the sacrificial fire and as the sun. In verse 6 Agni is identified with another deity, Ṛbhu or the Ṛbhu, the craftsman, who, like Agni, is also a priest. The "hide of the grain" is puzzling, but as also in IV.7.7, it might refer to the ritual grass and the "track of the bird" again to Agni as the sun, appearing during the kindling of the morning sacrificial fire.

Verse 7 once more takes up the theme of the birth of Agni. His parents might be Heaven and Earth, as Sāyaṇa and other interpreters suggest, or, more likely, the two fire-churning sticks, which are Agni's new parents with his every birth. Once Agni is born, the plants—the kindling chips—nurture him and he becomes strong in the lap of his parents. Then in verse 9 Agni, now flaring up, appears both in heaven as the sun and in the sacrificial area, the navel of the earth, as the fire of the sacrifice. The poem ends with one last identification: Agni is Mātariśvan, the fire-bringer, for fire gives rise to fire.

1. In response to the dawns, the ever more visible Agni has awakened, the inspired (priest), trail-blazer for the poets.
   He of broad visage, kindled by those seeking the gods, as the draft-horse (of the oblations), has opened the doors of darkness.
2. To be revered through recitations, Agni has grown still stronger through the praises and songs of the praise singers.
   Delighting in the many manifestations of truth, the messenger has flared forth at the shining out of dawn.
3. Agni has been installed among the clans of the sons of Manu—the embryo of the waters and Mitra bringing success through the truth.
   Beloved and worthy of the sacrifice, he has mounted the back (of the altar), and has become the inspired (priest) to be invoked by our thoughts.
4. Agni becomes Mitra when he is kindled. As the Hotar, he is Mitra; as Jātavedas, Varuṇa.
   As the vigorous Adhvaryu and the lord of the household, he is Mitra, the Mitra of the rivers and mountains.
5. He protects the summit's [?] tip dear to him and the track of the bird. The young one protects the course of the sun.
   Agni protects the seven-headed (chant?) in the navel (of the sacrifice). Towering, he protects the exhilarating (soma?) of the gods.
6. The Ṛbhu [=Agni] created for himself the beloved name (of Ṛbhu) to be invoked, since he is the god who knows all the ritual patterns.
   The hide of the grain and the track of the bird, (each) covered in ghee—just that does Agni guard, never lapsing.
7. Being eager, Agni has mounted the eager womb covered in ghee and providing wide entry.
   Shining, blazing, towering, pure—again and again he has made his mother and father new.

8. As soon as he is born, he grows strong through the plants, when the fruitful (plants) make him strong with ghee.
   Like the waters appearing in beauty on their downward course, Agni makes a wide path [?] in the lap of his parents [=the fire-churning sticks].
9. Praised, the young one has flared up through his kindling, upon the summit of heaven and the navel of earth.
   To be invoked as Mitra and Mātariśvan, Agni as messenger will convey the gods to the sacrifice.
10. Towering, Agni has propped up the vault of the sky through his kindling, becoming the highest of the lights, when Mātariśvan kindled him hiding from the Bhr̥gus, conveying the oblation.
11. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
   There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.6 (240) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh

From its beginning, this hymn signals Agni's dual roles as priest and ritual fire and as fire on earth and fire among the gods. The first verse contains a sustained śleṣa, a word, or in this case a gapped word, with a double sense. The gapped feminine noun is probably the juhū́, the sacrificial ladle with which the butter offerings are poured in the fire. But she can also be the tongue of the poet—not so incidentally, another meaning of the word juhū́—or even the speech of the poets. If one of the two latter, then dakṣiṇāvā́ṭ can mean not or not only "conveying to the right" but also, as Geldner suggests, "conveying the priestly gift" (dakṣiṇā) to the Hotar Agni. Similarly, in verse 2, the draft-horses are primarily the flames of Agni, but they can also be the priests of the sacrifices.

From verse 3 the poet launches into his principal theme: the position of Agni himself as the intermediary between gods and humans, himself a kind of divine śleṣa, who is simultaneously a Hotar for humans and a Hotar for the gods. The references to Heaven and Earth (vss. 3, 4) or to the "two world-halves" (vss. 5, 10) point toward his role as intermediary between earth and heaven. Similarly, in verse 7 Agni appears as both the heavenly fire, the sun, and as the earthly fire of the sacrifice. Reflecting his double manifestation, the first line of this verse could mean that Agni shines either as the earthly fire "to heaven" or as the sun "from heaven."

1. O praise-poets, twisting around in your mind, lead forth the one [=the sacrificial ladle] who is turned toward the gods, as you serve the gods; conveying (offerings) toward the right, the prizewinning mare goes to the east, bringing the offering to Agni, (she who is) rich in ghee.
2. You filled the two world-halves as you were born, and now you, o you who seek the first offerings, have surpassed even the heaven and the earth by your greatness, o Agni. Let your draft-horses with their seven tongues twist around.
3. Heaven and Earth and the (gods) worthy of the sacrifice set you down as the Hotar for the house, when the clans of the sons of Manu, serving the gods and bearing pleasing oblations, summon your gleaming flame.
4. Taking pleasure, the great one is set down here in his enduring abode between Heaven and Earth, the two great ones, who are united cowives, unaging and indestructible, the two nectar-yielding milk-cows of the wide-ranging (Agni).
5. Great are the commandments of you who are great, o Agni. Through your will you extend throughout the two world-halves.
   You became the messenger as you were born. You are the leader of the different peoples, o bull.
6. Or place your own two long-maned (horses) of truth, sorrels bathed in ghee, on the yoke-pole with the harness ropes.
   Then convey all the gods here, o god. Perform good rites, Jātavedas.
7. Your shining rays shine here even to heaven; you become radiant along with the many far-radiant dawns, when, o Agni, the gods marvel at your busy burning at will among the wood, (the burning) by the delightful Hotar.
8. Whether (they be) the gods who rejoice in the broad midspace or those who are in the luminous realm of heaven, or those who are helpers, easily invoked and belonging to the sacrifice—their chariot horses guided themselves here, o Agni—
9. With these, o Agni, journey here near to us on the same chariot, or on a different chariot, for your horses are wide-ranging.
   Convey here the three and thirty gods along with their wives, in accordance with your own will; make then rejoice!.
10. He is the Hotar, whose every sacrifice even the two broad world-halves welcome in order to make it strong.
    Turned eastward like two rites stand the two well-supported (world-halves), the two truth-possessing (parents) of truth-begotten (Agni), the two real ones.
11. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
    There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.7 (241) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh

Geldner describes this as a deliberately obscure morning hymn. The poet creates this obscurity by rarely directly identifying the objects concerned, but rather referring to them through metaphors, especially of mares and bulls. One reason the poet chooses this approach may be because he is simultaneously describing and thus interconnecting three realities relevant to the morning ritual: the priests and their activity, the appearance of the sacrificial fire and thus of the god Agni, and the rising of the sun, which is another form of Agni.

Neither space nor certainty allows us to unpack all of the poet's metaphors, but the following brief discussion of a few can illustrate the complexity and possibilities of the poet's imagery. Geldner suggests that the seven voices in verse 1 may be the seven rivers (as in III.1.6), but they might also be the voices of the seven priests of the soma rite. Agni's "mother and father" might be Earth and Heaven—especially since his parents are probably Heaven and Earth in pāda c. But they could also be the two fire-churning sticks, the *áráṇi*s, in which case mātárā might better be "the two mothers." If the mātárā are both Earth and Heaven and the churning sticks, then the poet may be deliberately exploiting the paradox that Agni, the ritual fire, is the child of the churning sticks, and Agni, perhaps as the sun, is the child of Heaven and Earth. In verse 2 Sāyaṇa among others reasonably understands the mares to be the waters, but we suggest that they might be, or again also be, Agni's flames or rays of the sun. If we follow these latter interpretations, then the "single cow" might be the sun, although this identification is doubtful since the sun is not otherwise a cow or even female. The choice of such an image for the sun, if it is such, might have been motivated by the image of the flames as mares and milk-cows. Alternatively, Geldner thinks the single cow is probably the sacrificial ladle, which is certainly possible. The "seers," who are the likely subject in verse 5 and who appear again in verse 7, may be the saptarṣayaḥ "seven seers," the seven stars of the Big Dipper, and in both verses they may also be the seven priests of the soma rite. As Kiehnle (1979: 83) has observed, it is because they may be stars in verse 7 that vípra "inspired" can also have the more literal sense of "quivering," that is, "twinkling." Also in verse 7 the young bulls may be the flames of Agni (so Oldenberg) or possibly the flames of the rising sun (Kiehnle).

1. Those (flames) that have gone forth from the wellspring of white-backed (Agni) have entered his mother and father and the seven voices.
 The encircling father and mother [=Heaven and Earth] travel in tandem;
 the two stretch far and wide to display their long lifetime.

2. The mares [=the flames?] of the bull, the ruler of heaven [=the sun], are milk-cows; he took his place upon these goddesses, who convey that filled with honey.
   The single cow travels her course around you, who dwell peacefully in the seat of truth.
3. He mounted upon them that become easy to guide as their watchful lord and as the wealth-finder of wealth.
   The blue-backed (Agni), whose faces are manyfold, made them dwell apart from the wellspring of the brushwood.
4. Nourishing the unaging son of Tvaṣṭar greatly, the carriers [=fingers of the priests?] carry him [=the newborn fire], who stands fast.
   Flaring out with his limbs in his abode, he entered the two world-halves as if they were one woman.
5. They [=the seers?] know the benevolence of the flame-red bull, and they find joy in the command of the copper-colored one—they, the shining ones, shining from heaven and brightly shining, to whose flock belong the milk-libation and the great song.
6. And by their knowledge, following his sound, they led their thunderous (sound) to his father and mother, the great (parents) of great (Agni), when at night the young bull grew strong all around his (fire)place along the domain of a singer.
7. With the five Adhvaryus, the seven inspired ones protect the dear hidden track of the bird.
   Turned forward, the young, unaging bulls [=flames?] become exhilarated, for gods follow the commandments of the gods.
8. I direct the two foremost divine Hotars downward. The seven (priests), giving strength, become exhilarated by their own will.
   Reciting the truth, they speak just the truth, reflecting upon their commandments as the protectors of commandments.
9. The many (mares) [=flames?] act like bulls for the great steed [=Agni or the sun]; their reins [=rays of light] are easy to guide for the shimmering bull.
   O god and Hotar, as the most delighting and watchful, convey the great gods and the two world-halves here to this place.
10. O Wealth—the dawns, owning the fortifying first offerings, receiving the beautiful words, bearing lovely beacons, have dawned richly.
    And now, o Agni, by the greatness of earth, for the sake of our great (fortune), be favorable even to the (ritual) fault we have committed.
11. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
    There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.8 (242) Sacrificial Post(s)

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 3, 7

Though this hymn is found in the middle of the Agni collection, it is dedicated to the Sacrificial Post (yūpa), to which the animal to be sacrificed is tied. It is not entirely clear why it has been inserted here, though as an eleven-verse hymn consisting mostly of triṣṭubhs it comes at the end of the triṣṭubh hymns to Agni and is preceded by two likewise eleven-verse hymns.

The structure of the hymn has been illuminatingly discussed by Theodore Proferes (2003b), who shows that not only does it fall into two separate parts devoted to the single post (1–5) and multiple posts (6–10) respectively, as is already indicated by the Anukramaṇī, but that the two halves are entirely parallel in phraseology and structure. Originally there were probably two hymns, each appropriate to a different ritual situation (one sacrificial animal versus several). They were put together and a final benedictory verse was added (11), and then it was inserted into the Agni cycle.

The ritual action depicted in both parts is the erecting, anointing, and wrapping of the posts; there is no mention of the sacrificial animal.

1. Those seeking the gods anoint you at the ceremony, o Lord of the Forest, with heavenly honey.
   When you will stand erect, after that establish material goods here—or when you will dwell peacefully in the lap of this mother [=Earth].
2. Being propped in front of the kindled (fire), gaining the unaging formulation that provides good heroes, thrusting heedlessness to a distance from us, rise up for great good fortune.
3. Rise up, Lord of the Forest, upon the height of the earth.
   Being founded with a good founding, establish luster for the one whose vehicle is the sacrifice.
4. As a youth, richly dressed, engirded, he has come here. He becomes more splendid as he is being born.
   Him do the insightful, very attentive poets lead upward, seeking the gods with their mind.
5. Once born, he is born (again) on the brightest day of days, growing strong at the encounter, at the rite.
   The insightful, industrious ones purify (him) with inspired thought. Beseeching the gods, the poet raises his voice.

6. Those of you whom the god-seeking men have fixed down, or, Lord of the Forest, whom the axe has fashioned, let those god(like) sacrificial posts, standing there, be disposed to place a treasure consisting of offspring in us.

7. Those who, hewn, are on the earth, or have been fixed down in it, or over whom the offering ladles have been outstretched, let them pursue a thing of value for us among the gods, assuring success to the cultivated lands.
8. The Ādityas, Rudras, Vasus of good guidance, Heaven and Earth, the Broad One, the Midspace—let the gods in concert help our sacrifice. Let them make the beacon of the ceremony erect.
9. Like geese, taking their places in a row, wearing gleaming (garments) the posts have come here to us.
   Being led upward by the poets in front, the gods go into the fold of the gods.
10. Just like the horns of horned beasts they appear—the posts, with their knobs, (standing) on the earth.
    Or listening attentively at the competing invocation by the cantors, let (the gods) help us at the battle drives.

11. Lord of the Forest, grow forth with a hundred branches—with a thousand branches may we grow forth—you whom this axe here, on being sharpened, has led forth for great good fortune.

III.9 (243) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The setting of the poem is the kindling of Agni in the very early morning (cf. vs. 7). Thematically, the poet parallels the gods' search for Agni and the human priests' kindling of fire. The fire has disappeared into the waters or into the wood, which has absorbed the waters. Therefore, it is in the waters that the "watchful and undeceiving ones," either priests or gods, have found him. The double reference is particularly well expressed in verse 5. The first part of the verse alludes to the myth of Agni's flight from the gods and to the myth of Mātariśvan, who brings the fire from heaven. But the final phrase devébhyo mathitám pári, here translated "stolen from among the gods," could also mean "churned from among the gods." That is, it likely refers to the priestly act of creating fire by friction as well as to the story of Mātariśvan's bringing fire.

1. As your companions, we mortals have chosen you, a god, to help—you, the Child of the Waters, sharing good fortune, shining brightly, strongly advancing, faultless.

2. Since desiring the trees, you went to your mothers, the waters, therefore your return is not to be ignored, o Agni, since, though being far away, you have come to be here.
3. You have grown beyond the acrid (smoke), and so now you are benevolent.
   The ones [=priests or flames] go farther and farther forth; the others [=other priests or flames] remain around—those in whose companionship you rest.
4. Him who had gone beyond failures, beyond the ever-parched places—him did the watchful and undeceiving ones find resting in the waters like a lion.
5. Agni, hidden thus, as if he had run away on his own—him did Mātariśvan lead here from the far distance, stolen from among the gods.
6. You are he whom mortals seized, o you who convey oblations to the gods, since you, son of Manu, guard all sacrifices according to your resolve, youngest one.
7. This is auspicious—your wondrous skill appears good even to a simple man—that the herd sits together around you, o Agni, when you are kindled at night's boundary.
8. Pour an offering to him who makes the rite good, sharp (Agni) of pure flame.
   Obediently serve the swift messenger, the quick, the ancient one to be summoned, the god.
9. Three hundred and three thousand, thirty and nine gods served Agni.
   They sprinkled him with ghee and they strewed ritual grass for him. Then they seated him as their Hotar.

III.10 (244) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: uṣṇih

The hymn is in praise of Agni as he is kindled and installed as the Hotar in the rite. Because the Hotar recites the hymns in the ritual and because this hymn emphasizes Agni's role as Hotar, the poet also connects ritual speech and Agni, in particular, the speech that addresses him and that he can appreciate and inspire as the Hotar. Again in accordance with Agni's role as Hotar, the poet emphasizes Agni's skill as a priest and his ability to rectify any failures in the rite. In verse 7, which mentions such failures, ví rājasi means both "shine in every direction" and "rule in every direction." Both, of course, would fit the context.

Oldenberg suggests that this hymn (as well as the next two) may be organized into tr̥cas. The extractions of triplets from these hymns in ritual performance and in the Sāmaveda also speak in favor of tr̥cas, although not all tr̥cas in the later tradition correspond to tr̥cas in the original hymns. So, for example, as Oldenberg points out, III.11.5, 7, 6 form a tr̥ca in the Sāmaveda, but they have a different order and cross a tr̥ca boundary in the R̥gveda.

1. You, o Agni, the sovereign king over the peoples, you a god do mortals of inspired thought kindle in the rite.
2. You do they summon as priest at the sacrifices and as Hotar, o Agni.
   Shine as the herdsman of truth in your own house.
3. He who will ritually serve you, o Jātavedas, with the kindling wood, he, o Agni, receives an abundance of heroes, and he prospers.
4. The beacon of the rites, Agni will come with the gods, being anointed by the seven Hotars for the sake of him who brings the offering.
5. Bring forward the first lofty speech for the Hotar, for Agni, as if for a ritual master who brings the lights of inspirations.
6. Let our songs strengthen Agni—those from which he is born, worthy to be hymned, as the one lovely to see, for the great prize and for great wealth.
7. O Agni, as the best sacrificer in the rite, sacrifice to the gods for him seeking the gods.
   As the delighting Hotar, you rule in every direction beyond failures.
8. O pure one, shine upon us a brilliant abundance of heroes.
   Be very near to the praise singers for their well-being.
9. Admiring, inspired poets, being awake, kindle you, the conveyor of oblations, immortal and strength-increasing.

III.11 (245) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: gāyatrī

The theme of the hymn is Agni as the intermediary between gods and mortals. So in verse 2, for example, he is a fire-priest like a human, but as a god he is immortal; he is the messenger placed on earth with mortals for the delight of the gods. The image of Agni as a chariot in verse 5 is unusual and striking, and because it is so and because it is located in the hymn's central verse, it dominates the hymn. It finds echoes in the descriptions of Agni as the "conveyor" (vss. 2, 4), as "overpowering all attacks" (vs. 6), and as piled high with "well-placed" ritual offerings and hymns for the gods (vs. 8)—these are the likely "things" of Agni mentioned in the verse—and with "desirable things" for mortals (vs. 9). The image of the chariot is also reflected in the description of the sacrificer journeying to both "pleasing offerings" and Agni's "dwelling place" (vs. 7). Indeed, the vā́has, the sacrificer's "vehicle" in verse 7, is probably none other than Agni himself, who is described by the cognates havya-váh and váhni.

1. Agni is the Hotar of the rite, who is placed to the fore, who is without boundaries:
   he knows the sacrifice in its proper order.
2. The conveyor of oblations, the immortal fire-priest, and the messenger placed for delight, Agni through insight assembles (the sacrifice).
3. Agni—through insight he becomes visible as the ancient beacon of the sacrifice, for his is a surpassing goal.
4. Agni, the son of strength famed of old, Jātavedas—him the gods made their conveyor (of oblations).
5. The undeceivable leader of the clans of the sons of Manu is Agni, who is the swift chariot, ever new.
6. Who overpowers all attacks as the indestructible resolve of the gods, Agni is the best of those of mighty fame.
7. A ritually dedicated mortal attains through his vehicle the pleasing offerings and the dwelling place (of Agni), whose flames are pure.
8. Through our thoughts we would fully attain all the well-placed things of Agni;
   we inspired poets (would attain those) of Jātavedas.
9. O Agni, we shall gain all desirable things among the prizes of victory.
   In you the gods have placed them.

III.12 (246) Indra and Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina.
9 verses: gāyatrī

The poet invites Indra and Agni to drink the soma at the morning soma offering. The two gods are not only invoked together, but the poet also ascribes the acts distinctive of each god to both. After invoking them in the 2nd person in the first two verses, in the third verse he refers to them in the 3rd person and then, especially in verses 4 and 6, tells of the great deeds that belong to both of them. In verse 4 they are both "smashers of obstacles," for while Indra is the "smasher of obstacles" or "smasher of Vr̥tra," Agni also burns his way through obstacles (e.g., VI.16.34). Indra is the god who famously breaks the fortifications of the Dāsas, but in verse 6 Agni also destroys enemies' fortifications, as in III.15.4. In verse 8 "crossing the waters" belongs to the two of them as well. As Geldner remarks, this last is probably a reference to a victorious march across rivers that is led by the sacrifice, represented by Agni, and by warriors, represented by Indra.

1. Indra and Agni! Come to the pressed soma, to the cloud worthy to be chosen, through our songs.
   Urged on by our insight, drink of this.
2. Indra and Agni! The sacrifice of the singer goes (to you two) jointly, being worthy of your attention.
   By this (insight), drink this pressed soma.
3. I choose Indra and Agni, the two who appear as sage poets with the spur of our sacrifice.
   So let those two satisfy themselves here with the soma.
4. I invoke the streaming smashers of obstacles, ever-conquering, never conquered Indra and Agni, best winners of victory's prize.
5. The singers with their recitations, knowing the (poetic) devices, chant forth to you two.
   Indra and Agni, I choose your refreshments.
6. Indra and Agni! You shook the ninety fortifications, lorded over by Dāsas, at one time with a single act.
7. Indra and Agni! From our (ritual) work our insights go forth toward (you) along the paths of truth.
8. Indra and Agni! Mighty are your abodes and your pleasing offerings.
   The crossing of the waters has been ordained for you two.
9. Indra and Agni! You encompass the lights of heaven among your prizes of victory.
   This heroic deed of yours has become revealed.

III.13 (247) Agni

Ṛṣabha Vaiśvāmitra
7 verses: anuṣṭubh

This is the first hymn of this collection attributed not to Viśvāmitra, but to his son, Ṛṣabha. Its theme is Agni as the god who inspires the recitations of the priests. As such, Agni possesses the truth that the hymns express (vs. 2), and he himself is both an inspired poet (vs. 3) and the Hotar priest (vs. 5). As he is kindled, he becomes increasingly bright and the hymn connects his visible brilliance with the brilliance of mind he inspires (vss. 5–6) and finally even the brilliance of the gift he wins for the sacrificers (vs. 7).

1. Chant forth for you all the loftiest (chant) to him, the god Agni.
   He will come to us with the gods, and as the best sacrificer he will sit here upon the ritual grass.

2. He possessing the truth, whose skill the two world-halves and (the gods') help follow—him do those bringing offerings summon, him do those striving to win (summon) for help.
3. As inspired poet, he is the controller of these (bringing offerings); he is (the controller) of sacrifices. Because he is so, befriend for yourselves Agni, who gives and gains bounty.
4. Let Agni extend to us shelters that best bring luck in order (for us) to pursue (the gods)— (shelters) from where he will shower here the goods in heaven and in the waters for the sake of our settlements.
5. The shining one who has none before him, Agni, together with his good insights, do the verse-reciters kindle as their Hotar and as the clanlord of the clans.
6. And you will help us in our sacred formulation and in our recitations as the best of those that invoke the gods.
   Growing strong through the Maruts, flame up as our good luck, Agni, since you best win thousands (of cattle).
7. And now give us the good that brings thousands, that brings offspring, that brings prosperity, and that brings a brilliant abundance of heroes, o Agni, that is highest and never diminished.

III.14 (248) Agni

Ṛṣabha Vaiśvāmitra
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn describes and praises Agni as the master of the sacrifice. The first verse announces this theme, describing Agni as the Hotar and the "real sacrificer and best of sages." In the first verse the poet also mentions Agni's "chariot of lightning" by which he speeds to the sacrifice, and he then returns to the image of the chariot in the last verse. In that final verse, however, the "chariot" is, as often, the sacrifice itself. The last verse, therefore, takes the role of Agni as priest and the description of Agni as having a "chariot of lightning" in verse 1 and combines them in the image of chariot as sacrifice.

1. The delighting Hotar has taken his stand upon the ritual divisions: as the real sacrificer and best of sages, he is the master of the rite.
   Agni, the son of strength, with chariot of lightning and hair of flame, has rested his countenance upon the earth.
2. It has been offered to you—take pleasure in (this) recitation of homage—to you, who perceive it, o you who possess truth and strength.
   As one who knows, convey here the knowing (gods). Sit down in the middle upon the ritual grass to help us, o you who are worthy of the sacrifice.

3. Let dawn and night, racing to the prize, run to you, o Agni, here along the paths of the wind.
   When (the priests) anoint him as the first with their (butter-)offerings, those two stand in the house as if upon a chariot-box.
4. O Agni, possessor of strength, to you Mitra and Varuṇa and all the Maruts chant of your favor, so that you will stand upright with your flame, o son of strength, spreading out the settlements, a sun (spreading out) men.
5. Since today we have given you your desire, having reverently approached with hands outstretched, sacrifice to the gods by means of your most sacrificially skillful mind, being our inspired priest with faultless thought, o Agni.
6. Since from you, son of strength, a god's many forms of help go outward, and outward (also go) the prizes of victory, give us real wealth consisting of thousands through your undeceiving speech, Agni.
7. For you, o Skill with a poet's purpose, are these things that we mortals, o god, have done in the rite.
   Be aware of everyone whose chariot [=sacrifice] is good. Sweeten everything here, immortal Agni.

III.15 (249) Agni

Utkīla Kātya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

This and the next hymn are attributed to Utkīla Kātya, the grandson of Viśvāmitra. The hymn describes the morning fire, who is the protector and guide of the sacrificers. Some of the language in the hymn is evocative of Indra, although Indra is never mentioned. A possible oblique reference to Indra, however, might help us understand verse 4, the central and most puzzling verse in the hymn. There Agni is invoked as an "invincible bull" who conquers fortresses, a description that strongly evokes Indra, since it is Indra (or twice Soma acting as Indra) who is áṣāḷha "invincible," and it is Indra who characteristically breaks open fortresses. This overlay of the image of Indra onto Agni may explain some of the complications in the second half of the verse. In cd Agni is surely the "leader of the sacrifice," but then who is the pāyú, the "protector" whom he also leads? If he is the leader of the sacrifice, Agni himself should be its protector as well. For this reason Oldenberg suggested emending the text so that "protector" is a subject parallel to "leader." But if we accept the text as transmitted and translate "leader of its protector" rather than "leader and protector," could Agni lead Agni? Possibly he could, if the first Agni were the priest Agni and the second were Agni as the embodiment of Indra, as suggested in the first half of the verse. Or the poet may also be punning on pāyú, which means "protector" here as elsewhere (cf. VII.37.8), but which formally and secondarily—though only secondarily—could be derived from √pā "drink" and mean "drinker," a natural description of soma-drinking Indra. In short, the appearance of Agni could be or could mark the appearance of Indra.

1. Ever-blazing everywhere with your broad countenance, press against hostilities, demons, and afflictions.
   I would be under the shelter of the lofty one who gives good shelter, under the guidance of easily invoked Agni.
2. You at the breaking of this dawn, you at the rising of the sun—become our herdsman!
   Take pleasure in my praise song as (you would) in your own birth, as in your own lineage, o Agni, well born in your own body.
3. You, drawing the gaze of men—(be radiant) through many (dawns), o bull. Flame-red, o Agni—be radiant amid dark (nights).
   O good (Agni), lead us and take us across narrow straits. Make us, your fire-priests, to have wealth, youngest one.
4. Shine, Agni, as the invincible bull having conquered all the fortresses and their good possessions, and as the leader of the sacrifice and of its foremost, lofty protector, o Jātavedas of good guidance.
5. Your shelters are many and unbreakable, o singer [=Agni?]. As one very wise, shining up to the gods, like a winning chariot convey (us) to victory's prize. Agni, (convey) us to the well-supported world-halves.
6. O bull, swell and quicken for us victory's prizes and the milk-yielding world-halves, o Agni, since you are aflame with good flame, o god with the gods. Let not a mortal's evil intent hem us in.
7. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
   There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.16 (250) Agni

Utkīla Kātya
6 verses: bṛhatī alternating with satobṛhatī, arranged in pragāthas

The hymn consists of pragātha distichs of one bṛhatī verse and one satobṛhatī verse. The metrics thus organize the verses into three pairs. Structurally, however, the poet also emphasizes the unity of the hymn through ring composition: verse 1 refers to Agni as the master of saúbhaga "good fortune" and of rayí "wealth," and verse 6 to him as subhága "bearer of good fortune" and the agent of "wealth."

Once again, as in the preceding hymn, the description of Agni evokes Indra, especially in verse 1, which refers to Agni as the "master of the smashing of obstacles," and in verse 2, in which the poet calls on the troops of Indra, the Maruts, to follow Agni.

1. This Agni is master of heroes in abundance and of great good fortune.
   He is master of wealth consisting in good descendants and cattle. He is master of the smashing of obstacles.
2. Follow this one, you superior men, you Maruts, to strengthen him, in whom are riches that grow strong with kindness, that overcome those of evil intent in battles, and that every day swindle his rival.

3. Sharpen us for a share of wealth with an abundance of heroes, o generous Agni, o you of mighty brilliance—(wealth) reaching the highest, bringing offspring, free from affliction, and bursting forth.
4. Who creates and overwhelms all living beings, who creates friendship here among the gods, he takes his place here among the gods, here amid an abundance of heroes, and here in the praise of men.

5. Agni, do not subject us to lack of thought nor to lack of heroes, nor to lack of cattle, o son of strength, nor to scorn. Put hostilities away from here.
6. Show a mastery over victory's prize that brings offspring, o bearer of good fortune, and that is lofty in the rite, o Agni.
   Join us with greater wealth that is delight and brings glory, o you of powerful brilliance.

III.17 (251) Agni

Kata Vaiśvāmitra
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn invokes the present sacrificial fire, the present Agni, as the reappearance of the ancient Hotar who performed the sacrifice. The hymn emphasizes the centrality of Agni in the sacrifice by insistently using different derivatives of √yaj "sacrifice" in four of its five verses: verse 1 has suyajñáḥ, yajáthāya; verse 2, ā́yajaḥ, yakṣi, yajñám; verse 3, yakṣi, yájamānāya; and verse 5, yájīyān, yajā. Strikingly, verse 4 has no derivative of √yaj, but rather is the direct proclamation of Agni's becoming the intermediary between gods and mortals and the source of life for both.

Verse 1 contains a pun, since aktúbhiḥ can mean both "with unguents" and "through the nights." Verse 3 is also complicated because the key word, ājā́nī, is a R̥gvedic hapax. It could mean "birth" and uṣásaḥ could be genitive singular, which could yield either "your three births belong to Dawn" or, less likely, "three are the births of Dawn." Or ājā́nī could mean "birth-giver" or "birth" and uṣásaḥ could be nominative plural, giving "the three dawns are your births or birth-givers." As Geldner points out, in favor of "three dawns" is the fact that three dawns also appear in VIII.41.3. In none of the possibilities is the interpretation of the half-verse transparent. In the last verse, however, there is a direct reference to the Agni of the past and the Agni of the present, so perhaps verse 3 refers to Agnis of the past, present, and future.

1. Being kindled according to his first foundations, he who fulfills all wishes is anointed with unguents—he, the flame-haired, ghee-cloaked, purifying Agni, who makes the sacrifice good—in order to sacrifice to the gods.
2. Just as you performed the sacrificial role of the Hotar of the Earth, o Agni, and just as you observantly (performed that) of the Heaven, Jātavedas, so sacrifice to the gods with this offering. Like Manu, carry out this sacrifice today.
3. Three lifetimes are yours, Jātavedas, and three dawns are your births, o Agni.
   By these (births) win the help of the gods by sacrifice as the knowing one, and then become luck and life for the sacrificer.
4. Singing to Agni, the one beautifully shining, beautifully appearing, we revere you who are to be invoked, Jātavedas.
   You have the gods made the messenger, the spoked wheel (of flames), the conveyor of oblations, and the navel of immortality.
5. The Hotar, the better sacrificer before you, o Agni, who once again will take his seat and (be) the one who is good luck by his own will, according to his foundations, carry forth the sacrifice, o you who are observant, and set the rite in place for us in pursuit of the gods.

III.18 (252) Agni

Kata Vaiśvāmitra
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This is a hymn in praise of the fire as it gains strength. The first two verses look forward to the fire's blaze, which should be directed against the enemies of the sacrificers. The third and middle verse turns to the ritual acts that cause the fire to increase—adding fuel to it, offering melted butter into it, and even pouring praise upon it. The last two verses then again describe the blazing fire, but this time the increasing blaze is not turned against enemies but rather represents and effects the increasing strength and wealth of the sacrificers.

1. Become benevolent toward us, Agni, at our reverent approach, bringing success (to us), like a companion to his companion, like a father and mother.
   Since the dwelling places of the peoples have many deceptions, burn against the hostilities turned against us.
2. Scorch our near enemies, Agni. Scorch the recitation of the distant, ungenerous one.
   And scorch the invisible ones as you become more visible, good (Agni). Let your unaging, irrepressible (flames) spread out.
3. With kindling wood and ghee, o Agni, seeking, I pour an oblation for endurance and strength.
   Insofar as I am master by my ritual formulation, offering praise (by it), (I pour) this divine insight in order to win hundreds.
4. (Flame) up with your flame, son of strength, when you are praised. Set rising vigor upon those toiling;
   (set) rich (vigor) upon the Viśvāmitras, o Agni, for their luck and life. We have groomed your body many times.
5. Create wealth, o you who are good at winning the stakes—when kindled, you become just that, o Agni;
   (create) rich (vigor) in the house of the praise singer of good fortune. You have acquired glossy forearms and wondrous forms.

III.19 (253) Agni

Gāthin Kauśika
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This is the first of a small collection of hymns, III.19–22, attributed to Gāthin, the son of Kuśika. According to the Sarvānukramaṇī, Gāthin was the father of Viśvāmitra, although in III.33.5 Viśvāmitra calls himself a son of Kuśika.

In general, the hymn is similar to IV.6. See especially verse 2, which has many of the same themes and much of the same vocabulary as IV.6.3. Its most obvious structural feature is the ring defined by 1a and 5a. One difference between the two lines, however, is that the poet chooses Agni in verse 1, but the gods anoint Agni in verse 5. This change echoes the shifts throughout the hymn between the priests and Agni. In verse 2ab first "I" perform a ritual offering to Agni, and then in cd Agni performs a ritual act. Verse 3 begins as if it is still describing Agni, especially if the gapped verb is sám √śri "provide" from 2d, but by the end of the first line the subject needs to be read as the priest. In 3b the action of both Agni and the priest is characterized as "striving." In verse 4 the people performing the ritual are "eager to sacrifice," but it is Agni who "will sacrifice." This shifting between humans and the god Agni signifies the closing gap between humans and the gods.

The hymn also contains two problematic ellipses. As mentioned above, 3a gaps the verb, and although we have supplied "provide," this is not the only possibility. In verse 2 because of another ellipsis there is some ambiguity about the ritual act that the "I" performs. By the end of the hemistich the reference to the sacrificial ladle, the juhū́, is fairly clear, but initially what is sent to Agni could be vā́c "speech" or suṣṭutí "good praise" (vs. 3) or the like, accompanied by offerings (e.g., X.188.2 prá… iyarmi suṣṭutím).

1. I choose Agni as the Hotar at the ritual meal—him, the clever poet, knowing all, never fooled.
   As the better sacrificer, he will sacrifice for us at the divine assembly. For wealth and victory's prize, he will win reward.
2. I send forth to you here, o Agni, (the ladle) filled with offerings, beautifully bright, full of gifts, and covered with ghee.
   Making respectful circumambulation before the divine assembly, being chosen (as Hotar), he has provided the sacrifice with gifts and with good (gods).
3. He (provides it) with very sharp thought when helped by you, and so strive for good descendants for him who strives.
   Agni, may we and our good praises be in an excess of wealth filled with the best of men, (an excess) of the good.
4. Since the peoples eager to sacrifice have established in you [=the fire] the many faces of (you) the god, Agni, convey here the assembly of the gods, o youngest one, when you will sacrifice to the multitude of gods today.
5. When the gods will anoint you as the Hotar at the ritual meal, seating you for the sacrifice, become our helper here, Agni. Set fame upon our persons.

III.20 (254) Agni and the All Gods

Gāthin Kauśika
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins by naming deities of the morning, although in the last verse the poet brings all the gods into his invocation. As in the previous hymn, the poet employs ring composition, a point that the Anukramaṇī underscores by assigning the address in both the first verse and the last verse not to Agni but to the All Gods.

Also once again, the poet varies the first and last verses. Every verse except the last one begins with "Agni." But in that last verse Dadhikrā is transposed in front of Agni. It is difficult to see if the poet has a purpose in mind other than marking the last verse through this shift.

However, fronting Dadhikrā, who is a deified horse, does underscore a return to the equine imagery that opens the hymn. In verse 1 the poet not only mentions the horse Dadhikrā and the two horsemen, the Aśvins, but he also calls the reciting priest a váhni, a chariot-driver, whose horses may be his recitations, as Geldner suggests. Then verse 2 refers to Agni's vā́jinā, here translated "victorious charges." The meaning of the word is not certain, but it is in any case derived from vājín "racehorse" or "prizewinning horse." Overt references to horses and racing then subside until the last verse.

1. Agni, Dawn, the two Aśvins, Dadhikrā—with his recitations the chariot-driver calls upon them at daybreak.
   Let the gods of good light, bellowing all together toward the rite, hear us.
2. Agni, three are your victorious charges, three your abodes. Three are your tongues [=flames], o you who are born of truth, (and these three are) many, and three are your bodies [=the three sacrificial fires], won by the gods. Never lapsing, protect our songs with these.
3. Agni, numerous are the names of you, the immortal one, o Jātavedas, o god of independent will, and, o you who propel everything, (yours are) the many wiles of the wily (gods), which they have assembled in you, o you about whose kinship people ask.
4. Agni is the leader of the heavenly settlements like Bhaga—he, the god who drinks according to [/protects] the ritual sequence, who possesses the truth.
   The smasher of Vr̥tra from of old, having every possession, will take the singer across all difficulties.
5. Dadhikrā, Agni, and the goddess Dawn; Br̥haspati and the god Savitar; the Aśvins, Mitra and Varuṇa, and Bhaga; the Vasus, Rudras, and Ādityas—I call upon them here.

III.21 (255) Agni

Gāthin Kauśika
5 verses: triṣṭubh 1, 4; anuṣṭubh 2–3; satobr̥hatī 5

Oldenberg judges this to be not so much a hymn as a collection of verses composed in various meters. In his earlier translation of the Agni hymns, however, he does note that at least the last two verses "seem to form a distich of an irregular pragātha type." On the other hand, Geldner observes that TB III 6.7 includes the whole of the hymn in the animal sacrifice among the stokīyā verses that accompany the dripping fat from the vapā, the omentum, while it is being roasted, and Elizarenkova (1995: 116) further proposes that the different meters of the verses reflect the irregular rhythm of the drops as they fall. Whether it originated as a verse collection or it constitutes a unified composition, the hymn does center on the dripping fat of an animal sacrifice. The hymn mentions médas "fat" in every verse but one, and even puns on médas in verse 4 by referring to Agni as médhira "wise."

1. Place this our sacrifice among the immortals. Take pleasure in these oblations, Jātavedas.
   Eat of the drops of fat and of ghee, o Agni, our Hotar, taking your seat as the first.
2. Filled with ghee, drops of fat drip for you, o pure one.
   O you on your own foundation, set in place for us the best thing, the thing to be chosen, in order for us to pursue the gods.
3. For you, the inspired poet, o Agni, are the drops dripping with ghee, o companion.
   As the best seer you are kindled. Become the helper of our sacrifice.
4. For you drip the drops of fat and of ghee, o independent and capable Agni.
   Proclaimed by poets, you have come with your lofty radiance. Take pleasure in the oblations, wise one.
5. We present to you the most powerful fat [=the vapā], extracted from the middle (of the animal's body).
   The drops drip for you upon your skin, o good one. Capture them (for) each god in turn.

III.22 (256) Purīṣya Agnis

Gāthin Kauśika
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 4

Like the surrounding hymns, the Anukramaṇī attributes this hymn to Gāthin, although, as Geldner notes, TS V.2.3.3 names Viśvāmitra as the poet. Verse 5 is the frequent final verse in the Viśvāmitra hymns (cf. III.1.23, 5.11, 6.11, 7.11, 15.7, 23.5).

Both the Black and White Yajurvedic traditions employ the hymn in the Agnicayana rite (TS IV.2.4.2, VS XII.47–50) at the consecration and laying of the bricks of the fire altar. Geldner suggests that this application of the hymn may have resulted from a misunderstanding of the phrase purīṣyā̀so agnáyaḥ in verse 4, here translated “the fires from their overflowing source,” but traditionally interpreted in the context of the Agnicayana to mean “the fires of the mud” (cf. ŚB VI.3.2.9 pr̥thivyā́ḥ sadhásthād agním purīṣyàm . . . ā́bhara “From the dwelling place of the earth, bring the Agni Purīṣya”).

Hoffmann (1975: 50) cites verse 3 of this hymn as one of the few clear instances of a heavenly ocean, and he is quite likely right. In verses 2–4, however, the image of an ocean of waters is overlaid with that of an ocean of light. In verse 2 Agni’s luster is “glittering, undulating radiance watching men,” a likely reference to the sun or the brightness of the sky more generally. The “undulating sea” to which Agni goes in verse 3, therefore, might not be a sea of waters, or rather, not only a sea of water, but also a sea of light. In verse 4 both the fires and the waters cascade downward. The fires could be in the waters, but they might also be light, which, like rain, pours down from heaven.

1. Here is Agni, in whom the bellowing Indra has received the pressed soma in his belly.
   As (we praise) a steed, a team-horse, (that has won) the prize of a thousand, you are praised, Jātavedas, since you are victorious.
2. O Agni, worthy to receive the sacrifice, your luster, which is in heaven and on earth, which is here among the plants and the waters, and by which you have stretched throughout the wide midspace—that is glittering, undulating radiance watching men.
3. O Agni, you go there to the undulating sea of heaven—there you have spoken to the gods, who are the holy ones—to the waters, which, in the realm of light, are beyond the sun, and which draw nearby beneath.
4. Let the fires from their overflowing source, along with the falling torrents—
   (all of them) great refreshments free of deception and free of disease—take pleasure in the sacrifice.
5. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
   There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.23 (257) Agni

Devaśravas Bhārata and Devavāta Bhārata
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except satobr̥hatī 3

The Agni of this hymn is probably the tribal fire of the Bhāratas (Proferes 2007: 37), which forms the ritual center of the Bhārata clans. This Agni governs the peoples (vs.

3)—likely the peoples of the tribe, as Proferes suggests—from a location, "earth's most desirable place" (vs. 4), among the three rivers. Various theories have been offered for the identity of Devaśravas, who is addressed in verse 3, and Devavāta, to whom the Agni of the Bhāratas belong. Surely Devavāta is or was the king of the Bhāratas, since his is the Bhārata fire. Devaśravas could be a priest or poet, or he could have been a Bhārata leader, perhaps an ally or successor of Devavāta. In any case, along with the Agni of the Bhāratas himself, they are the focus of the hymn since they are named in the central verse and this central verse is marked by a change in meter.

1. Churned out and well placed in his dwelling, the young poet, the leader of the rite, the unaging Agni amid the aging wood—Jātavedas has received immortality here.
2. The two Bhāratas, Devaśravas and Devavāta, have richly churned the very skillful Agni.
   Agni, look upon (every one) separately with lofty wealth. Then become the leader of our refreshments day after day.
3. Ten fingers have given birth to him, the ancient one, the dear one born well among his mothers.
   Praise the Agni of Devavāta, o Devaśravas, (the fire) who will exert his will over the peoples.
4. He has installed you, Agni, here on earth's most desirable place, in the track of the milk-libation, on the brightest day of days.
   As (the Agni) of Manu, shine richly upon the Dr̥ṣadvatī, on the Āpayā, and on the Sarasvatī.
5. – Make the milk-libation, the very wondrous winning of the cow, succeed, o Agni, for him who invokes you most constantly.
   There should be for us a son and a lineage that proliferates. Agni, let this your favor be for us.

III.24 (258) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 1

This is a brief, almost staccato hymn. Every verse begins with an invocation to Agni, and most verses follow with an imperative, urging Agni to take his place on the ritual ground and to grant the wishes of the poet and his people. The first three verses refer either directly or indirectly to the brightening fire, which may find its counterpart in the swiftness and brevity of the hymn.

1. O Agni, overwhelm in battles and cast away evil intents!
   Hard to overcome but overcoming hostilities, establish luster for the one whose vehicle is the sacrifice.

2. O Agni, you are kindled by the ghee-libation—you, the immortal one, pursuing the gods as Hotar.
   Take pleasure in our rite!
3. O Agni, who are awake with brilliance! O son of strength, to whom offering is made!
   Sit here on this ritual grass of mine!
4. O Agni, exalt our songs together with all the fires, with (all) the gods, and those who are the respected (priests) in the sacrifices.
5. O Agni, to the pious man give wealth full of heroes, a profusion (of heroes)!
   Sharpen us to be endowed with sons!

III.25 (259) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: virāj

As in the previous hymn, each verse begins with "Agni," whom the poet addresses in the beginning and the final two verses and who is the subject of verses 2 and 3. Actually verse 4 opens with a vā́yav índraś ca construction, which mixes a vocative and a nominative, and so is a hybrid that may mark a transition between the nominative of verse 3 and the vocative of verse 5. The hymn is also defined by ring composition: sūnúḥ (1a) / sūno (5b) // viśvávedāḥ (1b) / jātavedaḥ (5b).

The phrase in the last verse "home of the waters" is somewhat puzzling, so much so that Geldner assumes an ellipsis of nápāt, which would yield a translation "O Agni, (child) of the waters, you are kindled in the home. . . ." or the like. But there is little in the hymn itself to suggest such an ellipsis, nor does Sāyaṇa read one here. Although it is not clear exactly what the "home of the waters" refers to—it might simply be the firewood—the end of the verse suggests that Agni makes all homes or abodes great, wherever he is kindled.

1. O Agni, you are the watchful son of heaven and of earth by the continuity (of fires), providing all possessions.
   Sacrifice to the gods here one by one, o attentive one.
2. Agni, the knowing one, wins heroic deeds. He wins victory's prize, exerting himself for immortality.
   Convey the gods here to us, o you of many cattle.
3. Agni, the unerring one, shines upon heaven and earth, immortal deities, common to all people, since, much glittering through our acts of reverence, he is master through the prizes of victory.
4. O Agni—you and Indra!—journey here to the sacrifice at the home of the pious man pressing soma, o you two gods who never disdain to drink the soma.

5. O Agni, you are kindled in the home of the waters, as our own, o son of strength, o Jātavedas, making the abodes great by your help.

III.26 (260) Agni Vaiśvānara

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: jagatī 1–6, triṣṭubh 7–9, arranged in tr̥cas

The deities and attribution of the hymn are more complicated than indicated above. The hymn comprises three tr̥cas: the first set of three verses is to Agni Vaiśvānara, the second to the Maruts, and the third begins with Agni's self-praise in verse 7 and then continues with the poet's description of Agni in verses 8–9. This is one way to regard the hymn. Geldner offers another, quite plausible analysis. According to him, the first tr̥ca contains verses to accompany the kindling of Agni. In the second the newly created Agni is fanned with the help of the Maruts. The third tr̥ca is entirely the speech of Agni. It begins with the god's praise of himself and then continues with the god's praise of the poet. Bergaigne argues that the Āgnimāruta śastra in the later ritual consists of three major parts addressed to Vaiśvānara, the Maruts, and Jātavedas and suggests that this hymn represents an old Āgnimāruta śastra. Oldenberg disagrees with both Geldner and Bergaigne, holding that the hymn does not possess the kind of unity that either asserts. In his translation of Agni hymns (1897), he describes the three tr̥cas as "three independent hymns" because of the placement of the hymn in the collection; that is, it has more verses than the preceding hymns, while in the normal arrangement it should have the same number of verses or fewer.

Despite its placement in the collection and the change of meter, we believe that Geldner and Bergaigne are correct in seeing a coherence to the hymn and find Bergaigne's suggestion that this is an early Āgnimāruta śastra an attractive one.

1. Having discerned with our mind Vaiśvānara, who conforms to what is real and finds the sun, we Kuśikas, bringing offerings and desiring goods, invoke with our songs the god of good gifts, the delighting charioteer.
2. We invoke the beautiful Agni for help, who is Vaiśvānara and praiseworthy Mātariśvan, who is Br̥haspati for the divine assembly of Manu, who is the inspired poet and the listener, the guest and the quick-streaming one.
3. Whinnying like a horse, he is kindled by the females [=the fingers of the priest]; Vaiśvānara (is kindled) by the Kuśikas, generation after generation.
   Let Agni, awake among the immortals, grant us treasure and an abundance of good men and good horses.

4. Let the prizes of victory go forth. Blended with their powers, the fires have hitched up their spotted antelopes for beauty.
   Growing aloft, providing all possessions, the undeceivable Maruts make mountains tremble.
5. The Maruts, with Agni's splendor and belonging to all communities—we beg for their powerful and mighty help—are the noisy sons of Rudra, cloaked in rain, having the will to destroy like lions but bringing good gifts.
6. We beg (the Maruts)—cohort upon cohort, band upon band—with our good chants for the radiance of Agni and the power of the Maruts, with their dappled horses, with their unreceding generosity, the travelers to the sacrifice, wise at the ritual distributions.

7. [Agni:] "I am Agni, Jātavedas by birth. My eye is ghee; the immortal one [=soma] is in my mouth.
   The chant of three parts, which is the measure of space, the inexhaustible hot milk, and the offering—I am that by name."
8. Since he [=Agni?] purified the chant with three purifying filters, discovering understanding and light with his heart, he made for himself the highest treasure by his own will, and then he surveyed heaven and earth.
9. Lead him across—the inexhaustible well-spring of a hundred streams, the father of words to be said, who understands inspiration, and the joyful crackling in the lap of his parents—him who speaks what is real, o you two world-halves.

III.27 (261) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
15 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

The hymn comprises five tr̥cas, at least some of which show formal linkages that connect a tr̥ca to the one following it. This is particularly obvious in the case of the third (vss. 7–9) and fourth (vss. 10–12) tr̥cas, which are connected to the fourth and fifth (vss. 13–15) respectively. The last verse of the third tr̥ca (9a, c) describes Agni as váreṇyaḥ... dákṣasya pitáram "(the one) to be chosen, the father of skill," a characterization echoed by váreṇyaṃ dákṣasya in 10ab, the first verse of the fourth tr̥ca. Likewise, the poet "summons" (īḷe) Agni at the end of verse 12 and then describes him as īḷénya "to be summoned" in verse 13. A ring formed by havíṣmant "bearing offerings" in the first and penultimate verses provides a unity to the whole hymn.

Even though this hymn is closely connected to the ritual, the precise application of the verses is not clear. Bergaigne thinks that they are sāmidhenī (fire-kindling) verses to be recited as the fire is kindled, and surely this is true of at least the last tr̥ca, which repeats the verb sam √idh in each of its verses. Oldenberg agrees that parts of this hymn are sāmidhenī verses, but suggests that verses 7–9, for example, describe the agnipraṇayana, the procession of the fire to the uttaravedi in the classical Vedic rite, and that 10–12 refer to the installation of the fire. The agnipraṇayana and the deposition of the fire are closely conjoined rites.

1. Forth to you (go) the heaven-bound prizes, bearing offerings, by the ghee-filled (ladle).
   He [=Agni?] goes to the gods, seeking their favor.
2. With my song I summon Agni, recognizing inspired words, bringing success to the sacrifice, with his attentive listening and his emplaced (fires).
3. Agni, may we be able to guide the prizewinning (horses) of you, a god;
   may we cross beyond hatreds.

4. Being kindled in the rite, the purifying Agni to be summoned, he with flaming hair—him do we beg.
5. Of broad visage, immortal, ghee-cloaked, receiving well-poured oblations, Agni is the oblation-carrier of the sacrifice.
6. With their sacrificial spoons held out, bringing the sacrifice with their insight just so, they eagerly put Agni here for help.

7. As the Hotar, the immortal god goes in front with his craft, spurring on the ritual distributions.
8. The prizewinner is placed among the prizes. He is led forth in the rites as the inspired poet bringing success to the sacrifice.
9. Through insight the one to be chosen has been created. He has received as the embryo of living beings the father of skill through the continuity (of his fires).

10. I have installed you, the one to be chosen, (the father) of skill, o you who are made with strength by the libation;
    (I have installed) you, the bright shining fire-priest, o Agni.
11. Agni, guiding (his horses) and crossing the waters—at the harnessing of the truth, the eager inspired ones kindle him with the prizes of victory.
12. The child of nourishment, shining in the rite up to heaven, having a poet's purpose, Agni—him I summon.

13. As the one to be summoned, to be revered, visible throughout the darkness, the bull Agni is kindled.

14. The bull Agni is kindled, conveying the gods like a horse.
    Bearing offerings, they summon him.
15. As bulls ourselves, o bull, may we kindle you, the bull, shining aloft, o Agni.

III.28 (262) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
6 verses: gāyatrī 1, 2, 6; uṣṇih 3; triṣṭubh 4; jagatī 5

The hymn has three divisions that correspond to the offering of the puroḷāś, the "sacrificial cake" in the three soma-pressings: verses 1–2 belong to the Morning Pressing, verse 4 to the Midday Pressing, and verse 5 to the Third Pressing. The hymn is metrically mixed in an arrangement corresponding to the later tradition that assigns the gāyatrī meter to the first pressing, the triṣṭubh to the second, and the jagatī to the third. In part because the hymn is so closely tied to a specific parts of the liturgy, it likely represents a more advanced stage in the development of the Vedic ritual than is found in most R̥gvedic hymns. In the classical rite there is an offering of rice cakes—in the earlier period they were barley cakes—to Indra at each of the three soma-pressings. After each cake offering, there is an additional offering to Agni Sviṣṭakr̥t, and, as Oldenberg (1897: 301) points out, Āśvalāyana Śrauta Sūtra V.4.6 prescribes III.28.1, 4, and 5 for these offerings, according to the order of the soma-pressings. See also III.52, which also concerns the sacrificial cakes offered to Indra offered in the three pressings.

The remaining two verses (3 and 6) cannot be so readily connected with the three daily pressings. Verse 3 is not in any of the meters associated with the pressings, but rather in the rare uṣṇih meter. Verse 6 is in gāyatrī, but it is at the end of the hymn, not at the beginning where we would have expected the "morning" verses to appear. These are also the only two verses in which the description tiróahnya appears. The term means "aged overnight," or more literally, "having passed through the day." This word describes soma that is offered to the Aśvins in the early morning of the day following the soma-pressing day. In the classical Atirātra or "overnight" soma ritual, an offering of a puroḷāś accompanies this soma offering to the Aśvins, and these offerings of soma and puroḷāś may also be followed by a sviṣṭakr̥t offering of puroḷāś to Agni. These two verses thus likely refer to one or another of these final offerings of an Atirātra rite. Indeed, according to ĀśvŚS V.6.25, verse 6 is the yājyā or "offering" verse of the sviṣṭakr̥t rite for exactly this final offering.

If the term tiróahnya helps locate the ritual context of verses 3 and 6, it also poses an interpretive problem. Geldner and Renou both understand tiróahnya as an adjective describing the puroḷāś-cake. However, it is unlikely to be literally true that the cake is "aged overnight." Rather, as is the case in the classical rite, it would have been prepared on the morning it was offered. Recognizing this problem,

Elizarenkova understood tiróahnya to mean the soma "aged overnight," in accord with the consistent usage of the term elsewhere. But soma is not mentioned in the hymn, and neither verse gives any indication that tiróahnya describes something other than the puroḷāś. Therefore, we think that tiróahnya describes the puroḷāś but is not intended to describe it literally. Rather, it associates the puroḷāś with the accompanying offering of the soma "aged overnight."

In the classical Atirātra, the Āśvinaśastra, the recitation that accompanies the final soma offering to the Aśvins, follows the form of Prātaranuvāka, the early-morning litany, which opens the soma-pressing day (cf. Staal 1983 I: 683). The two recitations thus create a ritual ring, in which the end recapitulates the beginning. In this hymn verse 3, although connected with the end of the rite, is located immediately after the verses that mark the rite's beginning, and thus it becomes an icon of the conjunction of the beginning and end of the rite. This is reflected in its meter as well. Like gāyatrī, the meter associated with the morning rite, the uṣṇih meter of verse 3 consists of three pādas, but its final pāda has twelve syllables like jagatī, the meter associated with the end of the rite. The metrical form thus combines the morning and evening liturgies. Verse 6 is in gāyatrī, which again brings the hymn metrically back to the beginning of the rite, although the verse is placed at the end. For a more detailed discussion of this hymn, see Brereton (forthcoming b).

Another incongruous description appears in verse 5, which characterizes the rite (adhvará) as "bearing treasure" (rátnavant) and "wakeful" (jā́gr̥vi). Especially the latter is an adjective that often describes Agni (e.g., I.31.9, III.2.12) and Soma (e.g., IX.36.2, 44.3, 71.1). Here it is an epithet transferred from the sacrificial fire or from the priests who have drunk the soma to the rite, which both Agni and the priests wakefully maintain through the night. See also III.39.1, 2, in which the "thought" of the poet is "wakeful."

1. O Agni, enjoy our offering, our sacrificial cake, o Jātavedas, at the Early Morning Pressing, o you who are rich through insight.
2. The sacrificial cake has been cooked, o Agni, or rather, perfected for you.
   Enjoy it, o youngest one.
3. O Agni, seek after the offered sacrificial cake "aged overnight."
   You are the son of strength, installed in the rite.
4. At the Midday Pressing, o poet Jātavedas, enjoy the sacrificial cake here.
   O Agni, the wise do not diminish the portion that belongs to you, the youthful one, at the ritual distributions.
5. O Agni, since at the Third Pressing you will take pleasure in the sacrificial cake offered you, o son of strength, then (establish) the rite among the gods, amid their admiration; establish it, bearing treasure and wakeful, among the immortals.
6. O Agni Jātavedas, becoming strong, enjoy the offering, the sacrificial cake,
   "aged overnight."

III.29 (263) Agni

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
16 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 1, 4, 10, 12; jagatī 6, 11, 14–15

This hymn was composed to accompany the creation of a new fire for the sacrifice. This fire was created through friction using a fire drill that consisted of two pieces of wood. The upper fire-churning stick was held vertically, with one end in a recessed area in the lower piece of wood, which was horizontal. Wood chips were placed around the recessed area on the lower plank. The upper stick was then rotated back and forth, like a churn. In the later ritual this is done by wrapping a rope around the upper stick and pulling on one side and then the other to make the stick rotate back and forth. Eventually, enough heat was generated so that the wood chips caught fire.

This process of churning out the fire was regularly identified in the R̥gvedic hymns with sexual intercourse, and this repeated image presents the upper fire-churning stick as the father, with phallic overtones especially in verse 1, and the lower fire-churning stick as the mother of fire. Another theme that runs throughout the hymn, and again a common one in Agni hymns, is the idea that Agni is born as a priest of the sacrifice, who carries the oblations (vss. 4, 7) and offers the sacrifice (vs. 8) and who is a sage poet (vss. 5, 12) and a Hotar (vss. 8, 16) in the company of the seven Hotars (vs. 14), the seven priests of the rite. The priests kindling Agni are named in verse 15: they are the Kuśikas, whose knowledge and ability to formulate the truth about Agni the hymn accentuates.

1. Here is the base for fire-churning; here is the readied begetting tool [=upper fire-churning stick].
   Bring here the clanlord's lady [=lower fire-churning stick]. Let us churn Agni in the ancient way.
2. As Jātavedas, who is placed within the two fire-churning sticks, like an unborn child well placed within women with child, Agni is to be summoned day after day by those awake, by the sons of Manu bearing offerings.
3. Attentive, bear down upon her who is opened up [=the lower fire-churning stick]. Impregnated on this day, she has given birth to the bull.
   With flame-red crests—his countenance is glowing—the son of the libation has been born within the ritual pattern.
4. In the footprint of the libation and upon the navel of the earth, we would install you to convey our oblation, o Agni Jātavedas.
5. O men, churn out the unduplicitous poet, the discerning and immortal one of beautiful face.
   Beget the beacon of the sacrifice, the foremost one in front—Agni, the very benevolent, o men.

6. When they churn him with their arms, he shines out, like a prizewinning horse, flame-red here in the wood.
   Unstoppable, like the shimmering (chariot) of the Aśvins on its course [=the sun?], he avoids the stones, burning the grasses.
7. As soon as he is born, Agni shines, becoming ever more visible—he, the prizewinning horse, the inspired one praised by poets, the one bringing good gifts, whom the gods have established at the rites—the one to be summoned, knowing all things, conveying oblations.
8. Sit attentive, Hotar, in your own broad place; make the sacrifice sit in the womb of the well-performed (sacrifice).
   Pursuing the gods, you will sacrifice to the gods with the offering. Agni, place lofty vigor in the sacrificer.
9. Companions, create the smoky bull and without faltering go toward victory's prize.
   Here is Agni, overwhelming in battles and rich in good heroes, by whom the gods overwhelmed the Dasyus.
10. Here is your womb at its season, from which you shone at birth.
    Recognizing it, Agni, take your seat here, and then make our songs strong.
11. He is called Tanūnapāt as the embryo belonging to the lord [=the upper churning stick?]. He becomes Narāśaṃsa when he is born, and Mātariśvan when he has assumed his measure in his mother. He became the rush of the wind in leaping forth.
12. The poet is churned out by skillful churning and installed with skillful installation.
    O Agni, perform good rites. Sacrifice to the gods for him seeking the gods.
13. Mortals have begotten the immortal one, who is no miscarriage, overwhelming, hard-jawed.
    Joined together, ten unwed sisters [=fingers] embrace the male just born.
14. From of old, bringing the seven Hotars, he has shone forth in the lap of his mother when he blazed upon her udder.
    Day after day, greatly delighting, he does not blink after he has been born from the belly of the lord.
15. Fighting their enemies like the advance troops of Maruts, those first-born of the formulation [=the Kuśikas] know everything.
    The Kuśikas raised a formulation filled with brilliance. One by one, each in his house, they kindled Agni.
16. Since we chose you here today while the sacrifice was proceeding, o attentive Hotar—you have steadfastly journeyed and you have steadfastly labored—as the knowing one recognizing this, journey here to the soma.

III.30 (264) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
22 verses: triṣṭubh

This long hymn follows a familiar path. It begins with three verses expressing the sacrificers' hopes that Indra will appear at their sacrifice and their worries about his continuing absence. There follow a number of verses (4–14) describing the powers and deeds of Indra, past and present, including the defeats of Vr̥tra (8) and Vala (10). This section ends with two verses (12–13) on the sun and dawn, showing that Indra orders the cosmos both spatially and temporally. The riddling verse 14, with the well-known paradox of the "cooked" milk contained within a "raw" cow, ends this section of the hymn by seeming to identify the dawn as cow with other images of plenty for which Indra is responsible; it picks up the cow imagery already found in verse 10 concerning the release of the cows from the Vala cave. Moreover, since sacrificial gifts are distributed at the dawn ritual, the mention of dawn sets the stage for the requests for gifts at the end of the hymn.

The next part of the hymn (15–17) begins abruptly with an address to Indra and a command to him: he is exhorted to come to the aid of the poet and his allies against enemies in violent battle. The final section (18–21) continues the direct requests to Indra, but here for material goods to be distributed peaceably at the sacrifice. The final verse (before the refrain) applies the model of the Vala victory to the present, beseeching Indra to continue to break open cowpens and distribute cows.

As often, the concerns of the whole hymn are subtly foreshadowed in the first verse, which both establishes the sacrificers as beset by hostile forces and their sacrifice as a site for beneficial exchange with the god.

The hymn is characterized by a number of hapaxes and by affective morphology, especially in the sections devoted to Indra's opponents; the translations of some of these words are provisional.

1. They desire you, your comrades in soma; they press the soma; they set out pleasurable offerings.
   They endure the taunting of the people, for, Indra, there is no sign from you.
2. Even the farthest dusky realms are not at a distance for you. But drive here with your two fallow bays, bay-horsed one.
   It is for (you), the sturdy bull, that these pressings here were made and the pressing stones yoked when the fire was being kindled.
3. Indra of good lips, bounteous, overwhelming, having a great troop, powerfully ranging, mettlesome—that which you, powerful one, established among mortals, even when hard-pressed, where are these manly powers of yours now, bull?
4. For you, stirring the unstirrable, alone range about smashing obstacle after obstacle.

It is following your commandment that heaven and earth and the mountains stand like (pillars) implanted.

5. And, o you who are much invoked with acclamations, in fearlessness you alone talked tough, since you are the obstacle-smasher.
   Even these two world-halves without limits—when you grabbed them together, bounteous Indra, it was just a handful for you.
6. (Come) forth along an easy slope with your two fallow bays; let your mace come forth, pulverizing the rivals.
   Smash those facing you, those following, those turned away. Make all this come true; let it be accomplished.
7. To whatever mortal you have provided sustenance, he takes a portion of the household goods, even what is not yet apportioned.
   Auspicious is your benevolence and covered with ghee, much-invoked Indra; your generosity provides a thousand gifts.
8. The one dwelling together with (his mother) Dānu, the handless vermin did you utterly crush, much-invoked Indra.
   With your powerful (mace), Indra, you smashed at the sneering footless Vṛtra, who was growing strong.
9. You set down in its seat the whole, great, limitless, vital earth, Indra.
   The bull propped up heaven and the midspace. Let the waters flow here, propelled by you.
10. Vala, the enclosure of cattle, unquiet and fearful, opened up (even) before being struck, o Indra.
    He [=Indra] made the paths easy to travel, to drive out the cows. The choir (of Aṅgirases) aided the much-invoked one, blowing (on their instruments).
11. The one—Indra—filled the two—earth and heaven—the joint repositories of goods.
    And from the midspace, at their join [i.e., of heaven and earth], as charioteer of refreshment (bring) us prizes in yoke together, o champion.
12. The Sun does not confound the directions as they are directed, as they are day after day propelled forth by him of the fallow bays.
    When he has fully reached (the end) of the road, only after that does he perform his unyoking of the horses. But that is his (way).
13. They desire to see, at the coming of Dawn from night, the great glittering face of her who shines forth [=Dawn].
    They all know when she has come with her greatness. Many are the well-done deeds of Indra.
14. Great light was deposited in her udder. Herself raw, the cow roams about carrying the cooked (milk).
    Every sweetness was brought together in the ruddy one, when Indra established her for nourishment.

15. Indra, stand fast! The (enemies') "journey-buckets" [=chariots] have come. Do your best for the sacrifice, for the singer, for your comrades.
    The mortals who use dirty tricks, those of evil ways, the cheaters wearing quivers are to be smashed.
16. All around your battle-cry is heard by the closest foes. Smash your most scorching missile down on them.
    Cleave them below; break them apart; overwhelm them. Smash the demonic force, bounteous one; make them subject to you.
17. Tear out the demonic power, root and all, Indra; cleave its middle; shatter its top.
    How far have you sent it scooting? Hurl your scorching lance at the hater of the sacred formulation.
18. It is for our well-being and with your prize-seeking (horses), o leader, that you will sit down to many great refreshments.
    Might we be winners of lofty wealth. Let your portion, conferring offspring, be in us, Indra.
19. Bring hither to us a brilliant portion, Indra. Might we deposit it amid the surplus of your giving.
    As if in the (sea-)basin, desire spreads out in us. Fulfill it, goods-lord of goods.
20. Invigorate this desire with cows, with horses, with recompense in gold, and you will (further) spread it out.
    Seeking the sun, the inspired poets, the Kuśikas, have made with their thoughts a (ritual) conveyance for you, for Indra.
21. Keep breaking open the cowpens for us, (break out) the cows, lord of cows; let winnings and victory-prizes together come to us.
    You are the ruler of heaven, you bull, whose blusterings are real. For us, bounteous one, become a giver of cows.
22. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.31 (265) Indra

Kuśika Aiṣīrathi or Viśvāmitra Gāthina
22 verses: triṣṭubh

This dense and often puzzling hymn has given rise to much discussion. The heart of the hymn (vss. 4–11 and passim throughout the rest of the hymn) provides one of the fullest accounts in the Ṛgveda of the Vala myth and especially of Indra and the Aṅgirases as they besiege the Vala cave and seek to free the cows within by means of song and ritual activity. Since the cows of the Vala myth are often used as symbols of the dawns, the hymn also celebrates the coming of dawn and its ritual manifestations, including the distribution of priestly gifts (dakṣiṇā), which occurs at the early-morning ritual.

Perhaps the most striking part of the hymn, however, is found in the first three verses, which are often taken as depicting the production of the ritual fire as an allegory of cosmic incest. Although there are certainly hints of an incestuous liaison, the relationships among the various kinship terms here are not at all clear, and in our opinion the ritual references to the production of fire so dominate the picture and distort the underlying sexual configurations that it is a mistake to seek too literal a mythological reading. The translation of the first two verses, especially, is provisional. Our identifications of the personae with various ritual elements differ from those of other scholars (who also differ among themselves), but in our opinion the ritual reference here is not to the initial production of ritual fire, but rather the transformation, through removal to the east, of the undifferentiated ritual fire into the new offering fire, an action well known from the later ritual literature, where the new fire with its eastern hearth is called the Āhavanīya and the older one in the west the Gārhapatya. If this particular ritual procedure was an innovation in the Ṛgveda or pre-Ṛgveda, as we suspect, a mystical and riddling presentation of it like this would not be surprising.

The connection between this opening description of the birth of Agni and the following treatment of the Vala myth may not be superficially obvious, but it is the theme of dawn that unites them: fire is kindled at dawn, and the release of the Vala cows is regularly likened to the breaking of dawn.

It is notable that neither Indra nor the Aṅgirases are named for most of the recital of the Vala myth, though they are referred to constantly. Indeed the plural Aṅgirases is not found in the mythic section, only the singular (vs. 7) referring to Indra. Indra is named, but not until verse 11, the exact center of the hymn (minus the refrain, vs. 22) and the standard locus for mysteries and their solutions. However, various epithets, associates, and exploits of Indra that uniquely identify him and that are irrelevant to the Vala myth have foreshadowed this naming: Saramā, Indra's dog, in verse 6; his opponent Śuṣṇa in verse 8; and the Vṛtra-smashing earlier in verse 11. After the first naming of Indra in verse 11 the hymn broadens its view to include a range of Indra's cosmogonic deeds, especially the separation of Heaven and Earth and the smashing of Vṛtra.

The hymn returns to the ritual here-and-now starting around verse 17, and the theme of dawn, appropriate both to the fire-kindling verses 1–3 and the extensive treatment of the Vala myth, prompts the requests for Indra' liberality to be manifested in the early-morning dakṣiṇā, with the dispensing of gifts compared to the outpouring of cows from the opened Vala cave.

1. Instructing the (grand)daughter [=Āhavanīya?] of his daughter [=Gārhapatya?], the (offering-)conveyor [=Agni] has come—he the knowing one, ritually serving the visionary power of truth—to where the father [=priest? Agni?], stretching out straight, has run toward the outpouring of his daughter [=butter offering?] with capable mind.
2. The son of her body [=Agni?] has not left behind his leavings for her sister [=Gārhapatya?]. He has made the womb [=Āhavanīya?] a repository for the winner.
   When the mothers [=fingers] begot the (offering-)conveyor, one of the two good workers [=fire-churning sticks] was the actor, the other was the one assuring success.
3. Agni was begotten, quivering with his tongue [/by the offering-spoon, trembling], to display the sons [=flames?] of the great ruddy one.
   Great was the womb, great the birth of these here, great the growth of the one with fallow bays [=Indra] through the sacrifices.
4. The victorious (clans [=Aṅgirases?]) escorted the contender [=Indra?]. They distinguished the great light from the darkness.
   Recognizing him, the dawns rose up in response. He became the lone lord [/husband] of the cows—Indra.
5. The insightful ones bored through to the (cows), though they were in a stronghold. The seven inspired poets impelled (the cows?) with advancing mind.
   They found the whole path of truth. Himself knowing the way, he [=Indra] entered among them [=cows] with homage.
6. When Saramā found the break in the rock, she made the great ancient herd directed toward one goal.
   Sure-footed, she led the vanguard of the cows [/syllables]. First recognizing (them), she went to their bellowing.
7. The foremost inspired poet [=Indra] came, acting in partnership (with the Aṅgirases). The rock brought the embryo to sweetness for the good worker.
   The young blood won, doing battle alongside the youths. Then he became (an) Aṅgiras immediately upon singing.
8. The counterweight of every being, standing at the forefront, he knows all the races; he smashes Śuṣṇa.
   Following the track of heaven, seeking cows, chanting, the comrade released us, his comrades, from calumny.
9. With cow-seeking mind, they sat down (to a ritual "Session") with their chants, making for themselves a way toward immortality.
   Just this was their long Session, by which, for months, they sought to win (the cows) through truth.

10. Surveying (the cows) en masse, they delighted in their own possession, milking out the milk of the age-old semen.
    Their cry heated the two worlds through. Amid (all) that was born they set the outstanding one [=Indra?]; amid the cows they set heroes.
11. He was Vṛtra-smasher with (the help of) those who were born (together) [=Maruts], and he sent the ruddy (cows) surging upward with oblations and with the chants (of the Aṅgirases)—he is Indra.
    She of broad extent, bearing ghee-rich (milk) to him, milked out honey, sweetness—the thoroughbred cow.
12. It was for the father that they performed a ritual Session, for him also they prepared a seat, because the good workers surveyed the great, turbulent (cowpen).
    Propping apart with a prop the two begetters [=Heaven and Earth], while sitting (the Session) they fixed upright the dazzling (seat).
13. When the great (Earth), the Holy Place, has set him to piercing—him who is grown strong in a single day, spread wide in the two world-halves, and in whom the flawless hymns are united—(then) all powers are conceded to Indra.
14. Great is your comradeship—I long for it here, and for your powers. Numerous teams [=our poetic thoughts] come here to the Vṛtra-smasher.
    Great is the praise song. We have arrived at the favor of the patron [=Indra]. For us, liberal one, become a protector of cows.
15. Great the dwelling place, abundant the gleaming (goods) that he found; thereupon he assembled movable (goods [=livestock]) for his comrades.
    Indra along with the men, as shining one, begot at one blow the sun, the dawn, the way, the fire.
16. Also the all-gleaming waters, spread wide, did this master of the house send surging forth toward a single goal.
    Through the days, through the nights, (the priests) impel the runners, (the streams) of honey [=soma] being purified with poets as their purifying filters.
17. The two black treasure-chambers [=Dawn and Night], deserving the sacrifice, follow (each other) in succession through the magnanimity of the Sun, when your amiable, straight-flying comrades (gather) round about, to twist your greatness (toward them), Indra.
18. Become lord of liberalities, you smasher of Vṛtra, a bull of songs, conferring vigor all the life long.
    Come here to us with your friendly fellowship, a great one hastening with great help.

19. Serving him with homage like the Aṅgirases, I make new (their hymn) born of old, for the older one.
    Run over the deceits, manifold and godless, and set us up to win the sun, bounteous one.
20. The far-extended mists have just become clear; carry us across to the edge of them, to well-being.
    O Indra, as charioteer protect us from harm. Quickly, quickly make us winners of cows.
21. The Vr̥tra-smasher, lord of cows, has put his cows on display. He has come between the black (nights) (and bright days) with the ruddy manifestations (of the cows [=dawns]).
    And allotting the liberalities [=gifts] in accord with truth, he opened up all the doors that are his own.
22. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.32 (266) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
17 verses: triṣṭubh

The ritual application of this hymn is announced in the first verse: the Midday Pressing of soma, which in some ritual circles, as here, Indra shares with the Marut troop, his supporters in the Vr̥tra battle. Throughout the hymn invitations to drink soma at this rite are interspersed with praises of Indra's cosmogonic deeds, especially the slaying of Vr̥tra. In verses 9–10 Indra's powers are ascribed to his original drinking of soma immediately after birth, with the implicit suggestion that the sacrificers' current offering of soma will revitalize those powers for the sacrificers' benefit.

For the most part the language of this hymn is straightforward and even a bit monotonous, and there are a number of technical terms pertaining to the soma sacrifice (see, e.g., the types of soma in vs. 2). There are, however, several studied contrastive pairs (e.g., "vulnerable... invulnerable," vs. 4; "goddesses... godless," vs. 6; see also vss. 7, 11), as well as a few striking images, such as Indra "wearing the earth on his other hip" (vs. 11) as an indication of his greatness.

1. O Indra, lord of soma, drink this soma here, the Midday Pressing, which is dear to you.
   Snuffling out your two lips, you bounteous possessor of the silvery drink, having unhitched your two fallow bays, reach exhilaration here.

2. Mixed with cows [=milk], stirred (with meal), or pure, o Indra—drink the soma. We have given it to you for your exhilaration.
   Joined in pleasure with the formulation-making flock of Maruts, with the Rudras, drench yourself (in it), to satiety.
3. They who increased your tempestuousness, who increased your power, the Maruts, hymning your strength, Indra—at the Midday Pressing, you with mace in hand, drink in a flock with the Rudras, you of good lips.
4. It was they who became inspired at his honeyed (drink), Indra's troop, who were the Maruts, impelled by whom he found the vulnerable place of Vr̥tra, who thought himself invulnerable.
5. As by Manu, o Indra, enjoying the pressing, drink the soma for manly power ever new.
   Let yourself be turned hither by our sacrifices, you of the fallow bays. Along with the hastening ones, you set to running the flooding waters,
6. When you sent forth the waters, like steeds to run in a contest—having smashed Vr̥tra, who was lying still, with your moving weapon of death, o Indra, him having surrounded the goddesses, godless himself.
7. Let us sacrifice to Indra, increased through homage, lofty and towering, unaging and youthful, whose greatness the two dear world-halves measured, but did not measure up to the greatness of him worthy of the sacrifice.
8. Many are the well-done deeds of Indra. The All Gods do not violate the commandments (of him), who upholds earth and this heaven. Of wondrous power, he begot the sun and the dawn.
9. Undeceptive one, this greatness of yours is truly real: because, just born, you drank the soma, not the heavens, Indra, nor the days, nor the months and years could obstruct the strength of you, the powerful one.
10. You, Indra, just born, drank the soma for exhilaration in the highest distant heaven.
    After you had entered heaven and earth, then you became the first to suckle the bard.
11. You smashed the serpent lying around the flood, displaying its strength—you powerfully born, as more powerful (than he).
    Heaven did not come close to your greatness then, when you wore the earth on the other hip.
12. Since the sacrifice has become your strengthener, Indra, and the dear ritual meal of pressed soma also, aid sacrifice upon sacrifice, being the one who deserves the sacrifice; the sacrifice aided your mace in the serpent-smashing.

13. With the sacrifice as aid I (previously) brought Indra nearby with his aid. May I turn him hither for newer favor, him who was strengthened by previous praises, who by midmost ones and by the present ones.
14. She labored when she begot me [=poet]—the Holy Place [=Earth? ritual ground?]. I shall praise Indra before the decisive day, so that at that time he (will) carry us across (to the far shore) of constraint, as if with a boat. Both (sides) call upon him as he travels.
15. His (soma) tub is filled—hail! As a man pours out a bucket, I have poured (for him) to drink.
    And the dear soma drinks have together turned him here with respectful circumambulation, to exhilarate Indra.
16. Not the deep river nor the surrounding peaks could obstruct you, much-invoked one, when impelled just so from your comrades, Indra, you broke into the cattle enclosure though it was firmly fastened.
17. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory,
    the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.33 (267) Viśvāmitra and the Rivers

Viśvāmitra Gāthina / Rivers
13 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 13

Although this hymn is found in the Indra collection, the Anukramaṇī identifies Indra as the dedicand only of verses 6–7, with the remainder divided between the rivers (Nadyas: 1–3, 5, 9, 11–13) and the poet himself, Viśvāmitra (4, 8, 10). After two opening verses describing the confluence of the Vipāś and Śutudrī rivers, this justly famous poem consists of a dialogue between those rivers and Viśvāmitra, who begs the rivers to stop in their course to allow the Bharata forces, under his patron, King Sudās (not named here, but see III.53.9), to cross. They accede to his request in return for his ensuring their future fame in his poetry, and the Bharatas cross successfully, as is announced in verse 12—after which the rivers are urged to refill themselves with water and flow again. That it is the poet who succeeds in temporarily stopping the rivers is yet another example of the power of properly formulated speech to control the physical world. The final verse (13), in a different meter, may be a magic spell, exemplifying the continuing belief in the power of the word by applying this legendary river crossing to a team in trouble at a ford.

1. Forth from the lap of the mountains, eager, racing with each other like two mares unloosed, resplendent, licking each other like mother cows (their calves), the Vipāś and Śutudrī (rivers) speed with their milk.
2. Impelled by Indra as you long to take part in the forward thrust, you drive like two charioteers to the sea, clashing together, swelling with your waves, the one of you merges into the other—you resplendent ones.
3. [Viśvāmitra:] I have driven to the most motherly river [=Śutudrī]; we have come to the broad, well-portioned Vipāś—the two who are like mothers together licking their calf, proceeding together along the same womb [=riverbed].
4. [Rivers:] So we are—swelling with milk, proceeding along our god-made womb.
   Our forward thrust, launched in a surge, is not to be obstructed. Seeking what does the poet keep calling upon the rivers?
5. [Viśvāmitra:] Stop for my somian speech, truthful ones, for an instant, in your travels.
   My lofty inspired thought (has gone) forth to the river: seeking help, have I, the son of Kuśika, called upon (you).
6. [Rivers:] Indra with the mace in his arms dug us channels: he smashed away Vr̥tra [/the obstacle] surrounding the rivers.
   God Savitar of the lovely hands led (us): at his forward thrust we journey widely.
7. [Viśvāmitra:] This act of heroism is to be proclaimed ever anew, the deed of Indra when he hewed apart the serpent.
   He smashed apart the enclosures with his mace. The waters went seeking a way to go.
8. [Rivers:] This speech, singer—do not forget it—so that later generations will hear it from you.
   Favor us in return in your hymns, bard: don't put us down among men. Homage to you.
9. [Viśvāmitra:] Listen well to the bard, sisters. He has driven to you from afar with his wagon and chariot.
   Bow down; become easy to cross, staying below his axle(s) with your currents, you rivers.
10. [Rivers:] We will listen to your words, bard. You have driven from afar with wagon and chariot.
    I [=one river] will bow down to you like a young woman swollen (with milk, to her infant), (while) I [=other river] will bend to you like a maiden to her cavalier.
11. [Viśvāmitra:] When the Bharatas should really have crossed you entirely—the horde seeking cattle, propelled, sped by Indra—then certainly your forward thrust, launched in a surge, will rush (again). I wish for the favor of you who deserve the sacrifice.

12. [Viśvāmitra:] The cattle-seeking Bharatas have entirely crossed; the poet has shared in the favor of the rivers.
  Swell forth, nurturing, very generous; fill your bellies; drive quickly.
13. Let your wave push up the yoke-pins; o waters, let loose the yoking cords.
  Let the two inviolable (oxen), doing no ill, without offense, not come to naught.

III.34 (268) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The emphasis in this hymn, as often in Indra hymns, is on Indra's victories and the gains he won not only for himself but also for gods and mortals. In several verses (esp. 3 and 6) Indra's sheer power, reinforced by his backup troops, is contrasted with his control of clever tricks and artifice; both types of approach contribute to his success.

The underlying theme of victory, expressed in a variety of ways earlier in the hymn, becomes insistent in the numerous repetitions of the verb "win" (√san) in the last three verses before the refrain (vss. 8–10), which contain eight forms of the verb (including four forms of the perfect sasā́na in a single verse [9]); the root appears previously in the hymn only in the root noun compound svar-sán "winning the sun" in verse 4.

The poets' role in spurring Indra to victory is mentioned several times at the beginning of the hymn (vss. 1–2), but is otherwise backgrounded; the poets' task in the hymn is more to celebrate and praise (vss. 6, 7, 8) the god than to inspire him. In fact, it is Indra who grants inspiration to the poets (vs. 5), an action that precedes and makes possible their praises in verses 6–8.

One curious feature of the hymn is the presence of phraseology and imagery characteristic of the god Agni in 3cd and of fire-priests in 4ab. The point of contact is probably to be found in verse 4, where Indra is said to win the sun and make it shine, and to find the light, since the kindling of the ritual fire at dawn is associated with and often presented as the cause of the sunrise.

1. Indra, stronghold-splitter, overcame the Dāsa with his chants, finding goods, fragmenting his rivals.
  Spurred on by the sacred formulation, grown strong in his body, he of abundant gifts filled both world-halves.

2. I rouse forth speech as a spur for you, the forceful combatant, exerting myself for the immortal one.
   Indra, you travel at the forefront of the peoples stemming from Manu and of the divine clans.
3. Indra obstructed the obstacle [/Vṛtra] through control of his troop [=Maruts]; he beguiled (the wiles) of the wily ones through control of forms.
   He smashed the one whose shoulders were spread [=cobra]. Burning at will in the woods, he brought to light the nourishing streams of the nights.
4. Indra, winning the sun, begetting the days, conquered in the battles along with the fire-priests, as superiority (itself).
   He made shine for Manu the beacon of the days [=sun]; he found the light for lofty joy.
5. Indra "got into" mighty thrusts, manfully assuming his many manly (powers).
   He made these insights perceptible to the singer; he extended this bright hue of theirs [=insights].
6. They admire the great things of him, the great one: many are the well-done deeds of Indra.
   He utterly crushed the bent ones with his band; with his tricks (he crushed) the Dasyus, (though) he had overwhelming strength.
7. Through combat Indra with his greatness created a wide realm for the gods, he the master of settlements, filling the bordered domains.
   At the seat of Vivasvant [=ritual ground] these (deeds) of his do the inspired poets, the sage poets sing with their hymns.
8. Him, victorious in every way, worthy to be chosen, granting victorious might, having won the sun and the divine waters, him, who won the earth and this heaven—Indra do they celebrate, those who take joy in his insight.
9. He won the steeds and the sun he won; Indra won the cow of many benefits, and the benefit of gold he won. Having smashed the Dasyus, he aided the Ārya hue.
10. Indra won the plants, the days; the trees he won, the midspace.
    He split Vala; he expelled the challengers. Then he became the subduer of those who set their wills against him.
11. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.35 (269) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: triṣṭubh

A simple hymn, entirely devoted to Indra's journey to the sacrifice and his enjoyment of it, mostly expressed in the imperative. The progress of the hymn is completely chronological, from the yoking of his pair of horses, through the journey, during which Indra is exhorted to pass by other sacrificers (vs. 5), and finally the arrival at the ritual ground, properly prepared, and the drinking of the soma. The mention of the Maruts in verses 7 and 9 suggests that the Midday Pressing, devoted to Indra and the Maruts jointly at least in Viśvāmitra circles, is the sacrifice in question (see also, for example, III.32). There is also a rather charming concern for the welfare of Indra's horses (vss. 3, 7).

In the context of R̥gvedic poetry what is striking are the absent elements. There is neither praise of the god honored nor any mention of his attributes or heroic deeds. (The sole exception is 9b, with its unelaborated allusion to the Maruts' role in strengthening Indra and the alliance resulting therefrom.) Nor do we hear about the purpose of Indra's soma-drinking—rousing him to perform heroic deeds either in the past or for our benefit now. Nor, despite the many imperatives, does the poet ask for any gifts or for aid of any sort. It is an extraordinarily focused hymn, and its apparent simplicity may result not from artlessness, but from careful pruning.

1. Mount the pair of fallow bays being yoked to the chariot. Drive, like the wind, to our teams [=poetic thoughts].
   You will drink the stalk when you have surged to us. Indra, hail! We have given (it) to you for your exhilaration.
2. The nimble span, the pair of fallow bays I yoke to the yoke-poles of the chariot for the much invoked one.
   The two will bring Indra right here to this sacrifice assembled from every side, as if at a run.
3. Lead near the two bullish (stallions), protecting them from the scorching heat, and help them—you autonomous bull.
   Let the two horses graze. Unhitch the two sorrels here. Every day eat roasted grains of the same appearance.
4. With a sacred formulation I yoke for you the formulation-yoked pair of fallow bays, your swift comrades in joint revelry.
   O Indra, mounting the sturdy, well-naved chariot, thinking ahead, knowing, drive up to the soma.
5. Let other sacrificers not stop your bullish, straight-backed fallow bays.
   Drive beyond them, each and every one. We will prepare properly for you with pressed soma drinks.

6. Yours is this soma here. Come here, nearby. Well-disposed, drink of it each time anew.
   At just this sacrifice, having sat down on the ritual grass, put just this drop into your belly, Indra.
7. The ritual grass has been strewn for you, the soma pressed, o Indra. The roasted grains have been prepared for your fallow bays to eat.
   To the bull of many talents who is accustomed to it, to you accompanied by the Maruts are the oblations given.
8. This (soma) have the men, the mountains, and the waters jointly with the cows made honeyed for you.
   Having come here along your own paths, well-disposed, drink of it, lofty one, thinking ahead, knowing.
9. The Maruts to whom you gave a share in soma, who strengthened you and became your flock—joined in pleasure with them, eagerly desirous, drink the soma with the tongue of Agni, Indra.
10. Indra, drink of the pressed (soma) just by your own power or take a drink with the tongue of Agni, o you who deserve the sacrifice.
    Either from the hand of the Adhvaryu or from the oblation of the Hotar enjoy the offered sacrifice, able one.
11. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.36 (270) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina (1–9, 11) and Ghora Āṅgirasa (10)
11 verses: triṣṭubh

In contrast to the pared-down aesthetic of the immediately preceding hymn, this one, entirely devoted to Indra's drinking of soma, presents a series of extreme images and striking turns of phrase. The emphasis is on Indra's sheer size and capaciousness when he drinks soma, and liquid images predominate: he is conceived of both as a vast container for liquid (vs. 4) and as the liquid itself (vss. 6, 8). These images of Indra's vastness are deftly used as measures of his capacity to give to his human worshipers (e.g., vss. 5, 9, 10).

1. Set this offering here to be won, being ever newly united with help.
   At every pressing he is strengthened by strengthenings, he who has become well famed through great deeds.

2. From olden days the soma drinks are known to Indra, because of which he, the craftsman, has bullish joints and extensive power.
   Grasp at (the drinks) being offered; Indra, drink of the bull, rinsed by bulls.
3. Drink, become strong. Yours are the pressed soma drinks, Indra—the first ones and these here.
   Just as you drank the previous soma drinks, Indra, so take a drink today, as the one to be admired anew.
4. A great ample tankard at the (ritual) enclosure, he is master of powerful capacity, daring power.
   The earth never encompasses him, when the soma drinks have exhilarated the one with the fallow bays.
5. Great, powerful, he is strengthened for the heroic deed. The bull has been perfected through poetic insight.
   Indra is the apportioner. His cows are givers of prizes. His gift-cows propagate in abundance.
6. When the rivers set forth like a shot, their waters went to the sea like (two) charioteers.
   But Indra is wider even than that seat [=sea], when soma, the milked plant, fills him.
7. The rivers, uniting with the sea, are carrying well-pressed soma to Indra, (while) those who possess hands [=human priests] milk the plant with (the tools) they use for carrying [=those same hands]; they purify it in a stream of honey with purifying filters.
8. His cheeks are like lakes holding soma; he entirely encompasses many pressings.
   When Indra devoured the first foods, having smashed Vr̥tra he chose the soma.
9. Bring it here. Let no one contain it. For we know you as the goods-lord of goods.
   Indra, the great giving that is yours—offer it to us, o possessor of the fallow bays.
10. Offer us (a portion) of abundant, all-desirable wealth, o bounteous Indra of the silvery drink.
    Provide a hundred autumns for us to live; (provide) for us ever new heroes, o Indra of the lips.
11. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.37 (271) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
11 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 11

This is a good example of a hymn driven almost entirely by rhetoric. The organizing principle of the hymn is the careful stationing of an accented form of the name índra at the beginning of the third pāda (after the hemistich break) in eight of the first nine verses. The middle verse of this sequence (vs. 5) instead has índra at the beginning of the verse, and this slight deviation from pattern marks an unemphatic omphalos. As often in R̥gvedic hymnic composition, a pattern set through most of the hymn is both broken and advanced at the end. Verse 10 seems at first to announce the epiphany of the god, which has been desired throughout the hymn; the name of the god has been demoted to unaccented second position, after the annunciatory augmented aorist, the only past tense form in a hymn full of imperatives and presents: "you have come, Indra." The poet has tricked us, however: Indra has come not to us but to fame. The final verse (11) is in a different meter, often a sign of an extra-hymnic verse, but it also emphatically renews the call for Indra's epiphany and therefore provides a fitting end to the rest. The name índra opens the final pāda (11d).

The "content" of the hymn is relatively conventional and clearly subordinate to the rhetorical structure, but the light texture and balance of the phrases surrounding the all-important repeated name are quite pleasing.

1. For Vr̥tra-smashing capacity and for victory in battle—
   Indra—we turn you hither.
2. Let the cantors make your mind inclined our way—
   Indra of a hundred resolves—and your eye as well.
3. We implore your names with all our songs—
   Indra of a hundred resolves—in vanquishing hostility.
4. We magnify (him) through the hundred embodiments of the much-praised one, of Indra, the supporter of the settled domains.
5. Indra, much invoked, I call toward me to slay Vr̥tra, to win spoils in raids.
6. Be victorious when the prize (is set). We implore you, Indra of a hundred resolves, to slay Vr̥tra.
7. Amid brilliant outbursts on the battle-drive, amid claims to fame that bring success in battles, Indra, be victorious at the hostilities.
8. Drink the most unbridled, brilliant, wakeful soma—
   Indra of a hundred resolves—to aid us.
9. Your Indrian powers that are among the five peoples—
   Indra of a hundred resolves—those I want for myself.

10. You have come, Indra, to lofty fame. Establish for yourself brilliance difficult to surpass.
    We exalt your unbridled power.
11. From nearby come here to us—also, able one, from afar.
    The broad space that is yours—Indra possessor of the stone—from that come here.

III.38 (272) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina or Prajāpati Vaiśvāmitra or Prajāpati Vācya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

A dense and difficult, but rewarding, hymn. Although the hymn is found in the midst of the Maṇḍala III Indra hymns and is assigned to Indra by the Anukramaṇī, the name Indra is not found in the hymn (save in the appended Viśvāmitra refrain), and indeed it is not at all clear that there are any references to Indra in the hymn. Not surprisingly the hymn has given rise to much discussion.

Any interpretation of its contents and intent will necessarily be speculative, and the richness and multivalence of the images should not be reduced to a single and simple paraphrase. Nonetheless, we will attempt a sketch here. It is regularly remarked that the hymn is cosmogonic. In fact, it seems to concern two creations: the Ur-creation of undifferentiated material and the subsequent establishment of individual name and form. As usual in ancient India, creation is conceived of as an act of division and individuation, rather than of assemblage. This second, and more interesting, creation was carried out by the equivalent of poets, and the current poet of this hymn identifies himself and his activities with the authors of this second creation and seeks their model for his own poetic work. The large number of neuter pronouns of unclear reference throughout the hymn seem to be a grammatical reflection of the undifferentiated material of the first creation, and the poet seems almost to be inviting us to participate in the second creation by ourselves assigning them name and form.

The poem begins with three verses in the poet's own voice, concerning the older generations of poets and the poetic tradition. In verse 1 he sounds both tremulous and self-assured, mindful of the tradition he belongs to but also proud of his own insight. In the second verse, addressing himself (as so often) in the 2nd person, he exhorts himself to seek models from the earlier poets, and introduces the notion that they "crafted heaven for themselves," a reference to the second creation. The third verse fleshes out this statement, in describing just how the older poets set about this creation. Most important is the final pāda, in which they "put apart" the two worlds—the primal act of separation that makes life possible.

Verse 4 moves abruptly to a new subject, or rather to an older one. A previously unmentioned figure is introduced obliquely, and though he is explicitly credited with a "name" in pāda c, it is not at all clear what that name is—possibly Viśvarūpa "possessing all forms" of pāda d. In verse 5 it appears that this bull is responsible for the Ur-creation preceding the separation just described. The lack of differentiation in the Ur-creation may be signaled by the androgyny of its source—"the bull gave birth." The same verse also introduces two unnamed kings, "sons/descendants of heaven." This epithet in the dual usually refers to the Aśvins, but this identification seems unlikely here. Other suggested pairs are Mitra and Varuṇa (Grassmann, Geldner) or Indra and Varuṇa (Sāyaṇa, Renou, Oberlies); either pairing is perhaps possible, but the fact that the poet forebears to name them suggests that a precise identification may run counter to the poet's intentions. It might also be noted that the only identifiable dual entities in the hymn are the two world-halves (vss. 3, 8, probably 9), and in verse 8 they "set all in motion." It therefore seems possible that in this hymn the "two descendants of heaven" could in fact be the two worlds, which have dominion over (vs. 5) and tend to (vs. 6) the "(cosmic) division," both as products of the primal separation in the second creation and producers of the further individuation occurring in that second creation: note the increasing numbers in verse 6ab.

In verse 7a we return to the androgynous Ur-creator, now explicitly identified as both bull and cow; the rest of the verse introduces the second creation characterized by "names" and "form." The creators here are "masters of artifice," poets perhaps. Verse 8 essentially repeats verse 7, as is signaled by the identical opening phrase, but this time it is the current poet himself (who made a brief reappearance in vs. 6cd), who by his praise hymn is responsible for movement in the world (i.e., the second creation) contrasted to the static golden emblem (8b) arising from the first creation. The poet thus implicitly identifies himself with the masters of artifice, the poets, in verse 7. In the final verse (aside from the refrain) both the unnamed dual pairing, quite possibly the two worlds, and the masters of artifice return to bear witness to the creative actions of the poet himself, who through his powerful tongue seems to control the individuated forms. We have thus returned to the issues raised in verse 1, but with the poet having successfully assumed his vocation and commanded the respect of his predecessors in the creative act.

1. Like a craftsman I ponder my inspiration. Bending like a prizewinning steed amenable to the chariot-pole, touching now on my own dear things, now on distant ones, I seek sage poets to see (these) whole—(though) I (too) have wisdom.
2. Ask also the powerful generations of the poets: they as good workers, holding their minds firm, crafted heaven for themselves.
   These are the precedents for you, which keep growing stronger. Sought by mind they have now come (to rest) on its [=mind's] firm foundation.
3. And, in depositing their own secret (tracks/names) in safety just here, they ornamented the two world-halves for their dominion.

(When) they fully measured (them) with their measures, they held fast the two broad (worlds). They have put apart the two great ones, which were fitted together, to give (us) nourishment.

4. As he was mounting they all tended to him. Donning beauties, he roams about with his own light.
   Great is that name of the bull, the lord. Possessing all forms [/Viśvarūpa], he mounted the immortal (things/worlds).
5. The earlier older bull gave birth. Here are his many proliferating riches.
   You two sons of heaven, with your insights you established your dominion over the (cosmic) division, you kings, from olden days.
6. O kings, you two tended to the three, to the many, to all the seats in the (cosmic) division.
   Having come here with my mind, I saw even the wind-haired Gandharvas under your commandment.
7. This [=undifferentiated creation] was just his—(he who is both) bull (and) milk-cow; (then) with (individual) names they meted out the "fellowship of the cow" [=the joint creation of bull and milk-cow].
   Donning one lordly power after another, the masters of artifice parceled out (individual) form in it.
8. This [=creation] was just his, the impeller's, (it was) nothing of mine— the golden emblem that he fixed firm.
   But it is through (my) good praise hymn that the two world-halves set everything in motion here. He has swaddled the generations, like a young woman her children.
9. You two assure success to (that creation) of the age-old great one, (the creation) that is the divine blessing. May you two enfold us.
   All masters of artifice look upon the deeds of him whose tongue is a herdsman, who surmounts the various forms.
10. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory, the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.39 (273) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins (vss. 1–3) with a charming image of poetic thought as a lovely young woman, beautifully arrayed, seeking Indra as her husband and giving birth to twins, who perhaps are two types of ritual speech. The subject changes in verse 4, moving to the mythic past and one of Indra's great deeds: opening the Vala cave and releasing the cows (of dawn) and by extension the sun (vss. 4–6). The implicit connection between the verses concerning poetic speech and those treating the Vala myth is not expressed, but would be well known to the audience: Indra and his helpers the Aṅgirases (here under the names Navagvas and Daśagvas "nine-cowed" and "ten-cowed") used the power of properly formulated speech to open the cave. This is the mythic model for the poet's use of ritual speech to secure light and safety for the sacrificer and the sacrifice (vss. 7–8).

1. Thought goes toward Indra as her husband, curling herself out of my heart, crafted as praise, she who is wakeful when recited at the rite. Indra—what is born for you, know that.
2. Being born of old from heaven itself, wakeful when being recited at the rite, clothing herself in auspicious, silvery garments, this one right here in us is the ancient-born, ancestral hymnic vision.
3. She, as bearer of twins, bore her twins [=Ṛc and Sāman?] just here. In soaring, (she) has mounted the tip of the tongue.
   The pair, once born, accompany the wondrous forms (of Agni)—the two, smashing the darkness, have come here to the base of scorching (Agni).
4. There is no one among mortals who scorns them: our fathers, who were battlers for cows.
   Indra with his great force (emptied out) the fastnesses for them, he with his wondrous power emptied out the cowpens.
5. When the comrade with his comrades the Navagvas, the warriors, from their crouch followed after the cows—this is the real truth—Indra with the ten Daśagvas found the sun, which was dwelling in darkness.
6. Indra found the concentrated honey in the ruddy one, found the footed and the hooved in the "bend of the cow."
   What was placed in hiding, fit to be hidden, hidden in the waters he took in his right hand—he of right generous gifts.
7. He should choose light, distinguishing it from darkness. May we be at a distance from difficulty in a close encounter.
   Indra, you drinker of soma, increased by soma, enjoy these hymns of the bard, the latest of many.
8. Light for the sacrifice should suffuse the two world-halves. May we be at a distance from abundant difficulty, for also in abundance are those who grant good passage to the mightily thrusting mortal, o good ones.
9. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory,
   the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.40 (274) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: gāyatrī

This simple hymn hardly deviates from the theme of Indra's soma-drinking, a concentration that is reflected in the repetitive elements: the vocative índra (generally verse- or pāda-initial) in seven of the nine verses (1–6, 9) and the collocation "pressed soma" in four verses (1–2, 4–5) and split over another two (6/7). Note also the conjoined expressions "nearby and afar" (vs. 8) and "afar and nearby" (vs. 9), together forming a "magic square."

1. Indra! We invoke you as bull when the soma is pressed.
   Drink of the honey, of the stalk.
2. Indra! Enjoy the pressed soma that finds the will, you much-praised one.
   Drink it, drench yourself in it—the ever satisfying (soma).
3. Indra! Further our sacrifice, with its emplaced (fires?), along with all the gods, o you who are praised as clanlord.
4. Indra! These pressed soma drinks of yours go forth, o master of settlements, to your dwelling place—the glimmering drops.
5. Put into your belly the pressed soma worthy to be chosen, Indra.
   Yours are the heaven-ruling drops.
6. O you longing for songs, drink our pressed (soma). With streams of honey are you anointed.
   Indra! Just by you is glory given.
7. The imperishable heavenly effusions of the wooden (vessel) attend on Indra.
   Having drunk of the soma, he is grown strong.
8. From nearby come here to us, and from afar, Vṛtra-smasher.
   Enjoy these songs of ours.
9. If you are invoked between the far and the nearby,
   Indra, come here from there.

III.41 (275) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: gāyatrī

An elementary hymn, focused entirely on the ritual and on Indra's journey to it and participation in it. In this it is reminiscent of III.35, though in a different meter, and like that hymn this one entirely lacks praise of the god, reference to his past deeds, and prayers for his gifts and aid.

1. You, Indra, when you are called to drink our soma, drive here toward me with your pair of fallow bays, o possessor of the (pressing) stone.
2. Our Hotar was seated at his season; the ritual grass has been strewn in due order.
   The pressing stones were yoked in the early morning.
3. Here are the sacred formulations being made, o you whose vehicle is the formulation. Sit on the ritual grass; seek after the offering cake, o champion.
4. Take pleasure in our pressings, in these praises, o Vr̥tra-smasher, in hymns, o Indra who longs for songs.
5. Thoughts lick the broad, soma-drinking lord of strength, Indra—like mothers a calf.
6. Find exhilaration from the stalk, then, to show great generosity with your own person.
   You will not put your praiser to scorn.
7. Offering our oblations, we sing, seeking you, o Indra, and you are seeking us, you good one.
8. Do not unharness at a distance from us; drive nearby, you who are dear to your fallow bays.
   O autonomous Indra, become exhilarated here.
9. Let the two hairy(-maned horses) convey you nearby in a well-naved chariot, Indra, the two with ghee on their backs—(for you) to sit on the ritual grass.

III.42 (276) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: gāyatrī

Another straightforward hymn centered on the soma-drinking, very similar to the immediately preceding III.41.

1. Come up to our pressed soma mixed with milk, Indra, you who, with your pair of fallow bays, are seeking us.
2. Come, Indra, to the exhilarating drink, stationed on the ritual grass, pressed by stones.
   Will you now indeed sate yourself on it?
3. To Indra have my songs gone just so, sent from here, to turn him hither for soma-drinking.

4. Indra we call here for soma-drinking with praises, with hymns. Will he indeed come hither?
5. Indra! Here are the pressed soma-drinks. Put them into your belly, o you of a hundred resolves, you rich in prizewinners.
6. Because we know you as one winning the stakes, as one daring in prize-contests, you sage, therefore we beg for your favor.
7. Drink this (soma) of ours mixed with milk and mixed with grain, Indra, having come here to the (soma) pressed by the bullish (stones).
8. Just to you, Indra, in my own house, do I impel the soma for drinking.
Let it find pleasure in your heart.
9. You, Indra, do we call to drink the pressed drink, as of old—we, the Kuśikas, seeking your favor.

III.43 (277) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Although this hymn, like the two immediately preceding it (41, 42), focuses on Indra's journey to and presence at the soma sacrifice, its texture is richer and its rhetoric more shapely. (It is also in the longer triṣṭubh meter, rather than the gāyatrī of the previous two.) The first four verses insistently establish the journey motif with the opening "Here—drive" (ā́ … yāhi, vss. 1–3) / "Here … " (ā́, vs. 4), along with an abundance of adverbs meaning "here, nearby, up close." Verse 5 consists of four rhetorical questions, each introduced by the interrogative particle kuvíd, implicitly begging Indra's intervention on the singer's behalf. The initial "Here … " and the journey motif return in verse 6; verse 7, the last before the refrain, invites Indra, presumably finally arrived, to drink the soma, inserting brief mentions of two well-known myths, the falcon's stealing of soma and Indra's opening of Vala. As is common in these journey hymns, Indra's horses have a prominent part in the hymn (see esp. vs. 6, but also vss. 1–4).

1. Here—drive right up nearby, stationed on the chariot seat. Just yours is the soma-drinking from olden days.
Your two dear comrades—unharness them at the ritual grass. These oblation-bearers are calling you.
2. Here—drive across the many settled domains—here, across the prayers of the stranger, right up to us, with your two fallow bays, for these thoughts, crafted as praise, are calling you, Indra, taking pleasure in your fellowship.

3. Here—drive swiftly to our sacrifice, which has grown strong with reverence, o god Indra, together with your fallow bays, for I keep calling you with my thoughts, (offering) a delightful dish of ghee, to the joint revelry of the honey drinks.
4. Here—if these bullish fallow bays will convey you, the two well-limbed comrades amenable to the chariot-pole—taking pleasure in the pressing accompanied by the roasted grain, will Indra, as our comrade, hear the tributes of his comrade?
5. Will you indeed make me your herdsman of the people; will you indeed (make me) king, you bounteous possessor of the silvery drink?
   Will you indeed (make) me a seer, (for) I have drunk of the pressed drink; will you indeed do your best for immortal goods for me?
6. Here—let the lofty fallow bays, on being yoked, joint revelers, convey you nearby, Indra,
   (the horses) that once again stretch forth the doorposts of heaven, the well-curried dumb (beasts) of the bull [=Indra].
7. Indra, drink of the bullish (soma), rinsed by the bulls [=priests], which the falcon brought here to you, who wanted it, in whose exhilaration you rouse the communities, in whose exhilaration you opened up the cowpens.
8. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory,
   the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.44 (278) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: bṛhatī

The major trick of this short hymn is the extended pun between the words hári "gold-colored" (also used regularly for Indra's "fallow bay" horses) and harya "enjoy," a pun exploited elsewhere. (For a far more elaborate example, see X.96.) For the purposes of this hymn, we have rendered the former as "golden," even in reference to the horses, and the latter as "gladden(ing)," in an attempt to sketch the pun in English. In the last verse the poet slyly turns the golden mace of verse 4 into silver, a move that would surely have caught the attention of the audience.

1. Let this be gladdening to you—the soma pressed here by the golden (stones).
   Rejoicing, Indra, come here to us along with your golden (horses).
   Mount the golden chariot.

2. Being glad, you made the dawn beam; being glad, you made the sun shine.
   Knowing, observant, you wax strong over all the beauties, o Indra of the golden horses.
3. Heaven with its golden nourishment, Earth with its golden form did Indra hold firm, (and there was) abundant feeding of the two golden ones [=Heaven and Earth], between which the golden one [=Sun] wanders.
4. Once born, the golden bull radiates through the whole luminous realm.
   Having golden horses, he takes the golden weapon, the golden mace into his two arms.
5. Indra (uncovered) the silvery mace glad (in its work), decked out with gleaming (flames?), uncovered the soma pressed with golden stones; he drove out the cows with the golden ones.

III.45 (279) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: bṛhatī

The hymn begins by inviting Indra to "drive here," as is familiar from the previous "journey" hymns in this Indra cycle (e.g., III.41, 42, 43), but it soon turns to a series of striking and elaborate similes and metaphorical identifications glorifying Indra and his gifts. The middle verse (3) contains four separate similes and so, as often, represents the concentrated essence of the hymn.

1. Drive here, Indra, with your gladdening fallow bays, whose hair is (like) peacocks'.
   Let no one hold you down, as men using snares do a bird. Go across them, as if across wasteland.
2. Gnawer of Vṛtra, breaker of Vala, splitter of strongholds, driver of waters, mounter of the chariot, caller of the two fallow bays—Indra is the one who breaks apart even the fastnesses.
3. Your resolve, deep like pools—you foster it, like cows.
   As milk-cows with a good herdsman reach pasturage, as brooks reach a lake, (so your resolves) have reached fulfillment.
4. Bring here to us thrusting wealth, like a share to the one who acknowledges it.
   As a man with a crook shakes a tree for ripe fruit, o Indra, shake (us) goods that will get (us) across.

5. Self-seeking, you are self-ruling, and, along with (the gifts you) allot, exceptionally self-glorious, o Indra.
   Having increased in strength, much-praised one, become the one who most receives our praises.

III.46 (280) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Most of the hymn is devoted to generic praise of Indra, and especially of his immense proportions (see the nicely balanced rhetoric of the middle verse 3). The last verse and a half (4cd, 5) turn to the ritual situation, the early-morning soma-pressing for Indra.

1. Of you, the fighter, the bull, the sovereign king, the strong youth, stalwart, ardent, of the unaging bearer of the mace—great are the manly deeds of you, o Indra, famous and great.
2. You are great, you buffalo, with your bullish powers—winning the spoils, you strong one, overwhelming the others.
   As sole king of all creation, cause the peoples to fight and to dwell in peace.
3. He projects in his dimensions, while shining; he projects on all sides, unopposable by the gods;
   Indra projects with his greatness beyond heaven, beyond earth; projects beyond the great broad atmosphere—he who possesses the silvery drink.
4. Him—broad, deep, over(whelmingly) strong (even) at birth, encompassing all, a well of thoughts—
   Indra—do the pressed soma drinks enter early in the day, like streams the sea.
5. The soma that Heaven and Earth bear, like a mother an embryo, with longing for you, Indra, that do the Adhvaryus impel to you, that do they groom, o bull, for you to drink.

III.47 (281) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This ritually focused hymn is appropriate to the Midday Pressing, where Indra drinks soma in company with the Maruts. Both Indra and the Maruts are named in every verse, and all but the final verse contain an imperative of the verb “drink.” The Maruts’ role in strengthening Indra for his various exploits is treated in verses 3–4.

1. Accompanied by the Maruts, o Indra, as a bull drink the soma after your wont, for joy, for exhilaration.
   Pour the wave of honey into your belly. You are the king of the pressed drinks from olden days.
2. In joint enjoyment, Indra, in joint throng with the Maruts, drink the soma, o champion, as Vṛtra-smasher and knowing one.
   Smash the rivals, push away the despisers. Then make fearlessness for us on all sides.
3. And, seasonable drinker, according to the (right, ritual) seasons take a drink of the soma pressed by us, o Indra, with the gods [=Maruts] as your comrades, the Maruts to whom you gave a share (in the soma), who stood by you: you smashed Vṛtra; they established strength for you.
4. Those who strengthened you at the serpent-smashing, bounteous one, who in the fight with Śambara, who at the quest for cattle, o you of the fallow bays, who as inspired poets applaud you now—o Indra, drink soma in joint throng with the Maruts.
5. Him accompanied by the Maruts, the bull grown strong, not stingy, the heavenly commander—Indra—the all-conquering, mighty giver of strength—him we would invoke here for present help.

III.48 (282) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: triṣṭubh

In this short hymn (four verses, without the refrain) we are given a tantalizing glimpse of Indra’s infancy and what appears to be his youthful rivalry with and outsmarting and overcoming of his father, here as sometimes elsewhere identified with Tvaṣṭar; in these activities he is seemingly abetted by his mother. In this primal scene she offers Indra soma just after his birth, and he, having drunk it, defeats his father and steals the soma. Unfortunately this brief sketch is the fullest and clearest expression of this mythological background. See also IV.18.

1. Immediately on his birth the young bull showed favor to the ritual offering of the pressed stalk.
   Drink—at pleasure, however your (pleasure) is—the first of the somian sap-mixture that brings success.

2. When you were born, on that day in desire for it [=soma] you drank the mountain-abiding beestings of the plant.
   Your mother, the young woman who gave you birth, poured it around for you in the house of your great father for the first time.
3. On approaching his mother, he called for food; he looked upon the sharp soma as his udder.
   Clever, he took care to keep away the others; of manifold countenances, he performed great things himself.
4. Strong, overcoming the powerful, of overwhelming strength—he made his body as he wished.
   Having overwhelmed Tvaṣṭar at his birth, Indra, having stolen the soma, drank it in the cups.
5. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory,
   the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.49 (283) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The first word of this hymn, śáṃsā "I will proclaim" (or possibly 2nd sg. imperative "proclaim!"), sets the tone for the rest, which consists entirely of descriptive glorification (save for the refrain). There are no direct requests, though the praise of his victorious power and of his control of goods implicitly invites the god to exert the same for the singer and his community.

1. I will proclaim great Indra, toward whom all the soma-drinking communities have directed their desire, the very resolute one, fashioned for distinction, whom the two Holy Places [=Heaven and Earth] and the gods begot as the bane of obstacles.
2. The most manly sovereign king, mounted on fallow bays, whom now as before no one overcomes in battles, who along with his warriors is strongest through our fortifying (hymns). He in his broad expansion curtailed the lifetime of the Dasyu.
3. Victorious in battles like an overtaking steed, traversing the two world-halves, streaming abundance.
   Like Bhaga at the decisive moment, he is to be invoked with thoughts; like a father, he is dear, easy to invoke, conferring vigor.
4. As supporter of heaven, of the dusky realm, he is inquired after; erect like a chariot, he is (like) Vāyu teamed with goods.

Illuminator of the nights, generator of the sun, he distributes the share, like the Holy Place [=ritual ground] the prize.

5. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory,
the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.50 (284) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This brief "journey" hymn signals its application to the Midday Pressing by the adjective "accompanied by the Maruts" ending the first half-verse; the usual mention of Indra's horses in journey hymns is also found. In addition to the refrain (vs. 5), verse 4 is also a repetition, of the near final verse of the first Indra hymn in this maṇḍala (III.30.20). Since III.50 is the final hymn in the regular sequence of Indra hymns in III (III.51 is a collection of tr̥cas in various meters; III.52–53 are similarly various), the double repetition seems to act as a ring-compositional device to mark the end of the Indra cycle.

1. At "Svāhā!" let Indra drink, to whom the soma belongs. On coming here, bulging, bullish, accompanied by the Maruts, let him, though (already) of broad extent, become filled with these foods. Might the oblation bring to fulfillment the desire of his body.
2. I yoke for you these two obliging (horses) for speed, whose obedience you favored from olden days.
Here should the fallow bays deposit you, you of good lips. Drink of this pleasing well-pressed (soma).
3. While being hymned, (the horses? priests?) have established (the soma) desirous of mixture with cows [=milk], to nourish Indra, the deliverer, for preeminence.
Becoming invigorated once having drunk the soma, you of the silvery drink, drive together cows in quantity for us.
4. Invigorate this desire with cows, with horses, with recompense in gold, and you will (further) spread it out.
Seeking the sun, the inspired poets, the Kuśikas, have made with their thoughts a (ritual) conveyance for you, for Indra.
5. – For blessing we would invoke bounteous Indra, most manly, at this raid, at the winning of the prize of victory,
the strong one who listens, (we would invoke) for help in battles, him who smashes obstacles, the winner of prizes.

III.51 (285) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
12 verses: jagatī 1–3, triṣṭubh 4–9, gāyatrī 10–12, arranged in tr̥cas

The hymn falls into four sets of tr̥cas, in three different meters. Since the hymn follows one of five verses, each tr̥ca should originally have been a single hymn, to conform to the normal patterns of arrangement within maṇḍalas. However, even if it did consist originally of four separate hymns, the evidence of larger ring composition discussed with regard to III.50 makes it likely that III.51 was an addition to the original Indra collection, which would once have ended with III.50.

The first two tr̥cas consist of standard tropes of praise for Indra, with an emphasis on the songs and singers that express this praise. There are no strong indications of unity within the tr̥cas. The third tr̥ca is devoted to Indra's drinking of soma in company with the Maruts and is thus appropriate to the Midday Pressing, like several other Indra hymns in this maṇḍala (III.32, 35, 47, 50). The final tr̥ca is even more insistently focused on Indra's soma-drinking.

1. The bounteous supporter of the settled domains, worthy of hymns—to Indra have the lofty songs roared—the much-invoked one, having grown strong through well-turned (hymns), immortal, awakening every day.
2. The superior man with a hundred resolves, a flood of powers—my songs approach Indra from all sides—winning spoils, splitting strongholds, swift at crossing the waters, attending to the ordinances, attending closely, finding the sun.
3. The singer seeks admiration from him who distributes goods: Indra gives a friendly reception to his faultless rhythms, for at the seat of Vivasvant [=ritual ground] he finds pleasure. Praise him, victorious in every way, the smasher of hostility.

4. You [=Indra], the most manly of men—you [=singers], recite to the hero forcefully with songs, with hymns.
   Possessing many magical powers, he compacts himself together for might. Reverence is his. From olden days he alone is lord.
5. Many are the tributes to him among mortals; many goods does the earth bear (for him).
   For Indra the heavens, the plants, and the waters guard their wealth, and the lively (streams) and woods.
6. For you the sacred formulations, for you the songs altogether have been established, o Indra of the fallow bays. Enjoy them!
   Become a friend of help right now; o comrade, o good one, establish vigor for the singers.

7. O Indra along with the Maruts, drink the soma here, as you drank of the pressed (soma) beside Śāryāta.
   With your guidance, in your shelter, o champion, the wise poets of good sacrifices seek their win.
8. Eagerly desirous, here drink the soma pressed by us, o Indra, with the Maruts as your comrades—as when all the gods busied themselves around you, just born, for great plunder, o much-invoked one.
9. At the crossing of the waters, o Maruts, he is a friend. They, who give favors, have applauded Indra.
   Together with them let the Vṛtra-gnawer drink the pressed soma in the very seat of the pious worshiper.

10. Because this pressed (drink) is right here at hand with its strength, o lord of benefits, drink of it, o you who long for song.
11. Which(ever soma drink) will suit your nature, halt yourself at that pressing.
    Let it exhilarate you, who deserve the soma.
12. Let it reach to your two cheeks, to your head, Indra, (accompanied) by a sacred formulation—to your two arms, o champion, for (you) to give.

III.52 (286) Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
8 verses: gāyatrī 1–4; triṣṭubh 5, 7–8; jagatī 6

This hymn is also an addition to the Indra collection. Entirely parallel to III.28 (a hymn to Agni), it concerns the offering of a sacrificial cake at each pressing of the soma sacrifice, with each pressing characterized by a different meter. The Morning Pressing is the subject of verses 1–4; the Midday Pressing (amply represented in other hymns of this cycle: see the introduction to III.51) merits only one verse (5), and the Third Pressing is likewise mentioned only once (vs. 6). The remaining two verses appear to have a more general application.

1. (The soma) accompanied by roasted grain, by gruel, by cakes, by hymns—
   Indra, enjoy (this soma) of ours early in the morning.
2. The cooked offering cake—enjoy it, Indra, and welcome it.
   To you do the oblations flow.
3. Our offering cake you shall eat, and you shall take pleasure in our songs, as a bride-seeking man does a maiden.

4. Enjoy our offering cake at the Morning Pressing.
   O Indra famed of old, lofty indeed is your resolve.

5. The roasted grains of the Midday Pressing, the offering cake—Indra, make them your own dear (possessions) here, when the praiser, the singer, (going) forth swift to his task, acting the bull, reverently invokes you with hymns.

6. At the Third Pressing, our roasted grains, our offering cake bepoured (with ghee)—grant them to yourself, much-praised one.
   Might we, dispensing ritual delights, entice you here with our hymnic visions, o poet—you accompanied by the R̥bhus, provided with prizes.

7. We made gruel for you who are accompanied by Pūṣan, roasted grains for you of the fallow bay horses, accompanied by your fallow bays.
   Eat the cake; in joint throng with the Maruts drink the soma, o hero, as Vr̥tra-smasher and knowing one.

8. Bring the roasted grains swiftly toward him, the offering cake for the most virile of men.
   Every day there are (roasted grains) with the same appearance for you, Indra. Let them strengthen you for soma-drinking, daring one.

III.53 (287) Indra, etc.

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
24 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 10, 16; anuṣṭubh 12, 20, 22; gāyatrī 13; br̥hatī 18

This sprawling hymn, a supplement to the Indra collection, consists of at least six different sections in five different meters. There is little or no connection among the parts, which were probably originally independent. However, the whole seems intended to glorify the poet Viśvāmitra and his family, the Kuśikas, as well as his patron, King Sudās, and the Bharatas. Moreover, several of the different parts have clear reminiscences of other hymns in the Indra cycle of this maṇḍala, and so the hymn serves as a sort of summary of the themes of this Indra collection.

The beginning of the hymn (vss. 1–6) is the most conventional part, with its invitation to Indra to come to our ritual with gifts and to drink the soma. The most interesting feature is the mention of the pleasures of wife and home (vss. 4–6) and the envoi to Indra in verse 6, urging him to go home after consuming the soma at our sacrifice. (See also I.82.5–6.) This dismissal seems appropriate to the final hymn of the Indra collection and may in part account for this little hymn being appended here.

The next section (vss. 7–14) is subtly soldered to the first: the final word of verse 6 is dákṣiṇāvat “accompanied by priestly gifts,” while the first phrase of verse 7 is imé bhojā́ḥ “these benefactors”—the word bhojá is used throughout the hymn devoted to the dakṣiṇā (X.106) to refer to the bestowers of the priestly gifts. The whole of this second section concerns the relationship of the poet Viśvāmitra and his family with his patron, King Sudās and his people, the Bharatas, via the mediation of Indra, whose powers the poet can command for the sake of Sudās and his subjects because of his poetic gifts. There are several reminiscences of previous Indra hymns in III. Verse 7, with the patrons compared to the Aṅgirases, recalls the extensive treatment of the Aṅgirases in III.31. Verse 9 gives a synopsis of III.33, in which Viśvāmitra stops the rivers flowing so Sudās and his troops can cross; the name Sudās is mentioned in this story only here. Viśvāmitra’s family, the Kuśikas, are found here in verses 9–11; in III.33.5 he calls himself “the son of Kuśika,” and a repeated verse containing the plural of the name serves as a ring-compositional marker for the whole of the Indra cycle of Maṇḍala III (III.30.20 = III.50.4), as discussed in the introduction to the latter hymn. This section ends with a slighting mention of a rival and apparently non-sacrificing group, whom Indra is urged to subjugate to Sudās and the Bharatas.

The next two verses (15–16) are the most mysterious in the hymn; they both concern a female figure identified as sasarparī́, the formation and etymology of which is unclear and which may either be a proper name or an attributive characterizing adjective. (Our translation, “the squirming, sappy (cow called) Sasarparī,” is a portmanteau containing both adjectives evoked by the phonology and morphology of the word and the proper name; we consider it a multiple semi-pun.) The Anukramaṇī assigns these two verses to Vāc [=“speech”] Sasarparī, and some scholars consider that the figure the embodiment of the Kuśikas’ verbal art. In any case she seems to be responsible for the fame of the people she aids.

The next four verses (17–20) appear to have no connection with the rest of the hymn. They are prayers to deflect various possible catastrophes that might befall a team of oxen and the vehicle they pull on a journey, and wish for safe return. This section reads as if it were a continuation of or expansion on the Zauberspruch at the end of III.33 against potential difficulties afflicting a team and its wagon at a ford.

The final four verses (21–24) are very difficult to interpret. They have traditionally been taken as the expression of the implacable hostility between Viśvāmitra and Vasiṣṭha, which is a staple of later texts (e.g., the Mahābhārata). But there is no whiff of this personal hostility in the R̥gveda, in our opinion, and there is certainly no mention of Vasiṣṭha, direct or indirect, in the verses here. There is, however, hostility: verse 21 calls on Indra to help us defeat our enemy, and the next few verses express in colorful images the impotence of the enemy’s actions and weapons. The most puzzling verse is the final one, where the Bharatas, the people of Sudās, celebrated in verse 12, appear to be presented in an unflattering light. We have no explanation for this.

1. O Indra and "Mountain" [=Indra's mace?], with a lofty chariot convey hither precious nourishments, providing good heroes.
   Pursue the oblations at our ceremonies, o gods. Become strengthened by our hymns, becoming exhilarated on the refreshing drink.
2. Stay just so, bounteous one; don't go away. I will sacrifice to you from the well-pressed soma.
   I grasp your hem like a son his father's—Indra, powerful one—with the sweetest hymn.
3. Let us both recite, Adhvaryu: sing in response to me. Let us both make a vehicle enjoyable to Indra.
   Sit right here on the ritual grass of the sacrificer. And then the hymn will be recited to Indra.
4. Just the wife is the home; she is the womb. Let your yoked fallow bays convey you to it.
   Whenever we will press soma, Agni the messenger will run to you.
5. Drive yon, bounteous one, and drive hither. Brother Indra, in both places there is a goal for you, where there is a resting place for your lofty chariot and unhitching for your prizewinning donkey.
6. You have drunk the soma; drive forth home, Indra: your lovely wife, a great delight, is in your house, where there is a resting place for your lofty chariot and unhitching accompanied by (priestly) gifts for your prizewinner.

7. These benefactors, the Aṅgirases in different form, sons of heaven, heroes of the Lord, giving bounties to Viśvāmitra at the Pressing of a Thousand, lengthen their own lifetime.
8. Form after form the bounteous one assumes, wrapping his own body in tricks, when three times a day he has come here from heaven in an instant, drinking out of turn by (the power of) his own (magic) spells, (though) he possesses the truth.
9. The great seer—god-begotten, god-sped, (though) possessing a man's sight—stayed the river in flood.
   When Viśvāmitra conveyed Sudās (across the rivers), Indra made friends with the Kuśikas.
10. Like geese, you make a signaling call with the pressing stones, becoming exhilarated on hymns at the ceremony when (the soma) is pressed.

You inspired seers who have the sight of men, along with the gods drink the somian honey, you Kuśikas.

11. Come forth, Kuśikas; make yourselves known. Release the horse of Sudās, to (gain) wealth.
    The king will smash the obstacle to the east, to the west, to the north. Then he will sacrifice on the best part of the earth.
12. I who have praised both these two world-halves here and Indra—Viśvāmitra's sacred formulation here guards the Bharata people.
13. The Viśvāmitras have given the formulation to Indra who bears the mace.
    He will make us well rewarded.
14. What do the cows do for you among the Kīkaṭas? They do not milk out the milk mixture; they do not heat the gharma[=hot]-drink.
    Bring here to us the possessions of Pramaganda. Make the descendant of Nīcāśākha subject to us, bounteous one.

15. The squirming, sappy (cow called) Sasarparī, given by the Jamadagnis, banishing neglect, has bellowed loftily.
    (She like) the Daughter of the Sun has stretched (their [=the Jamadagnis']) fame, immortal and unaging, to the gods.
16. The squirming, sappy (cow called) Sasarparī swiftly brought fame to them among the communities of the five peoples, having taken on new life (like Dawn, though) in her winglessness, she whom the Palastis and Jamadagnis gave me.

17. Let the two oxen be steadfast, the axle firm; let the chariot-pole not be torn off, nor the yoke be broken off.
    Let Indra keep the two pātalyas [=pieces of chariot?] from breaking. You with indestructible wheel-rims, escort us.
18. Put power in our bodies, power in our draft-oxen, Indra—power for our kith and kin to live, for you are the giver of power.
19. Engird yourself in the hardwood of the acacia tree; place strength in the śiṃśapā(-wood) in its recoil.
    O Axle, you who are firm and were made firm, stay firm. Don't make us leave off from this journey.
20. Let this Lord of the Forest [=tree] here not leave us behind and not cause us harm.
    (Let there be) well-being all the way to the houses, to the unharnessing, to the unhitching.

21. Indra, with your manifold means of help, which are the best possible ones, quicken us today, bounteous champion.
    Whoever hates us, let him fall low. Whomever we hate, let breath leave him.

22. (Though) he heats his axe all the way through, it's just a śimbala flower he hacks off.
 The ukhā-pot, (though) boiling, boiling over, just throws off foam, o Indra.
23. There is no notice taken of his missile, you people. They lead a lump, thinking it a beast.
 (But) they are not making a non-prizewinner race with a prizewinner, nor leading a donkey before the horses.
24. Are these the sons of Bharata, Indra? They take note of the non-meal, not the meal.
 They spur the alien horse, not their own. At the contest they lead around the one whose prize is (just) a bowstring.

III.54 (288) All Gods

Prajāpati Vaiśvāmitra or Prajāpati Vācya
22 verses: triṣṭubh

This first hymn to the All Gods in this maṇḍala is something of a hybrid, combining two standard approaches to All God hymns. On the one hand, the second half of the hymn (starting with vs. 11) treats these deities as a list, granting a verse each to a number of gods and mentioning their familiar characteristics. This part is relatively straightforward.

The first half, especially verses 2–9, is ostensibly devoted to Heaven and Earth, but, though it begins as a conventional praise of those paired deities, as often in All God hymns the divinity provides a point of departure for speculation on the nature of things and unanswered questions about cosmic matters; see especially the questions in verse 5, at the middle of this self-contained hymn-within-a-hymn. The emphasis on truth and reality and on the discovery of Heaven and Earth (for both themes see vss. 3–4), in combination with the uncertain questions, suggests that the point is that we only gradually and imperfectly discover the real dimensions and nature of the cosmos. The style in this portion is enigmatic, intense, and rhetorically intricate, especially in the climactic verse 9, where Heaven as the divine begetter, and perhaps the single principle, and heaven as a place, the home of the gods to which we also aspire, seem to be referred to simultaneously. This double reference is aided by the ambiguity of the first verb in the verse, ádhy emi, which can mean either "I go upon" or "I study." Verse 10 clearly closes off that part of the hymn and makes the transition to the second part and its list of favored gods.

The hymn begins with a verse to Agni and ends with a verse and a half to him, thus providing a larger ring around the two very different halves.

1. This fortifying (hymn) here have they presented to the great one belonging to the rite, who is to be reverently invoked repeatedly time after time.
   Let him listen to us with his faces belonging to the house; let inexhaustible Agni listen with (his faces) belonging to heaven.
2. I will recite a great (hymn) to great Heaven and to Earth. My desire, seeking, knowing the way, goes (to those two), at the praise of whom the gods, seeking service at the rites, become exhilarated in company with them.
3. Let your truth be real, you two world-halves. Come to the fore for our great welfare.
   Here is homage to Heaven and to Earth, o Agni. I render service with a pleasurable offering; I beg for a treasure.
4. For also the ancient ones, speaking what is real, found you two, you truthful world-halves.
   Also the superior men at the clash, at the contest of champions, extolled you two, o (Heaven and) Earth, as they kept discovering you.
5. Who knows for certain? Who will here proclaim (it)? What is the pathway that leads to the gods?
   Their lowest seats are visible, (but those) that are amid the highest hidden commandments… ?
6. The sage poet, (though) having a man's sight, has looked upon them: the two [=Heaven and Earth], separated but becoming exhilarated (together) in the womb of truth.
   The two have made a seat each for herself as a bird does, (though) being united by a joint purpose.
7. Jointly but kept apart, with their ends at a distance, they have taken their stand in a fixed place, wakeful.
   And (though) they are sisters and young women, they are called opposing names.
8. All these races do the two contain. (Though) supporting the great gods, they do not waver.
   The One is master of all: the moving and the fixed, the walking and the flying, of various sorts, variously born.
9. From afar I tread upon the ancient (path) of old [/study the ancient One of old]: that is our relationship to the great father [=Heaven?], the begetter, where [=in heaven?] the gods, as admirers, in their own ways took their stand within (it) on their (own) broad separate path.
10. This praise here I proclaim, you two world-halves. The tender-hearted ones having Agni as their tongue will hear it—the youthful sovereign kings, Mitra, Varuṇa, the Ādityas, sage poets, extending far and wide.

11. Savitar of the golden hands and the lovely tongue, being master at the rite three times a day—and (when), Savitar, you have set your signal-call among the gods, then impel wholeness to us.
12. Of good action, of good hands, of good aid, truthful—let God Tvaṣṭar establish these things for us for help.
    In company with Pūṣan, o R̥bhus, make yourselves exhilarated. With pressing stones raised, you have fashioned the ceremony.
13. The Maruts with lighting as their chariot, brandishing spears, the young bloods of heaven, born of truth, irrepressible, and Sarasvatī—those worthy of the sacrifice will listen. Confer wealth along with heroes, you powerful ones.
14. The recitations, the chants have gone to Viṣṇu of many wonders as if on a journey of victorious Bhaga—(Viṣṇu) the wide-striding humped (bull), who has many (women). The young mothers-to-be are not neglectful.
15. Indra, being master by virtue of all his heroic powers, filled both world-halves with his greatness, stronghold-splitter, Vr̥tra-smasher, possessor of a bold host. Having massed it together, bring to us here an abundance of livestock.
16. The Nāsatyas, asked about our kinship, are my fathers. Our cherished name is our common birth with the Aśvins.
    Because you are wealth-givers of wealth to us, you keep watch over giving with unstinting (gifts), as undeceivable ones.
17. Great is this cherished name of yours, o poets [=R̥bhus], that you all become "gods" to Indra.
    You are partner with the dear R̥bhus, much-invoked one. (All of you,) fashion this insight here for us to win.
18. Aryaman, Aditi, (all those) worthy of our sacrifice—the commandments of Varuṇa cannot be cheated—
    (all of you,) keep us from coming to childlessness. Let our course be full of offspring and livestock.
19. The messenger of the gods, impelled forth in many forms—let him pronounce us blameless in our entirety.
    Let Earth, Heaven, and the Waters hear us, and the Sun with the heavenly bodies, and the broad midspace.
20. Let the bullish mountains with stable dwelling places hear us, as they become exhilarated on the refreshing drink.
    Let Aditi with the Ādityas hear us. Let the Maruts extend to us beneficial shelter.

21. Let our path be always easy to travel, abounding in food. Gods, saturate the plants with honey.
    (Let there be) a share in your fellowship for me, Agni. You should not be neglectful. Might I reach the seat of wealth consisting in much livestock.
22. Sweeten our oblations, illuminate our refreshments entirely. Mete out full measures of fame in our direction.
    Conquer all our rivals in combat, Agni. Through all the days, shine benevolently on us.

III.55 (289) All Gods

Prajāpati Vaiśvāmitra or Prajāpati Vācya
22 verses: triṣṭubh

The most obvious feature of this hymn is the refrain found in every verse: "great is the one and only lordship of the gods," notable for its emphasis on unity (ékam "one and only" is the final word of each verse) and for the juxtaposition and implied identity of asura(tvám) "lord(ship)" and devā́nām "gods," given that in later Vedic the Asuras and the Devas are locked in eternal enmity. This familiar Vedic mystery of simultaneous unity and diversity is further exemplified by the references to numerous gods (generally unnamed, but usually recognizable), especially in the second part of the hymn, in the manner of many All God hymns.

However, the hymn has a more structured trajectory than most All God list hymns. The first part of the hymn treats the mystery of the birth of Agni; once Agni has been definitively born, Indra comes to the sacrifice as is usual. After three verses situating the action at a re-creation of the primordial early-morning sacrifice and introducing the poet (vss. 1–3), the hymn turns to a mystical description of fire dispersed in many places and hidden in the plants (4–5), and of its parents, the two kindling sticks (4–7), then of fire as it catches after the kindling (8–9) and sends its smoke and flames toward heaven (9–10). The kindling of Agni then takes on both a cosmic and a ritual dimension, as Night and Dawn and then the Dawns alone are identified as the mother(s) of the infant Agni, reflecting, of course, the kindling of the ritual fire at daybreak (11–16). Soon after (17–18) Indra puts in an appearance, coming to the early-morning sacrifice.

Not all the referents are clear in these riddling verses, and in some verses several referents probably lurk beneath the enigmatic phraseology. For example, verse 17 serves as a transition verse between the fire-kindling verses and the appearance of Indra. The bull here could be Agni himself, or Soma (much of the vocabulary is somian), or a prefiguring of Indra. Commentators differ in their identifications, and those given in brackets here are sometimes provisional.

1. Then when the ancient dawns dawned forth, in the track of the cow a great imperishable (syllable) was born [/was discerned], which tends to the commandments of the gods: great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
2. Let not the gods deflect us here, nor the ancient Fathers who know the track [/word], o Agni.
   Between the two seats of the two age-old ones [=Heaven and Earth] is your beacon. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
3. My desires fly apart in many directions, but with my (ritual) labor I illuminate ancient things.
   When Agni has been kindled might we speak only truth: "Great is the one and only lordship of the gods."
4. The common king has been dispersed in many places; he lies in his resting places [=hearths], (spread out) for some distance along the (fire-)logs.
   Another bears the calf; the mother rests peacefully [=the two fire-churning sticks]. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
5. He is dwelling in the older (plants), growing up through the later ones, within the tender ones (even) when they are just born.
   Having (him) within, (though) unimpregnated they give birth to (him). – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
6. He who was lying down far away—now he who has two mothers roams without a binding (rope), their only calf.
   These are the commandments of Mitra and Varuṇa: Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
7. The one with two mothers is the Hotar, the sovereign king at the rites. The top (of him) roams along (the logs), while his base rests peacefully.
   Those who speak delightful (speech) proffer delightful (things). – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
8. His every approach appears right in your face, like that of a champion battling up close.
   The thought acts as go-between to the tribute of the cow [=ghee as oblation]. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
9. The gray messenger [=smoke] keeps bearing down on them [=hearths? plants?]. The great one acts the go-between through the luminous realm.
   Bearing wondrous forms, he looks out upon us. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.

10. Viṣṇu, the cow-protector, protects the highest pen, establishing his own dear, immortal domains.
    Agni knows all these worlds. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
11. The twins [=Night and Dawn] have assumed wondrous forms, each one for herself. One of them shines; the other is black;
    the dusky one and the ruddy one are sisters. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
12. Where the mother and the daughter [also =Night and Dawn], the two sap-yielding milk-cows, give suck jointly,
    I reverently invoke the two within the seat of truth. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
13. Licking the calf [=Agni] of another [=firestick/Night], she [=oblation/Dawn] lows: in what form has the milk-cow deposited her udder?
    Iḍā [/Refreshment] has swelled with the milk of truth. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
14. At her feet she of many shapes [=Dawn] clothes herself in wondrous forms. She stands erect, constantly licking the (calf) three lambing-seasons old.
    I roam through the seat of truth as a knowing one. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
15. Like two footprints set down within the wondrous one [=Agni? ritual ground?], the one of the two is hidden, the other visible [=Night and Dawn].
    Their pathway has a single goal, (but goes) separately. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
16. Let the milk-cows [=Dawns? plants crackling as they burn?] be noisy, those which are without young (yet) sap-yielding, unfailing, not milked out, becoming young ever anew. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
17. Though the bull goes about roaring within the one (herd of) cows, he deposits his seed in the other herd.
    For he is the earth-protector; he is the apportioner; he is king. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
18. The hero's abundance of horses we will proclaim just now, o people. The gods know of it.
    Yoked sixfold, five after five they convey (Indra) hither. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
19. God Tvaṣṭar, the impeller providing all forms, flourishes; he has begotten offspring in great quantity, and all these creatures here are his. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.

20. He [=Indra?] has raised up together the two great bowls (to be) united. Both of them are crammed with his goods.
    The hero is famed for finding goods. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
21. And he who suckles all of us [=Agni] dwells peacefully on this earth here, like a king with established alliances, stationed in front like heroes stationed for protection. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.
22. The plants and the waters offer tribute to you; the earth bears wealth for you, Indra.
    May we be your comrades, sharing in the valuables. – Great is the one and only lordship of the gods.

III.56 (290) All Gods

Prajāpati Vaiśvāmitra or Prajāpati Vācya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Another enigmatic and mystical All God hymn, with its mysteries, as so often, couched in numerological terms, primarily as threes or multiples of three. In the earlier parts of the hymn these numbers seem to refer to cosmic entities—perhaps, for example, the three heavens and three earths making up the six in verse 2—and to cosmic creation, though the details are far from clear. But the number three takes a strongly ritual turn beginning with verse 5, referring to three daily rites, that is, to the three pressings of the soma sacrifice. Thus the poet implicitly identifies ritual structure with cosmic structure.

1. Neither the tricky ones nor the clever transgress these: steadfast are the foremost commandments of the god.
   Neither the two world-halves without deceit nor the mountains standing fast are to be bowed down by knowing wiles.
2. Six burdens does the One, unmoving, bear. The cows have approached the highest truth.
   Three great females stand below, as steeds: two were deposited in hiding; one has become visible.
3. The bull of all forms [=Tvaṣṭar?] has three groins and three udders, with offspring in great quantity; having three faces, he is master [/husband], possessing great force. The bull is the inseminator of each and every female.
4. In a flash the trail-blazer for these (waters) has awakened—I have invoked the dear name of the Ādityas—
   Even the heavenly waters came to a stop for him. Proceeding in separate directions, they bent around him.

5. Three times three are the seats of the poets, o rivers, and the sovereign king at the rites [/in the (cosmic) divisions] [=Agni] has three mothers.
   Three are the truthful watery maidens, who act the master at the rite three times a day.
6. Three times a day, every day, o Savitar, impel valuables to us, three times daily.
   Threefold riches and goods impel here. O Bhaga, o Protector, o Holy Place, position (them) for winning.
7. Three times a day Savitar keeps impelling (and?) the two kings, Mitra and Varuṇa, of good hands.
   Even the waters, even the two broad world-halves beg for his treasure, for Savitar to impel it.
8. Threefold are the highest realms of light, difficult to reach; (there?) rule/shine three heroes of the Lord.
   Truthful, vigorous, difficult to deceive—three times a day let the gods be at the rite.

III.57 (291) All Gods

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn depicts the beginning of the morning ritual, with the recitation of praise poetry, the yoking of the pressing stones, and the kindling of the fire. The poet puts himself at the center of this activity, opening the hymn with a vivid image depicting his own inspiration as an untethered cow producing abundantly.

1. He who has sifted through has found my inspired thought—a milk-cow, roaming for some distance without a cowherd, who just in a single day has given milk in abundance from her wellspring. So Indra and Agni (and other gods) are admirers of her—
2. As are Indra and Pūṣan, the two bulls with dexterous hands. The (cows [=poems]), well treated, give unfailing milk like that of Heaven.
   When all the gods take pleasure in her, might I reach your benevolence there, o good ones.
3. The sisters who seek the potency of the bull [=Agni], they recognize their embryo in him and do homage.
   The milk-cows, bellowing, proceed powerfully toward their child who bears wondrous forms.
4. I invite the two well-fixed world-halves, as I yoke the pressing stones at the ceremony with my inspired thought.
   These (Dawns? flames?) of yours here, abounding in valuables for Manu, stand erect, visible and worthy of the sacrifice.

5. Your tongue, honeyed, very wise, wide spreading, which is proclaimed (even) among the gods, o Agni, with it make all those worthy of the sacrifice sit here for our help and make them drink the honeyed (drinks).
6. What of yours will swell inexhaustible and shimmering like the stream of a mountain, god Agni, that solicitude grant to us and your grace destined for all people, good Jātavedas.

III.58 (292) Aśvins

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins on a note of mystery, since the identities of the milk-cow, the "age-old (semen)," and the son of the priestly gift are unclear. The latter half of verse 1 describes the early morning, and therefore our view is that the first half does as well. We take the cow as the Dawn, whose milk is light, or possibly the hymn sung at dawn, and this milk arises from the semen (see III.31.10 for the ellipsis) that is the fire of Agni or the sun or, less likely, soma. Agni, the son of the dakṣiṇā, the priestly gift that may be actually or metaphorically a cow, is a "go-between," either as a messenger who encourages the morning or as one who goes between heaven and earth. Intricacy then replaces mystery in the second verse. In 2c, asmát, "because of us" or "from us," may be construed with "awaken" or perhaps secondarily with "away"—"We have put the poetic inspiration of the miser away (from us)." In 2d cakr̥ma "we have put" should be construed twice with two preverbs and, as Geldner has pointed out, ā́ "here" can be construed with the two verbs it stands between.

The remainder of the hymn is neither as mysterious nor as intricate as these opening verses. It becomes a plea for the Aśvins to appear at the early-morning soma-pressing, riding in their chariot, which is the sound of the hymns that carry the Aśvins to the sacrificial site.

In verse 6 Jahnāvī probably refers to the "wife of Jahnu," who is the father or ancestor of Viśvāmitra according to the Brāhmaṇas, although others have taken it as the name of the clan of Jahnu (Geldner) or as a name of the Ganges (Pirart 2001: 91). If the former, perhaps the poet reminds the Aśvins of the wealth that was with his family in the past in his wish to renew this friendship with them and their support for him.

1. The milk-cow [=Dawn?] is yielding the desirable milk of the age-old (semen); the son [=Agni] of the priestly gift acts as go-between.
   She whose course is beautiful carries brightness here; the praise song of Dawn has awakened the Aśvins.

2. In good harness, the ritual offerings—they come to be high above!— carry you two like parents back here by the truth.
   Awaken because of us! We have put the poetic inspiration of the miser away (from us) and put here the help of you two. Travel here this way.
3. With your well-harnessed horses and smooth-rolling chariot, wondrous ones, hear this signal call of the pressing stone.
   Is it not true that the inspired poets born long ago have said that you are the first to respond to trouble, Aśvins?
4. Turn your thought here, come here somehow in your usual way—all peoples call upon the Aśvins—for like allies they [=the priests] have given this honey, foaming with cows [=milk], to you at the beginning of the reddening (dawn).
5. Even across many airy spaces, Aśvins, the song (travels) among the peoples, generous ones.
   Travel here along the paths leading to the gods. Wondrous ones, these stores of honey belong to you two.
6. Your home is old, your companionship benevolent, and yours the wealth at (the house of) the wife of Jahnu, you men.
   Creating once again your benevolent companionship for ourselves, now united together, we would find exhilaration through the honey.
7. O well-skilled Aśvins, youthful ones, together with the Wind and along with your teams, drink the day-old soma, taking pleasure and never faltering, o Nāsatyas who bring good gifts.
8. O Aśvins, ample refreshments have sped around you two, aligning themselves with the songs and never faltering.
   Your chariot, born of truth and hastened by pressing stones, travels around heaven and earth in a day.
9. O Aśvins, the soma that is yours, the best of honeyed pressings—drink it and come to our house!
   Your chariot, again and again creating many a beautiful form, is the first to come to the appointed place of the soma-offerer.

III.59 (293) Mitra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
9 verses: triṣṭubh 1–5, gāyatrī 6–9

Mitra is usually invoked along with Varuṇa; this is the only hymn in the R̥gveda to Mitra alone. Here he is addressed as the god of alliances who “organizes” the peoples (vss. 1, 5), that is, who oversees the agreements, treaties, marriages, and other forms of alliance by which people assume relationships with one another. Just as the human king must abide by and protect such relationships, so Mitra as a divine king provides divine sanction for them. The first verse underscores the nature of Mitra and plays on the appellative sense of mitrá "alliance." It means both that the god of alliances arranges people when he is addressed and that an alliance arranges people when it is pronounced. This hymn marks the birth of an alliance, figured in verse 4 as the birth of Mitra himself at this time and in this place. The hymn does not say what kind of alliance has been born, but one possibility, suggested especially in the final two verses, is that it is the reciprocal alliance between gods and humans established through the sacrifice. In this alliance humans empower the gods through their praises and offerings, and the gods are expected to reciprocate by prospering humans.

This hymn has been the subject of a close study by Thieme (1957: 38–59).

1. Mitra arranges the peoples when (Alliance) is declared. Mitra upholds earth and heaven.
   Mitra watches over the nations with unblinking eye. To Mitra offer an offering of ghee.
2. He who strives according to your commandment, o Mitra—let that mortal, bringing pleasing offerings, be at the fore, o Āditya.
   Helped by you, he is not crushed, nor is he conquered. No distress reaches him from near nor from afar.
3. Free from disease, being invigorated through libation, with knees firm on the earth's expanse, abiding under the commandment of the Āditya, we would be in Mitra's good favor.
4. Here Mitra, to be revered and very kind, has been born as a king of excellent dominion and a ritual adept.
   We would be in the good favor of him, who is worthy of the sacrifice, and in his propitious benevolence.
5. The great Āditya is to be approached with reverence—he who arranges the peoples, who is very kind to the one singing praise.
   For him the most wonderful, for Mitra, offer this pleasing offering into the fire.
6. The help of the god Mitra, who maintains the separate territories, brings gain; his brilliance holds bright renown.
7. Wide-ranging Mitra, who surmounts heaven through his greatness and earth through his renown—
8. To Mitra with his power to dominate do the five peoples submit;
   he bears all the gods.
9. Among the gods and the Āyus, for the person who has plaited the ritual grass, Mitra has created refreshments that carry his desirable commandments.

III.60 (294) Ṛbhus and Indra

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
7 verses: jagatī

The hymn announces that the present priests have recovered the skills of the Ṛbhus by which, although born as human "children of Manu" (vs. 3), they attained divinity (vs. 2), immortality (vs. 3), and, like the gods, a share of the sacrifice (vs. 1). The "form" that the Ṛbhus adopt in verse 1 may be the divine form they have earned. In verses 4–6 the poet turns to Indra and asks him to come to the soma-pressing along with the Ṛbhus, now fully divine, and to drink the soma in the company of the Ṛbhus. Because Indra and the Ṛbhus are traveling by chariot, the poet deploys the imagery of prizewinning racehorses throughout these last verses. He even calls the Ṛbhus themselves "prizewinners" in verse 7, though this metaphor is anticipated by vā́javant in verses 5 and 6. "Vāja" is the name of one of the Ṛbhus, so on one level this means that Vāja is in the company of the other Ṛbhus, but it also means that the Ṛbhus, since they ride in Indra's chariot, are or will be accompanied by the prize of victory.

1. In one place and another, by their thought and family relationship, by their knowledge, o men, the fire-priests have arrived at these things:
 the craft by which, o sons of Sudhanvan, you have attained a sacrificial share, rapidly adopting a (different) form;
2. The ability by which you carved the cups; the insight by which you made the cow to flow (milk) from the hide;
 the thought by which you fashioned the two fallow bays—by (all) that, o Ṛbhus, you fully attained divinity.
3. The Ṛbhus attained the companionship of Indra. The artisans, the children of Manu, raced.
 The sons of Sudhanvan rose to immortality by applying themselves to their labors, ritually acting well by good ritual action.
4. You travel on the same chariot with Indra when the soma is pressed, and then you become joined with the splendor of your wishes.
 Your good ritual acts are not to be equaled, o chanters, sons of Sudhanvan, Ṛbhus, nor your heroic deeds.
5. O Indra, together with the Ṛbhus bringing the Prize of Victory [=Vāja], drench yourself in the soma pressed and sprinkled in the hands (of the priests).
 Urged on by insight, o generous one, become exhilarated in the house of the pious one together with the sons of Sudhanvan, those superior men.
6. O Indra, along with the Ṛbhus bringing the Prize of Victory [=Vāja], become exhilarated here at this soma-pressing of ours, along with your ability, o much-praised one.

These pastures [=soma rites?] have offered themselves to you according to the commandment of the gods and the (ritual) foundations of Manu.

7. O Indra, together with the Ṛbhus, with the prizewinners, racing to the prize, travel here to the ritually right praise of the singer with your hundred invigorating intentions for Āyu, since you have a thousand stratagems at the rite's invocation.

III.61 (295) Dawn

Viśvāmitra Gāthina
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The only hymn dedicated to Dawn in Maṇḍala III, it combines the usual themes: the beauty of the young goddess, her relation to the morning ritual and the ritual fire, and her role as giver of rich goods because of the distribution of priestly gifts at the Morning Pressing. Note that halfway through the hymn (beginning with vs. 4), the direct 2nd-person address to Dawn changes to 3rd-person description. This change may mirror the development of the ritual: first the poet coaxes Dawn to appear, and when his pleas have been successful (the vocatives of the first verses are in part replaced by aorists and perfects of the immediate past), he turns his attention to the ritual her appearance has set in motion.

1. O Dawn, prize-giver with a rich prize, bounteous—as a discerning one enjoy the praise of the singer.
O goddess, as a young woman from of old, as Plenitude you proceed according to your commandment, you who bring all valuables.
2. O goddess Dawn, as immortal one radiate widely, possessing a gleaming chariot, arousing liberalities.
Let your horses, easy to control, convey you hither—you of golden color, they who have broad flanks.
3. O Dawn, facing all beings, you stand erect as the beacon of the immortal one.
As you make your progress to the same goal (as the older dawns), roll yourself hither like a wheel, you newer one.
4. Like one letting the reins go slack [?], bounteous Dawn drives, mistress of good pasture.
Generating the sun, she of good portion and wondrous power stretches all the way to the end of heaven and of earth.
5. To the goddess Dawn, radiating widely, proffer your well-twisted (hymn) with reverence.
The honey-bringer has propped her leading edge upward in heaven. She of delightful aspect has shone forth through the shining realms.

6. The truthful (daughter) of Heaven has been awakened by our chants [/been perceived with her rays]. The wealthy lady has brightly mounted the two world-halves.
   Agni, you go begging Dawn for valuable property as she comes hither, radiating widely.
7. Driving (the cows) of the Dawns on the foundation of truth, the bull [=Sun?] has entered the two great world-halves.
   Great is the magic power of Mitra and Varuṇa. As the shimmering (Dawn) has spread her radiance, it [=magic power] is spread widely in many places.

III.62 (296) Various Gods

Viśvāmitra Gāthina (1–15); Viśvāmitra or Jamadagni (16–18)
18 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, gāyatrī 4–18, arranged in tr̥cas

This, the last hymn in the maṇḍala, consists of eighteen verses, which should put it out of sequence. However, it falls naturally into tr̥cas, and probably originally consisted of six three-verse hymns dedicated severally to Indra and Varuṇa (1–3), Br̥haspati (4–6), Pūṣan (7–9), Savitar (10–12), Soma (13–15), and Mitra and Varuṇa (16–18).

In general the tr̥cas are relatively straightforward, even banal, but the first verse of the first tr̥ca is rhetorically dense and striking in imagery. It seems to suggest that our hymns, though they appear to be frenetically active, have lost their effectiveness, and therefore Indra and Varuṇa have ceased to act on behalf of their humans praisers and worshipers. It may not be entirely fanciful to conjecture that the simple, even simplistic, style of the remaining tr̥cas is an attempt to replace the "whirlwinds" of verbal art (of which there is much in Maṇḍala III) with a meeker and less ostentatious style.

The most notable feature of this hymn is the fact that the first verse of the fourth tr̥ca, dedicated to Savitar (vs. 10), is the famous "Gāyatrī mantra," with which orthodox Hindus begin their morning worship even today. In the context of R̥gvedic poetry, it must be said that the contents and form of this verse are not particularly striking. As was just suggested, this may in fact be its point.

1. These (hymns) here for you two, (though) they are considered whirlwinds, have become ones that cannot be (successfully) brandished (even?) by one devoted to you two.
   Where is this glory of yours, Indra and Varuṇa, with which you are wont to carry the gear for your comrades?
2. This (man) here, latest of many, seeking wealth, keeps calling on you two time after time for help.
   Indra and Varuṇa, in concert with the Maruts, with Heaven and with Earth, listen to my call.

3. May there be goods for us, o Indra and Varuṇa; wealth in hale heroes for us, o Maruts.
   Let the Shielding Goddesses aid us with their shelters; (let) Hotrā Bhāratī (help) us with her priestly gifts.

4. Bṛhaspati belonging to the All Gods, enjoy our oblations.
   Grant treasures to the pious man.
5. To blazing Bṛhaspati give reverence with recitations at the ceremonies—his unbowed power I desire—
6. To the bull of the settled domains, having all forms, undeceivable, Bṛhaspati worthy to be chosen.

7. Here is a lovely praise hymn, utterly new, for you, Pūṣan, glowing god.
   It is recited by us to you.
8. Enjoy this hymn of mine—help our insight that seeks the prize—like a bride-seeking (man) a maiden.
9. He who looks at all creatures separately and sees them whole, that one, Pūṣan will become our helper.

10. Might we make our own that desirable effulgence of god Savitar, who will rouse forth our insights.
11. Seeking the prize, we beg for the generosity of Bhaga, along with the plenitude of god Savitar.
12. To god Savitar do the men, the inspired poets, give reverence with sacrifices and well-twisted hymns, when impelled by insight.

13. Soma proceeds, finding the way; he goes to a rendezvous with the gods, to sit in the womb of truth.
14. Soma—for us, for the two-footed, and for the four-footed livestock, he will make refreshments that bring no disease.
15. Increasing our lifetime, overcoming hostilities,
    Soma has sat on the seat.

16. Mitra and Varuṇa, sprinkle our pastureland with ghee, the realms with honey, you of good resolve.
17. Widely proclaimed, increasing through reverence, you rule by the greatness of your skill through the longest (spaces? times?), you of blazing commandments.
18. Being hymned by Jamadagni, sit in the womb of truth.
    Drink the soma, you two increasing through truth.

IV

Maṇḍala IV

The IVth Maṇḍala is the product of the Vāmadeva family, with almost all of its fifty-eight hymns attributed to the eponymous clan poet himself, Vāmadeva (Gautama). The numbers of Agni and Indra hymns are roughly equivalent (Agni 1–15; Indra 16–32), but the Indra hymns are the more striking, and Indra is really the dominant god of the maṇḍala. The Indra sequence contains both the famous treatment of Indra's birth (IV.18), with dialogue between him and his mother while he is still in the womb, and the almost equally famous hymn pair (IV.26–27) treating the theft of soma from heaven—along with hymns lacking fame but repaying attention like IV.16 and 24. The important dialogue between Indra and Varuṇa (IV.42) is also found in this maṇḍala, and Indra is addressed jointly with Varuṇa also in IV.41, with Vāyu in 46–47, and with Bṛhaspati in 49–50.

Moreover, a particular preoccupation in the Agni hymns is the Vala myth, which is more properly an Indra (/Bṛhaspati) narrative. Especially noteworthy in the Agni cycle is IV.5, an enigmatic hymn meditating on the craft of poetry.

Maṇḍala IV also contains a sequence of five hymns dedicated to the Ṛbhus (33–37), the most sustained treatment of these gods in the Ṛgveda and fundamental to our understanding of their ritual and mythological nature. Other minor gods are recessive in the maṇḍala, however.

The transcendent racehorse Dadhikrā is the recipient of three hymns (38–40). The final two hymns, 57 and 58, are unique in the Ṛgveda. The first is dedicated to agricultural gods, a striking departure for a text that focuses on stock-breeding and barely mentions agriculture, and the second celebrates the ritual substance ghee (melted butter), a material offering fundamental to the ritual but meriting only one hymn in the Ṛgveda, as opposed to the many allotted to its parallel substance soma.

IV.1 (297) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
20 verses: triṣṭubh, except aṣṭi 1, atijagatī 2, dhṛti 3

This long and complex hymn contains an important account of the Vala myth: the opening of the cave containing the imprisoned cows and their release. Although the hero of this myth is, of course, ordinarily Indra, he does not appear in the hymn, even in disguised fashion. Instead, the troop that usually aids him in this exploit, the Aṅgirases, receive all the credit, though they are not mentioned by name. The absence of Indra can presumably be ascribed to the fact that this is a hymn to Agni; the larger question is why the Vala myth is appropriate to an Agni hymn. Here the answer must be the connection of both gods with the dawn: the ruddy Vala cows are regularly identified as the dawns, and the ritual fire is kindled at dawn. Indeed the Vala myth in this hymn is introduced by a reference to Agni's primordial birth (vs. 11), and the (unnamed) Aṅgirases are identified as his begetters (vs. 12): perhaps they free the embryonic Agni enclosed "in the nest of the bull" (vss. 11–12) as they do the Vala cows. We have seen the connection between the birth of the ritual fire and the Vala myth elsewhere, for example, in III.31, an Indra hymn, where it was also mediated by dawn.

The Vala myth is embedded within verses more conventionally devoted to Agni. The first five verses address Agni directly. He is first reminded of his original installation by the gods and their purpose in so doing (vs. 1), and in the next four verses Agni is urged to use his closeness to Varuṇa in order to intercede for us mortals with that god. The next four verses praise Agni in the 3rd person, concentrating on his present state. Verses 10–12 form the transition to the Vala myth; in fact verse 10 might seem to go naturally with 6–9, but, with its reference to the treasure of the gods, it forms a ring with verse 18, which closes the Vala section. The heart of the Vala narrative consists of verses 13–17. The final two verses (19–20) provide a summarizing praise of Agni.

1. You, o Agni, the god, did the gods of equal fervor install for always as the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice)— with such a purpose did they install you: [Gods addressing mortals:] "Sacrifice to the immortal [=Agni] among the mortals; beget the god god-directed and discerning; beget each one [=every new fire] as god-directed and discerning."
2. Agni, turn here to your brother Varuṇa, to the gods with your favor—to him who yearns for sacrifice, your oldest (brother) who yearns for sacrifice, the truthful son of Aditi who supports the settled domains, the king who supports the settled domains.
3. O comrade, turn to your comrade, like a wheel to a swift (horse), like chariotry at speed,
   for us, o wondrous one, at speed.
   Agni, you (will) find grace in company with Varuṇa, with the all-radiant Maruts.
   To press out progeny, o blazing one, make luck; for us, wondrous one,
   make luck.
4. You, Agni, knowing one—for us may you please placate through prayer the anger of god Varuṇa.

As best sacrificer, best conveyor (of oblations), constantly blazing, release all hatreds from us.

5. You, Agni, come down close to us with your help; be nearest to us at the breaking of this dawn.
   Through sacrifice placate Varuṇa for us, as you give to us. Pursue his grace; be easy for us to invoke.
6. Of this well-portioned god here his manifestation is the fairest, the most brilliant one among mortals.
   Gleaming like the heated ghee of the inviolable (cow), (the manifestation) of the god is eagerly sought like the largesse of a milk-cow.
7. Three times do these highest births of his come into existence—the eagerly sought births of the god Agni.
   Enveloped within the limitless, he has come here—a blazing flame, ever shining for the stranger.
8. As messenger he strives toward all seats, the Hotar whose chariot is golden, whose tongue is amid the pleasures [=oblations], whose horses are ruddy, he wondrous, far-radiant, always pleasurable like a banquet abounding in food.
9. He makes men perceive [=instructs them], as their tie to the sacrifice of Manu; they lead him forth with a great halter.
   He dwells peacefully in his houses, assuring success; the god attains the fellowship of the mortal.
10. Let Agni, knowing (the way), lead us to the treasure, which was apportioned to him by the gods.
    (The treasure) which all the immortals created with their insight, which Father Heaven as begetter (created)—(that) they sprinkled (so it became) real.
11. He was born first in the dwelling places, at the base of this great realm, as his womb, footless, headless, concealing his two ends, continually retracting (his limbs [=flames]), in the nest of the bull.
12. The troop [=Aṅgirases] set forth first amid admiration to the womb of truth, to the nest of the bull—
    The eagerly sought youth, wondrous, far-radiant [=Agni]—the seven dear ones [=Aṅgirases or their music] begat (him) for the bull.
13. Our forefathers here, belonging to Manu, stationed themselves in front, panting over the truth.
    They [=the forefathers/Aṅgirases] drove up those with a rock as their pen, the good milkers within the cave, the ruddy dawns being called to.
14. They [=the forefathers/Aṅgirases] cleaned themselves, after having split the stone. This (deed) of theirs the others proclaimed all about.

Lacking ropes to hold the livestock, they sang the decisive act: "They found the light! They sought it with their insightful thoughts!"

15. Those with their mind set on cattle (opened up) the solid, knotted-up, enclosing stone that held the cows.
    The firmly fixed pen full of cows did the men, the fire-priests, open up with divine speech.
16. They brought to mind the first name of the milk-cow; thrice seven highest (names) of the mother they found.
    (The cows) recognizing it [=the name], bellowed out (to the men), (like) maidens (announcing their bridegroom choice). The ruddy one [=Dawn] became manifest with the glorious (name) of the cow.
17. The bilious darkness disappeared; heaven lightened; the radiance of the goddess Dawn arose.
    The Sun mounted the lofty fields, looking upon the straight and the crooked among mortals.
18. And then afterward having awakened they looked about; and then they held up the treasure apportioned by heaven—all the gods (did so) in all the houses. O Mitra, Varuṇa—let it [=treasure] come into existence (also) for our insightful thought.
19. I would call here blazing Agni as Hotar, the best sacrificer who carries all burdens.
    He drilled, seemingly, the gleaming udder of the cows, which was purified like the stalk of the plant poured in circles [=soma].
20. As the Aditi of all those worthy of the sacrifice [=gods], the guest of all the sons of Manu [=men], let Agni Jātavedas, choosing the aid of the gods, become very gracious.

IV.2 (298) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
20 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn shares a number of features, including phraseology, with the previous one: like IV.1 it begins with the installation of Agni as the mediator of the sacrificial exchange between men and gods, and it contains a brief, Indra-less account of the Vala myth (vss. 15–17), with the Aṅgirases explicitly compared to the poets of today besieging the treasure-holding pen of the sacrifice. However, the first few verses of the hymn (vss. 2–4) enlarge on Agni's role as messenger announced in verse 1. The hymn also contains an elaborate treatment (vss. 6–10, 13–14) of the various ritual services rendered to Agni by the sacrificers, and Agni is urged to distinguish between those who do such service and other mortals (esp. vss. 11–12). The final two verses (19–20) summarize the fire-worship that has just been performed by the sacrificers, both actions ("we have performed," vs. 19) and words ("we have spoken," vs. 20), a common hymn-ending device. Preceding them is a mysterious verse (18), whose position suggests that it closes the Vala myth, but whose content seems at least superficially unconnected.

1. He who has been installed as the immortal among the mortals, the god among the gods, the truthful one, the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice), Hotar, best sacrificer—to blaze with his greatness, to be roused by the oblations of Manu: Agni.
2. O son of strength, o Agni, created here for us today, between both created (peoples [=men and gods]) you shuttle as messenger, o high one, having yoked your (horses) with their testicles stretched out (behind from speed), (the horses) bullish and blazing.
3. The two chestnut steeds of truth, strong(-backed), ghee-backed, I consider to be swiftest (even in comparison) with mind.
   Yoking these two ruddy ones, you shuttle between (all of) you gods and the clans here, the mortals.
4. Among those (gods), convey Aryaman, Varuṇa, Mitra, Indra and Viṣṇu, the Maruts, and the Aśvins just here, to the person providing good oblations, o Agni—you who have good horses, good chariot, good rewards.
5. O Agni, a sacrifice bringing cows, sheep, horses, and manly comrades is never to be spurned.
   Bringing refreshment and progeny, o Lord, it is long wealth, broad of base, fit for the assembly.
6. Whoever will bear fuel to you though sweating, or will scorch his head in serving you, for him you will become a self-powerful protector, Agni. Make for him wide protection from everyone who bears malice.
7. Whoever will bring food to you just as you seek food, will whet (you) down, will raise (you) up as the gladdening guest, will, seeking the gods, kindle (you) here in his dwelling—in him let wealth, rich in gifts, be steadfast.
8. Whoever at evening, whoever at dawn will celebrate you, or offering an oblation will make you a dear (friend) in his own house—like a horse with much spurring you will carry that pious man out of narrow straits.
9. Whoever will perform pious service for you, Agni, the immortal one, whoever, with his offering ladle raised, will offer friendly service to you, that one, having labored to exhaustion, will not stay distant from wealth, nor will the narrow straits of the malicious enclose him.

10. Whose ceremony you will enjoy, Agni—a god enjoying the well-positioned ceremony of a mortal, while you give—just his ritual offering will be pleasing, o youngest one—(the man) whose strengtheners we will be when he does (you) honor.
11. Insight and lack of insight will the knowing one [=Agni] distinguish, like backs, straight and crooked, (like) mortals.
And for the sake of wealth and good descendants for us, o god, both grant Diti [/Giving] and make wide space for Aditi [/Boundlessness].
12. The poet [=Agni] have the undeceivable poets instructed, fixing him down fast in the houses of Āyu.
From there, Agni, you should look with your eyes upon those who are easily seen and upon the unerring ones (who go) along the ways of the stranger.
13. You, Agni, offering good guidance, to the cantor, to the one with pressed soma who does honor, o youngest one, bring a treasure, broad and gleaming—to the one who labors to exhaustion, to help him, o excitable one, you who fill the settled domains.
14. Then while we [=sacrificing priests] have acted, with feet, with hands, with bodies, in serving you, Agni, like those making a chariot with the work of (our/their) two arms, those of good insight [=poets] have held fast to the truth, panting over it.
15. Then as the seven inspired poets might we be born from mother Dawn, as the foremost ritual adepts for men.
Might we become sons of heaven, Aṅgirases. Might we break the rock that holds the prize, as we blaze.
16. Then like our further forefathers of old, panting over the truth, o Agni, those reciting solemn speech (now) will come to the blazing (udder of sacrifice [=Vala]), to visionary power. Splitting (heaven and) earth, they (will) unclose the ruddy (cows [=dawns]).
17. Those of good work and good light, seeking the gods, smelting the races of the gods like metal, they went blazing, strengthening Agni and Indra, besieging the cattle pen.
18. He [=Agni?] watched over them like (a herdsman) the herds of livestock in a cattle-rich (pasture)—watched over the race of gods that was nearby, o strong one.
The Urvaśīs yearned also for (the race of) men, also for the increase of the stranger, of Āyu to come.
19. We have acted for you; we have been good workers—(as) the radiant dawns have clothed themselves in truth—we always grooming in many ways unfailing Agni, beautifully gleaming, the dear eye of the god.

20. These solemn speeches have we spoken to you the poet, o Agni, you ritual adept: enjoy them.
    Blaze up; make us better off. Extend to us great riches, o you of many favors.

IV.3 (299) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
16 verses: triṣṭubh

In the very last verse of this hymn (16) the poet announces that he has produced counsels, enigmas, secret words, and poetry for Agni: these verbal products presumably make up the rest of the hymn. It begins fairly straightforwardly, however, with a treatment (vss. 1–3) of the kindling of the ritual fire, as so often at the beginning of Agni hymns. But starting with verse 4 a certain worried tone becomes apparent, about the relationship between the poet and the god Agni. The next four verses (5–8) contain anxious questions: what is Agni planning to say to various gods about us? These questions reflect the uncertainty produced by the ritual model: Agni is the ritual mediator between men and gods, and so in some sense everything the gods learn about us mortals is filtered through Agni, who may be—we worry—an unreliable witness. The anxiety returns in verses 13–14, especially the former, in which the poet worries that Agni will punish him for the deeds of his relatives and acquaintances. In between (vss. 9–12) are four verses, each beginning with the charged word ṛténa "by truth," introducing a mixture of ritual and mythic activities, including one verse (11) on the Vala myth, a preoccupation of the Agni hymns in IV.

What ties the various parts of the hymn together is not entirely clear, and it may be that the poet's final verse, listing several types of verbal material, is meant to indicate that the hymn consists of a disparate collection of his works, although attempting to assign those labels to the different parts of the hymn would probably be taking the conceit too far.

1. Make [=ignite] him here, the king, the Rudra of your ceremony, the Hotar whose sacrifice comes true in the two world-halves, Agni of golden form—(make him) for help for you in the face of unexpected thundering.
2. Here is the womb that we made for you. (It is/You are) like an eager wife, richly dressed, for her husband.
   Enveloped, sit down facing our way: here are (hymns) facing you, o very knowing one.
3. To him [=Agni] who listens undistracted to the thought, to the one drawing the gaze of men, the very gracious one—o ritual adept—to the god, the immortal, chant the chant, the god whom the (human) presser invokes like the honey-pressing pressing stone.

4. Agni, at least become aware of this (ritual) labor of ours, of (our expression of) truth, o perceiver of truth, as one who is very concerned.
   When will our solemn words become your feasting companions? When will your fellowship (come to) be in our house?
5. How will you complain about this to Varuṇa, o Agni, how to Heaven? What is our offense?
   How will you speak to Mitra the rewarder, to Earth? What to Aryaman, to Fortune?
6. What (will you say), Agni, having grown strong on the holy places [=ritual hearths], what to the Wind projecting strength, charging to beauty,
   (what) to the earth-circling (chariot) of the Nāsatyas, for it to appear? What will you say, Agni, to man-smiting Rudra?
7. How (will you speak) to great Pūṣan who brings prosperity, what to Rudra, the good combatant [/very generous], for him to give the oblation, what to wide-striding Viṣṇu, (for him to give) semen? What will you say, Agni, to (Rudra's) lofty arrow?
8. How (will you speak) to the troop of Maruts, for truth? How to the lofty Sun? When you are asked,
   (how) will you answer to Aditi, to powerful (Indra?)? Send (our thought) to its goal, all the way to heaven—(you are) the observant one, o Jātavedas.
9. With truth I reverently invoke the (mystical) truth set down [=acquired] from the cow: the raw one [=cow] and the cooked, honeyed (milk) belong together, Agni.
   Though she is black, she is swollen with the gleaming gush, with milk for nourishing offspring.
10. Because by truth even the bull, the male Agni, was anointed with the milk on the top [=cream, that is, butter], not bucking, he went about conferring vigor: the bull as Pr̥śni milked gleaming (milk/semen) from his udder.
11. By truth they threw open the rock, having split it. The Aṅgirases roared along with the cows.
    For blessing the men besieged the dawn; the sun became visible when the fire was born.
12. By truth the immortal, unharmable goddesses, the waters with their honeyed floods, o Agni—like a competitor beating a tattoo at the start(ing posts)—should set to running, to stream forever.
13. Don't ever chase after (us, as) the specter of a nobody, a crooked man—neither of a tricky neighbor, nor of a friend.

Do not pursue the debt of a dishonest brother (against us), Agni. May we not pay for the "skill" of a cheating partner.

14. Guard us, Agni, with your guards, ever guarding when you are gratified, you good combatant [/very generous].
    Spring toward rigid constraint and break it apart; smash demonic force, even though it has grown great.
15. By reason of these recitations become well disposed, Agni; by reason of our thoughts caress these prizes, o champion.
    And enjoy the sacred formulations, Aṅgiras. May the chant favored by the gods bring harmony to you.
16. All these devices, the secret words, are for you who know, o ritual adept, Agni—the enigmas, the poetic compositions are for you, the wise poet. I, the inspired one, have pronounced them in composed thoughts and solemn speeches.

IV.4 (300) Agni the Demon-Smasher

Vāmadeva Gautama
15 verses: triṣṭubh

The Anukramaṇī names Agni Demon-Smasher (Rakṣo-han) as the divinity of this hymn. This ascription is certainly apt for the first five verses with their vividly hostile imagery, but starting with verse 6 the benefits that accrue to those who properly worship Agni are described (vss. 6–10). We identify ourselves as those worshipers in verses 8–9, and in verse 11 (see also vs. 8) the poet boasts of his hereditary poetic gifts, which enable him to get the attention and good favor of Agni. He explicitly identifies the source of his poetic skill as his father Gotama, but implicitly, through his phraseology, he also identifies himself with the Aṅgirases, the legendary poets who broke open the treasure cave of Vala, a myth that is much on the mind of the poet of these Agni hymns in IV (see, e.g., IV.1.13–17; 2.15–17; 3.11). The remaining verses (12–15) call on Agni to protect us with his protectors (presumably his flames) and to grant other blessings. The demons return in the last half verse (15cd).

1. Make your leading edge like a broad onslaught. Drive like an aggressive king with his entourage, mowing down (enemies) along your thirsting onslaught. You are an archer: pierce the demons with your hottest (flames).
2. Your swirling (flames) fly swiftly; touch down boldly following (them [/your onslaught]) as you keep blazing.
   Unfettered, o Agni, with your tongue hurl out bursts of heat, flying (embers), firebrands in all directions.

3. Hurl out your spies against (the foes), as the swiftest one. Become the undeceivable protector of this clan here.
   Whoever curses us at a distance, who nearby, o Agni, let no one defy your veering course.
4. Stand up, Agni; stretch yourself out [/stretch (your bow)] against (them). Then scorch down the foes, o you whose missiles are sharp.
   Whoever has directed hostility toward us, o kindled one, burn him down like a dry thicket.
5. Become upright; pierce against (them)—away from us. Make your heavenly (forms?) manifest, Agni.
   Slacken the taut (bows) of those incited by sorcerers; kin or non-kin, pulverize the rivals.
6. That one knows your good will, o youngest one, who has set the course for a sacred formulation like this.
   For him you have flashed open the doors to all the day-bright (days), to the riches, to the brilliant things of the stranger.
7. Agni, let just him be rich in portions, rich in gifts, who with regular oblation, who with solemn words seeks to please you during his own lifetime, in his own dwelling. All (days) (will be) day-bright for him. This desire (of his) will come true.
8. I recite a good thought to you [/recite (=praise) your good will]. Hear it, inclined our way. (Like) a "Favorite" wife, let this song bring harmony to you.
   We who have good horses and good chariots would groom you. In us you should uphold lordly powers through the days.
9. Here should (a man) attend on you much in person—you illuminator of the evening, shining through the days.
   Playful and well disposed, we would serve you, we who have surmounted the brilliant things of (other) men.
10. Whoever, rich in horses and gold, drives up to you, Agni, with a chariot full of goods, his protector do you become and the (ritual) partner of him who will regularly enjoy your guest-friendship.
11. Thanks to my lineage, I powerfully break (it [=the rock full of treasures]) with my speeches. This [=speech/poetic gift?] has come down to me from my father Gotama.
    Take note of this speech of ours here, o Hotar, youngest one, very effective, as friend of the house.
12. These—sleepless, (ever) advancing, very friendly, tireless, never wearying, keeping the wolf away—these protectors of yours, directed to a single goal—let them settle down and protect us, o ungullible Agni.

13. Agni, your protectors who, watching, guarded blind Māmateya [=Dīrghatamas] from ill-faring, those of good (ritual) action has the possessor [/knower] of everything [=Agni] guarded. Though wishing to damage, the cheats did no damage at all.
14. Through you may we—companions aided by you, in your guidance—attain prizes.
    Sweeten both of the lauds [=for both the gods and the patrons], you who are reality itself. Set them in order, you unabashed one.
15. With this kindling stick we would do honor to you, Agni. Accept the praise being chanted.
    Burn the demons who lack chant; protect us from deceit, from scorn, from calumny, o you with Mitra's might.

IV.5 (301) Agni Belonging to All Men [Agni Vaiśvānara]

Vāmadeva Gautama
15 verses: triṣṭubh

A very difficult and enigmatic hymn: this is not surprising because its subject seems to be poetic speech, its hidden meanings and its mysterious sources, so that the form of the hymn replicates its theme. The signature word is padám, which occurs six times in the hymn (vss. 3, 5, 8, 9, 10, 12); it is a significant pun, meaning both "track/footstep" and "word," and in the full phrase "hidden track of the cow" (padám… gór ápagūḷham, vs. 3) it refers to the arduous pursuit of cryptic meaning by way of verbal art. As often when Rgvedic poets reflect on their craft, this poet wonders about the source of his own poetic inspiration and worries about the skills of other poets. Although some scholars consider this hymn to reflect a poetic contest, we do not see a formal contest here, but simply the usual anxiety about poetic rivals. This poet identifies the source of his poetic gift as the god Agni (vss. 2–3, also 12), who bestowed this vision on him, though he was just a simple man (vss. 2, 6). He puzzles over the fact that thoroughly evil men can nonetheless also have the gift of poetry (vss. 4–5), but decides that because he (the poet) is morally uncompromised, Agni will shoulder the extra burden of bringing his (the poet's) poetic vision to success (vs. 6). When he returns to the rival poets in verse 14, he is full of scorn for their talent: the patronage of Agni has clearly spelled the difference for our poet.

The exact middle of the hymn (vss. 7–8, esp. 7cd) is an omphalos, which displays in daunting fashion the control the poet has gained, thanks to Agni, over the encrypted mysteries of the sacrifice and its verbal expression. Verse 7 ends with the impossible hapax jábāru. There have been various attempts to interpret and etymologize this word, beginning with Yāska, but in our opinion this is beside the point: the word is a sort of abracadabra, a mystical expression, and the half verse in which it appears encapsulates the profound and transformative secret of the sacrifice. This secret is under the protection of Agni in verse 8, but the poet has learned at least some of it.

The following two verses (9–10) reflect on the dawn ritual and the kindling of the sacrificial fire then, though the mysteries are rather easier to penetrate than those in the omphalos verses. The poet then expresses hope for gifts from Agni in exchange for his own formulation of the truth (vs. 11) and asks somewhat nervous questions about how and whether he will gain these gifts (vss. 12–13). As already noted, verse 14 heaps scorn on rival poets with fewer verbal skills. The final verse is conventional praise of Agni, expressed in the aorist of the immediate past, indicating that the morning ritual and the hymn have come to an end.

Another Vaiśvānara hymn, VI.9, follows much the same trajectory as this one, with similar reflections on the craft of poetry and the inspiration received from Agni.

1. How might we, in concert, do service to Vaiśvānara, to Agni who gives rewards; how might we serve his lofty light?
   With his unfailing lofty growth he propped (heaven) like a post a bulwark.
2. Do not spurn (him), the self-empowered god who gave this bounty to me, a mortal, a simple man—he shrewd, discriminating, the immortal Vaiśvānara, most manly, youthfully exuberant Agni.
3. A great melody (he gave)—the doubly lofty, sharp-pointed, thousand-spurting, powerful bull—having found the word hidden like the track of the cow. Agni has proclaimed the inspired thought to me.
4. Agni, the sharp-fanged, will snap at them with his hottest flame—he who (also) grants good rewards—at them who violate the ordinances of Varuṇa, the enduring ordinances dear to Mitra who attends to them.
5. (You) pursuing (it [=the hidden word/track]) like brotherless maidens pursuing (men), (you) of evil ways like wives cheating (on?) their husbands, though being wicked, untruthful, untrue, you [=other singers] begot this deep track [/profound word].
6. (But) this (track/word) is mine, o pure Agni! Since I, however small, do not violate (the ordinances), for me you have boldly placed the thought, like a heavy burden, lofty and deep, on your own youthfully exuberant, sevenfold "back" along with the pleasurable offering.
7. May my hymnic vision, purifying through its conception, reach just to him [=Agni?] now, to the same one in the same way (as always [at the ritual]).
   On the hide of the grain [=ritual grass?] is the lovely (udder/name) of Pr̥śni [=sacrifice]; on the tip of the mount has (the mystical expression? the milk?) "jabāru" (also? been) mounted.

8. What (part) of this speech is to be proclaimed to me? They confide privately what was deposited in secret [=the track/word]— that they have uncovered it like the "water" of the ruddy (cows). He [=Agni] protects the dear tip of the mount, the track of the bird.
9. Here is this great face of the great ones [=Sun], which the ruddy cow [=Dawn] followed (as it went) in front.
   She [?] found it shining hidden in the track of truth, going quickly, quick-streaming.
10. Then having flashed with his mouth, in company with his parents [=kindling sticks], he [=Agni] pondered the hidden, dear (udder/name) of Pr̥śni,
    (the udder/name) which is in the furthest track/footstep of the mother cow, though (also just) nearby—(Agni having flashed) with the tongue of his bullish, extended flame.
11. I have proclaimed the truth with reverence, on being asked, with hope of you [=your bounty], Jātavedas, if it [=the truth] is here.
    You hold sway over this, all of it—whatever wealth is in heaven and what on the earth.
12. Is some of this wealth for us? What is the treasure? As the perceptive one, Jātavedas, you have announced to us in secret the highest (track/footstep) of this (ritual) road of ours, on which we have gone, like the spurned going on an empty track.
13. What is the (finish) line, (what) the trajectories, what the desired (wealth)? Might we go to it, like quick (horses) to a prize.
    When will the goddesses, the wives of the immortal one, the Dawns stretch toward us with the color of the sun?
14. Those who fail to satisfy with their insipid, meager, stunted speech, easy to attack—what then do they say here, Agni? Without weapons, let them be accompanied by (speech) that does not come true.
15. Of him, being kindled for beauty, the bull, the good one—his face shines here in the house.
    Gleamingly clad, with a form lovely to see, he of many favors has flashed like a dwelling (flashing) with wealth.

IV.6 (302) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is not at the same level of complexity as the previous Agni hymns in Maṇḍala IV; it does, however, contain some difficult hapaxes (see vss. 7, 8, 10) in its second half. The hymn in quite ritually focused, particularly in its first half (vss. 1–5). The mention of the post (vs. 3) and Agni's circumambulation (vss. 3–5) identifies the ritual in question in these verses, an animal sacrifice: as we know from later detailed accounts of the ritual, the animals were tethered to the post before sacrifice, and fire was carried around them. See III.8, dedicated to the sacrificial post.

The subject of the second half is less clear, the ritual references both less precise and more poetically enigmatic. It is perhaps simply the kindling of fire at dawn, as so often, with striking and shifting descriptions of its birth and of its resulting flames. The most difficult part of the hymn is the first half of verse 7, and its translation here is speculative.

Although the hymn seems to fall into two halves, there is no reason to suppose that it is not a unitary composition. The exact ritual references of the first part simply open out to a general treatment of the ritual fire, by way of a transition (vss. 5–6) mentioning the fearsome aspects of Agni, perhaps suggested by the association with animal sacrifice.

1. Stand upright, o Agni, Hotar of the ceremony, as superior sacrificer for us at the divine assemblage.
   Since you dominate every thought, you further the inspiration even of the ritual adept.
2. As ungullible Hotar he has been set among the clans, Agni, gladdening, forethoughtful at the rites of distribution.
   Like Savitar he has braced his radiant beam upright; like a builder he propped his smoke up to heaven.
3. The (offering ladle) is held out, beautifully glowing, full of gifts, covered with ghee. (Agni), chosen (as Hotar), is making respectful circumambulation before the divine assemblage.
   The post (standing) up, like a new-born foal [?], anoints the (sacrificial) animals—itself well placed, well grounded.
4. Once the ritual grass has been strewn and the fire kindled, the Adhvaryu has stood upright, in delight.
   Like a cowherd Agni circles around (the sacrificial animals) with triple toil—he chosen as Hotar from of old.
5. With measured pace the Hotar goes around by himself—Agni, gladdening, of honeyed speech, truthful.
   His flames run like prizewinners. All creatures fear (him) when he has flashed.
6. Auspicious is your manifestation, o Agni of the lovely face, and it is dear, though you are terrible and capricious.
   Since they have not covered your flame with darkness, the palls of smoke have not placed their smudge on your body—
7. This (body) of (him) the devourer [/fire], which has not been obstructed from birth, nor have his mother and father ever (been obstructed) in their seeking (for him)— therefore, well installed like an envoy, pure Agni shines among the clans stemming from Manu.

8. Agni, whom the twice five sisters dwelling together [/similarly clad] [=fingers] have begotten among the clans stemming from Manu—awakening at dawn, gleaming like the tooth of one enveloped in flame, with a good mouth, sharp like an axe.
9. These golden (horses) of yours, Agni, bathed in ghee, the chestnuts directed straight, directed well, the ruddy, bullish ones with testicles stretched out (behind from speed)—these wondrous ones have "called" the divine assemblage here—
10. These rays of yours, Agni, which proceed, overwhelming, irrepressible, turbulent, are like falcons going the distance to the goal, very noisy like the Marutian troop.
11. A sacred formulation has been made for you, o kindled one. (The priest) will recite the solemn speech to (you as you) sacrifice. (Now you—) apportion (treasures).
The fire-priests have set down Agni as the Hotar of Manu, giving homage to (him as) "Laud of Āyu."

IV.7 (303) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: jagatī 1, anuṣṭubh 2–6, triṣṭubh 7–11

Although this hymn consists of verses in three different meters, it was clearly conceived as a unity, as was already seen by Oldenberg (1888: 153). The hymn begins, as often, with the ritual installation of the current sacrificial fire, which is set against the backdrop of the primal installation of Agni, treated in verses 1–5, in a non-insistent ring structure. Verses 6 and 7, though in different meters, express the central mysteries of Agni and therefore define a sort of omphalos. Verse 6 is structured as a series of paradoxes concerning the nature of fire. Verse 7, quite reminiscent of the omphalos verse IV.5.7, refers to the elements of the sacrifice in riddling fashion. The hymn then turns to Agni's role as messenger between Earth and Heaven (vss. 8–9, 11, first mentioned in vs. 3), with some vivid metaphorical description of fire's appearance and its consuming of flammable "food" (vss. 9–11).

1. This one has been installed here first by the installers, as best sacrificing Hotar, to be reverently invoked in the ceremonies, whom Apnavāna and the Bhr̥gus made to shine, brilliant in the woods, extending to every clan.

2. Agni, when will there be manifestation of you, the god, in the regular order?
   For it was therefore that the mortals seized you as the one to be reverently invoked in the clans—
3. (The mortals) looking at (you,) truthful and discriminating (/widely observable) like heaven with its stars,
   (you) who create laughter [=fire's crackling] for all ceremonies in every house,
4. (You,) the swift messenger of Vivasvant, who sur(mount) all the domains, the Āyus brought (you) here as beacon, associated with the Bhṛgus, for every clan.
5. Him as observant Hotar did they set down in the regular order—gladdening, pure-flamed, best sacrificing, throughout his seven domains—
6. Him, enveloped in mothers who are ever new, enveloped in wood (yet) unfixed, set in hiding though brilliant, easily found but aiming who knows where.
7. When, at the separation of the grain [=spreading of the ritual grass?], at the same udder [=the sacrifice?], on the domain of truth [=the ritual ground?], the gods take pleasure, great Agni, on whom the oblation is bestowed with reverence, the truthful one, is always pursuing (his missions) for the ceremony.
8. You, as the knowing one, pursue your missions for the ceremony between the two world-halves, observing them both together.
   You speed as the messenger chosen from of old, since you know better the means of ascending to heaven.
9. Black is your course, (though) you are gleaming; your light is in front. The flickering beam of your (various) wondrous forms is single when (your mothers, though) not impregnated, conceive an embryo, and you, even immediately at birth, become a messenger.
10. Immediately at birth, his strength comes to light, when the wind fans his flame.
    He twists his sharp tongue into the thickets. Even hard foods he fragments with his jaws.
11. When thirstily he has grown with (his flame) thirsting for food, he makes the thirsty (flame) into his messenger—youthfully exuberant Agni.
    He accompanies the roaring of the wind as he grinds down (the bush); he incites it like a swift (horse); the steed is impelled.

IV.8 (304) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
8 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn shares some phraseology and themes with the immediately preceding IV.7, especially Agni's role as messenger, but it is far less complex than that hymn. It is also unlike that hymn in its prayers for rich goods from Agni in exchange for ritual service.

1. Your messenger, affording all possessions, immortal oblation-bearer, best sacrificer—I will aim straight toward him with a hymn.
2. For he knows the depository of goods; the great one knows the means of ascending to heaven.
 He will convey the gods hither.
3. He, the god, knows how to bow the gods here to the house for him who acts with truth.
 He will give especially dear goods.
4. He is Hotar, and he, understanding his mission, speeds between (heaven and earth), knowing the means of ascending to heaven.
5. May we, who have done pious service for Agni by giving oblations, be those who, thriving, kindle him.
6. They become far famed as winners through their wealth, they through their masses of heroes, who have placed their friendship in Agni.
7. On us may the riches craved by many converge day after day;
 to us may prizes move.
8. He, the inspired poet of the settled domains, of the sons of Manu, by his vast power pierces through (obstacles) as if with the snap (of a bow [string]).

IV.9 (305) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
8 verses: gāyatrī

Like II.1 and II.11, this short hymn enumerates Agni's ritual roles by identifying him with various priests, but it is considerably simpler and more straightforward than either of those two hymns. The order of the priestly offices here is close to that found in II.1.

1. Agni, be gracious. You are great—you who have come here to the god-seeking people,
   to sit on the ritual grass.
2. He, the immortal difficult to deceive, pursuing (his ritual duties) among the clans stemming from Manu, has become messenger for all.
3. He is led around his seat as the Hotar, gladdening at the rituals of day(break),
   and he sits down as the Potar.
4. And Agni (leads) the Wives (of the Gods) at the ceremony [=Neṣṭar], and he is Houselord in the home,
   and he sits down as the Brahman.
5. You pursue (your ritual duty) as Upavaktar for the people who perform the ceremony,
   and you pursue the oblations of the sons of Manu.
6. And you also pursue the (ritual) mission of him whose ceremony you will enjoy—
   to convey the oblation of the mortal.
7. Our ceremony enjoy, our sacrifice, o Aṅgiras; hear our call.
8. Let your chariot, difficult to trick, encircle us on all sides, the chariot by which you guard the pious.

IV.10 (306) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
8 verses: padapaṅkti, except mahāpadapaṅkti 5

This uncomplicated hymn begins with the sacrificial here-and-now and the poet's hope for the success of the sacrifice currently being performed. He then praises Agni's participation in the sacrifice, his brilliant appearance, and his protection of his mortal worshiper, ending with a prayer for good partnership with the gods and a strong statement of the umbilical tie between gods and men, as mediated through the sacrificial Agni. The image of the sacrifice as the shared udder of gods and men is also found in nearby Agni hymns: IV.7.7 and by implication IV.5.7.

Although the content of the hymn is straightforward, the meter is quite unusual, indeed confined to this one hymn (see Oldenberg 1888: 98; Arnold 1905: 239–40). It is thus not surprising that the Anukramaṇī's characterization of it, reproduced in the heading above, is not illuminating and is in fact somewhat misleading. Each verse consists of a series of five-syllable pādas (three per verse, except for vs. 5 containing four) followed by a single triṣṭubh pāda. The short pentads tend to present abbreviated syntactic constituents, such as similes or tightly organized noun phrases, while the culminating triṣṭubh provides the frame into which the earlier mosaic pieces can be fitted. However, as the hymn progresses, the group of pentad pādas begins to operate independently of the triṣṭubh finale. In this hymn the medium is in many ways the message.

1. Agni, this (sacrifice) today may we bring to success with lauds of you—like a horse with praises, like a good resolve—(so that it) touches your heart.
2. For, Agni, it is therefore that you have become the charioteer of good resolve,
   of skill that brings success, of lofty truth.
3. By reason of these recitations of ours become inclined our way like sunlight,
   well disposed with all your faces, o Agni.
4. Singing with these songs, we would do pious service for you today, o Agni.
   Your gusts thunder forth like (those) of heaven.
5. Your manifestation is the sweetest, Agni—now by day, now by night.
   For beauty it shines like a gold ornament in the nearness.
6. Like purified ghee your body is spotless gleaming gold.
   This (flame?) of yours shines like a gold ornament, autonomous one.
7. Because, o Agni, even a hateful act already committed you drive away, bag and baggage,
   from the mortal who sacrifices just so, o truthful one, 8. Let our comradeship be propitious, our brotherhood, o Agni, (with respect) to you gods.
   This navel [=Agni/sacrifice] of ours is in the same seat, at the same udder (with you).

IV.11 (307) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This short hymn begins with a verse full of phonetic and morphological play. The middle two verses (3–4) contain seven repetitions of tvád "from you," all but one stationed at the beginning of the pāda. Verse 5 begins with tvā́m, "you" in a different case, to bring that sequence to a close. Verse 5 also deploys playful oppositions of gods and mortals, and the final verse is marked by alliterative sequences.

The hymn identifies Agni as the source of both material goods (vss. 3–4) and of poetic inspiration (vss. 2–3), and the highly wrought surface of this superficially simple hymn shows that the poet has put the latter gift to good use.

1. Auspicious is your face, mighty Agni; it shines here in nearness to the Sun.
   Gleaming to be seen, it is seen even by night. Not coarse is the food [=ghee] to be seen on its form.
2. Unloose inspiration for the singer (as if) through an aperture, o powerfully born Agni, in your excitation while you are being praised.
   What you, along with all the gods, will crave, that grant us, o brilliant, very great one—an ample thought.
3. From you, Agni, poetic compositions, from you inspired thoughts, from you are born solemn words to be realized.
   From you come chattels ornamented with heroes for the pious mortal whose thought is to the point.
4. From you is born the prizewinning, prize-bringing (horse), of extensive power, creating his own superiority, whose snorting is real, from you god-sped wealth, joy itself, from you the swift, speeding courser, o Agni.
5. You, Agni, (are) the first god (whom) the god-seekers seek to attract here with their hymnic visions—the mortals, o immortal, (seeking you) whose tongue is gladdening, who keep hatred away, domestic ally, household lord, no fool.
6. At a distance from us (keep) heedlessness, at a distance constraint, at a distance all malevolence, as you protect us.
   At evening (be) propitious, o Agni, son of strength, (to him) whom you as god even here accompany with well-being.

IV.12 (308) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The first half of this hymn (vss. 1–3) describes the rewards Agni gives to a pious sacrificer. The second half (vss. 4–6) is entirely different: it begs for release from unspecified offenses done by us, and although Agni is addressed in the vocative in all three verses, the tone is distinctly Ādityan, reminiscent of Vasiṣṭha's pleas for forgiveness from the most formidable of the Ādityas, Varuṇa, in Maṇḍala VII. In fact, the last verse (6) has a plural addressee ("good ones worthy of the sacrifice") in addition to Agni, and the verse is repeated exactly in X.126.8, an insistently Ādityan hymn.

1. Whoever will kindle you, Agni, with his offering ladle extended, whoever will make food for you three times in the same day, let him, victorious, be superior in heavenly brilliance in accordance with your purpose, o Jātavedas—he the observant one.

2. Whoever will labor to bring fuel to you, rendering service to the face of the great one, o Agni, he, kindling (you) every evening, every dawn, follows along, thriving in his wealth, smashing his foes.
3. Agni holds sway over lofty lordship, Agni over the prize, the highest wealth.
   He apportions treasure in due order to the mortal who does honor (to him)—he the youngest, autonomous one.
4. Whatever we have done to you, youngest one, in our human nature or through our heedless ways—whatever offense—make us without offense through unbinding [/Aditi]: let loose our transgressions in all directions, o Agni.
5. (Release us) from even a great offense in close quarters, Agni, from the enclosure [=imprisoning] of gods and of mortals.
   Let us, your comrades, never be harmed. Extend luck and lifetime to kith and kin.
6. Just as then you released the buffalo-cow bound by the foot, you good ones worthy of the sacrifice, so release constraint from us. (Let) our lifetime be further lengthened, Agni.

IV.13 (309) Agni (or Assorted Divinities)

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh

The Anukramaṇī assigns this hymn either to Agni or to unspecified divinities, but as has long been recognized, it is really a hymn appropriate to dawn, mentioning the gods associated with this time of day: Dawn herself, the Aśvins, Savitar, and especially the Sun, who is found in all five verses. It forms a pair with the following hymn, IV.14, also devoted to Dawn though not so identified. For further on the similarities of these two hymns, see the introduction to IV.14.

The last three verses are especially striking, with several vivid images of the triumph of light over darkness in verses 3–4, and in the final verse (5) a speculative question about the sun—why does it not fall out of the sky?

1. Agni has looked toward the vanguard of the Dawns—benevolent (Agni) toward the treasure-conferring of the radiant (Dawns).
   Drive, Aśvins, to the dwelling of the one of good action. The Sun, the god, goes up with his light.
2. God Savitar has braced his radiant beam upright, brandishing his banner like a warrior seeking cattle.

Varuṇa, Mitra, (and the other Ādityas?) proceed according to their commandment, when they cause the Sun to mount into heaven.

3. The one whom they created to pull apart the darkness—those [=Ādityas?] with fixed peaceful abodes, who do not unharness until (reaching) their goal—that Sun, do the seven golden mares, youthfully exuberant, convey as spy of the whole moving world.
4. You drive with the (horses) that convey best, as you unravel the thread, stripping off the black garment (of night), o god.
   The rays of the Sun, shaking the darkness like a hide (for tanning), have set it down in the waters.
5. Not held firm, not tied down—how does this one not fall down, head over heels?
   With what autonomous power does he journey? Who has seen it? As prop of heaven, utterly fixed, he protects the vault.

IV.14 (310) Agni

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Like IV.13 this is a dawn hymn, and, as was noted there, it is closely paired with that hymn. The chief divinities are the same, mentioned in more or less the same order: Agni, Dawn, the Aśvins, Savitar, and the Sun; the final verses are identical; and the first two verses are stylistic variants of each other. In verse 1 of both hymns Agni looks toward the Dawns, and the Aśvins [/Nāsatyas] are urged to come to the sacrifice; in verse 2 Savitar braces his beacon, and the Sun rises.

The other two verses (3–4) deviate somewhat. In IV.13 these were devoted to the Sun, conveyed by seven mares, confronting darkness. Here verse 3 concerns Dawn as the horse conveying the Sun: the equine theme of IV.13.3 is thus matched, but with a different focus. In both hymns verse 4 also concerns driving, with horses that are "the best conveyors" (váhiṣṭha), but in IV.13 it is the Sun who is being conveyed, whereas in IV.14 it is the two Aśvins (unnamed).

These paired hymns give us valuable insight into the Ṛgvedic poets' compositional techniques, showing how the poets could produce variety even from a template of fairly specific themes (here vss. 1–2), and where the template allowed more freedom in developing those themes (here vss. 3–4).

1. God Agni, Jātavedas, has looked toward the Dawns, shining with all their might.
   Here, o Nāsatyas [=Aśvins], wide-ranging with your chariot, drive up to this sacrifice of ours.

2. God Savitar has braced his beacon upright, making light for all creation.
   He has filled heaven and earth and the space between—the Sun showing himself ever more widely with his rays.
3. The ruddy (mare) conveying (him) hither has come with her light, the great showy one, showing herself ever more with her rays.
   The goddess awakening (the world) for good faring, Dawn speeds with her well-yoked chariot.
4. Let the best conveyors convey you two [=Aśvins] here—the (best) chariots and horses at the break of dawn—for here are soma drinks for you two to drink the honey. At this sacrifice here, o bulls, exhilarate yourselves.
5. Not held firm, not tied down—how does this one not fall down, head over heels?
   With what autonomous power does he journey? Who has seen it? As prop of heaven, utterly fixed, he protects the vault.

IV.15 (311) Agni (1–6), Somaka Sāhadevya (7–8), Aśvins (9–10)

Vāmadeva Gautama
10 verses: gāyatrī

This final hymn of the Agni cycle in Maṇḍala IV consists of ten verses. Its length marks it as out of order in the cycle, since it follows a sequence of shorter hymns, but its internal structure is not entirely clear. It is generally agreed that the first three verses form a tr̥ca dedicated to Agni, and could therefore, as an independent hymn, be properly placed in the Agni cycle. The next three verses (4–6) could also form a tr̥ca to Agni and could likewise be properly placed, but the mention of Sr̥ñjaya Daivavāta suggests that the final four verses (7–10), a dānastuti to Somaka Sāhadeva, belong with verses 4–6, since Somaka's father, Sahadeva, is elsewhere (Aitareya Brāhmaṇa 7.34) identified as a Sr̥ñjaya.

We are of the opinion that the hymn consists of an originally independent single tr̥ca (vss. 1–3), and a second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6) with a loosely attached four-verse dānastuti (7–10), but that it is unlikely that either of the tr̥cas formed a part of the original cycle. Note especially that the two preceding hymns, IV.13–14, are really not standard Agni hymns, but more generally applicable to the divinities of dawn, and this change in subject matter suggests that these dawn-centered hymns were added at some point at the end of the Agni cycle proper. Only later were the fragments found in IV.15 appended to that enlarged cycle.

In any case, all three verses of the first tr̥ca concern Agni's circling of the sacrifice, a ritual act characteristic of the animal sacrifice, as we have seen previously in this maṇḍala (IV.6.3–5). The second tr̥ca, especially its second verse (5), seems to concern militant Agni and suggests that only a mortal who is a hero himself can control such a fire: the implication is that Sṛñjaya Daivavāta, mentioned in verse 4, is such a man. This provides a transition to the "praise of the gift" in verses 7–10, where a prince of the Sṛñjaya family is the patron. The poet praises Prince Sāhadevya for giving him two horses (playfully in vs. 7) and prays to the Aśvins to reward the prince with a long life. There is another, more subtle connection between 4–6 and 7–10: the last verse of the tṛca (vs. 6) alludes to the ritual drink soma (as "the red child of heaven"), though it is not named; the name (or hypocoristic: note the -ka-suffix characteristic of nicknames) of the patron in 7–10 is Somaka (vs. 9).

1. Agni, the Hotar at our ceremony, while being a prizewinning (horse), is led around, the god devoted to the sacrifice among the gods.
2. Agni drives with triple toil around the ceremony like a charioteer, establishing a pleasurable offering among the gods.
3. Agni, the lord of the prize, the sage poet, has marched around the oblations, establishing treasures for the pious.

4. Here is the one who is kindled in front when Sṛñjaya Daivavāta (is present), the brilliant (Agni) who belittles the foes.
5. Over such a fire as this (only) a hero should hold sway as mortal (master), over this one who has sharp fangs but grants rewards.
6. Him like a winning steed, like the red child of heaven [=soma?], they keep grooming day after day.

7. If he will "awaken" me with two fallow bays—Prince Sāhadevya—
   I will "get up" like one summoned.
8. And these two fallow bays, worthy of honor, from Prince Sāhadevya
   I took as soon as they were offered.
9. He is yours, god Aśvins—Prince Sāhadevya.
   Let him be long-lived—(this) Somaka.
10. You god Aśvins, make Prince Sāhadevya long-lived.

IV.16 (312) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
21 verses: triṣṭubh

This first hymn of the Vāmadeva Indra cycle is rich in mythological material. It begins with two verses devoted to the journey motif—Indra coming to our soma sacrifice—but already in the second half of verse 2 and the first half of verse 3 the legendary poet and sage Uśanā Kāvya, who will figure later in the hymn, is introduced by indirection. The Vala and Vr̥tra myths are interwoven in the next section of the hymn, verses 3cd through 8, their interpenetration encouraged by the fact that almost no participants are explicitly named in the earlier part of the section. The last two verses clearly separate the two myths: verse 7 by naming Vr̥tra, verse 8 by the very words of the dog Saramā and her naming of Indra's companions in the Vala myth, the Aṅgirases.

Verses 9–14 concern the saga of the hero Kutsa, the poet Uśanā Kāvya, and Indra, a story that is, as usual, narratively elusive. As noted above, Uśanā Kāvya was introduced earlier in the hymn by name; he is not named in this section, but deeds involving him in other references to the myth are also found here: Indra and Kutsa's joint journey to his house for help (vs. 10ab; cf., e.g., I.130.9) and the help he provides to their venture (vs. 11), help which elsewhere takes the material form of the mace he presents to Indra (I.121.12, V.34.2).

Our version also has the curious motif of the woman who seeks to tell the difference between Indra and Kutsa, who have identical appearance (vs. 10cd). This reminds us of the Jaiminīya Brāhmaṇa story (JB III.199–200), in which Kutsa was born from Indra's thigh and therefore looks identical to Indra. Kutsa takes advantage of this by having sex with Indra's wife, who claims, when Indra discovers them together, not to be able to tell Indra and Kutsa apart. The Jaiminīya Brāhmaṇa story appears, at least to us, to have been secondarily generated to explain the enigmatic motif in our R̥gvedic verse, which does not suggest any misbehavior on the part of the truth-distinguishing woman. Certainly Indra and Kutsa in partnership go on to destroy named and nameless enemies and to tear off the wheel of the Sun's chariot (vss. 12–13), an action also prominent, if enigmatic, in other mentions of this story (I.130.9, I.174.5, V.29.10). A successful act of distinguishing Indra (from Kutsa?) seems to be alluded to in verse 14b, bringing closure to this motif. This recognition was aided by the strong light of the sun. It is unclear whether the contribution of the sun's light here has anything to do with the damage inflicted on his chariot by Indra and Kutsa.

The remainder of the hymn consists of appeals to Indra for help in contests and battles and for largesse (vss. 15–19), with two closing verses (20–21) summing up the making of the poem and the hopes we have of it.

The hymn is full of deep and surface puns, phonological play, and subtle echoes across verses, and the poet takes some delight in setting up and then frustrating our grammatical and mythological expectations.

1. Let him drive here (to be) really present—the bounteous one possessing the silvery drink. Let his fallow bays run to us.
   It is just for him that we have pressed the well-skilled stalk. Being hymned, he will make his meal here.
2. Unhitch as if at the end of your road, o champion, in order to find exhilaration in this soma-pressing of ours today.

Like Uśanā, the ritual adept [=Agni] will recite his solemn speech, his thought, for the lordly one who attends to it—

3. Bringing the rites to realization like the sage poet [=Uśanā Kāvya] a secret, when the bull [=pressing stone] will chant as he drinks out the gush.

   In just that way he [=Indra?] begot the seven bards of heaven; just with the (coming of) day they created the ritual patterns as they were singing.

4. When the sun, beautiful to see, was found through their chants [/with its rays], they made shine the great light which is at dawn.

   The best of men in his dominance made (it possible) for men to penetrate the blind, bilious shades of darkness with their gaze.

5. Possessing the silvery drink, Indra increased without limit. He filled both world-halves with his greatness.

   Even beyond that did it reach—the greatness of him who surmounted all the worlds.

6. The able one, knowing all manly (labors), together with his eager companions, gave leave to the waters.

   The fire-priests, who split the stone just with their words, opened the pen full of cows.

7. You smashed away Vr̥tra, who had been enclosing the waters. Of one mind with you, Earth helped your mace.

   You sped the seaward floods forward, becoming their lord by your power, you daring champion.

8. When you tore open the rock for the waters, o much-invoked one, Saramā had appeared to you before:

   "As our leader, tear out an abundant prize, breaking apart the cowpens, being sung by the Aṅgirases."

9. In your dominance you came here to the poet in need [=Kutsa?] at the winning of the sun, o bounteous one with your mind on men.

   With your help you urged him on at the invocation to heavenly brilliance; but the Dasyu, possessing magic arts but no sacred formulation, sank down.

10. Drive here to the home (of Uśanā Kāvya) with your Dasyu-smashing mind. In companionship with you, Kutsa will become eager.

    Do you two, having the same form, sit down each in his own womb. She is trying to distinguish between you two—she is a woman who distinguishes the truth.

11. Seeking help, you drive with Kutsa on the same chariot—you, the goader of the Wind, the master of the two fallow bays, seeking to hold onto the two silvery (horses of the Wind) like a prize to be secured, so that on that day the poet [=Uśanā Kāvya] will exert himself for decisive (help).

12. For Kutsa you laid low insatiable Śuṣṇa, who brings bad harvest, with his thousands, before the day's first meal.
    Immediately crush out the Dasyus with (the weapon) that is Kutsa, and then tear off the wheel of the Sun at the moment of encounter.
13. You subjugated Pipru Mṛgaya, swollen with power, to Ṛjiśvan, the son of Vidathin.
    You scattered down the dark fifty thousand. You shredded their fortresses, like worn-out age a cloak—
14. Placing your body in nearness to the sun, so that the form of you, the immortal one, could be distinguished, like a wild elephant, clothing yourself in might, and fearsome like a lion when you bear your weapons.
15. To Indra have desires gone seeking goods, taking their pleasure at the soma-pressing as if at a (contest) having the sun as its prize, (desires) seeking fame, laboring with hymns, delightful like a home, like prosperity beautiful to see.
16. Just him, Indra easy to call, would we call upon for you—him who performed the many manly (labors), who quickly brings a prize worth securing even to a singer like me, him whose largesse is eagerly sought.
17. If a sharp missile will fly in an instant amid some one of the peoples, o champion, if there will be a terrible clash, o comrade, then, as ever, become the herdsmen of our body.
18. Will you be the helper of Vāmadeva's insights? Will you be a partner—no wolf—at the winning of prizes?
    We have come after you (who are) solicitude for us. Widely proclaimed, may you always be there for the singer.
19. While we dominate the strangers in every contest with these men who seek you, Indra, with the bounteous ones, o bounteous one, just as the heavens dominate with their heavenly brilliance, may we find elation through many nights and autumns.
20. Just in this way we have made a sacred formulation for Indra, the bull-strong bull, as the Bhṛgus do a chariot, so that he will never keep us far away from his partnership, and he will be our powerful helper, the protector of our bodies.
21. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
    A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.17 (313) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
21 verses: triṣṭubh, except ekapadā virāj 15

The hymn begins with the simple declaration "You, Indra, are great," and in some sense the rest of the hymn just develops this statement. The first section of the hymn (vss. 1–8) treats Indra's deeds in the past (though with some interludes in the present, esp. vs. 5), particularly the Vṛtra slaying and its cosmic repercussions. Verse 8 sums up this section by detailing the qualities that make Indra worthy of our attention. In verses 9–13 Indra's abilities to conquer foes and win prizes are celebrated for their present relevance. The following two verses (14 and 15, its stunted single-pāda adjunct) make a brief and quite obscure foray into the Etaśa myth. The final five verses (16–20), before the last (21) repeated from IV.16.21, express our hopes for Indra's bounty and aid, and, especially, our longing for him to be in affectionate relationship with us.

Several themes surface from time to time in the hymn. Indra is often called maghávan "bounteous (patron)" throughout (vss. 7, 8, 9, 11, 13 [twice], 20), even though our prayers for goods and services do not become insistent until the end. More striking is the motif of Indra's birth and, especially, the uncertainty about the identity of his father. His birth in mentioned in verses 2, 4, 7, and 12. In verse 4 it is said that Heaven is considered to be his begetter, but "is considered" throws that statement into question, and it is not even clear whether "the best craftsman," to whom the act is (also?) ascribed, is Heaven or not. It may well be Tvaṣṭar, called "good craftsman" elsewhere (I.85.9) and in apparent parental relationship with Indra in some passages (e.g., III.48.2–4; see also the next hymn, IV.18.3). Verse 12ab casts even more doubt on his parentage, which Indra himself seems not to be clear about. This birth motif foreshadows the next hymn, the famous IV.18 featuring the direct speech of Indra's mother at the time of his birth.

1. You, Indra, are great. To you did Earth, to you did Heaven magnanimously yield dominion.
   After you smashed Vṛtra with your strength, you let loose the rivers, which had been swallowed by the serpent.
2. At your birth Heaven trembled and Earth flinched in fear of your turbulence and of the battle fury that is yours.
   The well-founded mountains throbbed, the wastelands shuddered, and the waters ran.
3. He split the mountain, hurling his mace with his strength, revealing his power, displaying his might.
   He smashed Vṛtra with his mace in his exhilaration. With their bull struck down, the waters ran swiftly.
4. Rich in heroes, Heaven is considered to be your begetter. The best craftsman was the creator of Indra, who begot him, booming and bearing the good mace, not to be moved, any more than the Earth from its seat.

5. Who, just alone, sets the lands in motion—the king of the separate peoples, Indra invoked by many.
   All celebrate him, the real one, and celebrate the generosity of the god to the singer and the patron.
6. Entirely his were the soma-drinks; entirely for the lofty one were the most exhilarating exhilarating-drinks.
   Entirely the goods-lord of goods you became. You placed all the separate peoples in (the path of) your giving, Indra.
7. And on first being born, you placed all the separate peoples in (the path of) your onslaught, Indra.
   With your mace you hewed apart the serpent who was lying against the (mountain) slopes, o bounteous one.
8. (I call upon) him who smashes entirely, bold and brawny Indra, the great and limitless bull bearing the good mace, who is the smasher of Vr̥tra and the winner of the prize, the giver of bounties, the bounteous one who brings good presents.
9. This one forces his united opponents into hiding, he who alone is famed as the bounteous one in contests.
   This one brings the prize that he wins. Might we be dear to him in his partnership.
10. And this one is famed for conquering and smiting, and this one brings the cows forward to become his through battle.
    When Indra makes his fury real, everything, both what stays firm and what flinches, becomes afraid before him.
11. Indra conquered the cows altogether, altogether (the bounties) in gold and horses—he who through the many (autumns) is a bounteous patron, the best of men with these able men of his, the apportioner of wealth and the one who brings the goods altogether.
12. How much does Indra know of his mother, how much of his father, his begetter, who begot him?
    He who in an instant raises his tempest, as the wind does when sped by thundering clouds, 13. He deprives the man dwelling peacefully of his peace. The bounteous one raises the dust in confusion, a shatterer like Heaven with its missiles. But the bounteous one places his praiser in goods.
14. This one impelled the wheel of the Sun and stopped Etaśa as he ran.
    Moving crookedly, he [=Agni?] sprinkles it [=Sun? Sun's horse or wheel?] at the black base of the hide, on the womb of this realm,
15. Like a Hotar performing his own sacrifice on the dark (hide).
16. Seeking cows, seeking horses, seeking prizes, we, inspired poets, rousing the bull Indra for partnership; seeking wives, we bestir the wife-giver providing imperishable aid, like a bucket in a well.

17. Become our protector, showing yourself as a friend who watches over and dispenses mercy to your comrades in soma, our partner and father, the best father of fathers, the creator conferring vitality on the man longing for wide space.
18. Become the helper and partner of those seeking your partnership. Being sung, Indra, confer vitality on the man who praises, for we have fervently acted for you, exalting you with these labors, Indra.
19. Indra the bounteous, praised when he (smashes) obstacles, alone smashes those many and unopposable (obstacles).
The singer is dear to him, under whose protection none, neither gods nor mortals, obstruct (him [=the singer]).
20. In just this way shall bounteous Indra, conferring abundance, make these things come true for us, as the unassailable sustainer of the bordered domains.
You, as king of (all) the races, set fame upon us, which is a great thing for the singer.
21. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.18 (314) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
13 verses: triṣṭubh

A famous and enigmatic hymn recounting the prodigious and unnatural birth of Indra, partly in dialogue form. The hymn begins with a two-verse exchange between Indra's mother and the as-yet-unborn Indra: she tries to persuade him to be born in normal fashion, but, like many heroes world-wide, he insists on an unusual exit, from her side. Indra is already conscious of his great destiny (see vs. 2cd). The pregnancy has lasted abnormally long (see vs. 4ab), and after the birth Indra's mother appears to abandon him to make his own way (vss. 3ab, 4ab, 8ab, 10cd), but also hides him (vs. 5ab) and worries about his fate (vs. 11ab). Again like heroes the world over, Indra is born full-grown and ready to perform great feats (see vs. 5cd), so that his mother's protection is not necessary. In verse 3 he follow his mother as she abandons him and ends up at Tvaṣṭar's house, where he drinks Tvaṣṭar's soma. Elsewhere Tvaṣṭar is presented as Indra's father (e.g., III.48.2–4, possibly in the previous hymn IV.17.4), and by stealing and drinking his soma, Indra defeats him (see III.48, where Indra's mother abets him). Our verse contains no mention of this rivalry and conflict, but it may be alluded to indirectly toward the end of the hymn (see below).

In the middle part of the hymn (vss. 6–9) another set of voices (at least in our opinion) joins the dialogue, that of various waters. These waters seem to represent benevolent foster mothers (see esp. vss. 7–8), like the rivers attending the birth of Urvaśī's son in X.95.7, and their protective aid for Indra contrasts with his mother's ambivalence and alienation. But they are also assimilated to the waters released by Indra in the Vr̥tra myth, as Indra's mother makes explicit in verse 7. It may be that both identities were suggested by a natural phenomenon, the breaking of a pregnant woman's waters right before birth; the sudden release of those waters is reminiscent of the release in the Vr̥tra myth, while the association of the waters with the infant being born suggests their beneficent relationship with the fetus in the womb. Indra's mother ends this section by disavowing any blame for Indra's temporary disadvantage in the Indra–Vr̥tra battle (vs. 9). If we are correct, the second pāda of this verse alludes glancingly to snakes' ability to reconfigure their jaws to swallow large prey, a striking naturalistic image—one of the incidental fragments of realia to be gleaned from the R̥gveda.

The final verses of the hymn are even more puzzling than what precedes them. After the episode of the waters and the Vr̥tra battle, we return to the original scene of Indra's birth and his mother's abandonment of him (vs. 10), though in her worry about his isolation she follows him (vs. 11ab), a mirror image of him following her in verse 3ab. He does find a companion to aid in the Vr̥tra battle, namely Viṣṇu, in verse 11cd. The next verse (12) asks a series of rhetorical questions—or they would be rhetorical if we were certain of the answers. The questions center around a family tragedy of a type very familiar from world mythology: a father with murderous intent toward his son (possibly still in the womb; vs. 12b) and the killing of the father by the son (vs. 12d), an act that leaves his mother a widow (vs. 12a). Is the father Tvaṣṭar, mentioned briefly and without hostility in the earlier part of the hymn (vs. 3), or Vr̥tra, whose destruction was depicted several times (vss. 7cd, 9)—or both, or neither? In any case the questions are reminiscent of the question near the end of the famous Indra-Vr̥tra hymn I.32, when Indra flees after winning the battle: verse 14 "Whom did you see, Indra, as the avenger of the serpent when fear came into your heart after you smashed him, / and when you crossed over the ninety-nine flowing rivers, like a frightened falcon through the airy realms?" And the final verse of IV.18 (13) seems to depict Indra after such a flight, alone and in exile, eating taboo food out of necessity and witness to the dishonoring of his mother because of her widowed state. His own condition only improves when the falcon steals soma and brings it to him (vs. 13d), a tale that will be treated later in this cycle in IV.26–27.

Although the abrupt shifts of scene and chronology and the lack of context in each new scene produce some frustration in the reader (not to speak of the translator), the vivid focus of each episode and the dramatic tension in each snippet of speech cause the hymn to resonate in the imagination long after a more rational account would have done.

1. [Indra's Mother:] Here is the ancient proven path from which all the gods were born.
   Just from it should he be born full-grown.—Do not cause your mother to fall [=miscarry] in that way.
2. [Indra:] I will not go out from there—it's a hard plunge. I will go out crossways, from your side.
   Many are the things as yet undone that are to be done by me: I will do battle with one and make peace with another.
3. [Narrator:] He gazed after his mother going away. "I cannot not follow—now shall I follow!"
   In the house of Tvaṣṭar, Indra drank soma, a hundred's worth of the pressed (drink) in the two cups.
4. [Narrator:] How could she put aside the one whom she bore for a thousand months and many autumns?
   For surely he has no equal among those born and those yet to be born.
5. [Narrator:] Thinking him somehow a disgrace, his mother concealed Indra, who overflowed with heroic strength.
   But he stood up on his own, clothing himself in a cloak. He filled the two world-halves as he was being born.
6. [Indra:] These (waters) flow, babbling, like truthful women together shouting their witness.
   Ask them! What is this they are saying? What rock, what barrier are the waters battering?
7. [Indra's Mother:] What did they say as invitations to him? Do the waters intend to take on Indra's disgrace?
   It was my son who set loose these rivers, after having smashed Vr̥tra with his great murderous weapon.
8. [Various voices of the waters:] It was not because of me that the young woman cast you aside. It was not because of me that Kuṣavā (Evil Birth) swallowed you.
   But it was certainly because of me that the waters would show mercy to the child. It was certainly because of me that Indra stood up with his might.
9. [Indra's Mother:] It was not because of me that the cobra, having pierced you down, smashed apart his jaws (to swallow) you, o bounteous one.
   Then, (though) pierced down, having gotten the upper hand, you utterly crushed the head of the Dāsa with your murderous weapon.

10. [Narrator:] The heifer gave birth to the sturdy, powerfully charging, unassailable bull, the brawny Indra.
    The unlicked calf—his mother impelled him to wander, seeking by himself a way for himself.
11. And his mother followed the track of the buffalo, (thinking,) "Yonder gods are abandoning you, my son."
    Then Indra said as he was about to smash Vr̥tra: "Viṣṇu, my companion, stride out widely."
12. Who made your mother a widow? Who tried to smash you as you lay, as you wandered?
    What god was merciful toward you when you destroyed your father, having grasped him by the foot?
13. [Indra:] Out of need I cooked for myself the entrails of a dog. I found none who was merciful among the gods.
    I saw his wife being dishonored. Then the falcon carried the honey here to me.

IV.19 (315) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

Until the end, this hymn focuses almost entirely on the Vr̥tra-slaying and especially on the release of the waters after the slaying. In the first two verses Indra is chosen, by the gods and the world-halves, for the task, and he assumes the kingship. The actual slaying and the splitting of the mountains to set the waters free occupy the next verses (through vs. 5), and other feats of Indra regarding the waters—stopping them for his clients Turvīti and Vayya in verse 6, impregnating them in verse 7—are mentioned. Indeed, verse 7 lushly depicts the fertile and fructifying power of liquid in many forms. This main section of the hymn is brought to a close in verse 8, which efficiently summarizes the main points of the Vr̥tra myth.

Verse 9 serves as a somewhat bizarre coda. It celebrates three of Indra's great deeds that are regularly mentioned together: he rescues the shunned son of an unmarried girl, makes a blind man see, and causes a lame man to walk (cf., e.g., II.13.12, 15.7; I.112.8). But here each of these deeds has an odd twist: the boy is being eaten by female ants; the blind man "takes a serpent" (an unrecoverable pun or piece of slang, in our view); and the lame man is "broken in the 'pot'" or "breaks the pot" (slang for "hip"?). And it is also unclear why this verse has been tacked onto the end of a hymn that is otherwise remarkably consistent thematically. It may be that the "unwed girls" (agrū́) in verse 7, a metaphor for the rivers, suggested to the poet the episode of the unwed girl (agrū́) who abandons her son out of shame, and it may also be that this proverbial episode of a mother's abandonment of her son resonated with Indra's own experience with his mother at his birth, treated so dramatically in the preceding hymn (IV.18).

The hymn ends with two summary verses (10, 11). In the former the poet announces to Indra the hymn he has just completed, while the latter is the refrain verse of the Vāmadeva Indra cycle (see IV.16–17, 20–24).

1. So it is you, mace-wielding Indra, that all the gods, our easily invoked helpers, and both world-halves choose now—singling you out, the great one alone, strong and lofty, at the smashing of Vr̥tra.
2. Like old men the gods let go, and you became the universal king, Indra, acquiring your own true womb [=place].
   You smashed the serpent lying around the flood; you dug out the courses for all the nourishing streams.
3. The insatiable serpent, stretched out, lying against the seven slopes, did you dismember with your mace in his jointless part, o Indra—(making him) not to be awakened, unawakening, gone to sleep.
4. Indra made the earth shake to its bottom with his strength, as the wind does the water with its forces.
   He knotted up the strongholds, eager in his own strength; he cut down the peaks of the mountains.
5. They burst, as women burst out their embryo. Like chariots the stones went forth all at once.
   You satisfied (the waters) flowing widely, and you subdued their waves.
   You made the blocked rivers flow, Indra.
6. For Turvīti and Vayya you brought to rest the great flowing watercourse with its all-nourishing streams and the moving flood, because of their reverence. You made the rivers easy to cross, Indra.
7. He made the unwed girls swell like surging spurts (of water)—the parched young women knowing the truth.
   He saturated the wastelands and thirsty fields. Indra got milk from the barren cows, who thus had a husband of wondrous power.
8. Having smashed Vr̥tra, he set loose the rivers, welcomed [/gurgling] through many dawns and autumns.
   Indra drilled out the streams, which had been surrounded and hard pressed, to flow along the earth.
9. You brought the son of the unwed girl, as he was being eaten by female ants, out from their lair, o master of the fallow bays.
   The blind man saw after taking the serpent. The man broken in the "pot" [=hip?] set out; his joints fit together.

10. Knowing them, I speak forth your ancient deeds, o inspired one, to (you) who know the deeds, in just the way that you accomplished them, o king—the bullish and manly labors welcomed for themselves.
11. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
    A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.20 (316) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The general pattern of an invitation/journey hymn is followed here. Indra's journey to our sacrifice is treated in the first two verses, with his attendance at the sacrifice and acceptance of the offerings found in the following two (3–4). The invitation is summarized in verse 5. His reciprocal obligation to give generously to his worshipers dominates the rest of the hymn, and without overt mention of the Vala myth, the poet repeatedly likens Indra's acts of giving to his opening of the cowpen and releasing its contents (vss. 6, 8, 9). A subtle reference to the Vr̥tra myth may be found in verse 7: no "obstructor" (vartár) keeps Indra from giving, using the root vr̥ "obstruct," found in Vr̥tra, whose name is literally "obstacle."

The hymn several times uses gambling vocabulary (vss. 3, 8), and there are some other striking images, such as the two similes in the first half of verse 5.

1. Here to us from afar and here to us from nearby will powerful Indra drive for help, creating his own superiority—the lord of men with the mace in his arm, with his most powerful (men) overcoming battlers in combat and conflicts.
2. Here to us let Indra drive with his fallow bays, right here, turned our way for help and benefit.
   He will stand—that mace-bearing, bounteous one, conferring abundance—beside this sacrifice of ours at the gaining of prizes.
3. Setting this sacrifice of ours in front, o Indra, you will gain our intention.
   Like (a gambler) with the best throw to gain the stakes, with you, o mace-bearer, might we win the contest with the stranger.
4. Being eager and of favorable mind in our midst, now (drink) of the well-pressed soma, o autonomous one.
   Drink, Indra, of the honey brought before you. You will reach complete exhilaration with the soma-stalk coming from the back (of the mountain).

5. He who abounds in new seers like a fruited tree, who is a winner like a man with a sickle, much-invoked Indra do I invite here, setting my mind on him like a dashing youth on a maiden.
6. He who is self-strong like a mountain, lofty and powerful Indra, born from of old for conquest, he splits open the *cowpen as a fearsome (wild beast) does a sturdy (pen), (the pen) overflowing with goods like a bucket with water.
7. For whom by nature there now exists no obstructor and no hinderer of benefit and bounty, o strong and powerful one, boiling up and over, give riches to us, o much invoked one.
8. You are master of wealth and of the peaceful dwelling of the settled domains, and you open the pen of cows.
   Doing your best for men in the clashes, hitting the jackpot, you are the guide to an abundant heap of goods.
9. Because of what ability is he famed as the most able?—that ability by which the lofty one does everything instantly.
   He is the best at prying apart narrow straits for the man who does much pious service, and he establishes material property for the singer.
10. Do not neglect us! Bring and give us what of yours is to be given in abundance to the pious man.
    At this new gift we shall proclaim it in this hymn recited for you, praising you, o Indra.
11. – Now praised, O Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
    A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.21 (317) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The first verses of this hymn, especially 1 and 3, are quite reminiscent of the opening of the preceding hymn, IV.20, with the invitation to Indra to come to our sacrifice from wherever he might be, and the hymn promises to be a straightforward celebration of Indra's presence at the sacrifice and our praise and offering to him, in the hopes of his goods and help. But the hymn veers off into a different, and deeply puzzling, direction. The pivot is verse 5, which begins with a relative clause as does verse 4, leading us to expect that the referent in verse 5 will be the same as in verse 4, namely Indra, the subject of our hymn. But it is not, as the last word reveals, but rather the Hotar, here almost certainly the god Agni.

The next three verses (6–8) share a number of features: repeated phrases (especially the góhe phrase of 6b, 7c, 8c), metrical irregularity in their odd pādas (6c, 7a, 7c), morphological and syntactic parallelism, and patterns of phonological and morphosyntactic repetition. But what they especially share is almost impenetrable obscurity. In our admittedly speculative interpretation, these verses take off from the Agni verse (5) and treat simultaneously the kindling of the ritual fire, which initiates the sacrifice here and now, and the Vala myth. As we noted in the introduction to IV.20, the twin of this hymn in some ways, the Vala myth, is a backgrounded model for Indra's generous giving in that hymn. It should also be remembered that the Agni hymns of this maṇḍala frequently take the Vala myth as their subject (see esp. IV.1 and 2), despite the fact that Agni is not usually a participant in that myth. Thus a condensed version of the Vala myth embedded in an Indra hymn but focusing on Agni is compatible with the larger concerns of the Vāmadeva poets.

In verse 6 the gods coming to the sacrifice seem to be compared to the Aṅgirases going to the Vala cave—though neither group is mentioned by name—and the seat of both groups is identified as the "secret place" (góha) of the Auśija, a vr̥ddhi derivative that we interpret as referring to the whole company of Uśij-priests, or fire-priests. In the second half of the verse the ritual fire is kindled, though with difficulty. The kindled fire roars to life in verse 7a, enabling the sacrifice to proceed (pāda b) and the cows in the Vala cave to go forth (pādas cd)—expressed in increasingly compressed phraseology. The final verse of this section (8) is the one that most clearly alludes to the opening of the Vala cave, using several of the signature words of that myth, including the verb vidát "found, finds," which several times in the Vala myth takes "cows" as object (I.62.3, V.45.8, X.68.11). But in our verse the object is omitted, presumably to allow the simultaneous reading "cows" (for the Vala myth) and "goods" (for the ritual here-and-now).

Having thus provided Indra with a mythic model for generous giving (however cryptically phrased), the poet then reproaches Indra in verse 9 for not participating in the sacrificial give-and-take. The poet ends the hymn with a more conventional summary verse and plea for goods and help (vs. 10), followed by the Vāmadeva Indra-cycle refrain (vs. 11).

1. Let Indra drive here, near to us, for help. Praised, let the champion be here as our feasting companion, he whose powers are many when he has grown strong, (whose) overwhelming dominion, like heaven, will thrive.
2. Here will you praise the bullish forces of him alone, the powerfully brilliant and powerfully generous man, whose resolve, conquering and victorious like a sovereign king making ceremonial distributions, overwhelms the separate peoples.

3. Let Indra along with the Maruts drive here from heaven or from the earth, swiftly from the sea or from fertile ground, from the realm of solar glory, or from afar, from the seat of truth, to help us.
4. Who is master of substantial, lofty wealth, him will we praise at the ceremonial distributions—Indra, who is the winner along with Vāyu when (refreshments) consisting of cows are at stake and who boldly leads (us) forth to a better state.
5. Whoever, piling reverence upon reverence, rouses speech, begetting it in order to perform the sacrifice, aiming straight, granting many favors, he should bring Indra here to the (ritual) seats with his hymns—he, the Hotar [=Agni?].
6. When they [=the gods/Aṅgirases?], seeking a holy place, will hasten to the rock with holy fervor, taking their seats at the secret place of (the company of) the fire-priests [=ritual ground/Vala cave?], the Hotar [=Agni] of (the company) belonging to the household, (though) he is hard to kindle, (comes into being) here—he who is the great draft-horse for us in the (ritual) enclosures.
7. When in its entirety the explosive force of the devouring bull [=Agni] accompanies him [=Agni?], for the praiser to take his reward, when (it accompanies) him secretly to the secret place of (the company of) the fire-priests, when (it accompanies him) in order (for the praiser) to go forth to insight, forth to exhilaration—
8. When he opens out the mountain's enclosures into wide spaces and quickens the swift currents of the waters with gushes of milk, he finds (the cows?) in the secret place of the buffalo, of the bull, when those of good insight convey him for the prize.
9. Auspicious are your hands and well-fashioned your palms, as ones that hold out largesse to the praiser, o Indra.
   Why are you sitting it out? And why do you not find exhilaration? And why do you not rouse yourself higher and higher to give?
10. Just in this way, Indra, the real sovereign king of goods, the smiter of Vṛtra, made wide space for Pūru.
    O you praised by many, in accordance with your will, show your power over wealth for us. Might I have a share in your divine help.
11. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
    A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.22 (318) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

Within a slender frame depicting Indra's presence at and participation in our sacrifice is fitted a celebration of Indra's great deeds and, especially, his aggressiveness in performing them. The hymn begins (vs. 1) with a brief catalogue of the elements Indra wants at the ritual, which leads immediately to the praise of Indra's uncontrolled power, the terror he inspires in the cosmos, and the fortunate result of his greatest deed, the release of the waters following his defeat of Vr̥tra (vss. 2–7). Verse 8 marks a return to the ritual here-and-now, with a hope that our preparations will bring Indra to our sacrifice. Verses 9–10 then list the various things we want Indra to do for us, marked by the heavy repetition of "for us/to us" at the beginning of every half-verse (a pattern actually begun in vs. 8c with "toward us," and ending with an extra repetition in the final pāda 10d). The hymn ends with the Vāmadeva Indra-cycle refrain (vs. 11).

1. What of ours Indra enjoys and what he is eager for, that of ours will the great, explosive one arrange to be right here:
   the sacred formulation, the praise song, the soma, and the recitations—he, the bounteous, who goes on bearing the stone with strength,
2. The bull, hurling with his arms the four-edged (weapon), which is the repository of bullish strength—the powerful, most manly, able one, clothing himself in Paruṣṇī River [/gray] wool [=foam] for beauty—(the Paruṣṇī River) in whose tufts he has wrapped himself for partnership (with the Maruts).
3. The god who, being born as the best of gods, is great by reason of his prizes and his great explosive powers, having taken the eager mace in his arms, he makes heaven tremble by his onslaught, as well as earth,
4. (And) all the (river)banks and the many (river)beds—(and) heaven trembles, and the earth, before the towering one at his birth.
   The explosive one brings the two mothers here [=Heaven and Earth?], (brings) here (the milk? [=rain?]) of the cow. The winds in their circling roar constantly like men.
5. These great (deeds) of you, the great one, o Indra, are to be proclaimed at all the pressings:
   that, o daring champion, having dared with daring, you worked over the serpent with your mace and strength.
6. These (deeds) of yours all come true, o powerfully manly one: the cows stream forth from the udder of a bull; then, being afraid of you, o you of bullish mind, the rivers charge forth at speed.

7. Right now, o Indra, master of the fallow bays, with your help these goddesses, the sisters, are praised, when you let loose those (waters) that had been hard pressed, to let them flow along their long trajectory.
8. The (soma-)plant has been squeezed out like an exhilarating river. By the labor of the laboring (priest), might the skill of bright blazing (Agni) pull you here toward us, as a swift (horse pulls on) the powerfully strong reins of the cow [=leather?].
9. For us activate your highest, most distinguished manly strengths and powers altogether, o overpowering one.
For us weaken obstacles to become easily smashed: smash the deadly weapon of the rapacious mortal.
10. To us listen well, Indra; to us mete out glittering prizes.
To us you impel all plentiful gifts. For us become a giver of cows, o bounteous one.
11. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.23 (319) Indra (1–7, 11), Indra or R̥ta (8–10)

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

The most salient feature of this hymn is the insistent series of questions that dominate its first six verses. These questions all concern the sacrificers' relationship to Indra—which sacrificers have managed to attract and please Indra, how does Indra know who is sacrificing and where, who receives Indra's bounty and comradeship and by what means. A preliminary and oblique answer is given in the second half of verse 4: "the god will take cognizance of my truths," that is, my praise and sacred formulations, which will ensure that Indra will come to our sacrifice and share his bounty. This answer is elaborated upon in the last verses of the hymn. After this partial answer in verse 4 the questions take on a more intimate tone, inquiring into the nature of Indra's friendship with his worshipers, who are now his comrades, whereas the first four verses were more concerned with the mechanics of attracting Indra to our particular sacrifice. A striking feature of these question verses is that, despite the poet's eagerness for the presence and intimate comradeship of Indra, the god is always referred to in the 3rd person, and indeed the poet and sacrificers are almost always in the 3rd person as well. This 3rd-person distancing of Indra reminds us somewhat of the doubts expressed about Indra's existence or at least his whereabouts in other Ṛgvedic hymns; the 3rd-person reference suggests that the poet has not established the direct personal contact with the god that he desires.

Verse 7 serves as a transition to the amplified answers of verses 8–10. In verse 7 Indra prepares to destroy "the lie," the deceit that is inimical to the proper functioning of the cosmos. After Indra's destruction of the lie, the ubiquitous and all-powerful force of "truth" can be celebrated in the remaining verses (8–10, before the refrain verse 11). These three verses contain twelve instances of the word ṛtá "truth," most of them initial in their pāda. As Paul Thieme illuminatingly pointed out (1964: 30), ṛtá is the implicit answer to the questions posed earlier—the "how?" questions answered with "by means of truth," the "which sacrificer?" questions by "the one who produces truth." And we already saw that ṛtá as the answer was foreshadowed in the middle of the hymn (vs. 4cd). Thus we can satisfactorily resolve the apparent lack of connection between the first two-thirds of the hymn, with its barrage of questions about Indra and the sacrifice, and the last third, with its insistently repeated "truth" and absolutely no mention of Indra, that led the Anukramaṇī to suggest the possibility of two different divinities for the hymn (Indra 1–7, 11; Ṛta 8–10). Indra by destroying the lie (vs. 7) gave free rein to the workings of truth described in verses 8–10.

1. How did he [=priest?] strengthen the great one [=Indra]? Enjoying the sacrifice of what Hotar—(coming) to the soma as to an udder, eager for, enjoying, and drinking the stalk—has he waxed high for the blazing stakes?
2. What hero has reached shared exhilaration with him? Who has attained it with his good favor?
   Has his bright (course) appeared? Will he be here with help for the strengthening of the one who has labored, eager to sacrifice?
3. How does Indra hear (the call) being called? How, hearing it, does he know (the place for) his unhitching?
   What are his many distributions (of goods)? How do they call him a provider for the singer?
4. How will the man who has zealously labored and produced insights attain the material goods that belong to him [=Indra]?
   The god will take cognizance of my truths, when he has accepted the homage that he will enjoy.
5. How and what comradeship with a mortal does the god enjoy at the breaking of this dawn?
   How and what is his comradeship for his comrades, who have tugged their well-harnessed desire to him?
6. Is his comradeship then a drinking vessel for his comrades? When will we proclaim his brotherhood to you?
   The surges (of soma?) for him are a marvel, lovely to see for their beauty.
   He seeks (the milk?) from the cow, very bright like the sun.

7. Desiring to smash the lie, which is injurious and contrary to Indra, he sharpens the edges sharp for jabbing, after the powerful avenger of debts has also thrust our debts far away to unknown dawns.
8. Of truth there exist many riches. The vision of truth smashes the crooked, and the signal call of truth bored open deaf ears—(the signal call) of Āyu [=Agni], awakening and blazing.
9. Of truth the buttresses are firmly fixed; many are its gleaming marvels to be marveled at.
By truth the nourishments urge themselves along the long way, and by truth the cows approached truth.
10. (Whoever) holds fast to truth, just he wins truth. The explosive force of truth hastens swiftly as it seeks cattle.
For truth the two (worlds) are wide, ample, and deep; for truth do they, as the two highest milk-cows, give their milk.
11. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.24 (320) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 10

For most of its length (vss. 1–7), this hymn expresses in vivid language the familiar notion of competing parties invoking Indra for help and offering him sacrificial oblations and praise in return. Verses 3–5 are especially focused on the desperate efforts of the human antagonists to enlist Indra's might on their own side. It is also clear that the offerings made by the successful supplicants must be made just so: in addition to soma, a whole sacrificial menu is specified, with a special emphasis on cooked foods (see esp. vss. 5, 7).

The last three verses (8–10, before the Vāmadeva refrain in 11) lay bare the mechanism of the divine–human bargain that lies behind the first part of the hymn, and indeed behind the whole Ṛgvedic enterprise more generally. Rather than casting the exchange relations between men and gods in the rosy light of mutual benefit and voluntary cooperation, the verses present the acquisition of Indra's aid by mortals as a matter of cold-blooded haggling and crass calculations of price versus value received. In our interpretation, Indra even has an agent, in the person of his own wife. These verses are difficult, enigmatic, and apparently use the lexicon and phraseology of commercial transactions, a linguistic level barely attested elsewhere in Vedic. Consequently the meaning of the verses is much disputed, and we will provide here only our own interpretation (which follows Geldner's in many, but not all, ways).

In verse 8 Indra (or perhaps his wife, a possibility raised by Oldenberg and Geldner) takes a long hard look at the hostilities he's being asked to participate in, and his wife calls him back home, presumably to sit out the conflict or at least to hold out for a better offer. In fact, in verse 9 Indra reports on a failed bit of haggling. An unidentified party seems to have made a bad deal, offering a higher price for an inferior product, in this case probably the help of a god less powerful than Indra (9a). With Indra's own offer not accepted, he goes happily home "unsold" (9b), remarking that the other party did not seize his chance to replace the inferior product with a greater one, namely Indra himself (9c). He ends with what appears to be a maxim, mocking the negotiation prowess of the other party (9d). Verse 10, in our view (and ours alone?), is spoken by Indra's wife, hawking her husband and his obstacle-smashing talent and naming her price for his sale. The price, ten cows, seems very low for such a god (especially considering how many hundreds of cows are elsewhere given to mortal poets and priests, at least according to dānastutis), and so it is possible or even likely that this is a bitter and rhetorical question, complaining about the stinginess of mortal purchasers. In any case, it's a limited-term offer, as she expects Indra to be returned at the end of his mercenary service.

The allusion to dānastutis above was purposeful, for this little set of verses not only occupies the position of a dānastuti in this hymn, but also has the slangy and derisory tone of many dānastutis and the same recognition of the commercial underpinnings of the relationship between patron and client. It may even be that, using Indra's withdrawal as model, the poet is indirectly complaining about an ungenerous patron and threatening to withhold his poetic production unless he receives a better deal.

1. What good praise will turn Indra here—the son of strength, facing our way—for our benefit?
   For the hero is the giver of good things to the singer, and he is the herdsman of our tribute, o peoples.
2. He is to be summoned at the smashing of obstacles, he is to be invoked, and he is well praised—Indra, whose benefit is real.
   Here on his journey the bounteous one establishes wide space for the mortal soma-presser devoted to the sacred formulation.
3. Just to him do men separately call at the encounter. Having given up their bodies, they make him their preserver, when the men of both camps, on opposite sides, have come to abandon (their bodies) in the winning of offspring and descendants.
4. The settled peoples show their resolve at the hitching up (for battle), o powerful one, while they are gasping on opposite sides in the winning of the flood.

When the battling clans have rolled together, just then do those on the one side seek Indra at the moment of confrontation.

5. Just then do those on the other side perform sacrifice to his Indrian strength; just then would the cooked food succeed the offering cake;
just then would soma exclude the non-pressers; and just then does he [=Indra] find pleasure in the bull [=soma] for the sacrifice to proceed.
6. He [=Indra] makes wide space for the one who presses soma in just this way for Indra who is eager for it.
The man with fully focused mind who never loses the track—just him does he [=Indra] make his comrade in battles.
7. Whoever will press soma for Indra today, will cook the cooked foods, and will roast the grains—upon him will Indra, gladly receiving the recitations of the zealous one, confer his bullish explosive force.
8. When the ballsy one surveyed the clash, when he looked upon the long (war)drive of the stranger, his wife roared the bull (back) into the house, though he had been whetted sharp by the soma pressers.
9. [Indra:] "With a greater price he got a lesser deal. Unsold, I took pleasure in going (home) again.
He did not replace the lesser with a greater. Skimpy skills milk the bargain [?] dry."
10. [Indra's wife:] "Who buys this Indra of mine with ten cows, when he's going to smash obstacles? Then will he return him to me again?"
11. – Now praised, o Indra, now being sung, make refreshment swell for the singer like rivers.
A new sacred formulation has been made for you, o you of the fallow bays. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

IV.25 (321) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Although this hymn is superficially organized like IV.23, with a series of questions in the first part of the hymn that are answered in the second part, it lacks the structural subtlety of IV.23, where the answers to the questions are implied, not stated, and the questions themselves are quite varied. In this hymn the first three verses pose a set of questions about the sacrificer, all but one (kásya "whose?" in vs. 3c) introduced by nominative káḥ "who?" The benefits that accrue to the sacrificer so identified are detailed in most of the rest of the hymn (vss. 4–7), benefits highlighted by the corresponding ill fate of the non-presser and non-giver described in verses 6–7. The hymn ends (vs. 8) with a comprehensive list of all who call upon Indra.

A salient feature of this hymn is the focus on the various kinds of relationships a mortal may have with Indra: especially comradeship (vss. 1, 2, 6, 7), but also fellowship (literally yoke-fellowship, vs. 2), brotherhood (vs. 2), friendship (vs. 6), and kinship (vs. 6).

1. Who, a manly one with a desire for the god, eagerly enjoys the comradeship of Indra today?
   Or who, having his soma pressed when his fire has been kindled, reverently invokes him for his great and decisive help?
2. Who shows reverence with his speech to him deserving of soma, or becomes zealous at the breaking of the dawn?
   Who is eager for the fellowship of Indra, who for the comradeship, who for the brotherhood? Who (joins) together with his [=Indra's] help for the poet?
3. Who chooses the help of the gods today? Who reverently invokes the Ādityas and Aditi for light?
   Of whose pressed soma-plant do the Aśvins, Indra, and Agni drink without losing track in their mind?
4. For him will Agni, the fire of the Bhāratas, hold out shelter, and for a long time he will see the sun rising, who says, "Let us press soma for Indra"—for the manly man, for the best man of men.
5. The many do not overpower him, nor the few. Aditi will hold out wide shelter for him.
   Dear to Indra is the good performer (of sacrifice), dear the zealous man, dear the hard-striver, dear the provider of soma.
6. The swaggering victor, the hero—Indra—makes the cooked food of the hard-striver, the (soma-)presser, his own exclusive property.
   No friend of the non-presser, nor comrade, nor kinsman, he strikes down, deep down, the ill-strivers.
7. Indra does not agree to comradeship with a rich miser, nor does he, the drinker of pressed soma, (agree to it) with one who does not press.
   He rips away his possessions and smites him naked. He becomes manifest exclusively to the presser, for his cooked food.
8. Indra do they call—those higher, those lower, and those in the middle; Indra those travelling and Indra those settled down;
   Indra those dwelling peacefully and those fighting; Indra superior men competing for the prize.

IV.26 (322) Indra (1–3), Praise of Falcon (4–7) [Soma-Theft]

Vāmadeva Gautama
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The next two hymns treat the famous myth of the theft of Soma from heaven. Soma was being held captive in a well-fortified citadel there, guarded by an archer named Kr̥śānu. A falcon carried him off by stealth, and though shot at by Kr̥śānu, the bird only lost a single feather (a tale told more fully in several Brāhmaṇa accounts). Delivered to Manu, the first sacrificer, the soma was then available to be ritually prepared for Indra, who cannot perform his great deeds without it.

The first of the two hymns is entirely couched as the speech of Indra (in our view, though the Anukramaṇī assigns at least vss. 4–7 to the poet Vāmadeva and takes the first three verses either as Vāmadeva's speech [impersonating Indra] or as Indra's himself). It begins (vss. 1–3) as a standard Indra ātmastuti (self-praise), with 1st-person boasting about his deeds and identities; see, for example, X.48–49. (On the ātmastuti in general, see Thompson 1997.) In verse 4 he addresses his usual warrior band, the Maruts, with a laud of the falcon as the best of birds because of his soma-stealing exploit, which he then narrates in overlapping sequence (focusing on the central deed, "he brought [the soma]") in the remaining three verses (5–7). The last half of verse 7 alludes glancingly to the associated departure of the shadowy figure Plenitude, the personification (or rather deification) of plenty, a frequent companion of Soma's, presumably because of the association of the distribution of gifts with the performance of the Soma Sacrifice, especially the Morning Pressing. Judging from verse 7 in this hymn and verses 2–3 in the next one, Plenitude probably was carried away from heaven at the same time as Soma—though the poet expresses some doubts in IV.27.3.

1. I became Manu and the sun. I am Kakṣīvant, the inspired seer.
   I steered myself down to Kutsa, the son of Arjuna. I am Kavi Uśanā.
      Look at me!
2. I gave land to the Ārya; I (gave) rain to the pious mortal.
   I led the bellowing waters. It is my will that the gods followed.
3. I, in my exhilaration, broke apart all at once the nine and ninety fortresses of Śambara, and the hundredth, his dwelling place, to complete it, when I helped Divodāsa Atithigva.
4. Let that bird stand out from (all other) birds, o Maruts, the swift-flying falcon from (all other) falcons, because the fine-feathered one, with his independent power that needed no (chariot-)wheel, brought to Manu the oblation that is pleasing to the gods.
5. When he brought it from there, quivering (in fear), the bird, swift as thought, was sent surging along the wide path.

He traveled swiftly with the somian honey, and the falcon found fame here.

6. Flying straight, the falcon, the bird, hanging onto the plant, brought from afar the gladdening, exhilarating drink, the soma, holding it firmly, having the gods on his side, having taken it from yonder high heaven.
7. Having taken it, the falcon brought the soma, a thousand pressings and ten thousand all at once.
   Plenitude left behind the hostilities then, (as) in the exhilaration of soma the non-fool (leaves behind) fools.

IV.27 (323) Falcon (1–4), Falcon or Indra (5) [Soma-Theft]

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except śakvarī 5

The second of the pair of hymns devoted to the soma-theft, this one is told from Soma's point of view, with Soma speaking the first two verses (again, in our opinion), in which Soma engages in some ātmastuti of his own. He boasts of his own knowledge (vs. 1ab) and power (vs. 2ab), but also in almost breathlessly abrupt fashion relates the sudden appearance of the falcon, his rescuer (vs. 1d) from confinement (vs. 1b). Asserting that he was complicit in his escape (vs. 2ab), he then describes their departure, including that of Plenitude (see the introduction to the last hymn).

The next two verses (3–4) freeze the dramatic moment when the archer Kr̥śānu, guardian of Soma, shoots at the fleeing falcon with his precious cargo, and manages only to shoot off one feather. The final verse (5) depicts Indra about to drink the soma, now ritually prepared and offered by the priests. In keeping with the archery theme, the verb used of Indra's approach to the soma is an idiom (práti √dhā) ordinarily used of fixing an arrow to a bowstring and aiming it at the target.

1. [Soma:] Even though still in the womb, I knew all their births through and through—those of the gods—but a hundred metal fortifications guarded me. Then the falcon!—and swiftly I flew away.
2. [Soma:] He certainly did not carry me away against my will; I was superior to him in energy and valor.
   Plenitude left behind the hostilities (which were just standing) still, and (the falcon), swelling with strength, overtook the winds.
3. When the falcon then roared down from heaven, when—or if—they carried Plenitude away from there, when the archer Kr̥śānu, alert in mind, released and let fly his bow-string down toward him,

4. Flying straight, the falcon brought him to the companions of Indra from the lofty back (of heaven), just as (the Aśvins brought) Bhujyu (home, with their birds).
   A feather *of the winged one, of the bird launched then on its course, flew between (heaven and earth).
5. Now then the gleaming tub anointed with cows [=milk], the swelling, glistening stalk, the foremost of the honeyed drink held out by the Adhvaryus—bounteous Indra will aim it for drinking—the champion will aim it for drinking to exhilaration.

IV.28 (324) Indra, or Indra and Soma

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh

After the preceding two hymns devoted to the theft of soma and the preparation and offering of this ritual drink to Indra, this hymn shows the results, celebrating the great martial deeds that Indra was capable of, once he had acquired the soma. Indeed, Soma is presented as the equal partner of Indra in the performance of these deeds. The deeds themselves are the familiar ones: the slaying of Vṛtra in order to free the waters (vs. 1), the tearing off of the Sun's wheel with the Śuṣṇa saga obliquely alluded to (vs. 2), the destruction of earthly foes (vss. 3–4), and the opening of the Vala cave (vs. 5). The hymn is marked by a clever bit of ring composition: the waters freed from Vṛtra's imprisonment are as if "covered over" (ápihitā) in verse 1, while the same adjective "covered over" is found also in verse 5 (ápihitāni), where it refers both to those waters and to the cows freed from the Vala cave—thus suggesting the deep-structure similarity of those two myths.

1. With you as yokemate, o Soma, and in partnership with you, Indra made the waters flow for Manu.
   He smashed the serpent; he let the seven rivers stream. He opened them up, like holes that had been covered over.
2. With you as yokemate, o drop, Indra with his strength in a single day tore down the wheel of the Sun, which was rolling along the lofty back (of heaven). A whole lifetime of great deceit was set aside.
3. Indra smashed and Agni burned the Dasyus before midday at the moment of confrontation, o drop.
   With his missile he laid low many thousands of them, who were travelling to the house of no exit [=grave] as if by their own intention.
4. O Indra, you made the Dasyus the lowest of all and the Dāsa clans deprived of laud.

You two oppressed and crushed down your rivals and found requital with your deadly weapons.

5. In just this way (did it come) true, o bounteous ones: you two, o Indra and Soma, kept pounding the horse-pen and that of the cow;
   you gave leave to the things that were covered with the stone [=waters/cows] (to flow), having drilled through even the places of the earth.

IV.29 (325) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: triṣṭubh

A fairly straightforward invitation and journey hymn. Indra is urged to drive to our sacrifice, ignoring rival pressers, to drink soma jointly with us, and, as usual, to provide us with help and with wealth.

1. Praised, o Indra, with your fallow bays drive here right up to us, with prizes and with help, to find exhilaration for yourself; (drive) even across the many pressings of the stranger, being hymned by songs, as one whose benefit is real.
2. For the manly one, ever attentive, drives here, when being called by the pressers to the sacrifice—he who, with his good horses, thinking himself non-frightening, becomes exhilarated along with the heroes who have pressed the soma.
3. Cause his ears to hear—to rouse him, to make him reach exhilaration following our pleasing instruction.
   Boiling up and over for our benefit, powerful Indra will make fearlessness and good fords for us.
4. He who will come here with his help to a man in distress, to an inspired poet who calls and hymns just so—the mace-bearer putting his swift (horses) to the chariot-pole in person—hundreds and thousands (of them).
5. Aided by you, bounteous Indra, might we—inspired poets and patrons—hymning (you) be yours, for your giving of desirable (wealth) consisting of much livestock, as we receive our share of the wealth coming from lofty heaven.

IV.30 (326) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
24 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 8, 24, arranged in tr̥cas

This long hymn, constructed of triplets, begins with a celebration of Indra's supreme power (vss. 1–3) and ends with a summary of the same (vss. 22–23, with 24 a pendant). In between lies a catalogue of many of Indra's famous, and not so famous, deeds—though avoiding the most famous of these, the Vala and Vr̥tra myths (save in the repeated epithet "Vr̥tra-smasher," vss. 1, 19, 22). The most detailed treatments are of Indra's theft of the Sun's wheel (vss. 4–6) and the smashing of Dawn's cart (vss. 8–11), myths whose contents are not entirely clear to us, despite regular allusions to them. Both myths are also treated in X.138, and as in that hymn (see introductory remarks there), we see in both myths a reflection of Indra's assertion of control over cosmic time by deregulating it, at least temporarily. This theme seems to be announced in verse 3c, immediately preceding the story of the Sun's wheel.

The other deeds are related in cursory fashion, one per verse, and the abundance of forms of utá "and" emphasizes the additive nature of the hymn, especially in its second part. In this it resembles the catalogue hymns devoted to the Aśvins' rescues and favors to men.

1. There is no one higher than you, Indra, and no one superior, o Vr̥tra-smasher—no one who is exactly as you are.
2. Altogether do the peoples turn, like wheels, following all things that are yours.
   Altogether are you famed as great.
3. Not even all the gods (altogether) fought you, Indra, because of this:
   that by night you passed over the days.

4. When, for those hard pressed and for Kutsa as he fought, you stole the wheel from the Sun, o Indra;
5. When you fought the swaggering gods, all of them, even though you were alone, and you smashed the rapacious ones, o Indra;
6. And when for the mortal you let the Sun slip, and you helped Etaśa through your powers.

7. And after that are you (still) the one best possessed of battle fury, o bounteous smasher of obstacles?
   At that time you passed over Dānu (lying there),
8. And you performed this manly and masculine deed, Indra:
   that you smote a woman, the evilly angry daughter of Heaven.
9. The daughter of Heaven: though she was honored as great, you, the great, crushed Dawn completely.

10. Dawn ran away in fear from her cart, which was completely crushed, when the bull jabbed it down.
11. This cart of hers lies, very completely crushed, here at the Vipāś (River).
    She has run into the far distance.

12. And the River Vibālī, which had spread out upon the earth, did you hem in, Indra, by your magic power.

13. And you boldly seized the possessions of Śuṣṇa, when you completely crushed his fortresses.
14. And you struck Śambara, the Dāsa son of Kulitara, down from the lofty mountain, Indra.
15. And you smote the hundreds and thousands (of men) of the Dāsa Varcin, and five in addition, like the outer parts of wheels.

16. And to this unwed girl's son, who had been shunned, did Indra of a hundred resolves give a share in the recitations.
17. And these two, Turvaśa and Yadu, who could not swim, did the lord of powers, the knowing Indra, bring to the far shore.
18. And these two Āryas, Arṇa and Citraratha, did you strike at the same time to the far side of the Sarayu (River), o Indra.

19. You led along the two that had been abandoned, the blind man and the lame, o Vṛtra-smasher:
 that favor of yours is not to be equaled.
20. Indra threw open the hundred fortresses made of stone for the pious Divodāsa.
21. For Dabhīti, Indra "put to sleep" with his blows thirty thousand Dāsas by his magic power.

22. And you are that same herdsman, o Indra, Vṛtra-smasher, who set all these things in motion.
23. And now what masculine deed worthy of Indra you will do, o Indra, that no one shall thwart today.
24. Let the god Aryaman give everything of value to you, o Āduri—Pūṣan a valuable, Bhaga a valuable, the gap-toothed god a valuable.

IV.31 (327) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
15 verses: gāyatrī, probably arranged in tṛcas

Indra's help to us, in its manifold varieties, is a major subject in the hymn, which opens with a question about this help and regularly returns to the topic (vss. 3, 10, 12, 13). Because Indra's presence is required in order for us to receive his help, the hymn is also framed as a journey/invitation hymn. The second verse asks which soma drink will most appeal to Indra, a semi-disguised expression of the usual worry that Indra will be attracted by rival pressers. This worry seems also to underlie the difficult second tr̥ca (vss. 4–6), with its condensed phraseology. Here the poet first calls on Indra to come here (vs. 4), then seems (in our interpretation at least) to chide him slightly for tarrying (vs. 5), but finally announces (vs. 6) that Indra has arrived with both high spirits and equipment. (The references to the sun in vss. 5 and 6 are opaque, but we tentatively suggest that they refer to the early-morning soma sacrifice.) In the next tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) the poet seems reassured: despite Indra's wide-ranging travels his generosity never flags and nothing gets in its way.

In contrast to the middle verses 4–9, the last two tr̥cas (vss. 10–15) are quite straightforward and characterized by the insistent fronting of the pronoun "us/our," which opens every verse, as well as several intermediate pādas (10bc, 12c). The message is simple: help us and give to us in every way possible, ending with a wish for fame among the gods, fame higher than heaven itself (vs. 15).

1. With what help will our brilliant, ever-strengthening comrade be there for us—
   with what most powerful troop?
2. Which trusty one among the exhilarating drinks, which most bounteous one from the soma-stalk will exhilarate you to break loose good things, even though they are held fast?
3. As the helper of us, your comrades and your singers, you will prevail by your hundred means of help.

4. Turn toward us here—like a chariot-wheel turned toward its steeds—with your teams of the separate peoples.
5. For through the days you come here along the slope of your intentions, as if by foot.
   I have taken my share in company with the sun(rise).
6. Since your battle-frenzies, o Indra, since your chariot-wheels have converged (here), (I have taken my share) sometimes in (company with) you and sometimes in (company with) the Sun.

7. And because it is just you they always call a bounteous one, o lord of power,
   a giver who never thinks twice,
8. And (you) always (circle) around (the peoples? realms?) in a single day;
   on the laboring presser
   you bounteously bestow many goods.
9. For not even a hundred hindrances can block your generosity, nor your exploits when you will do them.

10. Let your hundred means of help help us, us your thousand, us all your superior powers.
11. Choose us here for comradeship, for well-being, for great, heavenly wealth.
12. Help us through all the days with wealth in profusion, o Indra—us with all your means of help.

13. For us open up these pens filled with cattle, as a sharpshooter (would), with your new means of help, o Indra.
14. Our brilliant chariot, not to be diverted, boldly speeds in its search for cattle and horses, o Indra.
15. Our fame—make it most preeminent among the gods, o Sun, and highest, as if above heaven.

IV.32 (328) Indra

Vāmadeva Gautama
24 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

This long final hymn of the Indra cycle of Maṇḍala IV is, in contrast to the earlier hymns in this cycle, quite straightforward for most of its length. The poet urges Indra to come to us, with help and gifts, and promises praises of his great deeds (though the celebration of his specific deeds within the hymn is cursory—consisting of part of vs. 10) and oblations.

Toward the end of the hymn, the requests for gifts become specific (esp. the tr̥ca of vss. 17–19) and somewhat peremptory (see esp. vs. 20). These verses (17–21) have the "feel" of a dānastuti, though they are without doubt addressed to Indra. The real dānastuti occupies the last tr̥ca (vss. 22–24), though the praise of Indra's gifts in the preceding verses obviously serves as model for the human patron. These last three verses, and especially the middle verse 23, are quite opaque and, like many dānastutis, contain slangy expressions and words belonging to a different, and lower, linguistic register. All three verses praise "the two brown ones," and the first of the verses announces itself as a formal praśasti (panegyric), with the verbal lexeme prá … śáṃsāmi. The referent of the two brown ones is unclear. The default assumption is horses, but the very peculiar verse 23 casts considerable doubt on this interpretation. We will not rehearse here the many strained interpretations of verse 23 (among which are some that concern puppets, some eyeballs) and simply provide our own. We suggest that the "two brown ones" are the two breasts of a woman given to the poet as a gift (along with cows and the like). (For what we take as similar praise of a gift-woman's breasts in a dānastuti, see VIII.2.42.) In verse 23 the poet compares the now-bared breasts to dolls on a post (the slender trunk of the woman, presumably), and the travels he refers to in verses 23–24 are, in our interpretation, their movements during sex. Although this interpretation is not entirely secure, the competing interpretations are even less so, and the prurient nature of our suggested contents would fit the marked linguistic register of the dānastuti.

1. Come here to us, o Indra Vṛtra-smasher, here to our side, as the great one with great means of help.
2. You are a whirlwind, constantly lunging. O brilliant one, you put the brilliance in the brilliant (females [=means of help?]) right here, for our help.
3. With only a few you smash the more numerous overweening (force) with your power, with the comrades who are in company with you.

4. We in company with you, Indra—we keep bellowing to you:
"Help us, only us!"
5. Come here to us, o master of the stone, with your brilliant means of help, which cannot be faulted or challenged.
6. Might we be comrades of one like you, Indra, possessed of cows, and be your yokemates for the sake of the thrilling prize.

7. Since you alone, Indra, are master of the prize possessed of cows, offer us great refreshment.
8. They cannot deflect you to another way, when, praised, you wish to give bounty to the praisers, o Indra longing for songs.
9. The Gotamas have bellowed to you with their song, for you to give the thrilling prize, Indra.

10. We shall proclaim your heroic deeds: that you in your exhilaration broke into the Dāsa fortresses, after having attacked them.
11. The ritual masters sing these deeds of yours—the manly deeds that you performed—at their pressings, o Indra longing for songs.
12. The Gotamas, whose vehicle is praise, have become strengthened in your company, Indra.
On them confer glory in heroes.

13. Even though you are the support common to each and every one, Indra, we summon you to us.
14. Become inclined toward us, o good one. Among us achieve exhilaration from the stalk, o Indra, soma-drinker of the soma-juices.
15. Let the praise song of our thoughts guide you here, Indra.
Turn your two fallow bays this way.

16. Our offering cake you shall eat, and you shall take pleasure in our songs,
    as a bride-seeking man does a maiden.
17. We beg Indra for a thousand paired horses in harness, for a hundred measures of soma.
18. Let us get hundreds and thousands of your cows driven here.
    Let your largesse come among us.

19. We have acquired ten tubs of golden (goods).
    You are the giver of much, o Vr̥tra-smasher.
20. O giver of much, give much to us. Not a little!—bring much here.
    Surely it is much that you want to give, o Indra.
21. Since you are famed in many places as the giver of much, o champion, Vr̥tra-smasher,
    give us a share in your largesse.

22. I solemnly proclaim the two brown ones of yours, o far-gazing grandson of the Goṣan.
    (But) with (the gift of) these two, don't slack off on (the giving of) cows!
23. Like two little baby-dolls on a post—the two new little ones, undressed—
    the two brown ones go in beauty on their travels.
24. Ready for me when I travel at dawn, ready (for me) when I don't,
    the two brown ones don't falter on their travels.

IV.33 (329) R̥bhus

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This is one of the most interesting of the R̥bhu hymns and one of the most significant for the interpretation of the R̥bhus. The R̥bhus are gods, but they are also priests, and much of the hymn refers to their work as sacrificial performers in the third soma pressing, the pressing with which they are associated (cf. vs. 11). This sacrificial work is sometimes directly expressed (e.g., vss. 2ab, 3cd, 9), but most often it is described in mythic narrative. For example, while verse 4 has been controversial, it likely refers to a distinctive rite of the Third Pressing in which the soma stalks already used in the first two pressings are beaten again to extract the soma juice for the Third Pressing. The "cow" that one R̥bhu tends is the soma stalks, which are thoroughly mangled or "carved" in the pressing and then "carried" away. Because the R̥bhus prepared the soma or perhaps even created the Third Pressing, they "attained immortality" and became gods. This leaves unexplained the verse's repeated reference to the "year," but perhaps the year represents the sacrificial day or even the period of the Third Pressing.

The next verses (5–6) describe the institution of the Third Pressing. The principal soma recipients in the Third Pressing are Indra and the three R̥bhus. The four soma cups that the R̥bhus construct from the one made by Tvaṣṭar thus represent the four soma recipients and the extension of the soma rite into the Third Pressing. Unfortunately, the narrative returns to deeper obscurity in verse 7. The story of the R̥bhus and Agohya occurs in other R̥bhu hymns (I.110.2–3 and 161.11–12), but none of the hymns provides enough information to know who Agohya is or the significance of the R̥bhus' slumber in the house of Agohya. If there is a ritual reference here, it may be to an Atirātra or overnight soma rite, in which the Third Pressing is extended through the night into the next day. If that is the case, then the poet could be conflating different units of time as in verse 4, and the "twelve days" they remained with Agohya could be the hours of the night. One possibility is that Agohya is Savitar (cf. I.110.2–3), and that identification too would point to the night since Savitar is associated with the night. In verse 8 the "smooth running" chariot that stands still may be the sacrifice, elsewhere compared to a chariot, but the "all-rousing milk-cow of all shapes" remains elusive.

Although there is significant competition for this honor, perhaps the most obscure of the stories is that of the R̥bhus' rejuvenation of their parents (vss. 2–3ab). Their parents could be the sacrificer and his wife, who has an important ritual role in the Third Pressing and whose sexual power is a theme of that pressing. Or they could even be the two Aśvins, who in the classical soma rite are invoked in the morning following an overnight soma rite. The word pitárā, though understood here and usually as an elliptical dual referring to father and mother, can mean "two fathers," perhaps an oblique reference to the Aśvins. The Aśvins are part of the Morning Pressing and their reappearance at the end of the rite could constitute a kind of rejuvenation.

The difficulties in the interpretation of the narratives in this hymn are reflected in some of the language of the hymns, especially at its beginning and end. The first verse imitates the clever artisanship of the R̥bhus by its own verbal intricacy. In pāda c the phrase táráṇibhir évaiḥ could be translated "along their transiting ways" and mean that the R̥bhus move actually or figuratively along the courses that cross heaven. But taráṇi can also mean "surpassing," and therefore the phrase might also refer to the "surpassing" ritual skill of the R̥bhus by which they encompass heaven. With equal justification, therefore, we could translate "(The R̥bhus,) sped by the wind, by their surpassing ways have encompassed heaven. . . ." Pāda b interrupts and separates pāda a from cd, which continue it. In pāda b it is not clear what the "śvaitarī cow" is—it could be a kind of cow as Geldner suggests—but śvaítarī carries or suggests the sense of "gleaming white" and points to the identification of the cow as milk. If the priest has just drunk it, milk might form an underlayer of his speech, which he then offers to the gods. The infinitive upastíre "to spread an underlayer" evokes the upastáraṇa, the underlayer of butter that accompanies a puroḍāśá or barley cake offering.

The last verse has a different kind of complexity. Pāda b begins ná ṛté śrāntásya, and the problem particularly involves the word ṛté. The simplest and most common reading is to translate ṛté as "except," but it would then normally govern an ablative noun and there is none to be had. Our suggestion is that there is an ellipsis of an ablative sakhyā́t "companionship." But further, we also suggest that ṛté is a śleṣa, a pun, and means not only "except," but also "in the truth," that is, "according to the proper order of the sacrifice." In this sense the word is construed with śrāntá "labored." To try to capture the double meaning, we have translated the word twice in these two senses.

1. To the Ṛbhus I send forth my speech like a messenger—I call upon the śvaitarī milk-cow to spread an underlayer (for it)— to the artisans who, sped by the wind along their transiting ways, have encompassed heaven in a day.
2. When the Ṛbhus made fit preparations for their parents by their attentiveness, industry, and wondrous skills, right then they came into companionship with the gods. Clever, they brought prosperity to their zeal.
3. They who made their parents, lying aged like two old posts, youths again—
   let them—Vāja, Vibhvan, and Ṛbhu together with Indra—delighting in the honeyed (soma), help our sacrifice.
4. When the Ṛbhus guarded the cow through the year, when the Ṛbhus carved the meat through the year, when they carried her leavings through the year, they attained immortality by these labors.
5. The eldest said, "I will make two cups (from one)." The younger said, "We will make three."
   The youngest said, "I will make four." O Ṛbhus, Tvaṣṭar wondered at that speech of yours.
6. The noble men spoke the truth, for they did exactly that. According to their will, the Ṛbhus followed that (will of theirs).
   Having seen the four cups, Tvaṣṭar gazed at them, bright shining like days.
7. When the Ṛbhus enjoyed the hospitality of Agohya for twelve days, sleeping (there),
   (then) they made the fields good and led the rivers; plants arose upon the dry land and waters upon the low ground.
8. Who made the chariot smooth running and standing still for men, who (made) the all-rousing milk-cow of all shapes—let these Ṛbhus fashion wealth for us, they of good help, good work, and good hands.
9. Because the gods were pleased at their work, reflecting on it according to their purpose and with their thought,

Vāja became the doer of right action for the gods, R̥bhukṣan for Indra, and Vibhvan for Varuṇa.

10. They who by their wisdom, finding exhilaration in the hymns, made the two fallow bays for Indra, they who made his easily hitched horses—you!—establish for us possessions and the prospering of wealth. Establish an alliance (with us), R̥bhus, like those dwelling in peace.

11. At this time of the day they have established drink and exhilaration for you. The gods are not in companionship (with men) except (for their companionship) with him who has labored in the truth.
Now, o R̥bhus, establish good things for us at this Third Pressing.

IV.34 (330) R̥bhus

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is built upon an urgent appeal that the R̥bhus and Indra reward and prosper the sacrificers. That desire is expressed especially in the repetitions of the noun ratnadhéya "the conferring of treasure" and adjective ratnadhá/-dhā́ "conferring treasure." Ratnadhéya (1b, 4a, 11d) occurs in the first and last verses and thereby frames the hymn; ratnadhá/-dhā́ (6d, 7d, 8d) is in the opening verses of the second half of the hymn. This repetition is amplified by the closely related phrases rayíṃ √dhā "confer riches" (10b) and rātíṃ √dhā "confer a gift" (10d), in the final verse before the extra-hymnic concluding verse 11.

Such word and sound repetition is a broader strategy of this poet. So pādas 5a, 5c, and 6a all begin with ā́ "here" and their following pādas open with an m-sound and repeat nasals, while using relatively few stops: 5b mahó naro dráviṇaso gr̥ṇānā́ḥ, 5d imā́ ástaṃ navasvà iva gman, 6b imáṃ yajñáṃ námasā hūyámānāḥ. The result is a humming sound reminiscent of stotra chants in the classical Vedic rite. Then 6c, 7a, 7b, 8a, 8b, 8c, and 8d begin with forms of sajóṣas "together" to emphasize the collectivity of gods who receive the soma. And finally, in a mirroring of verses 5–6, pādas 9a, 9c, and 10a begin with yé "who."

Implicit in the hymn is an insistence that the R̥bhus, even if they were once mortals, are now gods, able to bestow gifts on the sacrificers. Verse 3 defines their dual status as divine recipients of soma and as priests who offered soma. The sacrifice belongs to them, for as priests "like Manu" they long ago offered the sacrifice, but they also received it as gods. They are called sūrí "patrons" (6c), a term that can apply to sacrificers or to gods who reward the priests of the sacrifice. In 11cd the R̥bhus are invoked to receive the soma together with unnamed kings, who again could be divine or human. But the poet places particular emphasis on their divinity. The linking of the R̥bhus with Indra, especially at the beginning and end of the hymn (1a, 5a, 6c, 11c), more than just names the principal divine recipients at the Third Pressing; it also reaffirms the divinity of the R̥bhus through their close relationship to Indra. In verses 7–8 the poet directly addresses Indra and invites him to drink the soma together with many of the other deities who receive offerings at the soma pressings, and then adds the R̥bhus (8b) to his address and to these divinities. The poet even creates an icon of their achievement of divinity. The one time in this hymn that they are directly called gods is the very last word of the last verse, which forms a climax to the hymn.

One final note: at the beginning of the hymn, the poet names the three R̥bhus: R̥bhu, Vibhvan, and Vāja. Normally, the three together are called R̥bhus, of course, but elsewhere and here they can also be invoked by elliptical plurals of either of the other two names. In this hymn they are called Vājas in successive verses (3d, 4c, and 5a), an address likely inspired by the epithet vā́jaratna "whose treasure is victory's prize" in verse 2. In 9d they are called Vibhūs, obviously patterning with Vibhvan. In the first half of verse 9 the poet associates the name "R̥bhu" with the gods' typical deeds: they created a chariot for the Aśvins, rejuvenated their parents, and fashioned a cow and two horses. As noted before, most of these deeds refer to priestly action, since the chariot can be the sacrifice, the parents either the Aśvins themselves or the sacrificer and his wife, the cow the soma stalks, and the two horses the horses that bring Indra to the sacrificial area. In 9cd the poet uses the name "Vibhū" (or the form may be "Vibhu") and the deeds he describes are more unusual. The R̥bhus do not elsewhere make armor, so the significance of this story is obscure. The other two deeds echo the plea for prosperity. As Geldner has noted, Yāska understands ŕ̥dhak both in the sense of "separate" (pr̥thak) and "prospering" (r̥dhnuvan). The first is the proper meaning of ŕ̥dhak, but if the second is suggested by the word's similarity to √r̥dh "prosper," then the verse implies that the Vibhūs both create and prosper the sacrificer's world.

1. Let R̥bhu, Vibhvan, Vāja, and Indra travel here toward this our sacrifice and toward their conferring of treasure (here), for at this time of the day [=evening] the goddess Holy Place has placed the drink (of soma) for you. The exhilarating draughts have gathered for you.
2. And knowing of your origin, o you whose treasure is victory's prize, find exhilaration according to the ritual sequences, o R̥bhus.
   The exhilarating draughts have gathered for you, (as has) Plenitude. Send here a wealth of good heroes for us.
3. R̥bhus, this sacrifice now has been made for you, which you, like Manu, established for yourselves from of old.
   Those (draughts of soma), giving pleasure, have come forth for you here, and you all have come to the fore (to receive them), o Vājas.
4. Now there has come to be the conferring of treasure for him honoring you, for the pious mortal, o fine men.
   Drink, o Vājas, o R̥bhus! The great Third Pressing has been given to you for your exhilaration.

5. Travel here toward us, o Vājas, o Master of the R̥bhus [=Indra] and R̥bhus, o you fine men of great possessions, since you are being sung (by us).
   These (soma-)draughts have come here for you in the evening of the day, as newly calved (cows come) home.
6. O children of strength, travel here toward this sacrifice, being summoned with reverence.
   Together, o patrons and (the one) to whom you belong [=Indra], drink of the honey [=soma] along with Indra, as those who confer treasure.
7. Together with Varuṇa, o Indra, (drink) the soma. Together with the Maruts, drink the soma, o you longing for the songs.
   With those drinking first, with those drinking in ritual sequence, (drink) together; with the Wives (of the Gods) conferring treasure, (drink) together.
8. Together with the Ādityas become exhilarated; o R̥bhus, together with the mountains; together with the divine Savitar; together with the rivers, conferring treasure.
9. The R̥bhus, who (did for) the two Aśvins and who (did for) their parents, who fashioned the cow through their help, who the two horses;
   the Vibhūs, who (made) the armor (of the gods?), who (made) the two world-halves to be separated, and who have done (the deeds) bringing good descendants, 10. You who confer riches abundant in cattle, in prizes of victory, in good heroes, in goods, and in much livestock—o R̥bhus, as those drinking first and finding exhilaration, confer your gift on us and (on those) who sing of it.
11. You have not kept away. We have not let you be thirsty, o R̥bhus, nor are you unpraised in this sacrifice.
    You become exhilarated along with Indra, along with the Maruts, and along with kings for the sake of your conferring of wealth, o gods.

IV.35 (331) R̥bhus

Vāmadeva Gautama
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins by addressing the R̥bhus with a patronymic Saudhanvan "sons of Sudhanvan." This use of the patronymic and thus the emphasis on their birth accents their original humanity. But through their ritual work, they "went along the path of immortality" and so entered the community of gods (3cd). The poet returns to this theme also at the end of the hymn in verse 8. He states that the Ṛbhus became gods through their work (8a) and recalls that they were human—once again through addressing them with their patronymic—before they became immortal (8d). The concluding verse then invites the divine Ṛbhus together with Indra to receive the soma at the Third Pressing.

In the middle section of the hymn the poet mentions several of the Ṛbhus' great deeds (vs. 5), but his focus is on their act of dividing one soma cup into four (vss. 2–4). According to this hymn, Indra alone is the recipient of soma in the Midday Pressing, but Indra and the three Ṛbhus are the principal soma recipients in the evening (vs. 7). The creation of four cups from one thus marks the transition from the single soma offering to Indra at midday to the four offerings in the evening and the institution of the Third Pressing.

1. Travel here, children of strength! Do not keep away, o Ṛbhus, sons of Sudhanvan, for in this pressing the conferring of treasure is yours. Let your exhilarating draughts follow after Indra.
2. The Ṛbhus' conferring of treasure has come here; the drinking of well-pressed soma has become (yours), since by your good work and your good labor you divided the single cup fourfold.
3. You divided the cup fourfold; you said, "O companion, work to cut it apart!"
   Then, o Vājas, you went along the path of the immortality to the throng of gods, o Ṛbhus of skilled hands.
4. Of what was this cup made, which you divided into four by your artistry?
   Now then press the soma-pressing for your exhilaration; drink of the soma-honey, o Ṛbhus!
5. By your ability you have made your parents to be young; by your ability you have made the cup from which the gods drink.
   By your ability you fashioned the two swift-running fallow bays that convey Indra, o Ṛbhus whose treasure is victory's prize.
6. Who presses for you in the evening of the day the sharp pressing for exhilaration, o Vājas, for him, o Ṛbhus, fashion wealth that consist of hale heroes since you find exhilaration, o bulls.
7. In the early morning you drank the pressed soma, o you with the fallow bays [=Indra]; the Midday Pressing is yours alone.
   Drink together with the treasure-conferring Ṛbhus, whom you made your companions by their good work.
8. You who became gods by your good work—settle down upon heaven like falcons!
   Confer treasure, o children of strength! O sons of Sudhanvan, you became immortal.

9. The Third Pressing, the conferring of treasure, which you made by your good labor, o you of skillful hands, that is poured all around here for you, o R̥bhus. Drink it along with the exhilarating draughts belonging to Indra!

IV.36 (332) R̥bhus

Vāmadeva Gautama
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 9

The first half of this hymn turns on the "proclamation" of the divinity of the R̥bhus and of their deeds (vss. 1, 3, 5) and the second on the prosperity they bring. The first verse already establishes the central themes of the hymn. The chariot with three wheels that rolls through space is likely the ritual with its three fires or possibly with its three soma-pressings. And just as the ritual flies from earth to heaven, so the R̥bhus prosper both earth and heaven.

The ritual is key to the R̥bhus, since it is through their ritual acts that they became divine, and they continue to perform ritual acts, even as divinities. Verse 2 again refers to their perfect chariot—the perfect ritual that the R̥bhus carried out through their insight. Because they rode to heaven on that ritual, they are now offered soma at the Third Pressing (2cd). Verses 3–4 rehearse three of the well-known deeds of the R̥bhus, which are united by a sonic repetition: they rejuvenate their parents in order for them "to keep going" (caráthāya); in order to make the four principal soma offerings at the Third Pressing they "divided" one "cup into four" (ví cakra camasáṃ cáturvayam); and "out of a cowhide" (cármaṇaḥ) they made a milk-giving cow. The cowhide in 4b may be a hide on which the stalks of the soma plant are beaten (the adhiṣavaṇacarman) to produce the soma juice. Since at the Third Pressing the stalks used in the first two pressings are beaten again to extract the soma juice, therefore the great deed of the R̥bhus might have been that they were able to extract more soma juice on the cowhide from old stalks and in that way make the cowhide into a cow once again, who gives soma as its milk. Or the cowhide may refer to the soma stalks themselves, the shredded remains of the previous pressings that are made to yield soma once again.

In the second half of the hymn (vss. 5–9) the poet turns principally to the rewards that the R̥bhus bring. The poet announces the theme in verse 5 by proclaiming that those whom the R̥bhus help have "wide boundaries"—broad horizons, we might say. Great men, whether poets or warriors, are great because of the R̥bhus (vs. 6), and through the R̥bhus people gain wealth (5a, 6c, 8d), vigor (8d), fame (5a, 9bc), and descendants (9a).

1. Produced without horse and rein, the praiseworthy chariot with its three wheels rolls through the airy space.
   This is the great proclamation of your divinity: that you prosper heaven and earth, o R̥bhus.

2. The very perceptive ones who made from mind by insight the smooth-running chariot, which never overturns—
   (to you,) o Vājas, o R̥bhus, we now dedicate (the soma) of this pressing for you to drink.
3. Your greatness became well proclaimed among the gods, o Vājas, R̥bhus, and Vibhūs:
   that you fashion your parents as youths for them to keep going, even though they were enfeebled, worn out by age.
4. You divided the single cup into four; out of a cowhide you made a cow to flow (milk) by your insights.
   So then you attained immortality among the gods by your obedience, o Vājas, R̥bhus: that is your praiseworthy (attainment).
5. From the R̥bhus comes wealth that best brings the foremost fame, which the men famed as Vājas have produced, that is fashioned by the Vibhvans, that is to be proclaimed at the ritual distributions. Whom you help, o gods, he has wide boundaries.
6. He is a prizewinning charger; he a seer through his verbal artfulness; he a champion, an archer, who is difficult to overcome in battles;
   he has received an increase of his wealth and he an abundance of good heroes—he, whom Vāja and Vibhvan, whom the R̥bhus have helped.
7. An excellent, beautiful robe has been placed upon you: (this) song of praise, o Vājas, R̥bhus. Take pleasure in it!
   Because you are insightful poets perceiving inspired words, we dedicate (it) to you with this formulation.
8. You who know all the things that nourish men, for us (fashion) from the Holy Places [=the ritual ground] the highest heavenly prize that brings the explosiveness of a bull; fashion for us wealth and vitality, o R̥bhus.
9. Giving offspring here and wealth here, fashion here for us the fame that heroes accompany.
   The bright prize by which we would be brilliant beyond others, o R̥bhus, have you given to us.

IV.37 (333) R̥bhus

Vāmadeva Gautama
8 verses: triṣṭubh 1–4, anuṣṭubh 5–8

Meter divides this hymn into two parts: the first half is in trimeter and the second in dimeter. That might indicate that the two parts were originally two different hymns, but the two parts show a thematic unity. Running through the hymn is the explicit and implicit image of the horse, although the meaning of the horse is constantly changing. The first verse does not mention a horse, but it invites the R̥bhus to come in their chariots to the sacrifice, so the horse implicitly carries the R̥bhus. In 4a the bahuvrīhi pī́voaśva might mean "(having) fat horses," but we have taken it to refer to the butter offerings belonging to the R̥bhus, and therefore we have translated "(having) horses of fat," just as the R̥bhus' "blazing chariots" in the bahuvrīhi śucádratha likely refers to the sacrificial fires. In 4b the R̥bhus themselves are addressed as prize-winning horses. The theme then becomes more pronounced in the second half of the hymn. In verse 5b they are summoned as a team of horses, and in 5d at least one of them is called a horseman. In verse 6 the sacrificer's horse, here probably the hymn, is a steed that makes him a winner. And finally in verse 8 the wealth that the R̥bhus bring may be a horse, but this verse is problematic and discussed in more detail below.

One of the lexical features of the hymn is the wording of the invocation to the Vājas and R̥bhukṣans. These are elliptical plurals. The "Vājas" refers to all three R̥bhus, who are most commonly named R̥bhu, Vāja, and Vibhvan. "R̥bhukṣan," which means "Master of the R̥bhus," can refer to Indra, but it can also be a name for one of the R̥bhus, that is, the R̥bhu who is named "R̥bhu." The plural R̥bhukṣans here, therefore, are probably again just the three R̥bhus. In verse 5 the poet encodes two R̥bhus in the appellative use of their names: R̥bhu in r̥bhú "craftsman" (5a) and Vāja in vā́ja "prize" (5b). The name of the third R̥bhu, Vibhvan or Vibhū, does not appear in this verse, or anywhere else in the hymn. However, he may be the horseman (aśvín) in 5cd, for horses are "wide-ranging" (vibhú), as in III.6.9b vibhávo hí áśvāḥ "for your horses are wide-ranging." The word aśvínam also anticipates the invocation of the Nāsatyas, that is, the Aśvins, in verse 8. The addition of the Aśvins may point to the use of this hymn in an Atirātra or Overnight Soma Rite, since in that rite the Aśvins are summoned in the early morning after the soma-pressing day.

Verse 3 poses some difficulty because tryudā́ya, here translated "thrice ascending," is a hapax of unsure meaning. Perhaps wisely, Geldner does not try translating it at all. Sāyaṇa links tri- "three" to the three soma pressings, but the R̥bhus do not receive soma at the Morning or Midday Pressings. Therefore, while -udā́ya likely does describe soma pressing (sávana), tri- may refer to three soma offerings to the three R̥bhus.

But the most problematic verse is the last, and our interpretation is tentative. The verse appears to refer to a Horse Sacrifice. In the classical rite the horse is released to wander through various territories before it is finally sacrificed. Here the horse is the wealth that the R̥bhus, Indra, and the Aśvins bring from surrounding lands. As the sacrificial horse is slaughtered and cut up, so wealth is generously apportioned to the sacrificers.

1. Travel toward our rite, o Vājas, o R̥bhukṣans, you gods, along the paths the gods travel, just as you established the sacrifice for yourselves among these clans of Manu on a clear day of days, o you who bring joy.

2. Let the sacrifices be (pleasing) to your heart and mind: pleasing, they go today clothed in ghee.
   The full pressings will give you joy, and when drunk, they will inspire you to determination and skill.
3. Just as the thrice ascending (soma-pressing) has been established by the gods for you and the praise song has been given to you, o Vājas, o R̥bhukṣans,
   I, like Manu, offer the soma among the clans below [=humans] to you together with the (clans) of lofty heaven [=gods].
4. Be those with horses of fat and blazing chariots, with lips of bronze and fine neck-ornaments, o you prizewinners!
   O son of Indra and children of strength, the first (of the soma) has been assigned to you for your exhilaration.
5. O R̥bhukṣans, we summon the craftsman who is wealth, the team of best prizewinning horses at (the contest for) the prize, and, together with Indra, the horseman who is always best at winning.
6. The mortal whom you and Indra help, o R̥bhus—through his insights, let just him be a winner in winning wisdom and let him (be a winner) with his steed.
7. For us clear away paths (to enable us) to sacrifice, o Vājas, o R̥bhukṣans, in order (for us) to cross all regions, since you are praised, o patrons.
8. (Cut up) that wealth for us, o Vājas, R̥bhukṣans, Indra, and Nāsatyas, (which is the sacrificial) horse from the border lands. Cut it up abundantly to give (us) bounties.

IV.38 (334) Heaven and Earth (1), Dadhikrā (2–10)

Vāmadeva Gautama
10 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn and the next two (IV.39–40) are dedicated to a horse known as Dadhikrā(van), a prizewinning racer and a warhorse. Although no doubt in part referring to a real horse belonging to Trasadasyu, king of the Pūrus, it also represents the sacrificial horse of the great royal sacrifice, the Aśvamedha, and a symbol of Pūru, and then general Ārya, hegemony. In this capacity it is compared to the sun, in the last, triumphal verse.

What the reader will notice most, however, is the exuberance and precision of the equine imagery, emphasizing especially the headlong speed of the horse and his constant goal: groups of female animals, presumably mares. The sense of speed is enhanced by the regular use of "and" to string verses together; indeed, the hymn begins with one. Unfortunately some of the imagery is not entirely clear; see especially verse 4, where some of the translation is provisional.

Although the Anukramaṇī assigns the first verse to Heaven and Earth, it is more likely that Mitra and Varuṇa are the referents of the unspecified duals.

1. And since the earlier gifts were from you two [=Mitra and Varuṇa], the ones that Trasadasyu was to send spilling down for the Pūrus, you have (also) given the one [=horse] who wins dwelling places, who wins meadows, a bane for the Dasyus, overwhelming, powerful.
2. And a prizewinner providing many fulfillments have you given—Dadhikrā, who belongs to all the communities, a straight-flying falcon, frothing at the mouth, swift, to be constantly celebrated by the stranger, a champion like a lord of men.
3. The one whom every Pūru applauds in excitement as he runs as if down an easy slope—greedy with his hooves like a champion seeking his meal, outstripping chariots, swooping like the wind.
4. The one who, hemming in the things to be seized in battles, keeps going to (the contests for) cows as one better at winning, foaming visibly, setting his attention on the (rites of) distribution, across the circlet (of fire? the sun?), around the waters of Āyu.
5. And the settled peoples shriek after him at his raidings as if after a thief who steals clothes, as he makes his way downward like a famished falcon toward fame and a herd full of livestock.
6. And desiring to run first, he keeps bearing down upon them (fem. [=mares?]), with the ranks of chariots, garlanding himself like a resplendent groomsman, constantly licking the dust, having bitten the grit.
7. And this prizewinner, victorious, truthful, himself seeking fame with his own body in the clash, hastening headlong toward them (fem. [=mares?]) as they go hastily, straight-flying, scatters dust up to the eyebrows as he stretches out straight.
8. And they take fear at his charge as he shows his mettle, as if at the thundering of heaven.
When a thousand have battled him, the fearsome one becomes difficult to obstruct, as he stretches out straight.
9. And the peoples admire the speed of him who fills the territories, the superiority of the swift one.
And they say about him as they disperse at the encounter: "Dadhikrā has run away with thousands."
10. Dadhikrā has stretched over the five peoples with his vast power, like the sun over the waters with its light.
Gaining thousands, gaining hundreds, let the prizewinning steed infuse these words with honey.

IV.39 (335) Dadhikrā

Vāmadeva Gautama
6 verses: triṣṭubh, except anuṣṭubh 6

In this celebratory hymn the very real and physical horse of the preceding hymn (IV.38) has become a mere recipient of and occasion for a formal encomium. He is invoked along with a number of gods and thus appears to have achieved a measure of divinity, but the artistry of IV.38 has been replaced by the deployment of stiff and conventional formulae. It is, however, interesting to see how an encomium of this sort, presumably a particular type of occasional verse, would be constructed.

1. The swift Dadhikrā—him will we now praise, and we will pay tribute to Heaven and to Earth.
   Let the Dawns, dawning, sweeten me. They will lead me across all difficult passages.
2. Fulfilling my conception, I pay tribute to the great steed, to Dadhikrāvan, the bullish one of many favors, whom, triumphant, shining like fire, you gave to the Pūrus, o Mitra and Varuṇa, as one triumphant for the Pūrus.
3. Whoever has paid tribute to the horse Dadhikrāvan when the fire has been kindled at the break of dawn, him let Aditi make without offense, in concert with Mitra and Varuṇa.
4. Once we (have paid tribute to) the refreshment and the great nourishment of Dadhikrāvan, and have brought to mind the auspicious name of the Maruts, we call upon Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni, and mace-armed Indra for well-being.
5. Both (sides) vie in invoking (him) just like Indra, as they rouse themselves and reverently approach the sacrifice.
   Dadhikrā, who makes sweetness for the mortal, have you, o Mitra and Varuṇa, given to us as our horse.
6. Dadhikrāvan have I paid tribute to—the victorious, prizewinning horse.
   He will make our mouths fragrant; he will lengthen our lifetimes.

IV.40 (336) Dadhikrā (1–4), Sūrya (5)

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 1

The first verse of the hymn is in the same formal style as the preceding hymn, and in fact is almost slavishly based on IV.39.1; it is also in the same meter (triṣṭubh) as that hymn. But when the hymn turns to jagatī, its style changes dramatically—to the exuberant, inventive, playful descriptions of the first Dadhikrā hymn, IV.38. The three middle verses (3–5) capture the dizzying speed and agility of the horse as he races around the track, as they compare him to a bird swooping in full flight. The language is equally dizzying and agile: the poet is fond of phonetic and morphological figures, several of them involving morphologically impossible hapaxes concocted by phonologically manipulating underlying morphology. (See esp. vs. 2.)

The final verse (5) is an explosion of morphological figures: eight compounds ending in -sád- "sitting" (pādas abc), growing closer and closer together, followed by four ending in -jā́- "born" crammed into the final pāda—which culminates in the last word ṛtám "truth." The referent of all these compounds is no longer the horse Dadhikrā, at least not directly. Rather, as with the last verse of IV.38, the horse is now identified with cosmic forces—the sun, but probably also the ritual fire—and these in turn identified with the king. (See Proferes 2007: 127–28.) This verse is much repeated and employed in later Vedic texts.

1. Just to Dadhikrāvan will we now pay tribute—let all the Dawns sweeten me—and to the Waters, Agni, Dawn, and the Sun, also to Bṛhaspati Āṅgirasa, the victorious.
2. A consummate warrior seeking plunder, seeking cattle, he will seek fame in a rush to the distance, in a headlong rush to the refreshments of Dawn.
   The real thing—running, running faster, flying—Dadhikrāvan gives birth to refreshment, nourishment, and the sun.
3. And (the wind) fans up his "feathers" [=mane], like the feathers of a bird in greedy pursuit, while he runs and rushes headlong, while he swoops like a falcon around the curving (racecourse), while he keeps advancing with his vigor—Dadhikrāvan.
4. And this prizewinner, bound at neck, shoulder, and mouth, rushes headlong to the lash—Dadhikrā, growing stronger and stronger following his will, galloping and galloping following the curves of the paths.
5. A goose sitting in the gleaming (waters), a good one sitting in the midspace, a Hotar sitting at the vedi, a guest sitting in the dwelling, sitting among men, sitting in the choice place, sitting in truth, sitting in high heaven, water-born, cow-born, truth-born, stone-born—Truth.

IV.41 (337) Indra and Varuṇa

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

Though immediately preceding the great Indra–Varuṇa dialogue hymn IV.42, with its themes of contested sovereignty and complementary divine and human royal functions, this hymn, also dedicated to Indra and Varuṇa, is a relatively simple and straightforward joint praise of and appeal to the two divinities as an undifferentiated pair. The poet speaks repeatedly of his desire for the friendship and companionship of the two gods, repeatedly asks them for their help, and seeks material gain from them as well. Although the gods are not treated separately, the contents reflect Indra's qualities more than Varuṇa's, for the two are especially beseeched for aid in defeating rivals in contest and battles (vss. 2, 4, 6, 7, 11, with imagery derived from contests in vss. 8–9).

1. O Indra and Varuṇa, which praise song obtains your favor, bringing oblations like the immortal Hotar?
   (The one) spoken by us, which, filled with resolve, filled with homage, will touch your heart, o Indra and Varuṇa.
2. Indra and Varuṇa—the mortal who has made the two gods his own friends for comradeship, bringing them pleasing offerings, he smashes obstacles and his rivals in clashes; by your great forms of help he becomes far-famed.
3. Indra and Varuṇa are the best at providing treasure to men who have performed (ritual) labor just so, when as comrades for comradeship they will make themselves exhilarated with the pressed soma juices and the very pleasing offering.
4. O Indra and Varuṇa, you powerful ones—smash your missile, your most powerful mace down on him who turns his evil ways on us, who is wolfishness and deception (personified). Against him show the measure of your overwhelming power.
5. O Indra and Varuṇa—become the lovers of this insight, like bulls of a milk-cow.
   She should yield her milk to us like a great cow with her milk in a thousand streams who has gone to the pastures.
6. When progeny and posterity are at stake, when fields, the sight of the sun, and the masculine power of the bull, Indra and Varuṇa should be here for us, the wondrous pair with their forms of help at the turning point.
7. For it is just you (we choose) for your age-old help because of your pervasive preeminence, o good friends of the cattle-seeker;
   we choose you for your dear comradeship, the two champions, most munificent like parents, who are luck itself.
8. As those seeking prizes go to a contest, these insights, seeking you, have gone to you for help, o you of good gifts [/drops].
   As cows [=milk] approach soma for mixing, my hymns and inspired thoughts have approached Indra and Varuṇa for splendor.

9. These inspired thoughts of mine have come up to Indra and Varuṇa, seeking material goods.
Like those who enjoy a good thing, they have approached them, seeking a share of goods as fleet mares (seek a share) of fame.
10. Might we by ourselves be lords of prosperity in horses and chariots, of our own proper wealth, making the two (gods) our own along with their newer forms of help. Let riches in teams accompany (them) among us.
11. O lofty Indra and Varuṇa, with your lofty forms of help drive here to us at the winning of prizes.
When the missiles will play in the battles, (thanks to) you might we be the winners of this contest.

IV.42 (338) Indra and Varuṇa

Trasadasyu Paurukutsya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

According to the Anukramaṇī, the author of this hymn is King Trasadasyu, and the first six verses are his own self-praise. Beginning from a similar premise, Lommel (1951) argues that verses 1–6 were spoken by King Trasadasyu on the occasion of his royal consecration. Lommel points out that in the later royal consecration rite, the king is compared to both Varuṇa as dharmapati "lord of dharma" and to Indra as vṛtrahan "smasher of Vṛtra." Thus Trasadasyu identifies himself as both Indra and Varuṇa, and because of these identifications the poet of the hymn affirms that the king is "half a god" (vs. 8). Schmidt (1992) elaborated on this thesis, locating the hymn in a different ritual context. He argues that according to later Vedic tradition Varuṇa and Indra are dominant in different seasons, and this alternation between the two gods is visible in this hymn. So according to Schmidt (1992: 340), "King Trasadasyu impersonates both Varuṇa and Indra by performing their functions according to the demands of the seasons." This hymn marks the transition from the settled period, in which the king enacts the role of Varuṇa, to the period of raiding and battle, when he becomes Indra. Thus it begins with the king's identification with Varuṇa, but "in the third stanza the king affirms that he is not only Varuṇa but also Indra and thus announces the transition to his Indra-like activities which he details in the fifth and sixth stanza." However the ritual context is interpreted, the hymn provides insight into the nature of kingship in the Ṛgvedic period.

It is not clear whose voice it is in verse 7. For Lommel it is the poet; for Geldner and Renou, Varuṇa. Schmidt (1992: 341) offers the interesting suggestion that these two possibilities need not exclude one another if at this point in the rite or at this time of the year, a priest impersonates Varuṇa. He surmises that when the king left for war, he installed a caretaker in the settlement, represented here by the poet.

Verse 8 refers to a legend about the birth of Trasadasyu, but its details are uncertain. According to Sieg (1902: 97–98), following a tradition mentioned in Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa XIII.5.4.5, Purukutsa performed a Horse Sacrifice with a horse named Daurgaha, and his son Trasadasyu was born as a result. As Lommel (1951: 37) points out, this reference to Trasadasyu's birth would have enhanced his dignity and further justified his identification with Indra and Varuṇa because of the favor those gods showed to his mother. Sāyaṇa gives another, less likely version of the legend. According to this version, King Purukutsa Daurgaha had been captured. Seeing that the kingdom was left without a king, the principal wife of Purukutsa appealed to the Seven Seers, who offered a sacrifice to Indra and Varuṇa on her behalf, and the gods then gave her Trasadasyu as her son.

In the final verses (9 and 10) the poet addresses Indra and Varuṇa in a dual dvandva compound indrāvaruṇā, which signals the gods' close connection to one another. Thus, while the rest of the hymn describes the two sides of kingship, these last verses emphasize the unity of the kingship represented by the two gods and their union in King Trasadasyu. The poet's final request for a cow "that does not kick" (ánapasphurantī) may be explained by its possible double meaning. On the one hand, a cow that doesn't kick is one that is easy to milk and therefore represents the prosperity that the poet hopes for (10a). On the other hand, as Renou notes, the description "never kicking" (ánapasphur) is applied to the soma when it is compared to a cow in VIII.69.10. So then the cow in this verse may also be good soma, which will "elate" the gods (10b). Therefore, the cow "that does not kick" is both the successful sacrificial performance and the successful result of the sacrifice.

1. [As Varuṇa:] Now as before, mine is the kingship of a lifelong ruler, so that all the immortals (are) ours:
   the gods follow the will of Varuṇa; I am king of the boundary of the highest covering [=the boundary of heaven].
2. I am King Varuṇa. For me (the gods) uphold these foremost lordly powers;
   the gods follow the will of Varuṇa. I am king of the boundary of the highest covering.
3. I, Varuṇa, am Indra. By my greatness, these two realms, wide and deep, have strong support.
   Like Tvaṣṭar, knowing all living beings, I pressed together the two world-halves and upheld them.
4. I swelled the splashing (and mounting) waters; I upheld heaven on the seat of truth.
   Through the truth the son of Aditi possesses the truth, and he spread wide the threefold earth.
5. [As Indra:] Men call upon me as they race to victory with their good horses; surrounded in battle they call upon me.

I make the contest—I who am generous Indra. Of overwhelming power, I raise the dust.

6. I have done all these things. No divine power will block me, who am unopposable.
   When the soma juices, when the hymns, have exhilarated me, both endless realms become afraid.
7. [The poet:] All living beings know this of you, and you proclaim these things to Varuṇa, o you ritual adept:
   you are famed as he who smashed obstacles; you, Indra, made the blocked rivers to flow.
8. Our forefathers, the Seven Seers, were here, when Daurgaha was being bound.
   For her [=Purukutsa's wife] they won by their sacrifice Trasadasyu, who overcomes obstacles like Indra (and) who is half a god.
9. Because the wife of Purukutsa served you two with oblations and acts of homage, o Indra and Varuṇa, so then to her you two gave King Trasadasyu, who smashes obstacles (and) who is half a god.
10. Having won, we should become elated by wealth, the gods by the oblation, and the cows by pasture land.
    All our days, o Indra and Varuṇa, grant to us the milk-cow that does not kick.

IV.43 (339) Aśvins

Purumīḷha Sauhotra and Ajamīḷha Sauhotra
7 verses: triṣṭubh

The first four verses of this hymn are filled with questions, with the poet seeking to identify the god or gods who will be most attentive to him. He begins by casting his net widely, with any and all gods potentially the answer to his petitions. (These plural possibilities are signaled grammatically and lexically: katamá "which one?" [1a, 2a, 2b] explicitly requires a choice from three or more possible answers, and "of those worthy of the sacrifice" [1a], "among the immortals" [1c], and "of the gods" [2b] allow these choices to be made from the full set of divinities.) But the questions soon pick the Aśvins out as the correct answer to the earlier questions. A query about their chariot (2cd), which the maiden Sūryā chose as her bridal conveyance, obliquely but uniquely identifies the Aśvins, and the remaining questions (vss. 3–4) focus on their ability and willingness to aid us.

With our benefactors now identified as the Aśvins, the next two verses (5–6) concern their chariot journey (somewhat obscurely), with the announcement of the first sight of their chariot made in the second half of verse 6. In the final verse, identical to the last verse of IV.44, the poet reminds the gods that he has provided them with nourishment and asks for their return favor.

The hymn displays a neat, but uninsistent, ring composition. In verse 1d the poet asks where to "fix" his praise and offerings to the god, using a form of the root śri; the same root is found in the final pāda of the hymn (7d), where our desire of the gods is, reciprocally, "fixed." This complementarity is emphasized by the two morphologically parallel words that express what we offer to the gods (suṣṭutí "good praise," 1d) and what we hope for in return (sumatí "good favor," 7b).

The hymn twice mentions the involvement of the Aśvins (and their chariot) in the marriage of Sūryā, the daughter of the Sun (vss. 2, 6), the second time in the present tense coinciding with our own first sight of their chariot. While most references to Sūryā and her marriage in Aśvin hymns are set in the mythic past, in this short Aśvin cycle (IV.43–45) Sūryā is present with the Aśvins when they come to the sacrifice, travelling with them on the same chariot (see IV.44.1, 45.1).

1. Who will listen? Which one of those worthy of the sacrifice? Which god will take pleasure in our extolling?
   In whose heart among the immortals shall we fix this dearest divine good praise accompanied by good oblations?
2. Who will have mercy? Which one (will be) the first to come? Which one of the gods (will be) the most wealful?
   What swift chariot with speeding horses do they say is the one that the Daughter of the Sun chose?
3. For during days such as these you two come right away, like Indra to his ability at the decisive turn.
   You two, born from heaven as fine-feathered heavenly birds—by which one of your abilities do you become the most able?
4. What is your distribution (of goods) and with what (distribution) do you come here to us when called upon?
   Who is yours? Make wide space for us in close quarters, even out of great neglect, with your help, o honeyed, wondrous pair.
5. Your chariot reaches widely around heaven. When it rolls here to you from the sea, (its wheel-rims) splash honey upon honey on you, you two honeyed ones, when cooked nourishments are roasted [?] for you two.
6. The Sindhu River sprinkles your horses with the Rasā; your ruddy birds avoid the glowing heat.
   Your speedy vehicle has just appeared, with which you two become the masters [/husbands] of Sūryā.
7. Since I have nourished you two, whether here or there, in the same way, so (let there be) this good favor for us, o you who bring prizes as treasures:
   make wide space for the singer. Our desire is fixed in your direction, o Nāsatyas.

IV.44 (340) Aśvins

Purumīḷha Sauhotra and Ajamīḷha Sauhotra
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Connected with IV.43 by their shared final verse, this hymn begins with another reference to the wedding journey of Sūryā on the Aśvins' chariot, also expressed in the present tense (like IV.43.6; see also IV.45.1). Thereafter the hymn concentrates solely on the Aśvins' chariot journey to our sacrifice and the reciprocal ritual exchange (aid and goods for soma and other oblations) that will occur there. The threat of other sacrificers attracting the gods elsewhere is also on the poet's mind (vss. 3–5).

1. Today, o Aśvins, we would call your chariot of broad expanse here to its meeting with the cow,
   (the chariot) that conveys Sūryā, providing her a standing place, the best of many, whose team is hymns, the one seeking goods.
2. You two, o Aśvins, you sons of heaven, win splendor among the gods by your abilities.
   Nourishments escort your wondrous form when the humped horses [?] convey you on the chariot.
3. Who today, having bestowed his oblation, will attract you here with his chants, for help or for drinking the pressed soma, or, having held fast to his reverence, will turn (you) here for the foremost striving for truth, O Aśvins?
4. O you who appear in many places, with your golden chariot drive right up to this sacrifice here, o Nāsatyas.
   Just you will drink of the somian honey, and you will establish a treasure for the person who distributes it.
5. Drive right here to us from heaven and from the earth with your golden, smooth-rolling chariot.
   Let the others who seek the gods not hold you down, because our ancient umbilical tie is attached to you.
6. Now, wondrous ones, measure out lofty wealth conferring many heroes to us both [=singers and patrons].
   As the superior men furthered your praise, o Aśvins, the Ājamīḷhas have come to your joint praise.
7. Since I have nourished you two, whether here or there, in the same way, so (let there be) this good favor for us, o you who bring prizes as treasures:
   make wide space for the singer. Our desire is fixed in your direction, o Nāsatyas.

IV.45 (341) Aśvins

Vāmadeva Gautama
7 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 7

This hymn represents the culmination of the chariot-journey sequence in the three Aśvin hymns of Maṇḍala IV. In IV.43 the poet began by asking who among the gods will listen to his prayers and come to him with aid. Having identified the Aśvins as his target, he briefly describes their chariot and its journey and announces its arrival. In IV.44 the poet once again calls the chariot and the Aśvins to his sacrifice and urges them to avoid the sacrifices of others.

Here in this hymn (IV.45), the Aśvins' chariot journey is depicted as happening simultaneously with the performance of the sacrifice, and in fact the two realms are to some extent conflated. Their chariot(s) and horses behave in the same way and are described with the same verb (vs. 2ab) as the beam of the kindled ritual fire (vs. 1a), and the Aśvins both come bringing honey and come for the honey offered them. (Honey is a leitmotif throughout the hymn, occurring at least once in each of the first five verses.) The ritual is also depicted in more detail than in the last two hymns: see the actions of the priest in verses 5ab and 7d. Moreover, the exact time at which the journey and the sacrifice are happening, namely dawn, is repeatedly mentioned (vss. 2, 4, 5), and the other light sources associated with the break of day have their place in the hymn: the ritual fires (1a, 5ab) and the sun (vss. 2, 6).

As in the other two Aśvin hymns in this series, Sūryā, the daughter of the Sun, is present not merely in mythological memory but in the present, ritual time—but in this hymn she is not mentioned by name. Instead, an ingenious turn of phrase "three . . . are on (the chariot) as a pair" in verse 1 must refer to the pairing of the two Aśvins with Sūryā, especially since the word for "pair" mithuná is regularly used for a sexual pairing. Her anonymous appearance in the first verse of the hymn suggests the fertile fruitfulness that the overflowing honey in the rest of the hymn also represents.

The final verse of the hymn formulaically celebrates the Aśvins' chariot, and this verse sums up not merely this hymn but the triad of Aśvin hymns that it closes.

1. Now this radiant beam arises; the earth-encircling chariot is hitched up upon the back of this heaven.
   Three bringing nourishment [=Aśvins and Sūryā] are upon it [=the chariot] as a pair; a fourth, a skin-bag, teems with honey.
2. Up rise your nourishing, honey-filled chariots and horses at the break of dawn, uncovering the darkness that had been confined and stretching like the blazing sun through the dusky realm.
3. Drink of the honey with your honey-drinking mouths and hitch up your own dear chariot for honey.

You quicken the course of the path with honey, and you carry your honey-filled skin-bag, o Aśvins.

4. Your geese—honeyed, unfaltering, golden-feathered, calling "uhu" [?], waking at dawn, swimming in water, invigorating, stroking the invigorator [=soma]—(along with them) you go to the pressings of the honeyed (soma) like flies to honey.
5. Providing good ceremonies, honey-filled, the ruddy fires awaken at dawn in response to the Aśvins, when the wide-gazing (priest), his hands washed, advancing (across the ritual ground), has pressed the honeyed soma with stones.
6. (Your horses) keeping watch nearby through the days, in constant agitation, stretching like the blazing sun through the dusky realm—hitching up his own horses, the Sun also comes speeding. By your own independent power, you two perceive all the paths.
7. I have (now) proclaimed (this chariot of) yours, o Aśvins, setting my insight before you—the unaging chariot that has good horses, with which in a day you drive around the dusky realms to the provider offering oblation, as he advances (across the ritual ground).

IV.46 (342) Vāyu (1), Vāyu and Indra (2–7)

Vāmadeva Gautama
7 verses: gāyatrī

This simple hymn never strays from its ritual purpose: at the Morning Pressing of the soma sacrifice, Vāyu and then Indra and Vāyu receive the first offerings of soma. Here they are urged to come to the sacrifice and drink their shares.

1. Drink the foremost of the honeys, the pressed (soma), o Vāyu, at the rituals of daybreak, for you are the first drinker.
2. With a hundred forms of help for us, (come,) provided with a team, having Indra as charioteer.
   O Vāyu—may you both become sated on our pressed (soma).
3. Indra and Vāyu, let your thousand fallow bays convey you here, to the pleasurable offering, to drink the soma.
4. O Indra and Vāyu, the chariot with the golden chariot box, good for the ceremony, touching heaven—because you will mount it—
5. With that chariot of broad dimension come up to the pious one.
   O Indra and Vāyu, come here.

6. O Indra and Vāyu, here is the pressed (soma): in concert with the gods drink it in the house of the pious man.
7. Here be your advance, o Indra and Vāyu, (here) your unhitching, here for you to drink the soma.

IV.47 (343) Vāyu (1), Vāyu and Indra (2–4)

Vāmadeva Gautama
4 verses: anuṣṭubh

Like the immediately preceding hymn, this one fulfills its ritual purpose with a minimum of fuss: Vāyu, and then Indra and Vāyu, are invited to partake of the first soma offerings at the Morning Pressing.

1. Vāyu, the clear (soma) has been held out to you, the foremost of the honey, at the rituals of daybreak.
   (Since you are) craved, drive here to drink the soma, o god, (on a chariot) with a team.
2. O Indra and Vāyu, you two have the right to the drinking of these soma drinks,
   for the drops go to you like waters, converging, to the deep.
3. O Vāyu and Indra, tempestuous ones, lords of power, on the same chariot,
   provided with teams, drive here to help us, to drink the soma.
4. Your teams, craved by many, which are for the pious, o men, stop them by us, o Indra and Vāyu, you whose vehicle is the sacrifice.

IV.48 (344) Vāyu

Vāmadeva Gautama
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

Unlike the two preceding hymns to Vāyu and Indra (IV.46–47), with their simple diction and single purpose, this hymn to Vāyu alone, although it also continues the journey motif, especially in the refrain of verses 1–4, contains some enigmatic phraseology and striking images. In particular both the sense and the syntactic construction of the simile in the second pāda of verse 1 are much disputed. On the basis of VI.14.3 we believe "the riches of the stranger" (rā́yo aryáḥ) to refer to Ārya people in general and their poets in particular.

Note that the soma-drinking, the purpose of Vāyu's journey, is mentioned only in the refrain, and that the time of day for the ritual, early morning, is only obliquely referred to, in verse 3.

1. Pursue the invocations not (yet) pursued, just as "the riches of the stranger" [=the poets of the Āryas] pursue poetic inspirations.
   – O Vāyu, drive here with your glittering chariot, to drink of the pressed (soma).
2. Taking taunts out of harness, (but yourself) provided with a team, with Indra as charioteer,
   o Vāyu, drive here with your glittering chariot, to drink of the pressed (soma).
3. The two black treasure chambers [=Night and Dawn], with all their ornaments, have directed themselves after each other in turn.
   – O Vāyu, drive here with your glittering chariot, to drink of the pressed (soma).
4. Let the ones with mind as yoke, the ninety-nine yoked ones, convey you.
   – O Vāyu, drive here with your glittering chariot, to drink of the pressed (soma).
5. O Vāyu, hitch up a hundred flourishing fallow bays, or, since you have thousands, let your chariot drive here with its (full) dimension.

IV.49 (345) Indra and Bṛhaspati

Vāmadeva Gautama
6 verses: gāyatrī

This simple hymn is reminiscent of the nearby Vāyu and Indra hymns (IV.46–47), elementary in diction and simple in purpose, inviting the two divinities to come and drink the soma. It seems likely that IV.49 was indeed based, somewhat artificially, on those former hymns, as there is no standard ritual offering of soma to Indra and Bṛhaspati as there is to Indra and Vāyu. Indeed, Bṛhaspati does not otherwise drink soma in the Ṛgveda (save for IV.50.10). Evidence for the dependence of this hymn on Indra and Vāyu hymns is found in the second pāda of verse 3, which is also found in I.135.7 with the grammatical subjects Indra and Vāyu. The elementary and derivative nature of this hymn contrasts strongly with the richness of the following hymn (IV.50) to the same divinities.

1. This dear oblation here is in your mouth, o Indra and Bṛhaspati;
   the solemn speech and the exhilarating drink are being announced.
2. This soma here is being poured in circles for you, o Indra and Bṛhaspati, pleasing, to be drunk to exhilaration.
3. Come here to our house, o Bṛhaspati and Indra, as soma-drinkers to drink the soma.
4. In us, o Indra and Bṛhaspati, place wealth in hundreds of cows, rich in horses, thousand-fold.

5. Indra and Bṛhaspati we invoke with hymns when (the soma) is pressed, to drink of this soma here.
6. Drink the soma, o Indra and Bṛhaspati, in the house of the pious one.
 Become exhilarated, being at home with it.

IV.50 (346) Bṛhaspati (1–9), Bṛhaspati and Indra (10–11)

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 10

This hymn falls naturally into several sections, but although some scholars consider it to be a composite of up to three independent hymns, an overall unity can be detected. (Of course, this unity may results from the combining of once separate elements.) Indeed, the hymn seems to encapsulate the historical development of the Vala myth, which concerns the freeing of the cows from the Vala cave where they were imprisoned, and its principal participants, Indra, Bṛhaspati, and the Aṅgirases. As Schmidt has clearly shown (1968), Indra was the original hero of the Vala myth, in his role as priest-king and with his priestly weapons—songs and correctly formulated true speech—with the Aṅgiras singers as his helpers. In this role he received the epithet "bṛhaspati." But in time the epithet was split off into a separately conceived divine figure Bṛhaspati, first as an alloform of Indra and then detached from Indra as an independent divinity who served as Indra's priest—taking with him Indra's priestly role, while Indra retained the roles of king and warrior. In this hymn we first see a unitary (Indra-)Bṛhaspati figure, then the human equivalent of the split figure, in the form of king and "Formulator" priest. And finally the split divine figures, Indra and Bṛhaspati, are invited to share the ritual.

The first six verses are dedicated to the mythic deeds of Bṛhaspati (or "Bṛhaspati") with the Vala myth occupying verses 2–5. The Aṅgirases are prominent, though not named. The final verse of this portion (6) clearly brings the section to a close, returning it to the present with explicit treatment of our ritual honoring of Bṛhaspati, and wishes for our continued prosperity typically found in hymn-final verses. Verses 7–9 promise success of all sorts to the king who does honor to Bṛhaspati and to his earthly representative, the "Formulator" (Brahmán), a role that will evolve into the later Purohita (house-priest of the king) (note the verb phrase puró √dhā in vs. 1). This section seems to apply the lessons of the mythic past found in verses 1–6 to the contemporary situation and to establish a symbiotic relationship between Formulator and king, matching the relationship between the mythic Bṛhaspati and the (unnamed) Indra, from whom Bṛhaspati has been split. It follows logically that the last two verses (10–11) invite Bṛhaspati and Indra to the sacrifice to drink the soma and bestow blessings on us. The unitary role in the opening mythic section has evolved into the double divine figures summoned in the final section, by way of the mediating section showcasing these complementary roles in the human domain.

1. He who with his strength propped apart the ends of the earth, with a roar—Bṛhaspati possessing three seats—him with the gladdening tongue did the seers of old, the inspired poets in meditation, set in front—
2. Those [=Aṅgirases] of noisy tread, exulting at the good sign, o Bṛhaspati, who for us have battered at the dappled, glossy, uncheatable (cow-)enclosure [=Vala cave]. O Bṛhaspati, (after their action) guard its womb [=(the contents of) the Vala cave, the cows].
3. O Bṛhaspati, that which is the farthest distance, (coming) from there have those who touch the truth [=Aṅgirases] sat down here (for sacrifice) for you.
   For you do the deep-dug springs, milked by the stone, drip an abundance of honey all about.
4. Bṛhaspati, on first being born from the great light, in the farthest distant heaven, he, possessing seven mouths [=Aṅgirases] and seven reins [=seers?], being powerfully born, blew apart the dark shades with his roar.
5. He with his flock possessing good rhythm, the flock possessing chant—he broke Vala, broke its bolt with his roar.
   Bṛhaspati drove up the ruddy (cows) who sweeten the oblation, who kept lowing as he was bellowing.
6. Thus to the father to all the gods, to the bull, we would do honor with sacrifices, with homage, with oblations.
   O Bṛhaspati, may we, possessed of good offspring and of heroes, be lords of riches.

7. Only that king surmounts all the (forces) belonging to his opponents through his tempestuousness and heroism who supports Bṛhaspati (to be) well-supported, behaves agreeably to him, and extols him as the one receiving the first portion.
8. Only he dwells peacefully, well-situated in his own home; for him refreshment swells at all times; to him the clans bow just of themselves—for which king the Formulator comes first.
9. Unopposable, he wins riches belonging to his opponents and those belonging to his allies.
   The king who makes wide space for the Formulator seeking aid, him do the gods aid.

10. Bṛhaspati and Indra, drink the soma, becoming exhilarated at this sacrifice here, you who have bullish goods.
    Let the drops that stand by you enter you. In us deposit wealth consisting of hale heroes.
11. Bṛhaspati, Indra, strengthen us. Let this benevolence of yours keep company with us.
    Aid our insightful thoughts; awaken plentiful gifts. Exhaust the hostilities of the stranger, of the rapacious ones.

IV.51 (347) Dawn

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is remarkable first for the fact that the dawns are always presented and addressed in the plural ("Dawns") rather than the singular, as so often. Indeed, when the poet wishes to refer to a single dawn, he uses instead the word "light" (vs. 1) or an unspecified pronoun (vs. 6). The grammatical plurality of the subject Dawns serves a thematic purpose: as in other dawn hymns the poet notes that each day's dawn is different, yet paradoxically all dawns are the same, coming in an unbroken chain from the east day after day (see, e.g., vs. 8).

As V. Yareham suggested (in an unpublished paper presented at the University of Texas Vedic Workshop, May 2007), the hymn is structured around an omphalos verse (6), with concentric matching verses surrounding it: 1–2 / 10–11 and 3–5 / 7–9. The omphalos poses a central and essentially unanswerable question, the one that always arises about the dawn(s): how can they be both the same and different, and the poet expresses his anxiety that he cannot identify the particular dawn in the swarm of identical ones. Behind this anxiety is another one, seen especially in verses 4, 6, and 7, namely whether we, the current sacrificers, will have the same material success with our dawn sacrifice as the ritualists of old.

Otherwise, the imagery is of the usual type for dawn hymns: the brilliant beauty of the dawns in contrast to the darkness, which they banish; their abrupt arising in the east and their subsequent journey; and the prayers for largesse, reminding us that the dakṣiṇā, the priestly gifts, were distributed at the dawn sacrifice.

1. Here has this light, the latest of many, stood (up) out of the east from the darkness, with its patterns.
   Now the daughters of Heaven radiating widely, the Dawns, will make a way for the people.
2. They have stood up—the bright Dawns—in the east, like the sacrificial posts fixed at ceremonies.

They have unclosed the doors of the enclosure of darkness as they dawn, blazing and pure.

3. Dawning today, the bounteous Dawns brighten the benefactors for the giving of largesse.
   In (a place) without brightness let the niggards sleep, unawakening in the middle of darkness.
4. Goddess Dawns, should it be the old course or a new one for you today—
   (or the one going) along which, you rich ladies, you richly dawned on the Aṅgiras(-clan) of the Nine-Cows, of the Ten-Cows, of the Seven-Mouths?
5. For you, goddesses, with horses whose yoke is truth, drive around the creatures in a single day, awakening the sleeping, every two-footed and four-footed living thing, to activity, o Dawns.
6. Where is she, which one of them is she, the age-old one along with whom they distributed the distributions of the R̥bhus?
   (I ask because) when the beautiful Dawns proceed in beauty, they cannot be distinguished—the unaging ones having the same appearance.
7. These same auspicious Dawns existed of old, those of superior heavenliness, who were really born of truth, at whose (time) one who had sacrificed and labored with hymns, praising and chanting, reached wealth in a single day.
8. They proceed, in the same way, from the east, spreading out from the same place in the same way.
   The Goddess Dawns, awakening from the seat of truth, like gushes of cows, become wakeful.
9. Just these now—the same ones in the same way—with immutable colors, the Dawns proceed, hiding the black void with their bright (colors), glistening, gleaming, shining with their own bodies.
10. O daughters of Heaven, radiating widely, bestow on us wealth in offspring, o goddesses.
   Being awakened from a comfortable place in response to you, may we be lords of an abundance of heroes.
11. O daughters of Heaven, radiating widely—I whose sacrifice is a beacon implore this of you, o Dawns:
   May we be glorious among the peoples. Let both Heaven and Goddess Earth ensure this.

IV.52 (348) Dawn

Vāmadeva Gautama
7 verses: gāyatrī

A simple hymn in contrast to the immediately preceding dawn hymn, with Dawn depicted and addressed only in the singular. The Aśvin pair is named in verses 2–3 because of their early-morning journey to the sacrifice.

1. This spirited lady, dawning forth from her sister [=Night], has appeared opposite—the daughter of Heaven.
2. Dappled bright and ruddy like a mare, the mother of cows, follower of truth, Dawn has become the companion of the Aśvins.
3. You are both the companion of the Aśvins, and you are also mother of cows,
   and also, Dawn, you have dominion over goods.
4. With awareness of you, in response to you, who keep away hatred, o liberal-spirited one,
   we have awakened with praises.
5. Her auspicious rays have appeared opposite, like gushes of cows.
   Dawn has filled up the wide expanse.
6. Having filled it up, wide-radiant one, you have uncovered the darkness with your light.
   O Dawn, help (us) according to your independent power.
7. Through heaven do you stretch with your rays, through the midspace wide and dear,
   o Dawn, with your bright brilliance.

IV.53 (349) Savitar

Vāmadeva Gautama
7 vereses: jagatī

A relatively straightforward hymn dedicated to Savitar, literally "the Impeller." Savitar's natural control over the rhythms of life—alternatively setting the world in motion and causing it to settle down—is emphasized, as is his omnipresence in the cosmos. It is noteworthy that throughout the hymn, even in the requests for Savitar's protection and benefits (vss. 1, 6–7), the god stays in the 3rd person, grammatically distanced from us despite his direct involvement in our affairs.

1. We would choose that great thing, worthy to be chosen, of god Savitar, the provident lord, with which by himself he holds out shelter to the pious. The great god has held it up for us through the nights.

2. The supporter of heaven, the lord of offspring of the living world, the sage poet, fastens on himself a tawny cloak.
   Wide-gazing, spreading out and filling the wide (midspace?), Savitar has begotten praiseworthy benevolence.
3. He has filled the heavenly and earthly realms. The god makes his signal-call to support his own.
   Savitar has stretched forth his two arms, at his impulsion causing the moving world to settle down and impelling it forth through the nights.
4. Undeceivable, watching over living beings, god Savitar guards his commandments.
   He has stretched his two arms for the offspring of the living world. He whose commandments are upheld rules over the great road.
5. Savitar (encompasses) the midspace three times in his greatness; he encompasses the three dusky realms and the three realms of light.
   He speeds the three heavens and the three earths. With his three commandments he guards us by himself.
6. Possessing lofty benevolence, the one who impels forth and causes to settle down, who exerts his will over both the moving world and the stationary, let him, god Savitar, hold out to us shelter providing threefold protection against distress for us and for our dwelling place.
7. The god has come according to the ritual progressions. Let him make our dwelling place strong. Let Savitar establish for us refreshment that brings good offspring.
   Let him quicken us through the nights and the days. Let him speed wealth that brings offspring.

IV.54 (350) Savitar

Vāmadeva Gautama
6 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 6

This hymn conveys a much more intimate sense of our connection to Savitar than the preceding hymn with its formal praises. This intimacy is achieved by the aorist of the immediate past that opens the hymn announcing his epiphany—"he has arrived!"—and by the vocatives and 2nd-person address that follow. The closeness of our relationship with the god allows us to ask him for something more personal than the shelter and support requested in IV.53, namely (in the middle verse, vs. 3) for Savitar to intercede on our behalf with anyone, divine or mortal, whom we have offended.

The hymn also makes heavy use of the verb sū "impel" from which Savitar's name is derived: it is found in all verses but the first.

1. He has arrived—god Savitar to be greeted by us now and at this very time of day to be invoked by superior men—he who apportions treasures to the sons of Manu so that he will establish the best material wealth for us here.

2. For you first impel immortality to the gods worthy of the sacrifice as their highest share;
just after that, o Savitar, you reveal your gift: lives following in succession for the sons of Manu.
3. Whatever we have done to the divine race, because of heedlessness, or scant skills, or excess of power, or our sheer human nature, o Savitar, among both the gods and the sons of Manu, impel us to be without offense here.
4. The (commandment?) of the divine Savitar is not to be violated, so that he will support all the living world.
Whatever he of the beautiful fingers impels on the expanse of earth or in the height of heaven, that of his comes true.
5. (You impel) those whose chief is Indra [=Maruts] from the lofty mountains, and you impel the dwelling places that provide homes [=clouds?] for them.
Just as they spread out while flying, just so do they stand still for your impulsion, o Savitar.
6. O Savitar, as three times a day your impulsions impel good fortune day after day, Indra, Heaven and Earth, the Sindhu with her waters, Aditi with the Ādityas, will extend shelter to us.

IV.55 (351) All Gods

Vāmadeva Gautama
10 verses: triṣṭubh 1–7, gāyatrī 8–10

The only hymn dedicated to the All Gods in Maṇḍala IV, it is clearly a composite hymn in two different meters, divisible into 1–7, 8–10. The last three tacked-on verses are extremely simple; not so the first and more substantial part of the hymn, which is full of difficulties and uncertainties, especially in verses 2 and 6.

This first section opens with questions about identity (vs. 1): who among the gods will protect and defend us, and who (among mortals?) will provide a safe space at the sacrifice for the gods. The hymn provides a number of possible answers to the first question, starting in fact in the first verse: Heaven and Earth, Aditi, Mitra and Varuṇa. All of these recur in subsequent verses, along with others: Night and Dawn (vs. 3); Aryaman, Agni, and Indra and Viṣṇu (vs. 4); the Maruts (vs. 5); in addition to lesser divinities and powers like the Sindhu (vs. 3); Ahi Budhnya (vs. 6); and so on. It is likely that the hymn does not envisage a single answer to the question, though Aditi and the Ādityas continually surface in these verses, and Aditi, Mitra, and Varuṇa, named in verse 1, are again named in verse 7, which forms a ring with verse 1. Although a clear answer to the first question is not given, the verses describing or invoking these named gods' help are relatively clear (3–5, in addition to 1, 7).

This leaves the second and second-to-last verses (2 and 6), symmetrically paired in this structure. In examining the hymn thus structurally, one can form the hypothesis that, since the other verses suggest answers to the first question in verse 1, these two verses provide the answer to the second question (1d): "Who will establish wide space for you at the ceremony, o gods?" Although this hypothesis does not solve all the difficulties, especially of the cryptic verse 2, it does offer a means to approach the problems. Certainly verse 2 can be interpreted as the depiction of a dawn sacrifice: the Dawns appear to be the subject of pāda b (discriminators because they mark the boundary between night and day), and the chanters of pāda a can then be the priests. Pāda c can then refer to the distribution of the dakṣiṇā, priestly gifts, at the dawn ritual, and the subjects of pāda d can be the Dawns, the gods present at the sacrifice, or the poets—or all three. The sacrificial context returns, somewhat more clearly, in verse 6, where it seems that the priests reveal the actual sacrificial substance in the same manner as the gods revealed the contents of the Vala cave (using the same verb). In both of the "sacrificial" verses, then, it seems that divine characteristics and mythical exploits are attributed to the presumably mortal participants.

If these speculations about the structure of this hymn are at all correct, it is striking that the gods are identified by name and by role quite clearly, but the ritual participants are left deliberately unclear. This may be another example of the poets' reflection on the mystical nature of the sacrifice and of the transformations it effects not only in the sacrificed substance but in the sacrificers themselves, temporarily endowing the latter with a touch of divinity.

1. Who is the protector among you (all), o good ones, who the defender? O Heaven and Earth, o Aditi—you should protect us from the stronger mortal, o Varuṇa and Mitra. Who will establish wide space for you at the ceremony, o gods?
2. Those [=priests?] who will chant forth the ancient ordinances while the discriminators who are never fooled [=Dawns?] will dawn widely—they are the untiring distributors who make distribution. The wondrous ones whose insights are truth have shone.
3. I reverently invoke the Housegoddess, Aditi, the Sindhu with chants, (invoke) divine Well-Being for comradeship.
   Night and Dawn, the undeceivable, will arrange it so that both day halves will keep guard over us.
4. Aryaman clears out a path, and Varuṇa; the lord of refreshment, Agni, (clears out) a way easy to traverse.
   Indra and Viṣṇu—when you are being praised in our manly way, hold out shelter to us and defense along with attack.
5. The help of the Mountain, of the Maruts, of the divine Protector, of Bhaga have I chosen.

The lord [=Agni? Varuṇa?] will guard us from anxiety stemming from (our own) people; Mitra from that stemming from our allies, and he should make wide space for us.

6. Now, you divine World-Halves, one should praise (you) along with Ahi Budhnya, with watery sacrifices.
   They [=priests?], desirous of gain, have revealed them [=the watery sacrifices?] gurgling like the gharma pot, (like) rivers in their converging on the sea.
7. Let goddess Aditi, with the gods, keep guard over us. Let the god Protector protect us, not keeping his distance, for we ought not to violate the wellspring of Mitra and Varuṇa nor the back of Agni.

8. Agni is lord of a mass of goods, Agni of great good fortune.
   He will grant these to us.
9. Bounteous, liberal Dawn, convey hither many valuables to us, you who are rich in prize mares.
10. So to us Savitar, Bhaga, Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman—to us Indra—will come with generosity.

IV.56 (352) Heaven and Earth

Vāmadeva Gautama
7 verses: triṣṭubh 2–4, gāyatrī 5–7

Like the preceding hymn, this one is divided into two by meter: 1–4, 5–7; the two were presumably independent hymns originally. The first four verses mix invocations of Heaven and Earth at the current sacrifice with cosmogonic accounts of their creation (see esp. vs. 3 and its present-time counterpart in 1cd), but the ritual context is dominant. There are a number of puns. The short second hymn continues the ritual focus.

1. Let great Heaven and Earth, the preeminent ones, come to be here with their light, with their gleaming rays [/at our gleaming chants], when, fixing the two lofty ones apart as the widest, the bull bellows to them along the ways that spread broadly.
2. The two goddesses deserving the sacrifice, along with the gods deserving the sacrifice—they stay, not confounding (the heavenly commandments) [/not altering (their color)], growing strong [/dripping (ghee)], truthful, without deceit, the two whose children are the gods, the two leaders of the sacrifice with its gleaming chants [/with their gleaming rays].

3. He certainly was the good artisan among the creatures who begot these two, Heaven and Earth:
   the two wide, deep, well-fixed realms did the wise one fit together in propless (space) with his skill.
4. Now, you two World-Halves, with your lofty defenses, nurturing us in concert with (the gods) accompanied by their wives, protect us, o you of wide extent, who entirely deserve the sacrifice. Through our insightful thought may we be charioteers who always win.

5. We present to you two, great (Earth and) Heaven, a praise-invocation to be proclaimed to you two gleaming ones.
6. Purifying your own bodies mutually, you two rule each through your own skill.
   You have constantly conveyed the truth from of old.
7. You two great ones assure it success, as you further and fulfill the truth of Mitra.
   You have stationed yourself around the sacrifice.

IV.57 (353) Agricultural Divinities

Vāmadeva Gautama
8 verses: anuṣṭubh 1, 4, 6–7; triṣṭubh 2–3, 8; puraüṣṇih 5

This hymn is in a variety of meters, alternating throughout the poem, and it is dedicated to a number of different divinities related to agriculture. With its number of verses it is out of place in the collection, and its subject matter and tone are more "popular" than those of the core R̥gveda. It is not possible to determine whether the hymn we have now was assembled out of several separate hymns, but at least verses 1–3, dedicated to the Lord of the Field, hang together, though they are not metrically uniform. A curious feature in the later part of the hymn is the dual address (via a dual dvandva compound) to "Prosperity and Plow" (vss. 5, 7).

Hymns like this give us precious glimpses into everyday life and the technical terminology of particular professions. The hymn is notable also for its address to the Furrow (vs. 6, see also 7), the first appearance of the feminine noun sī́tā, renowned in later Sanskrit of course as the name of Rāma's noble wife in the Rāmāyaṇa.

1. By means of the Lord of the Field as if by a concluded (alliance), may we win what prospers the cow, the horse. He will be gracious to one such as us.
2. O Lord of the Field, as a milk-cow yields milk, milk out upon us a honeyed wave, dripping with honey, well-purified like ghee. Let the lords of truth be gracious to us.

3. Honeyed the plants, the heavens, the waters—honeyed let the midspace be for us.
   Let the Lord of the Field be honeyed for us. Without suffering harm may we follow after him.

4. Prosperity (be) the draft-animals, prosperity the superior men; for prosperity let the plow till.
   For prosperity let the straps be bound; for prosperity brandish the goad.
5. O Prosperity and Plow, take pleasure in this speech here. When you have made milk in heaven, with it besprinkle this (earth) here.
6. Become inclined our way, well-portioned Furrow. We will extol you, so that you will be well-portioned for us, so that you will be well-fruited for us.
7. Let Indra lay down the Furrow; let Pūṣan extend her straight.
   Let her, full of milk, yield milk to us, summer after summer.
8. For prosperity let our plowshares till through the earth; for prosperity let our plowmen advance with their draft-animals.
   Prosperity (let) Parjanya (be) with his honey and milk drinks. O Prosperity and Plow, place prosperity in us.

IV.58 (354) Ghee

Vāmadeva Gautama
11 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 11

The Anukramaṇī provides a bewildering variety of choices for the divinity of this hymn: Agni, or the Sun, or the waters, or the cows—or ghee (ghṛta), the clarified melted butter regularly used as an oblation in sacrifice. The last is clearly correct.

Ghee is here given the same type of exalted, high-style rhetorical treatment as the other crucial ritual substance, soma, with which it is also identified in this poem. Phraseology appropriate to soma is applied to the streams of ghee throughout, and, like soma, ghee becomes the focus of mystical speculations and also the subject of vivid images. It is not surprising that this significant sacrificial substance should receive such poetic glorification, especially given the importance of cows and cow imagery in the Ṛgveda.

What should really surprise us is that only this poet in this late and final hymn in just one maṇḍala should have seen fit to make ghee his subject. Soma, after all, has a whole maṇḍala of 114 hymns to itself. Grammatical accident may help account for the difference: sóma is grammatically masculine and thus easily personified, while ghṛta is grammatically neuter. However, the prominence of the cognate substance in Old Iranian (Aves. haoma, Old Persian hauma) and the existence of a lengthy praise hymn to deified Haoma in Younger Avestan (the Hōm Yašt, Yasna 9–10) testify to a long tradition of celebration of soma, which is not shared by ghee.

1. From the sea a honeyed wave has arisen; along with the (soma-)plant it has reached all the way to immortality.
   The name of Ghee that is hidden: "the tongue of the gods," "the navel of the immortal."
2. We will proclaim the name of Ghee; at this sacrifice here we will uphold it with reverences.
   The formulator will hear it as it is being announced. The four-horned buffalo [=soma] has vomited it.
3. Four are his horns, three his feet; two heads, seven hands are his.
   Triply bound, the bull keeps on roaring. The great god has entered mortals.
4. Triply deposited, being hidden by the niggards—the gods discovered the ghee in the cow.
   Indra begat one; the Sun begat one; from the seeker they fashioned one through their own power.
5. These (streams) rush from the sea found in the heart. Having a hundred barriers, they are not to be spotted by the cheat, but I keep gazing upon the streams of ghee. A golden reed is in their midst.
6. These nourishing liquids flow together like streams, being purified within by heart and mind.
   These waves of ghee rush, like wild beasts retreating from a javelin.
7. As if on the straightaway of a river, they fly—the youthfully exuberant ones, swift-battering, confounding the wind—the streams of ghee—like a ruddy prizewinning horse splitting the wooden race-course barriers [/splintering the sticks (in their current)], swelling with their waves.
8. They float—like lovely young women to (marriage) assemblies—smiling, to Agni.
   The streams of ghee approach the kindling sticks. (Agni) Jātavedas delights, taking pleasure in them.
9. I keep gazing upon them, who are like maidens smearing on unguent to go to their wedding.
   Where the soma is pressed, where the sacrifice (is performed), toward that do the streams of ghee go purifying themselves.
10. Rush toward the lovely praise hymn, to the contest for cows; on us confer auspicious chattels.
    Lead this sacrifice here to the divinities for us. The streams of ghee purify themselves like honey.
11. All the living world is firmly fixed in your domain, within the sea in your heart, within your lifespan.
    The one that was borne hither at the forefront of the waters in their joining, that one may we attain—your most honeyed wave.

Volume II

V

Maṇḍala V

Only fourteen of the eighty-seven hymns of the maṇḍala are attributed or alternately attributed to Atri himself (V.27, 37–43, 76–77, 83–86). The majority of the hymns were composed by Ātreyas, descendants of Atri, thirty-six of whom are mentioned by the Anukramaṇī in Maṇḍala V. In the Anukramaṇī's reckoning, only three of the Ātreyas—Vasuśruta (3–6), Sutambhara (11–14), and Śyāvāśva (52–59, 81–82)—composed more than one or two hymns, and only Atri himself, Śyāvāśva, and Avasyu Ātreya (31, 75) provided hymns to more than one deity or set of deities in this book. Unlike, for example, Maṇḍala III, the Viśvāmitra Family Book, the eponymous poet is thus not the major poet of Maṇḍala V. Rather, Atri is principally an ancestor, perhaps a fairly distant one, of a large family of poets. Atri appears as a figure in hymns by Ātreyas (2, 7, 15, 73, 74, 78) and in one hymn of his own (40), sometimes in reference to narratives associated with him, such as his rescue by the Aśvins (73.6, 78.4) or Atri's restoration of the sun (40.6–8). In final verses poets occasionally refer to themselves and their people as "Atris" (22.4, 39.5, 40.9, 67.5)—a plural that only occurs in the Vth Maṇḍala. In addition to Atri and Ātreyas, there are other poets from families connected to the Atris in some way. Among them are Āṅgirasa poets, to whom two hymns (15, 35) are attributed. The Āṅgirasa poets are one of the two dominant families in VIII, which also contains seven hymns ascribed to Ātreya poets (or in the case of VIII.91, a female [Ātreyī] poet). The presence of Āṅgirasa poets in V and of Ātreya poets in VIII points to the close connection between Atri poets and the Kāṇvas and Āṅgirasas. Geographically, the Atris ranged broadly from the rivers in the northwest, including the Kabul (Kubhā) and Kurram (Krumu) rivers, extending to the Yamunā in the east. Strikingly, it is the same poet, Śyāvāśva, who mentions rivers in the northwest (53.9) and the Yamunā (52.17).

The Atris and their associates address a broader range of deities in their hymns than do many of the other poetic families. The distribution is as follows: Agni (1–28), Indra (29–40), the All Gods (41–51), the Maruts (52–61), Mitra and Varuṇa (62–72), the Aśvins (73–78), Dawn (79–80), Savitar (81–82), Parjanya (83), Earth (84), Varuṇa (85), Indra and Agni (86), and the Maruts (87). The last hymn, which returns to the Maruts, is an addition to the original collection and unusual in a number of respects. Metrically it is in a long lyric meter, and thematically it features an unusual pairing of the Maruts with Viṣṇu.

The Atri Maṇḍala contains a noteworthy collection of hymns to the All Gods (41–51). A number of these feature riddles and verbal play, but none is as challenging as V.44, which Geldner called the most difficult hymn in the R̥gveda. The hymn does not name the god or gods it praises, but the very last verse mentions Agni and Soma, leaving the hearer to divine what the rest of the hymn is about. Complicating that task are lexical, syntactic, and morphological puzzles, ellipses without obvious resolution, and, above all, a likely dual reference that points to the mystery at the heart of the hymn.

The Marut cycle attributed to Śyāvāśva Ātreya (52–61) contains the longest sequence of hymns dedicated to these gods in the R̥gveda and is a remarkably exciting and satisfying achievement. Other hymns of note include two hymns to gods of the natural world, V.80 to Dawn and V.83 to Parjanya, the Thunderstorm. The first is the most famous and certainly one of the most beautiful of the hymns to Dawn in the R̥gveda, famed for its sensual portrayal of Dawn as a beautiful woman revealing herself to men. The latter is an energetic picture of the storm god, roaring loudly and flooding the earth. The rains are a constant theme in a number of the strongest hymns in this collection, including V.54, which vividly describes the Maruts and the storms they bring, and V.63, which rumbles repeated sounds in its praise of Mitra and Varuṇa as masters of the monsoons. The single hymn to Varuṇa in this collection, V.85, presents both a grand vision of the god as the creator of the world and a more intimate one of Varuṇa as a god who can forgive offenses and free people from them. In general, the Atri poets were at their best in describing natural phenomena, especially thunderstorms, which they both fervently desire and fear because of their power.

V.1 (355) Agni

Budha Ātreya and Gaviṣṭhira Ātreya
12 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn describes the kindling and birth of Agni in the morning rite. In the middle section of the hymn, the poet links verses by repeating an image from the second hemistich in the opening hemistich of the next verse. So in 4d and 5a Agni as a horse is born "at the beginning of days," although in verse 4 this may be Agni as the sun, while in verse 5 Agni is clearly the sacrificial fire. Note the difference in color: the horse is "gleaming" or "white" in verse 4, but "ruddy" in verse 5. The poet almost repeats 5d in 6a, except that he has shifted the tense in 6d to a more distant past indicating the passage of time between the verses. More loosely, in 6c Agni is a sage poet (kaví) and in 7a an "inspired" poet (vípra). In 7d the priests "groom" (mr̥janti) Agni, imagined as a horse, and in 8a "fit to be groomed, he is groomed" (mārjālyò mr̥jyate). In 8d Agni is ahead (prá √as) of other fires and in 9a he goes ahead (prá √i) of other sacrificers.

Though a common metaphor, the image of Agni as a horse or a chariot-driver is treated with originality. Most strikingly, in verse 3, instead of the priests awakening Agni, Agni awakens the hymn, "the bridle" (raśanā́) of the horse that pulls the chariot, the sacrifice itself, while the dakṣiṇā, the sacrificial reward to the priests, is the horse. The end of the verse shifts to the metaphor of Agni as a growing child. The word for "tongues" of flame, juhū́, can also mean a sacrificial ladle, and this ambiguity is the basis for the ellipsis of the noun.

1. Agni has awakened by the kindling wood of the peoples in response to Dawn, approaching like a milk-cow.
   Like young (birds) rising toward a branch, his radiant beams leap forth to heaven's vault.
2. The Hotar has awakened to sacrifice to the gods. Benevolent Agni has stood tall in the early morning.
   As he is kindled, his brightening face has become visible. The great god has become free from darkness.
3. When he has awakened the bridle [=the hymn] of the (priestly) troop, blazing Agni is anointed with blazing cows [=milk].
   Then Reward is harnessed, racing toward the prize. Tall, with his tongues he suckled upon her [=the Ladle], who is stretched out.
4. Toward Agni the thoughts of those seeking the gods converge, like eyes upon the sun.
   When Dawn and Night, differing in color, give birth to him, the gleaming prizewinning steed is born at the beginning of days.
5. Since the thoroughbred has been born at the beginning of days—the ruddy one has been laid upon the laid wood—laying seven treasures in every house, Agni has taken his seat as the Hotar, the superior sacrificer.
6. Agni took his seat as the Hotar, the superior sacrificer, in the lap of his mother, in the wide, sweet-smelling place [=the altar]— he, the young poet, outstanding among many, truth-possessing, the maintainer of the peoples, and kindled in their midst.
7. Now they summon forth this inspired one bringing success in the rites, Agni the Hotar, with their acts of reverence.
   They groom with ghee their own prizewinning steed, who stretches through the two world-halves by truth.
8. Fit to be groomed, he is groomed in his own (house) as master of the house, praised by poets, our kind guest.
   A bull of a thousand horns and having its power, o Agni, you are ahead of all the other (fires) by your strength.
9. At once, Agni, you go ahead beyond the other (sacrificers), for him to whom you have become manifest as the most beloved, as one to be summoned, to be marveled at, far radiant, the dear guest of the clans of the sons of Manu.

10. To you, o youngest Agni, the peoples bring tribute from near and far.
    Attend to the favor of the most fortunate (sacrificer)! Lofty and great is your propitious shelter, o Agni.
11. Today mount your radiant chariot, o radiant Agni, that is shared with the (gods), fit recipients of sacrifice.
    Knowing the paths, convey the gods here across the wide midspace for them to consume the offerings.
12. We have spoken an extolling speech to the wise poet, the bull-strong bull.
    With reverence Gaviṣṭhira has rested his praise song in Agni, as if resting the wide-spreading golden disk in heaven.

V.2 (356) Agni

Kumāra Ātreya or Vr̥śa Jāna or both
12 verses: triṣṭubh, except śakvarī 12

Geldner provides a long introduction to this hymn and concludes that it deals with the disappearance of the fire-god Agni as if he were a household or ritual fire that has suddenly gone out or a newly churned or kindled fire that does not emerge. More specifically, we suggest, it may have been composed as a prāyaścitti or expiation for a sacrificial fire that has gone out as offerings were poured into it and to accompany a rite of restoring the fire.

In verses 1–2 the hidden child is Agni. The young mother (vs. 1) and wet nurse (vs. 2) could be the firewood (samídh fem.) that keeps the fire hidden, and the chief wife, the máhiṣī, who gave birth to Agni, may be a fire-churning stick (aráṇī fem.). Yet in verse 1 the poet assures himself that Agni will emerge and take his ritual place to the east as he usually does. The poet sees Agni far away from his place in the rite (vss. 3–4), but who is this Agni? Is he other fires, or, as we think more likely, the sun, moving from the east toward the west? Verse 5 offers syntactic challenges—the masculine yéṣām and the sense of ná... cid—but the cattle or bulls of Agni that it mentions may be the flames (arká or arcí masc.?) that the poets hopes the god will drive to the sacrificial place. Agni should find release from the powers who would deny the fire to the poet and his peoples (vs. 6), and thus should release the sacrificers from whatever limits them (vs. 7). However, Agni has departed the sacrificial place in anger—a fact that one of the gods, perhaps Indra or Varuṇa or conceivably even Agni himself, has made plain. But Indra knows where Agni is and has guided the sacrificers so that they may recover him (vs. 8). Ultimately, nothing can keep Agni from the sacrificers, as the presence of Agni as the sun in heaven shows (vss. 9–10), and he will honor the command of the gods to help the sacrificer (vs. 12).

Geldner also summarizes a narrative later connected to this hymn, mentioned in Pañcaviṃśa Brāhmaṇa XIII 3.12, Jaiminīya Brāhmaṇa III 94, Br̥haddevatā V

12–23 and given also by Sāyaṇa. According to the version of the Bṛhaddevatā, King Tryaruṇa was riding in a chariot driven by his purohita Vṛśa Jāna. A brahmin boy was killed by the chariot, and the king blamed the purohita. Vṛśa brought the boy back to life, but then stormed away in anger because of the king's accusation. When the purohita departed, however, so did the fury of the king's sacrificial fire and with it the ability of the fire to cook the oblations. Therefore the king went to Vṛśa and persuaded him to return as his purohita and to restore the fire's fury. When he came back, Vṛśa found that a Piśācī woman in the king's house had taken the fury of the king's fire. But by reciting V.2.9 Vṛśa caused the fury to return and to burn the Piśācī woman. As Geldner rightly concludes, this story draws on elements of the hymn, but the hymn is surely not based on it.

1. In secret the young mother carries the child who is swaddled; she does not give him to his father.
   His face is not one that changes (its face): the peoples see it in front, set down in the circle of spokes.
2. Young woman, who is this child whom you carry as his wet nurse? The chief wife has given birth to him, for the embryo grew strong through many autumns, and I saw him (newly) born, when his mother bore him.
3. I saw him with golden teeth and flaming color far away from his homeland, showing the measure of his weapons, as I gave to him my immortal (soma) without impurity. What can those without Indra, without recitations, do to me?
4. I saw him moving from his homeland into the distance, going in beauty in many ways like a herd (moving) together.
   They did not keep hold of him. Because he has been born, the young women become gray.
5. Who will keep my little young blood separate from the cattle, which have never had a stranger as their herdsman?
   They who have kept hold of him, let them release him. The watchful one will drive the animals to us.
6. Hostilities have set down the king of dwellings, the dwelling place of the peoples, among mortals.
   Let the formulations of Atri release him. Let them who scorn become those to be scorned.
7. You loosed even Śunaḥśepa, who was bound, from his thousand (bonds), from the sacrificial post, since he exhausted himself (in sacrifice).
   So unloose the fetters from us, o Agni, watchful Hotar, after having taken your seat here.
8. Because, becoming angry, you had gone from me, the protector of the commandments of the gods announced (that) to me.
   Because the knowing Indra has kept you in his sights, instructed by him have I come here, o Agni.

9. Agni radiates in all directions with a lofty light. He makes visible all things by his greatness.
   He overpowers ungodly guiles and those of evil ways. He sharpens his horns to pierce through the demonic.
10. And in heaven let there be the roars of Agni with their sharp weapons to smash the demonic.
   Even in his elation his (furious) radiance breaks forth. Ungodly evasions will not hinder him.
11. This praise song for you, o you who are powerfully born, have I, the inspired poet, fashioned as a clever artisan (fashions) a chariot.
   If, Agni, you will gladly receive that very (song), o god, thereby we would win the waters together with the sun.
12. "The bull of powerful neck, having become full-grown, will drive together unchallenged the possessions of the stranger," thus the immortals have spoken to this Agni here. He will offer protection to Manu bearing ritual grass; he will offer protection to Manu bearing offerings.

V.3 (357) Agni

Vasuśruta Ātreya
12 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn opens with identifications of Agni with the Ādityas—Varuṇa and Mitra in verse 1 and Aryaman and Mitra in verse 2. The reason for these identifications is not immediately clear, and indeed in various ways the poet also marshals the presence of other gods: Indra in verse 1, the Maruts, Viṣṇu, and Rudra in verse 3, and all the gods again in verse 1. After invoking the presence of the gods, the poet then describes the installation of the sacrificial fire (vss. 4–5). In verses 6–7 he asks that the presence of the sacrificial fire also mark the presence of Agni's help against those who are offending against his people and himself. He mentions evil speech (vs. 7) and curses brought against its speaker (vss. 7, 12) and also against thieves and cheats (vs. 11) threatening him. He therefore asks the god for rescue (vs. 9). This concern explains the prominence of the Ādityas at the beginning of the hymn, since they are the gods who oversee social relations among humans and therefore can protect against people who seek to harm others.

1. You, o Agni, are Varuṇa when you are born. You become Mitra when you are kindled.
   In you are the all the gods, o son of strength. You are Indra for the pious mortal.
2. You become Aryaman when you belong to young girls (at marriage). You bear a secret name, o you of independent will.

They anoint (you as) Mitra with cows [=milk/butter], like a well-established (ally), when you make the lord and lady of the household to be of one mind.

3. For your splendor the Maruts groomed themselves, o Rudra, when you came to beloved, shimmering birth.
   The track of Viṣṇu that was set down as the highest, by that you protect the secret name of the cows.
4. By the splendor of you (who are lovely to see), the gods are lovely to see, o god. Receiving many things for themselves, they serve the immortal one.
   The fire-priests have seated Agni as the Hotar of Manu, giving homage to him as the "Recitation of Āyu."
5. No ancient Hotar was a better sacrificer than you, o Agni. There is no one higher in poetic arts, o you of independent will.
   One belonging to the clan of which you will become a guest will vanquish mortals through the sacrifice, o god.
6. Helped by you, o Agni, we would vanquish mortals—we, striving after goods and awakening with our offering;
   we, in the competition and in the ritual distributions of the days; we, with our wealth, o son of strength.
7. The one who will bring offense or blame against us—all of you: set evil upon him, the speaker of evil.
   O watchful Agni, smash this curse (of him) who harms us with duplicity.
8. At the dawning of this (dawn), o god, the ancients, making you their messenger, offered you sacrifice with oblations, when, o Agni, you speed amid the gathering of riches as the god being kindled by mortals and by the good (gods).
9. Fight! since you know how. Rescue your father [=the priest], who considers himself your son, o son of strength!
   Watchful one, when will you look toward us? O Agni, when will you, perceiving the truth, take your place?
10. Your father sets many names (on you) as he sings praises, good one, if you will find pleasure in this.
    Desiring this, Agni will gain (divine) favor (for us) with the strength of a god, having become full grown, will he not?
11. Certainly, o youngest Agni, carry the singer beyond all difficulties.
    Thieves have appeared and cheating peoples. Devious ones of unknown intention have come.
12. These pleas have come toward you, or rather this very offense has been spoken to (you), the good one.
    Having become full grown, this Agni here will not betray us to the curse nor to him doing harm.

V.4 (358) Agni

Vasuśruta Ātreya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

In this hymn the poet sets forth what we—the poet and the other sacrificers—will do and receive within the frame of what Agni, typically addressed in the 2nd person, will accomplish. The poet draws attention to "we" and "you" by fronting the personal pronouns and using their non-enclitic forms. He announces this strategy in the first verse, which begins with tvā́m "you," and then the following verses largely describe Agni as the sacrificial fire, who conveys the oblations to the gods (vs. 2) and the gods to the oblations (vs. 4). Verses 5 and especially 6, the omphalos verse, mark a thematic movement from the sacrificial fire that serves the gods to the fire that mortals serve and that serves mortals. In verse 7 the first word of each pāda and in verse 8 the first word of each hemistich is "we" or "us." Enclitic and non-enclitic forms of the 1st-person plural pronoun also occur in verses 9 and 10, and in verse 10 the poet personalizes the verse even more deeply by using 1st-person singular verbs: jóhavīmi "I repeatedly invoke" and aśyām "may I attain." The last verse abandons the 1st person altogether, instead referring to the recipient of Agni's favor as "he," and with tvám "you" in the first pāda, it returns to the initial focus on Agni.

1. In you, o Agni, goods-lord of goods, I find elation at the rites, o king.
   Through you we would win victory's prize, racing to the prize. We would prevail against the battle-charges of mortals.
2. Conveying our oblations, unaging Agni is our father, the one far-reaching, far-radiant, and lovely to see among us.
   Illuminate fully the refreshments of a well-run household. Mete out full measures of fame in our direction.
3. The poet of the clans, the clanlord of the (clans) of the sons of Manu, blazing, purifying, ghee-backed Agni—him have you all installed as the Hotar knowing all things. He will win desirable rewards among the gods.
4. Take pleasure, o Agni, along with the libation, aligning with the rays of the sun.
   Take pleasure in our kindling wood, o Jātavedas, and convey the gods here to eat the oblations.
5. As the pleasing lord of the house and the guest in the home, journey to this our sacrifice since you are the knowing one.
   Having smashed to pieces all attacks, o Agni, bring here the sustenance of those challenging us.
6. With your weapon send the Dasyu into hiding, while creating vigor for your own body, and thus protect us when the prize is at stake, o Agni, best of men, since you bring the gods safely across, o child of strength.

7. We would do you honor, o Agni, with our recitations; we, with our oblations, o pure one of auspicious flame.
   For us speed wealth that fulfills all wishes; for us grant all goods.
8. Take pleasure in our rite, o Agni, son of strength with three abodes, and in our oblation.
   May we be those acting rightly toward the gods. Protect us by your shelter with its three defenses.
9. Carry us across all difficult depths and difficult ways, o Jātavedas, as if across a river by a boat.
   O Agni, being sung with reverence as if by Atri, become the helper of our bodies.
10. Thinking with a simple heart, I, a mortal, who repeatedly invoke you, an immortal—among us grant glory, o Jātavedas. May I attain immortality through offspring, o Agni.
11. For whom you will make a wide, comfortable place, o Jātavedas, since he acts rightly toward you, o Agni, he will attain a wealth of horses, sons, heroes, and cattle for his well-being.

V.5 (359) Āprī

Vasuśruta Ātreya
11 verses: gāyatrī

This hymn follows the usual sequence of the Āprī litany, although it omits the normal explicit reference to the barhis, the ritual grass, in verse 4. Until the very end of the hymn, the poet uses the imperative except in verse 2, which has the subjunctive, and in verse 6, in which he announces that he is beseeching Evening and Dawn but does not directly state what he wishes to occur. However, he implies a request for strength by calling the two deities vayovṛ́dh "increasing vigor." The last verse, however, shows a decided shift that is signaled by the complete absence of a verb. Through the repetition of the ritual call svā́hā, the verse marks the moment at which the priest makes the offering that should culminate or accomplish all the things urged before.

1. To the well-kindled flame offer sharp ghee, to Agni Jātavedas.
2. The undeceivable Narāśaṃsa will sweeten this sacrifice, for he is the poet with honey in his hands.
3. When invoked, o Agni, convey here dear shimmering Indra with his easy running chariots, to help us.
4. Having the softness of wool, spread widely, (o ritual grass): the chants have cried out to you.
   Be here to win gain for us, beautiful one.

5. Divine doors, gape open, giving easy access to help us.
   Fill the sacrifice, further and further.
6. The two of beautiful appearance, increasing vigor, the young mothers of truth, Evening and Dawn—them we beseech.
7. On the wind's flight let the two divine Hotars of Manu, being invoked, come to this our sacrifice.
8. Iḍā, Sarasvatī, and Mahī, the three goddesses who are joy itself—let them, unfailing, sit upon the ritual grass.
9. Tvaṣṭar, come here as the kind one, far-ranging in the prosperity (you bring), and in your own person help us at every sacrifice.
10. Where you know, o Lord of the Forest, to be the hidden names of the gods, there make our oblations go.
11. Svāhā to Agni and to Varuṇa, svāhā to Indra and to the Maruts, svāhā to the gods—the offering!

V.6 (360) Agni

Vasuśruta Ātreya
10 verses: paṅkti

The hymn is dominated by references to prizewinning horses. In verse 3 Agni gives the prizewinner, which may be Agni himself. In pāda d of the verse, therefore, the one who "journeys to what is valued" is Agni both as a god retrieving the reward for the sacrificers and as a metaphoric horse racing to the prize. Again in verse 7 Agni's flames are horses and the prize toward which they strive is cattle, first mentioned in verse 1, along with horses. Allusion to horses is indirect in verse 10, but in 10ab the priests "guide" Agni—assuming with Geldner and Renou that ajuryamur is haplology for ajuryáṃ yamur—as they might guide a horse. Then in d they hope for an "abundance of heroes and this abundance of swift horses." There are various possible explanations for why the poet speaks of tyád "this" abundance. One is that there is a comparison between the horses they hope to gain and Agni's flames imagined as horses. If so, then "this abundance" would mean an abundance of horses equivalent to the present abundance of flames.

1. I think of Agni, who is the good one, to whom milk-cows go home, swift chargers (go) home, and our own prizewinners (go) home.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
2. He is Agni, who is sung as the good one, whom the milk-cows approach together, the fast-running chargers (approach) together, and well-born patrons (approach) together.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.

3. Since Agni, who belongs to all domains, gives the prizewinner [=Agni?] to the clan, (since) Agni (gives the prizewinner) that is very ready for wealth, when pleased, he journeys to what is valued.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
4. Agni, here would we kindle your brilliant and unaging (flame), o god, so that this your kindling stick, admired more, will shine in heaven.
   – Bring here refreshment for the praise singers.
5. Agni, for you the offering is poured here, accompanied by our verse, o lord of the glistening flame, beautifully shimmering, wondrous clanlord, and conveyor of oblations.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
6. And these fires are at the forefront among fires. They foster everything of value.
   They hasten it; they speed it; they drive it onward in proper order.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
7. These flames of yours, o Agni, are greatly arrogant prizewinners, which, by the soaring of their hooves, dart toward the double enclosures of the cows.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
8. Agni, bring the new ones here to us, the praise singers—(those) refreshments and good settlements.
   We would be those who have recited verses, those having you as our messenger in every house.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
9. O you who are beautifully shimmering, you make the two spoonsful of melted butter ready within your mouth, and so you should fill us (with plenty) at our hymns, o lord of vast power.
   – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.
10. Thus they *have guided the *unaging Agni with songs and sacrifices in proper order.
    He will grant to us an abundance of heroes and this abundance of swift horses.
    – Bring refreshment for the praise singers.

V.7 (361) Agni

Iṣa Ātreya
10 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 10

At the beginning (vss. 1–3) the poet repeats the word sám “together” alone or in compounds. The first pāda draws particular attention to the word with its repetition of sa(m): sákhāyaḥ sáṃ vaḥ samyáñcam.* In the middle verses (4, 5, 7, 8) sám is echoed by the particle smā/sma "again," or more exactly "as always." The last verse (10) is in a different meter, and, marked by its opening íti "with these words," it stands outside of the main body of the poem. The real concluding verse, therefore, is verse 9, in which sám is echoed again, this time by śám "luck." The one verse in which neither sám nor one of its echo words occurs (6) is actually a dependent clause that is completed by verses 7–8. The sound repetitions thematically link the union (sám) of both the priests and the offerings, the return of Agni (sma/smā), and finally the good luck (śám) that the sacrifice will bring to Agni and the benefit that Agni will bring to both gods and humans.

As mentioned above, the poet extends a statement across three verses (6–8). This highly unusual construction marks the climax of the hymn, which describes the moment when Agni "streams forth." Indeed, the extended statement even iconically suggests the extension of the sacrificial fire as it creeps throughout the wood. However, this strategy creates challenging syntax: verse 6 is a relative clause describing Agni, verse 7 a causal clause that explains how it is that Agni is a homeland for Āyu and his descendants, and verse 8 concludes with the appearance of Agni.

Finally, one philological explanation: in verse 7 we read ákṣitam rather than ā́kṣitam with the Padapāṭha.

1. O companions, (unite) together your united refreshment and praise to Agni, to the highest (dweller) of the dwellings, to the child of nourishment endowed with strength,
2. At the encounter together with whom, wherever it be, delighting men [=priests] (unite) in the session of men [=the sacrifice] and whom even the worthy (gods) kindle and our folk bring to birth.
3. When we get together the refreshments and together the oblations of the sons of Manu,
   he for his part has taken the rein of truth with the vast power of his brilliance.
4. Again he makes a beacon here, even during the night, for him who is far away,
   when he, the pure one, again diminishes the lords of the forest (into ash), himself unaging.
5. In whose service they again pour down their sweat upon his paths, they have mounted this land of his own noble birth like the backs (of horses).
6. The much coveted one whom the mortal finds in order that he suckle everyone [=both gods and mortals],
   (the one who is) the sweetening of foods and also the homeland for Āyu,
7. Because like a mower, he again mows the uninhabitable wasteland like a grazing animal—

he of golden beard and blazing teeth, the craftsman whose might is never blunted—

8. Him his mother bore bearing easily, when she successfully obtained the good fortune (of Agni's birth), (for the sacrificer), for whom, as for Atri, blazing (Agni) again streams forth like an axe.
9. (For the sacrificer), who is luck for you so that you suckle (everyone), o Agni, o you having butter as your soma-drink, establish brilliance and fame here among these mortals, (establish) insight here.
10. With just these words, I take the battle-fury of Adhrij, the (sacrificial) animal given by you.
Then, o Agni, Atri should overpower the Dasyus, who never give; Iṣa should overpower men [=other sacrificers].

V.8 (362) Agni

Iṣa Ātreya
7 verses: jagatī

The poet begins each verse with the object phrase tvā́m agne "you, o Agni," except verse 5, which subtly breaks the pattern by beginning tvám agne, with the nominative subject pronoun instead of the accusative. Thematically the hymn emphasizes the roles of Agni as the fire of the household, of the clan, and of the clans collectively. The poet remembers that the ancestors kindled Agni (vss. 1–2), that their descendants, the present clans, continue to do so now (vs. 3), and that through Agni they gain sustenance (vs. 5).

1. You, o Agni, did the truth-seekers kindle—the ancients (kindled) the ancient one—for your help, o you made with strength,
(you) the much-glittering, all-nurturing one worthy of the sacrifice, the desirable master of the household, lord of the house.
2. You, o Agni, did they seat as the first guest of the clan, as the lord of the house with blazing hair, with lofty beacon and many forms, winning back the stakes, offering good protection and good help, striving to bring (mortals) to old age.
3. You, o Agni, do the clans of Manu's sons invoke as the one knowing priestly offices, discriminating, and best granting treasures, being in hiding yet visible to all, o you who bring good fortune, resounding mightily, sacrificing well, and having ghee as your splendor.
4. You, o Agni, the steadfast one, have we always approached with homage, singing with our songs.

Being kindled, find pleasure in our (songs), o Aṅgiras—(you) a god (in those) of a mortal—with a glorious (fire?), with your bright lights.

5. You, o Agni, with your many forms establish vitality for every clan in your ancient way, o you much praised.
   By your strength you rule over many foods. When you have flared, that flare of yours is not to be challenged.
6. You, o Agni, o youngest one, did the gods make their messenger, the conveyor of the oblations, when you were kindled.
   They have established you of wide expanse, having your birthplace in ghee, anointed (with ghee), as the flaring eye that propels thought.
7. You, o Agni, anointed with ghee from of old, have those seeking your favor kindled with good kindling.
   Having become fully grown and increased by the plants, you spread over the earthly expanses.

V.9 (363) Agni

Gaya Ātreya
7 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

The poet has taken special pains to link one verse to the next. Verses 2–3 form a single statement with two relative clauses joined by the marked conjunction utá. Verses 3–4 both begin with the same words utá sma "And . . . again," and verse 5 also begins with a similar and conjunctive ádha sma "Then . . . again." The final pāda also begins with utá, but sounds almost like an afterthought. Its seeming superfluity calls attention to it as an addition and thereby also to the serial concatenation across the hymn's verses.

Less clear is the purpose that such concatenation serves. One possibility is that this structure is a verbal icon of various kinds of ritual strings. Thus it might reflect the poet's request in the first verse that Agni "convey our oblations in proper order." That is, the connection of verses one to another might anticipate the connected sequence of offerings made into the fire. Or it might reflect the convergences of sacrifices, sacrificial rewards, and sacrificial participants at the rite, all mentioned in verse 2, or the union of Agni's flames, amplified by the image of metals smelted together in verse 5. Or it might even indicate the alliance between gods and humans signified by the appearance of Agni as Mitra, the god of alliances, in verse 6. Or all of the above.

1. You, Agni, a god, do mortals summon, bearing offerings.
   I think you to be Jātavedas: convey our oblations in proper order.
2. Agni is the Hotar of the dwelling rich in gifts, in which the ritual grass is twisted, upon whom sacrifices converge and the prizes and seekers of fame (converge);

3. And to whom the churning stick has again given birth like a new calf—
   Agni, the supporter of the clans of the sons of Manu, performing good rites.
4. And like a son of twisting (snakes) you are again hard to grasp, you, who are the consumer of much wood, o Agni, like a grazing animal in a pasture (consuming much grass).
5. Then he whose smoky flames all together join together—when Trita in heaven blows upon him like a blower [=smelter] (of metals), he becomes sharp as if at the blowing (of bellows).
6. By your help, o Agni, and through my proclamations of (Agni as) Mitra, would I—would we cross over difficulties of mortals, as those repelling hatred do.
7. Let our men (be) dominant over wealth, o Agni. Bring that here, o strong one!
   He makes us dwell in peace; he makes us thrive; he comes in order (for us) to gain the prize of victory. And let him be present to strengthen us in battles.

V.10 (364) Agni

Gaya Ātreya
7 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 4, 7

Oldenberg (1897: 390) remarks that this hymn "seems to stand parallel with" the preceding hymn, which is attributed to the same poet. The hymn comprises a direct and energetic plea for wealth both for those chanting praise songs and for their patrons, their *sūrí*s, explicitly mentioned in verses 3 and 6. In verse 3 it is not clear whether "patrons" and "men" refer to patrons and priests or whether "men" is in apposition to patrons, and then in verse 4, whether those beautifying the songs are patrons or priests or both. If both, which we think most likely, then the "gifts of horses" could refer to actual horses that patrons bring and metaphoric horses, the songs that priests offer.

The hymn is marked by repeated pointing at Agni as the one who can and should bring this wealth. So verses 2, 3, and 7 all begin with a 2nd-person pronoun followed immediately by an address to Agni: "You, o Agni!" In verse 2 there is a progression from Agni's will to sacrifice, to his skill to do so, and finally to his "effective action" in performing the rite, at which point he becomes "worthy of the sacrifice," that is, both worthy to perform his priest's role and worthy to receive offerings as a god.

1. O Agni, who are never poor, bring here the most powerful brilliance to us.
   With wealth and abundance, cut a path to victory's prize for us.

2. You, o undeceiving Agni! By your will, by your readiness of skill for us, and by your effective action—upon you has lordliness mounted—you are worthy of the sacrifice, like Mitra.
3. You, o Agni! Increase for us the household and prosperity of these, our patrons (and) our men, who have obtained rewards through praise songs,
4. Who with their gifts of horses, o shimmering Agni, beautify songs for you—
   (these) men, spirited with high spirits, whose acclaim (rises) more loftily even than heaven. In person he [=Agni] attends (to them).
5. These flashing flames of yours, o Agni, go boldly, like earth-encircling lightning bolts, their sound like a chariot chasing the prize of victory.
6. Now, (bring us wealth) to help us, o Agni, and to give to the zealous one, and for our patrons to pass safely through all regions.
7. You, o Agni, o Aṅgiras, having been praised and being praised, bring us wealth that overwhelms the wide-reaching one, for your praisers and for us to praise (you), o Hotar. And be present for us to grow strong in battles.

V.11 (365) Agni

Sutambhara Ātreya
6 verses: jagatī

As in the previous hymn, there is an energetic pointing to Agni, who is insistently named at the beginning of each pāda in verse 4 and addressed in the 2nd person at the beginning of 5abc and 6a, d. There is also an emphasis on Agni's expanse: his radiance (vs. 1) and his smoke (vs. 3) touch heaven; he is a visible beacon (vss. 2, 3); he is present in every household (vs. 4); he is filled with vast power (śávas, vs. 5); and he even extends backward in time all the way to the first man, Vivasvant (vs. 3). The description of Agni as shining for the Bharatas (vs. 1) may explain why there is this emphasis on his expanse. The Agni of this hymn may be the tribal fire of the Bharatas, and therefore the poet wishes to emphasize Agni's presence among all the people of the Bharatas and the extent of the Bharatas' territory or power.

1. The herdsman of the people has been born, the awakened, well-skilled Agni, for a new safe passage.
   His face covered with ghee, blazing (Agni) radiates brilliantly for the Bharatas with lofty (radiance) that touches heaven.
2. As the beacon of their sacrifice, as the foremost one placed to the fore, men have kindled Agni in his threefold abode.

On the same chariot with Indra and the gods, he of strong resolve sits down on the ritual grass as Hotar to perform the sacrifice.

3. Though ungroomed, you are born blazing in your two mothers [=the fire-churning sticks]. As the delighting poet of Vivasvant, you rose up.
   They made you grow strong with ghee, o (ghee-)anointed Agni. Your smoke became a beacon, resting upon heaven.
4. Let Agni successfully pursue our sacrifice. Agni do men distribute in every house.
   Agni became their messenger, conveying the oblations. Choosing Agni, they choose him who possesses a poet's purpose.
5. For you, Agni, let this most honey-filled speech, for you let this inspired thinking be a joy for your heart.
   You do the songs fill with vast power, like great streams the river [=the Sindhu], and (you) do they make strong.
6. You, Agni, did the Aṅgirases find, though you were hidden in secret, resting in every piece of wood.
   Being churned, you are born to great strength. You they call the child of strength, o Aṅgiras.

V.12 (366) Agni

Sutambhara Ātreya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn repeatedly asserts that the poet is speaking the truth (ṛtá), and therefore, since Agni himself speaks the truth (vs. 3) and attends to the truth (vs. 2), he should attend to the poet and grant his wishes. In verse 5 the poet contrasts himself and his truth-speaking with those who were apparently once his allies, whose words and whose attacks against him are now twisted and false. The questions in 4bcd are ironic, for in fact Agni offers no protection to a lying cheat. Pāda 4a might also be taken ironically or not: the bonds (bándhana) could be the bonds of friendship with Agni—in its other two Ṛgvedic attestations the word means "connection" in a neutral or positive sense—or they could be the fetters that the poet clearly hopes are the cheat's reward.

1. Forth to lofty Agni, worthy of the sacrifice, to the bull of truth, the lord, do (I bring) my thought, well purified in my mouth at the sacrifice like ghee (in Agni's mouth);
   I bring (forth) my song to be face-to-face with the bull.
2. O you attentive to the truth, attend to just the truth. Bore through to the many streams of truth.
   I do not (serve) the sorcerer by strength nor by duplicity; I serve the truth of the flame-red bull.

3. In what fashion, o Agni, do you, speaking the truth according to the truth, become aware of our newer speech?
   The god who is rites-guardian of the rites' sequence knows of me; I do not (know) a lord other than him, the winner of wealth here.
4. What bonds do you have for the cheat, Agni? What brilliant protectors will keep winning gain (for him)?
   Which ones protect the wellspring of untruth, o Agni? What herdsmen are there for false speech?
5. These inconstant companions of yours, Agni, though they used to be kind, have become unkind.
   These have injured themselves by their words, speaking twisted things against him who goes straight.
6. The one who summons you to the sacrifice with homage, o Agni, protects the truth of the flame-red bull.
   For him let there come a dwelling place, wide and bringing success, (and also) the posterity of Nahuṣa, who is spreading in every direction.

V.13 (367) Agni

Sutambhara Ātreya
6 verses: gāyatrī

Like the previous hymn, which is also attributed to Sutambhara, this hymn emphasizes the praise song offered to Agni, which causes Agni to grow and to perform the sacrifice as the Hotar. The course of the hymn follows that growth of Agni. In verse 1 the sacrificers are just beginning to kindle Agni. He then spreads wide (vs. 4) and is made strong (vs. 5), until finally, in the last verse, he encompasses the gods.

1. Chanting, we invoke you; chanting, we would kindle you, chanting, o Agni, for your help.
2. For Agni we will conceive a praise song, an effective one today for him who touches heaven, for the god, as we seek goods.
3. Agni is pleased at our songs—he the Hotar, who is here among the sons of Manu.
   He will perform sacrifice to the divine race.
4. You, o Agni, are spread wide as the pleasing Hotar to be chosen.
   Through you they stretch out the sacrifice.
5. You, o Agni, best prizewinner, do the inspired poets make strong when you are well praised.
   Give us an abundance of heroes.
6. O Agni, like a rim the spokes, you surround the gods.
   I reach toward your shimmering generosity.

V.14 (368) Agni

Sutambhara Ātreya
6 verses: gāyatrī

As in his previous two hymns Sutambhara emphasizes the power of the praise song to awaken Agni. Here he fronts the name of Agni (vss. 1, 4–6) or a pronoun referring to Agni (vss. 2, 3) in every verse. Verses 2–3 are not so much exceptions as a variation of the structure of the other verses. These two verses form a single statement that withholds the name "Agni" until it is fronted in their last pāda, 3c. Then verse 4 and the following verses pick up "Agni" and continue with it as the first word in the verse.

1. Agni—awaken him with a praise song, kindling the immortal one.
   He will place our oblations among the gods.
2. Him they invoke in the rites—mortals (invoke) the immortal one,
   the god—
   to be the best sacrificer among the people of Manu,
3. Because him do they invoke one after another with a spoon dripping with ghee, him the god
   Agni, to convey the oblation.
4. Agni shone as soon as he was born, smashing Dasyus and darkness with his light.
   He found the cows, the waters, and the sun.
5. Agni, to be invoked as our poet—serve him, ghee-backed!
   Let him—he will hear!—track my summons.
6. Agni, governing all territories, have they increased with ghee and praise songs
   of good insight and eloquence.

V.15 (369) Agni

Dharuṇa Āṅgirasa
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Elizarenkova (1995: 152) calls dharúṇa "support" the "magic word" of this hymn, since this word is repeated and echoed by other derivatives of √dhṛ or by similar sounding words. By attributing the hymn to Dharuṇa, the Anukramaṇī implies that the poet is playing on his name, although it is likely that the Anukramaṇī derives the name of the poet from the repetition of this word. The purpose of this repetition of dharúṇa is to underscore the role of Agni as the "supporter of wealth, the support of goods" (vs. 1). The name of Agni is postponed to the very end of the line of this first verse and then is never mentioned again, although echoing Agni the next to last word of the hymn is the name of Atri.

The rest of the hymn presents a number of linguistic and exegetical problems, and this translation accepts the minor emendation in verse 4c of jarase to járase proposed by Oldenberg. The second verse is particularly mysterious and the translation does not fully unravel it. Geldner suggests that the unnamed subjects are the Aṅgirases, ancient singers, who established the truth as the foundation of the sacrifice in heaven and who, together with their "born" sons, attained the "unborn" Ādityas or the gods generally. We offer another view in the translation. In this interpretation, the subjects are priests, who by the truth of their words support the truth that is the rightly performed sacrifice, which itself is a support, the support of the gods. The priests support the sacrifice by placing it on its support, the heavenly ideal of the sacrifice. In doing so they also support the gods, who gather at the earthly sacrifice, the foundation of heaven. In this way the priests attained the unborn gods by means of their sacrificial fires that have been "born." To be sure, like much else in this verse, the identification of those "born" is uncertain, but note that the bodies of Agni, the different sacrificial fires, are mentioned in verse 3 and that also in this verse the ancient Agni, this time in the singular, is "newly born."

In verse 5, as Geldner rightly notes, the image is from racing. The beckoning prize of victory maintains the diminishing strength of the racer. In the sacrificial context the prize may be Agni's reward, the offerings of melted butter that revive the flagging fire. Thus according to the latter half of the verse, the fire hides within the wood, but after it is revived, it appears again majestically.

1. I bring forth my song to the ritual master and poet worth finding, to the glorious ancient one.
   Seated in ghee is the very kind lord, the supporter of wealth, the support of goods, Agni.
2. By truth they [=the priests] support truth, the support, on the powerful (support) of the sacrifice in the highest heaven, and (support) the superior men [=the gods], who have sat down on the support at the foundation of heaven—they who have attained the ones unborn by those born.
3. They stretch out the bodies (of Agni), which keep away confinement, and great vitality, hard to surpass, for the ancient one.
   Though newly born, he would cross the boundaries (of the fireplace), but all around they hem him in, who is like a raging lion.
4. When, spreading, like a mother you carry more and more peoples to be suckled and to see, and when *you awaken, acquiring more and more vitality, you go all around with varying forms in your single person.
5. Now let the prize of victory protect the limit of your strength as you give as your milk broad support for wealth.
   Hiding your track like a thief, then appearing greatly for wealth, you have rescued Atri.

V.16 (370) Agni

Pūru Ātreya
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

This and the following hymn are attributed to the same poet, and indeed the two hymns show many parallels: they have the same meter and the same number of verses, and their concluding pāda is identical. Geldner notes that this hymn, like many of the Agni hymns of this maṇḍala, uses rare and affected expressions. Certainly the syntax in this hymn is challenging, especially in verses 3–4, whose complex construction marks the climax of the hymn. The two verses describe the point at which Agni is burning most brightly. At that moment he has become the powerful ally and benefactor of the sacrificers, and at that moment Agni shines beyond both heaven and earth.

Both in these verses and elsewhere in the hymn the poet emphasizes the alliance among Agni, the priests, and their patrons. In verse 1, for example, the expression mitrám̐ ná compares Agni to Mitra, the god of alliances, and simultaneously compares him to a mitrá, an ally. The first is the primary sense, as it is elsewhere, here especially because the hymn refers to Bhaga, another of the Ādityas, in verse 2.

1. Because there is lofty vitality for radiance, chant to the god Agni, whom mortals have installed to the fore, like Mitra, with their proclamations.
2. Because he is the Hotar of the peoples in the arms of skill throughout the days,
   Agni allots the oblation in the proper sequence, like Bhaga a wish.
3. At our praise of this generous one and in our companionship with him full-flamed,
   our mightily roaring compatriot, in whom all (beings) have placed unbridled strength—
4. For then, o Agni, (you are) ready to give abundant heroes to these (your companions)—
   the two world-halves do not encompass him, though youthful, nor his fame.
5. Now come to us! Being sung, o Agni, bring here a desirable reward to us and our patrons, who together will receive well-being.
   – And be present to strengthen us in battles.

V.17 (371) Agni

Pūru Ātreya
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

A striking image in this hymn is that of the mouth—the mouth of Agni, who receives the offerings, and the mouth of the priest, who recites the hymns. The poet associates or even identifies these mouths in verse 2 by using ásya "of this one," to refer to either Agni or the priest, and in verse 5, where the mouth is equally that of Agni and that of the priest. The poet insists on these two mouths because they are the means by which the patron of the sacrifice can think himself glorious (vs. 2). In verse 3, however, the poet refers only to the mouth of Agni and shifts to a sexual image. The "thrust" could be the thrust of the poet's song or it could be the thrust of the fire-churning. Because it carries a sexual connotation, line c then describes the semen of Agni that gives birth to lofty flames.

1. Here, o god, by his sacrifices the mortal (should summon) the mightier one for help;
   Pūru should summon Agni to give help, when a good rite has been performed.
2. Since, by reason of the mouth of this one [=both Agni and the poet], o distributor [=sacrificer], you think yourself to have greater glory for yourself, (you should summon) him, the vault of heaven with his shimmering blaze, the delighting one beyond inspired thinking.
3. Surely it is by the mouth and flame of this one, who is hitched up by thrust and song, by whose semen, like that of heaven, flames blaze aloft,
4. And it is by the will of this one—discerning, wondrous—that there are good things here on the chariot [=the sacrifice].
   So then Agni is proclaimed as the one to be invoked among all the clans.
5. Since the desirable reward is now just ours, our patrons follow after the mouth (of Agni and the poet).
   O child of nourishment, protect us that we prevail. Be capable that we have well-being.
   – And be present to strengthen us in battles.

V.18 (372) Agni

Mr̥ktavāhas Dvita Ātreya
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

This hymn is a dānastuti, a praise of generous patrons. Renou calls it a dānastuti for the whole preceding sequence of hymns. Dvita, who calls himself, perhaps jokingly, mr̥ktávāhas "him of the broken vehicle," summons Agni to reward Dvita's patrons. Agni should give them fame, although this fame is also partly and directly created by the hymn itself. They deserve this reward because they have generously given Dvita a gift of many horses (vss. 3, 5). The hymn praises Dvita as well, if indirectly, when it mentions the "brilliant insight" of the singer (vs. 4), which because of him exists among the patrons.

1. Early in the morning much beloved Agni, guest of the clan, should be praised, the immortal who rejoices at all the oblations among mortals.
2. Your own skill is at the ready for Dvita of the broken vehicle.
   He receives the (soma-)drop in proper sequence even as your praise singer, o immortal one.
3. For you do I summon him of long-lived blaze with a song for (you) generous ones, whose chariot speeds away undamaged, o giver of horses,
4. Or among whom is brilliant insight, who protect the recitations in (the singer's) mouth.
   The ritual grass has been strewn near him [=Agni] of sun-like majesty, and they have wrapped themselves in fame.
5. For those who have given me fifty horses for our joint praise, for the generous men, o Agni, make bright and great fame, lofty (fame) filled with men, o immortal one.

V.19 (373) Agni

Vavri Ātreya
5 verses: gāyatrī 1–2, anuṣṭubh 3–4, virāḍrūpā 5

As other translators have remarked, this hymn is enigmatic. Renou even describes it as a collection of disjointed verses, and it is true that in its five verses the hymn has three different meters.

The first two verses describe the birth of Agni in terms that suggest human birth. The fire is born from a womb of wood, its first covering, and appears with a caul of smoke, its second covering. Having emerged, it peeps out from the hollow of the lower churning stick that gave it birth. Then priests nurture Agni's growth into manhood, and perhaps Agni himself, as Geldner suggests, becomes a fortress for them, or perhaps the sacrificial ground governed by Agni is their fortress.

In verse 3 it is not clear who Śvaitreya might be. He could be Agni himself, whose kin would be his flames. Or he might be a clan leader or even, as Geldner argues, a racing bull. Because the relationship between Bṛhaduktha and Śvaitreya is unclear, it is equally uncertain how to understand the relationship between 3ab and cd. Bṛhaduktha is elsewhere a poet, and although the Anukramaṇī abstracts Vavri Ātreya as the name of the poet of this hymn from the vavrí "covering" in the first verse, it is more likely that Bṛhaduktha is actually the poet. He is apparently seeking the prize the way a horse does. Oldenberg points out that in the Vājapeya sacrifice there is a mantra that invites the horse to drink honey, perhaps to give him strength, and perhaps this custom lies behind the simile in d. The mystery deepens in verse 4, but it appears that Agni, when he is born, then mates with the two fire-churning sticks that give him birth as he consumes them. The act would seem to be unholy, but that is merely Agni's deception.

The last verse apparently describes the fully mature Agni, flinging his flames in the wind. On this verse, see Hoffmann (1954/61: 46–47 [=1975: 375–76]); he is surely correct to read sandhr̥ṣájas, which could mean "daring warriors" or the like, instead of san dhr̥ṣájas with the Padapāṭha.

1. His low appearances [=low flames] are born forth. From the covering (of wood) a covering (of smoke) has become visible.
   He gazes out in the lap of his mother [=the lower churning stick].
2. Attentive, they [=the priests] have poured various offerings. Unblinkingly, they protect his manly power.
   They have entered into the firm fortress.
3. The kin of Śvaitreya have grown strong brilliantly, as have their peoples.
   With ornamented neck, Br̥haduktha (is) seeking the prize with this (honey) [=soma?], like (a prize-seeking horse) with honey.
4. (His semen) dear like the milk of desire, (his act) unkindred (incest) with two [=fire-churning sticks] that are kin, like the vessel of hot milk in whose belly is the prize, (he is) the undeceivable deceiver of every one.
5. Playing, o ray of light, you are here for us, ever finding yourself in alliance with the biting Wind.
   Hurl those well-sharpened flames, like daring warriors their sharp (weapons), o you who stand in the belly [=fire pit].

V.20 (374) Agni

Prayasvanta Ātreya
4 verses: anuṣṭubh

As in the previous hymn and the three that follow, the name of the poet has been extracted from the hymn itself, in this case from práyasvant "bringing pleasing offerings" in verse 3. The dominant theme is the songs, which are explicitly mentioned in every verse except verse 2, and even there they are probably the understood object in ab. Verse 2 is the most interesting in the hymn because it is not clear to whom the poet refers. It sounds as though the people he criticizes are rival poets, who have prospered through Agni, but who are in some way not acting or not performing the ritual properly now.

1. The wealth that even you hold in regard, o Agni, best winner of victory's prize, that yokemate of ours I will extol with songs as worthy of fame among the gods.

2. O Agni, those grown strong by your mighty power who do not send (songs)
   (to keep) away hatred, away crookedness, follow (the commandments) of one who is under the commandments of others.
3. We choose you, o Agni, as our Hotar, ensuring success for our skill.
   Bringing pleasing offerings, we summon with our song the one who is first in the sacrifices.
4. As (we strive) in this way for your help day after day, o powerful one, for wealth and for truth, o you of strong will, we your feasting companions would be united with cattle and we would be united with heroes.

V.21 (375) Agni

Sasa Ātreya
4 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 4

The name of the poet is extracted from sasá "grain" in verse 4, which sticks out as an unusual word in an unusual context. The poet, whatever his name might be, pairs and links similar-sounding words and expressions. The last line of the first verse devā́n devayaté yaja (1d) is echoed in the first line of the last verse devám̐ vo devayajyáyā (4a). He fronts accented forms of the 2nd-person pronoun at the beginning of 2a (tvám) and 3a (tvā́m), both to be read disyllabically, as is normal for tvám but not for tvā́m. These repetitions are thematically the more significant since the poet emphasizes the 2nd-person address to Agni and his role as a god (vss. 3, 4) sacrificing to the gods. But there are other repetitions as well. For example verse 3 links su- and *uṣ-*sounds: mā́nuṣe... súprīta*... srúcas... ānuṣák sújāta sárpirāsute*.

1. Like Manu, we would install you. Like Manu, we would kindle you.
   O Agni, Aṅgiras—like Manu, sacrifice to the gods for the one seeking the gods,
2. For, o Agni, it is you who, well-pleased, are kindled among the people descended from Manu.
   The sacrificial ladles go to you in their proper order, o you, the well-born one whose drink is melted butter.
3. It is you whom all the gods, as one, have made their messenger.
   Waiting upon you, o poet, they invoke you, a god, in the sacrifices.
4. The mortal should invoke for all of you the god Agni with sacrifice to the gods.
   O blazing one, shine when you are kindled. Take your seat upon the womb of truth. Take your seat upon the womb of grain.

V.22 (376) Agni

Viśvasāman Ātreya
4 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 4

In verse 1 the poet Viśvasāman likely addresses himself. In doing so, he may be playing on the significance of his name, which means "he to whom belongs every tune," for he calls on himself to chant to Agni. The fire is installed as the Hotar of the rite, and like a Hotar he should be attentive. Therefore Viśvasāman asks that Agni be attentive to his praise and to his words. The references to Agni as the "Hotar within the clan" (vs. 1) and to the Atris (vs. 4) suggest that this short hymn was an address to the clan fire of the Atris, and of course the fire of a clan of poets ought to be especially attentive to the speech of poets and especially adorned by songs.

1. O Viśvasāman, like Atri chant forth to him of purifying flame, who is to be invoked at the rites as the most delighting Hotar within the clan.
2. Install Agni Jātavedas, the god and priest.
   Let the sacrifice go forth in proper sequence today as that which best encompasses the gods.
3. We mortals have brought to mind you of attentive mind, you a god, for help, begging for the help of you, the desirable one.
4. O Agni, be attentive to this (speech) of ours—here is our speech, o strong one!
   The Atris make you strong with their praise songs, o you of fair lips, o lord of the household; the Atris beautify you with song.

V.23 (377) Agni

Dyumna Viśvacarṣaṇi Ātreya
4 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 4

This hymn invokes the fire that grants wealth, especially a wealth of cattle (vs. 2), which brings with it dominance over surrounding lands. At the same time the ability of Agni to grant wealth and power also depends on the sacrificers who bring the ritual grass (3a), who establish Agni as their Hotar (3c), and whose words confer power on him (1d). The references to the tribes who pursue Agni (vs. 3) and to Agni himself as the one "who belongs to all lands" (vs. 4) suggest that the fire of this hymn either was or was at least compared to the common fire that united the various Ārya peoples.

1. O Agni, bring here wealth that is overpowering through the power of your brilliance and that, with prizes at stake, will be powerful over the lands by means of my mouth [=my speech].

2. O powerful Agni, bring here that wealth overpowering in battles, for you are the real and infallible giver of the prize that brings cattle.
3. For, with their ritual grass twisted, all the tribes as one pursue you as their cherished Hotar in your seats [=fire places] for the sake of many desirable things.
4. For as always, that one who belongs to all lands acquires power against evil intents.
O Agni, here in these dwellings shine richly for us, o blazing one, shine brilliantly, o pure one.

V.24 (378) Agni

The Gaupāyanas or Laupāyanas: Bandhu (1), Subandhu (2) Śrutabandhu (3), and Viprabandhu (4)
4 verses: dvipadā virāj

The Anukramaṇī attributes this hymn's four verses to four poets, all belonging to the family of the Gaupāyanas or Laupāyanas. These four poets are brothers in the Gaupāyana family according to an itihāsa (legend) that is supposed to underlie X.57–60, although it is unlikely that these R̥gvedic hymns actually refer to this story. According to the story the second brother, Subandhu, was killed and brought back to life by the other three. In this hymn, the first and third verses are for protection, while the second verse, the one attributed to Subandhu, is a more generic call for wealth. The last verse simply asks for Agni's favor without being clear what end his favor should serve. In a general way the hymn thus fits the story of the rescue of Subandhu, since the verses surrounding his verse concern the idea of rescue. But such echoes may explain the attribution of the hymn rather than the hymn itself.

1. O Agni, be our nearest and our kind rescuer, providing (us) a shield.
2. Agni is good and famed for goods. Arrive here and give the most brilliant wealth.
3. Be attentive to us, and hear our summons. Give us freedom from anyone who wishes evil.
4. O strongest-blazing, shining (Agni), we now beg you for your favor for (us, your) partners.

V.25 (379) Agni

The Vasūyava Ātreyas
9 verses: anuṣṭubh, arranged in tr̥cas

The attribution of this hymn to the Vasūyavas is likely based on verse 9, in which the poet calls himself and his people vasūyávaḥ "those seeking goods." As Oldenberg (1897) notes, the hymn is divided into three tr̥cas. This organization would explain its position in the Ātreya Agni collection. A hymn of three tr̥cas can follow a hymn of four verses in the proper sequence in which hymns with a fewer number of either verses or strophes follow hymns with a greater number of verses or strophes. However, Oldenberg (1888: 188) also suggests that V.25–28 may be an added supplement to the Agni collection.

In the first tr̥ca Agni is apparently first becoming present (vs. 2) and has begun to shine (vs. 3). Then in the second (vss. 4–6) the presence of Agni explodes, and the poet marks the force of Agni by constantly repeating his name at the beginning of every hemistich except one (5cd). In the final tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) the poet turns not so much to the sight of Agni as the sound of Agni. His louder and louder crackling is reflected in the words of the sacrifice and the other sounds of the sacrifice, notably the sounds of the pressing stones that pound the soma, which are themselves regularly connected to the chants and recitations of the rite. The danger of tr̥cas, especially when the strophes are as thematically distinct as they are in this hymn, is that the hymn itself may seem to break into blocks. This poet uses ring composition to unify the poem and to underscore its ultimate purpose. In 1d he says that Agni parṣati dviṣáḥ "will bring to safety from hatred," and again in 9cd, at the end of the hymn, that sá no víśvā áti dvíṣaḥ / párṣat "he will bring us to safety across all hatreds." While the two phrases obviously echo one another, note that the poet has not quite repeated himself. Most especially his first assertion seems to be a general one: Agni is the one who brings to safety. But in the last, Agni is the one who brings us to safety, applying Agni's more general power to himself and his people.

1. Here for you all I sing to the god Agni for his help. He is the one good for us.
   The son of (dawn's) rays will give; the possessor of truth will bring to safety from hatred.
2. For he is really present—the one whom even the ancients kindled, whom even the gods—he the very Hotar of gladdening tongue, who brings radiant goods through his bright light.
3. By your best insight and most excellent favor toward us, o Agni, shine on us riches by reason of our well-plaited words, o you who are worthy to be chosen.

4. Agni is king among the gods and Agni among mortals when he enters (among them).
   Agni is the conveyor of oblations for us. Serve Agni with your insights.
5. Agni gives to the pious man an excellent son of very mighty fame and of very mighty formulations, one who cannot be overcome and who brings fame to his lord.
6. Agni gives the lord of settlements who prevails in battle with his men;
   Agni (gives) the fast-running charger, the unvanquished victor.

7. What best conveys (offerings), that is for Agni. Chant (your chant) aloft, o you of far-radiant goods.
   Like a buffalo-cow wealth (arises) from you; victory's prizes arise from you.
8. Your flames are brilliant: (they resound) as the pressing stone resounds aloft,
   and just like thunder from heaven your roar has arisen by itself.
9. Thus, seeking goods, we have celebrated Agni who acts with strength.
   He of strong resolve will bring us to safety across all hatreds, as if by a boat.

V.26 (230) Agni

The Vasūyava Ātreyas
9 verses: gāyatrī, arranged in tr̥cas

Like the preceding hymn, this hymn comprises three tr̥cas. It draws on repeated pādas, especially although not exclusively in the final pādas of verses: 1c = VI.16.2c and VIII.102.16c; 2c = VII.16.4b; 4c = V.20.3a, VIII.60.1b, and X.21.1b; 5c = I.12.4c and VIII.44.14c; 7c = V.22.2b; and 9c = I.39.5d. Geldner provides a complete list of the repetitions. As such, it is reminiscent of the assemblages that constitute the kindling verses in several priestly families (see V.28 below). The first two tr̥cas (vss. 1–3, 4–6) are a direct address to Agni to assume his role as the one who conveys oblations to the gods and perfects the ritual. In the third tr̥ca (vss. 7–9) the poet turns to his fellow priests, telling them to install the fire, prepare the seat for the gods, and perform the rites in order, and then in the final verse, with the fire now blazing and the priests performing their roles, he invites various gods, perhaps representing the All Gods, to take their seats.

1. O purifying Agni, with your radiance and with your gladdening tongue, o god,
   convey the gods hither and sacrifice.
2. O you with ghee-covered back, o you of shimmering radiance, we beg you of sunlike appearance:
   convey the gods hither to pursue (our oblations).
3. O poet, we would kindle you, the brilliant one whose oblations are worth pursuing,
   the lofty one in the rite, o Agni.

4. O Agni, come with all the gods for the giving of oblations.
   We choose you as our Hotar.
5. Convey an abundance of heroes to the sacrificer pressing soma, o Agni!
   Sit here on our ritual grass along with the gods!

6. Being kindled, o thousand-conquering Agni, you prosper the (ritual) foundations as the praiseworthy messenger of the gods.

7. Install Agni Jātavedas, who conveys the oblations, the youngest (Agni), as god and priest.
8. Let the sacrifice go forth in proper sequence today as that which best encompasses the gods.
   Strew the sacred grass (for the gods) to sit.
9. Let the Maruts, the Aśvins, and Mitra and Varuṇa sit here upon this, let the gods with their whole clan.

V.27 (381) Agni

Kings Tryaruṇa Traivr̥ṣṇa, Trasadasyu Paurukutsya, and Aśvamedha Bhārata, or Atri Bhauma
6 verses: triṣṭubh 1–3, anuṣṭubh 4–6, arranged in tr̥cas

This hymn consists of two tr̥cas, so it is in its proper place according to its length. Nonetheless, Oldenberg (Noten and 1897) regards it as an addition to the original collection.

The hymn is a dānastuti addressed to allied patrons or kings. The Anukramaṇī names three patrons, but, as Oldenberg (1897) and Geldner suggest, Tryaruṇa might be a descendant of Trasadasyu and bear his name as an epithet (vs. 3). If so, then the hymn addresses two men, Tryaruṇa (vss. 1–3 in triṣṭubh) and Aśvamedha (vss. 4–6 in anuṣṭubh). In verse 4 Tryaruṇa commands Aśvamedha to reward the poet, but it remains unclear just how the two are related.

The translation and interpretation of the hymn become difficult especially at verse 3, which is open to a number of different constructions. We understand 3ab to mean that the sacrificer desires Agni's favor for the poet's hymn. Why he should desire this favor navamám "for the ninth time" is not stated, but there is a parallel in VIII.24.23, which calls on the poet to praise daśamám "a tenth time." In both verses the numbers may simply indicate "many times." Here in this hymn, however, it is likely that navamám, especially because it follows náviṣṭhāya "for the newest," either means "anew" rather than "ninth" or puns on the two meanings. The "harnessed chariot," with which Tryaruṇa welcomes the poet's song in 3cd, may be a gift to the poet, or it may be the sacrifice itself, which elsewhere is represented as a chariot.

Verse 4 begins the second tr̥ca, a transition that is marked also by a change in meter. But in contrast to the clear segmentation of the hymn shown by the tr̥ca form and the meter, the syntax binds verse 4 with verse 3, since the opening relative clause is coordinate with the relative clause in 3cd. This may reproduce the relationship between Tryaruṇa and Aśvamedha, who are two individuals but who are in some manner bound to one another.

1. The lord of settlements has readied for me two oxen together with an ox-cart—he, the most illustrious lord, more (illustrious) than (any other) generous patron.
   Tryaruṇa, son of Trivr̥ṣan, is illustrious through his tens of thousands (of cattle), o Agni Vaiśvānara.
2. To him who gives to me a hundred and twenty cattle and two harnessed fallow bays, compliant to the chariot-pole—to Tryaruṇa offer protection, o Agni Vaiśvānara, o you who are well praised and grown strong.
3. In this way, o Agni, Trasadasyu [=Tryaruṇa] is desiring your favor for the newest (hymn) for the ninth time—
   Tryaruṇa, who welcomes with a harnessed (chariot) the many songs of mine for (you), the one powerfully born;
4. (Tryaruṇa), who will declare thus to my patron Aśvamedha:
   "Let him [=Aśvamedha] give to (the poet) questing for gain by his verse; let him give to the one who seeks the truth, (questing for) wisdom."
5. (Such are) the gifts of Aśvamedha, whose hundred gray bulls excite me like soma juices with their three additions [=milk, curds, barley].
6. O Indra and Agni, keep an abundance of heroes with Aśvamedha, the giver of a hundred (cattle), and (keep with him) dominion, lofty and unaging like the sun in heaven.

V.28 (382) Agni

Viśvavārā Ātreyī
6 verses: triṣṭubh 1, 3, jagatī 2, anuṣṭubh 4, gāyatrī 5, 6, arranged in tr̥cas

The Anukramaṇī attributes this hymn to a female poet, but her name is extracted from viśvávārā "bringing all desirable things" in 1c, which describes the sacrificial ladle.

One of the striking features of this hymn is its use of four different meters in its six verses. As that metrical variation suggests, the hymn is not a unified composition but rather a collection of verses from the Atri tradition, brought together as sāmidhenī verses to accompany the kindling of fire. There are similar composite sāmidhenī hymns in the collections of the Viśvāmitras (III.27) and of the Bharadvājas (VI.16). As Proferes (2003: 10) notes, these hymns are three of the four hymns used by both the Śāṅkhāyana and Āśvalāyana traditions for the compilation of the sāmidhenī verses used in the classical Vedic rites.

Even though the hymn is a compilation, the tr̥ca form does reflect its structure. The first three verses urge Agni to show himself as he comes into flame. In 1cd the description sounds as though it might refer to the dawn (in 1b), but at the end the subject is revealed to be the ghee-filled ladle, or perhaps it is both the ghee-filled ladle and the ghee-filled dawn that move forward, the first to the east, the second toward the west. The second tṛca (4–6) begins with a praise of the fire in full blaze and an invocation to him to take on the task of bringing the oblations to the gods.

1. Kindled, Agni has lifted his flame to heaven. Facing the dawn, he radiates widely.
   Forward she goes with our homage, bringing all desirable things, summoning the gods with the oblation—she, the ghee-filled (ladle).
2. When you are being kindled, you rule over what is immortal. For well-being you accompany him who prepares the oblation.
   He acquires all material wealth whom you urge onward, and he sets his hospitality in front, o Agni.
3. O Agni, show yourself off for the sake of great good fortune. Let your brilliance be very high.
   Let our united household be easy to control. Surmount the great powers of those who act as our rivals.

4. I extol the glory of you, kindled and greatly exalted, o Agni.
   You are the bull of brilliance. You are kindled in the rites.
5. When you are kindled, o Agni of poured offerings, sacrifice to the gods, o you of good rites, for you are the conveyor of oblations.
6. Pour an offering to Agni and seek his friendship as the rite goes forth.
   Choose him as the conveyor of oblations.

V.29 (383) Indra

Gaurivīti Śāktya
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn consists primarily of a recital of Indra's great deeds, with special attention to the Vṛtra saga and the Maruts' role in it (vss. 1–4, 6–9). Interspersed are verses devoted to two much less understood myths, Indra's conflict with the Sun in an apparent chariot race (vss. 5, 9–10) and his journey with Kutsa to Uśanā's house and the defeat of Śuṣṇa (vs. 9), myths that often appear together and show narrative connections. There are as well brief mentions of other exploits of Indra, including the Vala myth (vs. 12). The story of the Sun's chariot and the Kutsa/Uśanā complex are particular preoccupations of the Indra hymns of Maṇḍala V, although the references to them (Sun's chariot V.31.11, Kutsa/Uśanā V.31.7–10) do not help to clarify the details as much as we would like.

The poet several times (vss. 1, 3, 7) mentions Manu, the first Ārya man and sacrificer, in connection with the mythic past. This emphasis on Manu, the theoretical ancestor of the current sacrificers, is presumably meant to associate those current sacrificers with the participants and supporters of Indra in his previous deeds, in order to gain a portion of reflected glory. As often, the hymn sometimes narrates the myths as if in present time (see esp. vss. 1, 6, 12, all three using the same verb "they chant" [árcanti]). This again is a strategy serving the same purpose, here by specifically identifying the present singers with both the Maruts and the Aṅgirases.

The hymn is also structured by recurrent soma-drinking phrases, each slightly different, almost always in the second half of an even pāda (see 2b, 3b, 3d, 5b, 7d, 8b, 11d), a pattern that provides a sort of rhythmic theme-and-variations.

It ends with three verses (13–15) in which the poet refers globally to the amazing range of Indra's deeds past and future, and in the final verse offers him his own well-crafted poems. Only one word in this verse, vasūyúḥ "seeking goods," out of the whole hymn, hints that the poet would like something in return.

1. They uphold the three customs [=rituals of the soma-pressing day] at Manu's attendance on the gods and the three heavenly realms of light.
 The Maruts of refined skill chant to you. You are their wise seer, Indra.
2. When the Maruts chanted to him after he became exhilarated, to Indra who had drunk of the pressed soma, he took up the mace. When he (had) smashed the serpent, he released the exuberant waters to flow.
3. And—you formulators, you Maruts—Indra should drink of this well-pressed soma of mine, for this is his oblation: he found the cows for Manu; Indra smashed the serpent, having drunk of it.
4. After that he propped the two world-halves wide apart; even while enwrapped, he set the wild beast to fearing.
 Repeatedly taunting the gulper, Indra smashed the snorting Dānava back and down.
5. Then according to your will, o bounteous one, all the gods conceded the soma-drinking to you, when you put the flying golden mares of the Sun behind, though they were in front, in (the presence of) Etaśa.
6. When the bounteous one hews apart his [=Vr̥tra's] nine and ninety coils at one blow with his mace, the Maruts chant to Indra at the seat (of conflict). With speech in triṣṭubh meter he thrusts heaven (away from earth).
7. As a comrade for a comrade, Agni straightaway cooked three hundred buffalo in accord with his [=Indra's] will.
 Indra drank the pressed soma of Manu, three lakes worth at one blow, for the Vr̥tra-smashing.
8. When you the bounteous devoured the flesh of three hundred buffaloes and drank three somian lakes, all the gods called "Carry (the day)!" to Indra as (a gambler calls)
 "Game!," when he smashed the serpent.

9. When, Indra, (you and Kutsa) drove to the home of Uśanā with the mighty, speeding horses, as combatant you drove there on the same chariot with Kutsa, with the gods. You combated Śuṣṇa.
10. You tore off the one wheel of the Sun for Kutsa; the other you made into wide space for driving.
You crushed the Dasyus mouthless with your murderous weapon; you wrenched those of slighting speech down into a woeful womb.
11. The praises of Gaurivīti strengthened you. You made Pipru subject to Vaidathina.
R̥jiśvan brought you here for companionship, cooking cooked foods (for you). You drank his soma.
12. The Navagvas, the Daśagvas [=Aṅgirases], having pressed soma, chant to Indra with chants.
Just that cowpen with its covering [=Vala cave]—just that have the men, having ritually labored, opened up.
13. How shall I, (though) knowing them, now encompass your heroic deeds that you have done, o bounteous one, and the new ones that you will do, strongest one? We will proclaim these (deeds) of yours at the ceremonies.
14. Having done all these many (deeds), Indra, by your nature you cannot be circumscribed in heroism.
As for those (deeds) you will do even now in your daring, possessor of the mace—there exists no one to obstruct this power of yours.
15. O Indra, enjoy the sacred formulations being made, the new ones we have made for you, strongest one.
Like garments, lovely and well made, like a chariot have I fashioned them—I the clever artisan, seeking goods.

V.30 (384) Indra

Babhru Ātreya
15 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn follows a fairly straightforward chronological trajectory. The poet begins by wondering where Indra is (vs. 1), locates him on the way to the sacrifice (vs. 2), and promises the god to recite his deeds at the ceremony (vs. 3). This recital occupies the middle of the hymn (vss. 4–10), ending (vs. 11) with a return to the ritual setting, where Indra, pleased by the soma, bestows cows. This mythic model provides a smooth transition to the last four verses (12–15), the poet's dānastuti, praising his patrons the Ruśamas and their king, R̥ṇaṃcaya (lit., "he who requites his debts"), for their gift to him of four thousand cows, plus a piece of ritual equipment, a pot. The poet names himself in verse 14.

The recital of Indra's deeds touches on the Vala myth (vs. 4), the Vr̥tra myth (vss. 5–6), and the defeat of Namuci (vss. 7–8). The intriguing mention of the Dāsa "who made women his weapons" (vs. 9) is unfortunately more opaque; however, it may be connected with an equally opaque verse, I.104.3. In our view both passages refer to rivers controlled by the Ārya's consistent, and perhaps indigenous, opponents, thus serving as a barrier to Ārya progress. The words "river" and "stream" (dhénā) are feminine in gender, and so these are the female "weapons" of 9a. Once Indra has recognized that the "weapons" are mere (female) streams, he leads the charge against the Dāsa foe. The cows captured in this raid may be referred to in verse 10, the same cows that Indra distributes in verse 11.

1. Where is this hero? Who has seen Indra of the well-naved chariot speeding with his two fallow bays, the mace-bearer, who, seeking one who has pressed the soma, will come to that home, when he is much invoked, with wealth, with help?
2. I spotted his track in secret; I followed the powerful track of the one who laid it down, seeking him.
   I asked the others, and they said to me, "We men might attain Indra, since we have wakened (early)."
3. We shall now proclaim at the pressing the deeds that are yours, Indra, which you will enjoy (hearing) from us.
   He will learn who does not know, and he will hear who does know: "This bounteous one is traveling here fully armed."
4. You made your mind steadfast when you were just born, Indra; even alone you pursue the many for battle.
   You made even a stone flash like lightning through your vast power; you found the pen of the ruddy cows.
5. When you were born far away in the farthest (realm), bearing a name famous afar, from then on even the gods feared Indra. He conquered all the waters, those whose husband [=Vr̥tra] was a Dāsa.
6. Just for you do these friendly Maruts chant the chant, press the stalk.
   The serpent vaunting himself, lying on the waters—Indra will overcome the tricky one with tricks.
7. You hewed apart those negligent by nature, stimulating giving, o bounteous one, taking pleasure along with the cow, at the time when you caused the head of the Dāsa Namuci to roll, seeking an (open) way for Manu—
8. For you have made me your yokemate, Indra—just afterward stealing the head of the Dāsa Namuci, which was rolling, (like?) a whizzing stone, like the two world-halves (that roll) forth like two wheels, for the Maruts.
9. Because the Dāsa made women his weapons, what can they do to me?
   His armies lack strength.

Since he [=Indra] distinguished both his [=the Dāsa's?] streams, therefore Indra advanced on the Dasyu to fight.

10. Together the cows then lowed on every side, since they were here, there, and everywhere separated from their calves.
Along with his powerful (men) Indra drove them together, when the well-pressed soma drinks exhilarated him.
11. When the soma drinks rinsed by Babhru exhilarated him, the bull set up a bellowing among the (ritual) seats.
The stronghold-splitting Indra, having drunk of it, gave again of the ruddy cows.
12. The Ruśamas have done this auspicious thing, o Agni, in giving four thousand cows.
The proffered bounties of Ṛṇaṃcaya, most manly of men, we have accepted.
13. The Ruśamas send me home well-ornamented with thousands of cows, o Agni.
The sharp (soma-drinks, when) pressed, exhilarated Indra at the early brightening of the night, at its final turn.
14. (When) that night brightened at its final turn, at (the hands of) Ṛṇaṃcaya, king of the Ruśamas, like a steed quick in competition, being driven [/anointed], Babhru won four thousand (cows).
15. Four thousand bovine livestock have we accepted from the Ruśamas.
Also the gharma pot, which was heated for the Pravargya rite, the one made of copper, that too have we inspired poets taken.

V.31 (385) Indra

Avasyu Ātreya
13 verses: triṣṭubh

Like the previous Indra hymns in this maṇḍala, this hymn provides a survey of Indra's great deeds, with the ritual context for this recital made explicit in verses 5–6 and Indra's journey to the sacrifice sketched in verses 1–2. The recital itself is fragmentary and mosaic-like, with glittering vignettes from various myths juxtaposed unordered. This fragmented nature is enhanced by abrupt switches between the past and the present/future (see, e.g., vss. 6, 11). The stories of the chariot of the Sun (vs. 11) and of Kutsa and Uśanā (vss. 7–10) encountered in V.29 recur here, vivid but enigmatic. The ritual context returns in the final two verses, with Indra's arrival at the sacrifice (12) and prayers for Indra's help (13).

1. Indra makes an easy slope for his chariot, the prize-seeking one, which the bounteous one has mounted.
   Like a herdsman separating the flocks of livestock, he keeps (his chariot) separate (from the others). Invulnerable, he drives as the first to seek winnings.
2. Run hither, you of the fallow bays; do not lose the track. You of tawny [=golden] gifts, accompany us, for there exists nothing better than you, Indra: you have provided even those lacking the brideprice with wives.
3. When he was born as might from might, Indra displayed all his Indrian powers.
   He impelled forth the good milkers (who were) within the cave; he pried apart the darkness, which was rolled up in a ball, with light.
4. The Anu people fashioned a chariot for your horse; Tvaṣṭar (fashioned) the brilliant mace, o much invoked one.
   The formulators, magnifying Indra with their chants, strengthened him to smash the serpent.
5. When for you the bull, o Indra, the bulls and the pressing stones will chant a chant, with Aditi in concord—the (pressing stones like) wheel-rims which, (even) without horses, without chariots, but impelled by Indra, rolled over the Dasyus—
6. I will proclaim your previous deeds, proclaim the current ones that you have done, bounteous one, when, potent one, you will pull apart both world-halves, winning the waters, bright in drops, for Manu.
7. Just this now is your deed, wondrous poet: that smashing the serpent, you measured out your strength there.
   Even Śuṣṇa's magic arts you enveloped; on your way to the ritual meal you repelled the Dasyus.
8. You brought the waters, the good milkers, to rest for Yadu and Turvaśa, (when you were their) transport, Indra.
   You two drove to the strong one [=Uśanā]—that is, you conveyed Kutsa—when the gods encountered you two along with Uśanā.
9. [Uśanā:] "O Indra and Kutsa, let the steeds convey you two, traveling by chariot, right here close to our face [/lit. ear].
   You two blow him [=Śuṣṇa?] out of the water, out of his seat; (by doing this) you two will keep the dark shadows away from the heart of the bounteous one."
10. It was just this sage poet [=Indra?] who had gone, seeking help, to the yoked horses of the Wind, so easy to yoke.
    All the Maruts were your partners then, Indra; their sacred formulations strengthened your power.

11. The very chariot of the Sun, (which is) in front, at the decisive turning he will put behind, (though) it is speeding.
    Etaśa [=the Sun's horse] bore the wheel; he restores it. Putting (the chariot?) in front (again?), he will gain our intention.
12. This Indra has come here to look about, o peoples, seeking a partner who has pressed the soma.
    The pressing stone, speaking, will be carried down to the altar—the stone whose nimble (action) the Adhvaryus attend to.
13. Those who take pleasure [/are dear (to you)], they shall take pleasure now [/shall be dear]. The mortals, o immortal one—let them not encounter constraint.
    Cherish the worshipful ones and place strength among these your peoples, among whom may we be.

V.32 (386) Indra

Gātu Ātreya
12 verses: triṣṭubh

In contrast to the bricolage of the previous hymn, this hymn concentrates on a single myth, the Vr̥tra battle, occupying verses 1–8 and providing one of the most sustained accounts of this story outside of I.32. But this poet avoids using the standard formulae associated with that narrative, instead ringing changes on the normal phraseology (especially the áhann áhim formula: "you/he smashed the serpent," which does not appear as such in this hymn). Considerable attention is paid to Indra's opponent, but interestingly the word vr̥trá is never used. Instead he is identified several times as Dānava (descendant of Dānu, who is called Vr̥tra's mother in I.32.9, or a member of the demonic Dānu tribe) and once called śúṣṇa, usually the name of a different foe of Indra (see, e.g., nearby V.29.9), but here probably used in its etymological sense, "hisser." But mostly he is nameless, a state emphasized by the emphatic, repeated, verse-initial forms of t(i)yá- cid "that very one" (vss. 3, 4, 5, 6, 8), a sort of empty and open-ended deictic that attracts a series of shifting descriptors of horror. The emphasis on darkness (vss. 4, 5, 6), fog (vs. 4), and emptiness (vs. 7) also suggests an indistinct enemy that lacks proper definition.

After this depiction of Indra's great victory over the multifarious monster, it comes as no surprise that in the next verses (9–11) Indra's power is universally acknowledged by cosmic forces and mortals alike. Verse 9 opens with the question "who can obstruct him?"—using the verb varāte, belonging to the same root and having the same semantics as the suppressed name Vr̥tra "obstruction." The question thus carries with it an implied conditional—"who can obstruct him if Obstruction itself cannot?"—with the implicit answer obviously "no one." The last verse turns, as often, to the benefits Indra can bestow on the poet, ending with a perhaps teasing rhetorical question, paraphrasable as: "Do (other) poets complain about your gifts?"

1. You violently split the wellspring; you reamed out its apertures. You brought to peace the floods, which had been hard pressed.
   When, Indra, you pried apart the great mountain, you set loose the streams; you smashed down the Dānava.
2. You, o mace-bearer, sent speeding the wellsprings that had been hard pressed through the seasons (in?) the udder of the mountain.
   Having smashed the very serpent lying spread out for some distance, strong Indra, you assumed your power.
3. With his powers Indra smashed away the weapon of that very one, the great wild beast, who was thinking himself unopposable even on his own. But then there was born one more powerful than he.
4. That very one—drunk on his own power, belonging to them [=the Dānavas], child of the fog, grown very strong, emerging from darkness, the Wrath of the Dānavas—(it was) the hisser [/Śuṣṇa] that the mace-bearer smashed down with his mace, he who receives the proffered bullish (soma) offering.
5. That very one (he smashed down), (so he became) sunk down in accord with his [=Indra's] intentions. He found just that vulnerable place of him (who thought himself) invulnerable, when at the proffering of the invigorating (soma) you consigned him who sought battle to darkness, (as if) to a secure house, o you of good dominion.
6. That very one, lying just so, horribly swollen, having grown strong in the sunless darkness, just him did the bull Indra, invigorated on the pressed (soma), smash from above, after taunting him.
7. When Indra held up to the great Dānava his weapon, which was unopposable might itself, when at the proffering of the mace he outwitted him, he made him the lowest of all creation.
8. The strong one [=Indra] mightily took that very one—the honey-drinker lying on the flood, the insatiable cavity, the footless devourer with slighting speech; with a great murderous weapon he wrenched him down into a woeful womb.
9. Who can obstruct his tempestuousness, his power? Alone, unopposable, he bears away riches.
   Even these two goddesses [=the two world-halves] now bend (away) from fear of his expansion, of Indra's strength.

10. The heavenly hatchet [/the goddess Autonomous Power] bends down to him; to Indra a way [/Gātu = poet's name] yields itself, like an eager (wife).
    When he joins his whole strength with them, the settled peoples incline themselves to the one of autonomous power.
11. I hear of you as born the sole master of settlements, belonging to the five peoples, glorious among the peoples, (while) my hopes have grabbed (always) for the newest Indra, calling on him (every) evening and dawn.
12. For thus I hear of you as arranging the bounties in the proper season and as giving them to inspired poets.
    Do the formulators, your comrades, complain, who have deposited their desire with you, Indra?

V.33 (387) Indra

Saṃvaraṇa Prājāpatya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

The structure of this hymn is relatively straightforward. It begins (vs. 1) with the poet's praise of Indra, presented as an inducement to the god to come to his sacrifice, followed (vss. 2–3) by the usual tropes of a "journey" hymn, including the yoking of Indra's horses. The poet recognizes that there are competing sacrifices (vs. 4a), but continues to urge Indra to choose to come to his (vs. 5). There follow two verses (6–7) asking for gifts from Indra. The hymn ends with a three-verse dānastuti (8–10), praising the gift of horses from a number of different patrons.

1. I conjure up a great (praise) for the great, powerful one among superior men, for Indra so very powerful—I who am not so powerful—he who, praised among the people as battle-ready, takes note of the good thought (directed) toward him at the prize-winning.
2. You, Indra, being conjured up by our chants, have fixed the yoking thong for the fallow bays, you bull.
   You will drive here just so, following your pleasure, bounteous one. You will bring (good things); you will be victorious over the peoples of the stranger.
3. These (horses) of yours (will) not (remain) unyoked because of us [i.e., because of our failure], lofty Indra, if it's for lack of a (yoking) formulation.
   Mount on the chariot with mace in hand. You with the good horses will hold your own rein, o god.

4. Just as there are many hymns that exist for you, Indra, and many are (the deeds) you have done for the cow, when fighting over the meadows,
   (and many [the paths]?) you carved out also for the sun in your [/his] own home, as bull you (have carved out) even the names of the Dāsa in the contests.
5. We are yours, Indra—as are the superior men born as a troop [=Maruts?] and the driving-chariots.
   As a consummate warrior he [=Indra] should come here to us, o you with the serpent's hiss—dear, like Bhaga to be invoked at our forays [/dear like a portion to be offered at our (ritual) presentations].
6. For, Indra, in you are strength to be nurtured and manly powers. As prancing immortal, give us dappled wealth, you winner of goods. I will start up the praise for the gift of the powerfully bounteous stranger.
7. So, help us, Indra, with your help. Protect the singers, the bards, o champion.
   And please those giving the skin of the dear, well-pressed honey at the winning of prizes.
8. And these gold-bedecked (horses) of my patron, Paurukutsya Trasadasyu, when they are given—let his ten white ones convey me. I am attended by the intentions of Gairikṣita.
9. And (let) these (convey me)—the ruddy (horses) of Mārutāśva, the bounty of his intentions at the giving of the distribution, (when) Cyavatāna was giving a thousand of his own to me. Afterward (the singer) sang as if to marvel (at the gift) of the stranger [=Indra].
10. And (let) these (convey me)—the enjoyable (horses) of Dhvanya Lakṣmaṇya, the very bright ones having being marshaled.
    Through the greatness of his wealth the proffered (horses) have come, like cows to the cowpen, (to the enclosure) of the seer Saṃvaraṇa.

V.34 (388) Indra

Saṃvaraṇa Prājāpatya
9 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 9

The first three verses of this hymn urge sacrificers to make offerings to Indra and promise them a return on this investment of ritual energy, and the preoccupation throughout most of the hymn is the contrast between the generous and the stingy and their respective fates (see esp. vss. 5–7). There is a hostile and dangerous edge to much of the rhetoric: the punishments Indra metes out to non-givers are described with gusto.

But the most curious feature of the hymn is verse 4, where Indra, depicted as the killer of the father, mother, and brother of an apparently blameless man, not only feels no remorse ("he does not shrink from his offense"), but expects to receive offerings from his victim. The word "offense" used here is a rare and charged one (kílbiṣa): the uncompounded form is found only here in the R̥gveda, and the four other (compounded) occurrences of it are in late hymns in Maṇḍala X. Our passage here seems a foreshadowing of a theme in Indra mythology that becomes highly developed in the middle Vedic period, that of Indra's offenses or misdeeds, catalogued as a set of kilbiṣāṇi (see Jamison 1991: 64–68), with Indra as the figure of a warrior run amuck. But the theme seems out of place in the context here, save perhaps for Indra's excessively aggressive behavior toward the stingy in other verses. (The stingy deserve this treatment, however, in the ritual calculus of the R̥gveda; the man violently deprived of his kin does not.)

The hymn ends with what appears to be a truncated dānastuti (vs. 9): the poet praises his apparent patron Āgniveśi Śatri, but no gifts are mentioned.

1. Autonomous power, unaging, solar, immeasurable, speeds after him, the wondrous, whose rival has not been born.
   Press, cook for the one whose vehicle is the sacred formulation; set more (offerings) out for the one praised by many.
2. He who filled his belly with soma, the bounteous one, drew exhilaration from the honey, the stalk, when Uśanā, possessing the great weapon, held the thousand-spiked weapon (out to him), to smash the wild beast.
3. Whoever presses soma for him in the heat or whoever in the cold, he certainly becomes heaven-bright.
   The able one, the bounteous one who is partner to the poet (/Kavi [Uśanā]), snatches off the extended (garment), resplendent on his body.
4. The man whose father the able one has smashed, whose mother, whose brother—he [=Indra] does not shrink (even) from him.
   Rather, he actually pursues his offerings; the arranger, the distributor of goods does not shrink from his offense.
5. He does not wish to grasp (the offerings) (only) by fives or tens. He does not keep company with a man who doesn't press (soma), even a prosperous one.
   He either despoils (him as he goes) along the way, or the tumultuous one smashes (him). But he gives to the god-seeker a share in the pen full of cattle.
6. Very energetic in the clash, affixing the wheel (to the chariot?), he is antagonistic to the non-presser, but strengthener of the presser.

Indra is the dominator of all, spreading fear; the Ārya leads the Dāsa as he wishes.

7. He drives together the sustenance of the niggard, to steal it, but he shares out liberal goods to the pious.
   In a (place) of no exit there is held firmly each and every people that has antagonized his power.
8. When the two wealthy peoples with all their troops (clashed) together, Indra the bounteous pursued (them) in the (battles for) resplendent cattle.
   Since the shaker has made one of them his yokemate, he drives up for himself the bovine (wealth) (of the other)—the tumultuous one along with his warriors.
9. The thousand-winning Āgniveśi Śatri will I sing, the measure and the beacon for the stranger, o Agni.
   For him the waters will swell continuously; in him let there be lordly power aggressive and ardent.

V.35 (389) Indra

Prabhūvasu Āṅgirasa
8 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 8

A simple hymn calling on Indra for help, the word that provides the outer skeleton of the hymn: forms of the root "help" (√av) as noun or verb are found in the first three verses and the last two (7–8). The interior verses (4–6) simply provide conventional praise of Indra's powers.

1. Your resolve to help that best brings success, Indra, bring that here—the resolve that conquers the territories for us, a winner difficult to surpass in the (contests for) prizes.
2. Whether you have four, Indra, or you have three, o champion, or five settlements (for you to help)—bring this same help to us now.
3. We summon hither the help worthy to be chosen, the help of you, the most bullish one, for you were born with the speed of a bull, Indra, victorious with your (forms of help) ready at hand.
4. For you are a bull; for benefit you were born; bullish is your power.
   Your daring mind has its own dominion; your masculine nature smites entirely.
5. You, Indra, possessor of the stone—run down the mortal who acts the foe, chariot and all, you lord of power who possess a hundred resolves.

6. Just you, best smasher of obstacles, do the peoples, when they have twisted their ritual grass, call on for the winning of prizes—you the strong, foremost among the many (peoples) [/in the many (battles)].
7. Our chariot, Indra—help it, the one difficult to surpass, driving in front in the contests, driving together (with you?) whenever the stakes (are set), seeking prizes.
8. Our chariot, Indra—come help it along with Plenitude.
   We would establish desirable fame for ourselves in heaven, strongest one;
   we will conceive a praise (poem) (to reach) to heaven.

V.36 (390) Indra

Prabhūvasu Āṅgirasa
6 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 3

Like the preceding hymn, attributed to the same poet, this one keeps its focus on Indra, but is less predictable in its phraseology. The first four verses deploy a series of similes characterizing Indra, the soma, and the singer(s). Verse 5 plays heavily with the word "bull" (vṛ́ṣan) for Indra and his accoutrements, a device that returns more insistently in the first four verses of V.40. The final verse (6) is a short dānastuti to the patron Śrutaratha ("[Having a] Famous Chariot"), whose name may have inspired the wheel and chariot imagery of verse 3: the phrase "from the chariot" in that verse is somewhat puzzling on the surface, but if it slyly expresses the hope that the singer will become one "possessing many goods from (Famous) Chariot," it may be a prefiguring of the dānastuti.

1. He will come here—Indra, who will be attentive to the giving of the gift of goods and riches.
   Like a buffalo roaming the wasteplaces, thirsting, let him desirously drink the milked plant.
2. Soma mounts your jaws, your lips, you champion, possessor of the fallow bays, as the soma plant grows on the back of a mountain.
   Like one driving his steeds, we all would cheer you on with hymns, o much-invoked king.
3. Like a wheel set rolling my mind trembles with fear of neglect, o much-invoked possessor of the stone.
   Surely the singer will now praise you from the chariot, o ever-strengthening bounteous one—(so he will become) one possessing many goods?
4. This singer, like a pressing stone, raises his voice high to you, Indra, panting after (you).

With your left hand, bounteous possessor of the fallow bays, hold forth wealth, and hold it forth right-handed: do not lose track.

5. Let bullish heaven strengthen you, the bull; as bull you travel with your two bullish fallow bays.
   As bull with a bullish chariot, well-lipped one, as bull with bullish will, you of the mace, set us up in loot.
6. He who, possessing prizewinning mares, has allotted (to me) two prizewinning chestnuts accompanied by three hundred (cows?), to him, the youth, let the settled peoples together do homage, to Śrutaratha, o Maruts, in friendship.

V.37 (391) Indra

Atri Bhauma
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Two verses devoted to the activities of the dawn sacrifice open the hymn; the last two verses (4–5) describe the successes of the king whose sacrifice Indra attends, with the king's actions assimilated to Indra's great deeds (Vala and Vr̥tra, both 4cd). The middle verse (3) is a sort of riddle and serves, therefore, as a mild omphalos: the bride in question may be Speech, as the beloved of Indra (as some have suggested), or perhaps Dawn. The husband may be Indra, or the Sun. (We favor the Dawn/Sun interpretation, which is in keeping with the dawn-ritual context.)

There are two pieces of onomastic verbal play that look outside the hymn proper. In verse 3c the phrase "his chariot will seek fame" (śravasyād ráthaḥ) recalls the name of the patron Śruta-ratha, whose praise ended the previous hymn (V.36.6). And the phrase "with the radiance of the sun" (bhānúnā… sū́ryasya) in the first pāda of the hymn (1a), describing Agni, is actually the solution to the story of Svar-bhānu ("[Having] the Sun's Radiance") told in V.40.5–9. It is especially appropriate to find this answer given at the beginning of this hymn here, as it is the first in a series of hymns attributed to Atri, among which is V.40.

1. He [=Agni] aligns himself with the radiance of the sun, being bepoured, with ghee on his back, of lovely outlook.
   The non-neglectful dawns will shine forth to him [=sacrificer] who says "Let us press (soma) for Indra."
2. With his fire kindled and his ritual grass spread, he will win; with his pressing stones yoked and his soma pressed, he will sing; whose pressing stones speak vigorously, he will go, as Adhvaryu, down to the river with an oblation.
3. Here she goes, a bride seeking a husband who will take her home as vigorous chief wife.

His chariot will seek fame here and will sound loudly here; it will roll itself for many thousand (leagues).

4. That king does not falter, by whom Indra drinks the sharp soma whose comrades are cows.
   He drives (the cows) here with his warriors, he smashes Vṛtra; he dwells peacefully, prospering the settled peoples, bearing the name "Well-portioned."
5. He will prosper in peace, and he will prevail at the hitching up (for war); (when) the two opponents are clashing together, he will entirely conquer;
   he will become dear to the Sun, dear to Agni—the one who with pressed soma will do ritual service to Indra.

V.38 (392) Indra

Atri Bhauma
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

Geldner, the most authoritative twentieth-century translator of the Ṛgveda, pronounced this hymn empty of content ("inhaltslos"). This judgment does not seem entirely fair, but the hymn is characterized by a certain lack of syntactic coherence, as well as an overabundance of elaborate vocatives addressed to Indra. It is not clear who the second god is in verse 3, though he is possibly Varuṇa; otherwise the hymn only makes reference to Indra.

The hymn is in some ways a twin to the following one, sharing vocabulary and thematics, but the second hymn provides only limited help in interpreting this one.

1. Extensive is the giving of your broad largesse, o Indra of a hundred resolves.
   So make ready to give to us brilliant things, you of good lordship who govern all domains.
2. What praiseworthy thing you appropriate as your nourishment, strongest Indra, that spreads itself as having the longest fame, difficult to surpass, o you of golden hue—
3. (As do) your tempests, which serve your will in profusion, o possessor of the stone.
   Both you gods rule over both heaven and earth to dominate them.
4. And (you rule) over this skill of yours, whatever it may be, for us, o Vṛtra-smasher.
   Bring manly power here to us: you are manly minded toward us.

5. Now through these dominating forces of yours (may we be) in your shelter.
   May we be provided with a good herdsman, o Indra of a hundred resolves; may we be provided with a good herdsman, o champion.

V.39 (393) Indra

Atri Bhauma
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

As was already noted, this hymn is paired with V.38, sharing some vocabulary and themes, but this one is more coherent in both syntax and thought. The first three verses urge Indra to give in abundance, while in the last two (4–5) the poet urges his fellow Atris to praise the god.

1. What is given by you in profusion, bright Indra, possessor of the stone, that largesse bring here to us with both hands full, you finder of goods.
2. What you consider worthy to be chosen, that heaven-ruling thing bring here, Indra.
   Might we know you as the unbounded (ocean) for giving.
3. Your thought, famed and lofty, which is eager to give, should be realized.
   With it split apart even the strongholds for plunder to win, possessor of the stone.
4. Most bounteous of bounteous ones, the king of the settled domains, Indra (do I call) nearby for you [=Atris?] to eulogize. He takes pleasure in the hymns as well as the many (eulogies).
5. Just for him a poet's speech, for Indra a solemn word worthy to be pronounced;
   for him whose vehicle is the sacred formulation the Atris strengthen their hymns, the Atris beautify their hymns.

V.40 (394) Indra and the Myth of Svarbhānu [Anukramaṇī: Indra 1–4, Sūrya 5, Atri 6–9]

Atri Bhauma
9 verses: uṣṇih 1–3, triṣṭubh 4, anuṣṭubh 5, 9, triṣṭubh 6–8

This hymn falls into two parts. It opens with four verses praising Indra in his bullish aspect, with hypnotic repetition of the word vṛ́ṣan "bull." The remainder (vss. 5–9) contains an allusive account of the myth of Svarbhānu, who "pierces the Sun with darkness," and the Sun's rescue by the seer Atri, a myth much treated in middle Vedic literature. For extensive discussion of the myth and this Ṛgvedic version of it, see Jamison (1991: Part II, pp. 131–303).

The myth makes sense once the identity of the mysterious enemy of the Sun is solved: Svarbhānu, literally "he who possesses the radiance of the sun," is actually the Sun's earthly counterpart, the god Agni. He punished the Sun for the latter's incestuous intercourse with his daughter (not mentioned in this hymn, but frequently found elsewhere), but because of the importance of sunlight for the maintenance of the world, the Sun had to be restored by the seer Atri (also the supposed poet of this hymn) through ritual means. The physical manifestations of the Sun's punishment betray his attacker's identity: "pierced with darkness" refers to sunspots, dark spots on the sun as if burnt by fire, and the enveloping darkness of smoke is depicted in verse 6.

Note that the Svarbhānu portion (5–9) is a perfect omphalos hymn. The two outer verses (5, 9) are multiforms of each other and in a different meter from the verses in between; the middle verse (7) is the only direct speech; the intermediate vss. (6, 8) both mention Atri in the singular, both deal with the māyā́ ("magic spells") of Svarbhānu, and both have complementary vocabulary: diváḥ/diví, sū́ryam/sū́ryasya, gūḷhám/aghukṣat, bráhmaṇā/brahmā́.

1. Drive hither. Drink the soma pressed with stones, you lord of soma—bullish Indra, with your bulls, best smasher of obstacles.
2. Bullish is the pressing stone, bullish the exhilarating drink, bullish this pressed soma here.
   Bullish Indra, with your bulls, best smasher of obstacles.
3. Bullish I call upon you, the bullish, o possessor of the mace, with your bright help.
   Bullish Indra, with your bulls, best smasher of Vr̥tra.
4. Possessor of the soma-dregs, possessor of the mace, the bull overcoming the powerful, the tempestuous king, smasher of Vr̥tra, soma-drinker—having yoked them, he will come hither with his two fallow bays. Indra will become exhilarated at the Midday Pressing.

5. When, o Sun, Svarbhānu Āsura pierced you with darkness, like a befuddled man not knowing the territory did the living beings perceive.
6. Then, o Indra, when you smashed down from heaven the circling magic spells of Svarbhānu, Atri with the fourth formulation found the sun, hidden by darkness because of (an act) contrary to commandment.
7. [The Sun:] "O Atri, let him not, deceived by jealousy and fear, swallow me, who am one of yours.
   You are an ally whose bounty is real; do you and King Varuṇa help me here."
8. The possessor of the sacred formulation [=Atri], having yoked the pressing stones, serving the gods with plain reverence, doing his utmost,

Atri placed the eye of the sun in heaven. He hid away the magic spells of Svarbhānu.

9. Which sun Svarbhānu Āsura pierced with darkness, that one the Atris found, for no others were able.

The following series of hymns to the All Gods / All the Gods (V.41–51) contains some of the most complex and difficult poetry in the R̥gveda (along with some restfully more straightforward hymns), including the hymn that Geldner called "the hardest hymn in the R̥gveda" ("das schwierigste Lied des R̥V"), V.44. Although the placement of this series within the Saṃhitā was dictated by the strict and mechanical rules of numerical arrangement discussed before (see Intro. pp. 10–11), it is sometimes difficult for us not to view this set of hymns as a type of omphalos in the larger structure of the R̥gveda. They are found in more or less the middle of Maṇḍala V (which has 87 hymns), which is more or less the middle maṇḍala of the Family Books (II–VII—keeping in mind that, though V is preceded by three maṇḍalas and followed by two, the preceding maṇḍalas are shorter: II–IV contain 163 hymns, VI–VII 179, remarkably close to equivalence). Just as the omphalos verse in a hymn contains the enigma, the mysterious message of the hymn, so we could view these All God hymns as the mystical center of the older R̥gveda.

V.41 (395) All Gods

Atri Bhauma
20 verses: triṣṭubh, except atijagatī 16–17, ekapadā virāj 20

This hymn is quite intricate on the verbal level, though in paraphrase and in translation it may seem to lack interest. Every verse (but 17) names at least one divinity—many verses have several—chosen from among both the most prominent gods of the Vedic pantheon (e.g., Mitra and Varuṇa in vs. 1) and distinctly marginal figures like Āptya (vs. 9). There does not seem to be any one dominant god or set of gods: though the Maruts are mentioned more than any other gods (vss. 2, 5, 11, 13, 16), there is little particularly Marutian vocabulary or imagery. (It might be remembered, however, that the longest series of Marut hymns in the R̥gveda, the Śyāvāśva hymns of remarkable poetic quality, immediately follow the All God hymns in this maṇḍala [V.52–61]). The content of the hymn as a whole seldom deviates from invitations to the sacrifice with promises of offerings, and prayers for divine gifts in return. Verses 16–17 are in a different meter and seem to be bringing the hymn to a close, especially 17, in which, as often, the poet makes a meta-reference to the hymn just concluded. If this is so, verses 18–20 are an afterthought.

The seemingly unordered series of gods who receive the honor of a verse (or part thereof) may exemplify a covert theme of choice or alternatives, underlined by the use of the simple conjunction "or" (vā) as the verbal "hero" of the beginning of the hymn (vss. 1–3, returning at the end, vss. 15, 19).

Unfortunately other pieces of verbal play are essentially untranslatable, like the unusual sequence of two monosyllables at the end of the first half-verse of verse 1: ... vā dé ("or ... to be given"), which, scrambled, produces the target of the hymn: devā(ḥ) "gods."

1. Which one now, performing the truth for you two, Mitra and Varuṇa, is to be given (a good thing) from great heaven or one stemming from the earth or (one) at the seat of truth [=ritual ground]—you two should protect us—or which of you two (is ready) to give prizes to the sacrificer like the prizes for one who wins cattle?
2. They—Mitra, Varuṇa, Aryaman, Āyu, Indra lord of the R̥bhus, and the Maruts—shall take pleasure in us, or (in those) who with reverences provide a well-plaited (hymn), a praise for Rudra who gives rewards—(they, the gods) in joint enjoyment.
3. You two Aśvins, driving quickest on the flight of the wind, in the flourishing of your chariotry, are to be summoned hither.
   Or (you priests), present a thought to the lord of heaven [=Rudra], like (soma) stalks to the worshipful.
4. The heavenly victor with Kaṇva as Hotar, (i.e.,) Trita from heaven, and the Wind, and Agni in joint enjoyment, Pūṣan, and all-nourishing Bhaga have come to the (ritual) presentation like those with swiftest horses to a contest.
5. Present your wealth of yoked horses; for help in the quest for wealth a visionary thought should be produced.
   The Hotar [=Agni] is well disposed because of the ways of (the company of) fire-priests, which are (also?) the ways of you powerful ones, o Maruts.
6. Set Vāyu, who hitches up the chariot, in front; in front the god, the inspired admirer, with your chants—
   (you,) aiming (straight), serving the truth, (set in front) the creators of plenty. Let them, (like?) good wives, create (plenty) here (in exchange) for our visionary thought.
7. I hasten to the two young maidens of heaven with your praiseworthy fortifying (hymns), with conspicuous chants.
   Night and Dawn, like ones who know all, through the days convey the sacrifice here for the mortal.
8. I chant for you to the men granting prosperity, to the Lord of the Dwelling-Place, to Tvaṣṭar, as I give;
   with reverences (I chant) to the trees, the plants, along with the rich Holy Place, in the quest for wealth.

9. Let the mountains behave like family, to thrust out progeny for us—they who are like good heroes.
   Āptya, admired, always worthy of our sacrifice, the manly one, will strengthen our laud in preeminence.
10. I have praised the embryo of the terrestrial bull, (as) Trita (has praised) the Child of the Waters with a well-twisted (hymn).
   Agni is sung with fortifying (hymns) like (a horse) at running.
   Flame-haired, he liquefies the trees.
11. How shall we speak to the great Rudrian (troop) [=Maruts]; what (shall we say) to observant Bhaga, for wealth?
   Let the waters and the plants help us, and Heaven, the woods, and the mountains whose hair is trees.
12. Let him hear our hymns—the lord of nourishments; he [=Agni] is the vigorous encircler, passing more quickly than a cloud.
   Let them hear—the Waters, resplendent like the fortifications of a mountain that encloses the offering ladles [=cows].
13. Just by our knowledge, o great ones [=Maruts], we shall say which are your ways, wondrous ones, as we acquire what is choice.
   And like birds, those of good essence [=Maruts] swoop down here in pursuit with their fluttering to the mortal held by murderous weapons.
14. I will call on the heavenly and earthly breeds and on the waters for the good battler (/very bounteous one) [=Indra].
   Let the days increase and the hymns tipped with gold; let the waters, the conquered floods increase.
15. Step after step old age has been secured for me, either (by her) who is the able Shielding Goddess or by the protectors.
   Let the mother, the great Rasā, accompany us along with our patrons, she with hands outstretched, with winnings outstretched.
16. How might we ritually serve with reverence those of good drops, the Maruts traveling their ways, at the invitation—the Maruts of advancing fame, at the invitation?
   Let Ahi Budhnya not set us up to suffer harm. For us let there be winnings at the distribution (of prizes).
17. In just these words now, for the sake of offspring along with cattle, the mortal (seeks to) win you, o gods—the mortal (seeks to) win you here, o gods.
   Otherwise Dissolution might swallow the secure depository beneficial to this body, my own old age.
18. Might we obtain that favor of yours, o gods, good ones, the nourishing refreshment of the cow, through (this) recitation.
   That gracious goddess of good drops [/gifts] should come toward us at a run, for our welfare.

19. Let Iḍā, mother of the flock, greet us, or let Urvaśī, along with the rivers.
    Or Urvaśī Bṛhaddivā, being sung, covering herself, (mother) of the (ritual) presentation, mother of Āyu, 20. Of the nourishing prosperity [/of the prosperity of Ūrjavya]—let her accompany us.

V.42 (396) All Gods

Atri Bhauma
18 verses: triṣṭubh, except ekapadā virāj 17

Like the last hymn, this one enumerates a number of different gods to whom we direct our praise, beginning, as V.41 did, with Mitra and Varuṇa, and the concern, as in that hymn, is generally the ritual exchange of mortal praise for immortal gifts. Or such is the structure of the opening (vss. 1–6) and concluding (vss. 11–18) sections of the hymn. In the middle (vss. 7–10) Bṛhaspati (in vs. 10 with the Maruts) is called upon to be generous to generous patrons but to unleash destructive power against stingy patrons and non-sacrificers. As Hanns-Peter Schmidt has noted, these hostile actions are uncharacteristic of Bṛhaspati but typical of Indra, just as the association of Indra with the sacred formulation in verse 4 would be more expected of Bṛhaspati than Indra. He therefore argues (1968: 84–86) that verses 4–10 form a unity in this hymn, with Bṛhaspati serving as an epithet of Indra.

Although the gods in the enumerative verses are often named, some verses are riddles, describing the god without naming him (1cd, 6, 13, 14) or naming him only in the second half of the verse (3, 11). Such puzzles are common in All God hymns.

At the end of the hymn (vss. 14–17) the poet expresses the hope that his praise should reach in all directions, to all three worlds, creating wide space for him and his companions (in the final single-pāda verse 17). (Verse 18 is adopted from Aśvin hymns later in the maṇḍala [V.76.5, 77.5], perhaps to introduce the Aśvins, who are otherwise unmentioned, into this All God hymn.)

1. May the most availing hymn now reach Varuṇa with its visionary power; may it reach Mitra, Bhaga, Aditi.
   Let him hear it—the lord whose womb is the dappled (cow/ghee), who has five Hotars, whose path cannot be transgressed, who is joy itself [=Aryaman].
2. May Aditi grab hold of my praise, like a mother the beloved son of her heart.
   The dear sacred formulation that has been established by the gods, that is joy itself to Mitra and Varuṇa—may I (grab hold of it).

3. Rouse the best poet of poets. Wet him with honey, with ghee.
   He—god Savitar—will propel to us the golden goods that have been held forth and set out.
4. Through your thought, Indra, join us with cows, with patrons, with well-being, o possessor of the fallow bays—and with the sacred formulation established by the gods, with the favor of the gods who are worthy of the sacrifice.
5. God Bhaga, Savitar, Share of Wealth [/Aṃśa], Indra, the complete victor over Vṛtra and riches, the lord of the Ṛbhus, Vāja [=a Ṛbhu], and Plenitude—let the powerful immortals aid us.
6. We will proclaim the deeds of the one accompanied by the Maruts [=Indra], unopposable, victorious, unaging.
   None previous to you, bounteous one, nor later, nor anyone at all right now has achieved your manly power.
7. Praise the first conferring of treasure; (praise) Bṛhaspati, the winner of riches, who, the most wealful for him who chants and praises, will come here, with many goods, to the one who repeatedly invokes (him).
8. O Bṛhaspati, the bounteous ones accompanied by your help, who are invulnerable and possessing good heroes, who are givers of horses or givers of cows, who are givers of garments, the well-portioned ones [=patrons]—on them (confer) riches.
9. Dissipate the possessions of those who benefit by our hymns without giving.
   Those violating the commandments, grown strong at forward thrusting, the haters of the sacred formulation—keep them away from the sun.
10. Whoever lauds the demons at the invitation to the gods, run him over, Maruts, with your wheel-less (chariots).
    Whoever will scorn the labor of the one who labors for you, he will render his own desires empty when he sweats (at ritual labor).
11. Praise him, who has the good arrow and the good bow, who holds sway over every healing remedy.
    Sacrifice to Rudra for great benevolence; with acts of reverence offer friendship to the god, the lord.
12. The masters of the house, the workmen who have good hands [=Ṛbhus?], the wives of the bull, the rivers fashioned for wide extension, Sarasvatī, Bṛhaddivā, and Rākā—let the resplendent ones, showing favor, create a wide realm (for us).
13. I present to the great one who grants good shelter [=Tvaṣṭar] wisdom (in the form of) a hymn just newly being born, to him who, bulging [?] in the belly of his daughter, changing his forms [=Tvaṣṭar as father of Viśvarūpa?], made this (world? form?) for us.

14. May our lovely praise now reach to the thundering, bellowing lord of refreshment [=Parjanya], o singer—to him who, rich in clouds, rich in water, sets in motion the two world-halves with his lightning, as he sprinkles them.
15. May this praise reach up to the Marutian troop, to the youthful sons of Rudra.
    Desire calls me to wealth with well-being. Praise the unruly ones with dappled horses.
16. May this praise reach to earth, to the midspace, to the trees, to the plants, for wealth.
    Let every god be easy for me to invoke. Let Mother Earth not set us in disfavor.
17. May we come to be in broad unconstricted (space), o gods.
18. May we come together with the present help of the Aśvins, which is joy itself and provides good guidance.
    Here to us bring wealth and here heroes, you two immortals, and here all that brings good fortune.

V.43 (397) All Gods

Atri Bhauma
17 verses: triṣṭubh, except ekapadā virāj 16

Like many All God hymns, this one enumerates in individual verses divinities deserving praise, and the emphasis is on the ritual and the gods' presence at and participation in it. There is perhaps more detail about ritual performance than in many such hymns (see, e.g., vss. 1, 3–7), and this focus on the ritual is observable in two other features of the hymn. On the one hand, the god Agni dominates the last part of the hymn (vss. 12–15), under the name/epithet Bṛhaspati in verse 12, unnamed but clearly identified by his characteristics in verse 13, called Āyu in verse 14, and finally named in verse 15ab. Such concentration on deified ritual fire in an All God hymn is somewhat surprising. Further, the middle verse of this hymn (excluding the repeated verses at the end), verse 7, is directed not toward a god but a ritual implement, the gharma pot, used in the Pravargya ritual and often the focus of priestly speculation.

1. Let the milk-cows, swift to their tasks, not neglectful, come close to us here with their milk, their honey.
   For great wealth, the inspired poet, the singer keeps invoking the seven lofty (cows [=rivers?]), who are joy itself.
2. With lovely praise, with reverence Heaven and Earth are to be turned hither—they who are not neglectful with regard to the prize-contest.
   The Father, the Mother who has honeyed speech and good hands—let the two glorious ones aid us in every bout.

3. Adhvaryus—having made the honeyed (drinks), present the pure dear (soma) to Vāyu.
   Like the Hotar, drink first of this honey of ours, god; we have given it to you for your exhilaration.
4. The ten fingers and the two arms hitch up the stone—the two arms with good hands that are the laboring priests [/quellers] of soma.
   The plant, well(-handled by) the fists, has milked out the sap of honey that dwells on the mountain, shimmering and pure.
5. The soma has been pressed for you who have enjoyed (it)—for will and skill, for lofty exhilaration.
   Indra, bring nearby the two dear fallow bays, those amenable to the chariot-pole at the yoking to your chariot, when you are being invoked.
6. Hither to us, in agreement (with her), (bring) great Devotion [/Aramati], lady goddess, on whom the oblation is bestowed with reverence, the lofty knower of truth—for the exhilarating drink of honey, bring her hither, Agni, along the paths the gods travel.
7. The one which the inspired poets anoint, like (the ritual grass) as they spread it, heating it with fire like (the offering of the sacrificial animal) with its omentum:
   the truth-(sing)ing gharma (drink/pot) has been set here on the fire like the dearest son on the lap of his father.
8. Let the great, lofty, most availing hymn come like a messenger to invoke the Aśvins.
   (O Aśvins,) joy itself, drive nearby on the same chariot; go to the treasury (of honey) as if to the chariot-pole, like the axle-pin into the wheel-nave.
9. I have shown forth an expression of reverence to the very strong, powerful Pūṣan and to Vāyu, who are impellers of thoughts by reason of their bounty and treasure-givers of the prize in their own nature.
10. Convey all the Maruts according to their (individual) names, according to their (individual) forms, o Jātavedas, when you are invoked.
    The sacrifice, the hymns, and the lovely praise of the singer—all you Maruts, all come (to these) with your help.
11. Hither to us from lofty heaven, from the mountain let Sarasvatī, deserving the sacrifice, come to the sacrifice.
    Let the goddess, having enjoyed our call, turning toward the ghee, listen willingly to our capable speech.
12. Here on the seat make him sit—the ritual adept, dark-backed, lofty Bṛhaspati (as Agni).
    Sitting on his womb, shining here in the house, golden-colored, reddish—(him) may we serve.

13. The enduring one belonging to lofty heaven, the bestower—let him come with all his succors when he is invoked—clothing himself in his wives, the plants, not neglectful, a bull with tripartite horn, conferring vigor [=Agni].
14. In the highest, gleaming footstep of the mother of Āyu [=Urvaśī] the admiring abundant [?] ones have come.
With their oblations bestowed with reverence, they groom the beloved child [=Agni] in his dwelling place, like the Āyus.
15. Lofty vigor for lofty you, Agni, do those rivalrous (priestly) pairs, who reach old age through their insight, pursue.
Let every god be easy for me to invoke. Let Mother Earth not set us in disfavor.
16. May we come to be in broad unconstricted (space), o gods.
17. May we come together with the present help of the Aśvins, which is joy itself and provides good guidance.
Here to us bring wealth and here heroes, you two immortals, and here all that brings good fortune.

V.44 (398) All Gods

Avatsāra Kāśyapa, etc.
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 14–15

As noted above, Geldner considers this the hardest hymn in the R̥gveda ("das schwierigste Lied des R̥V"), and a judgment very like this is shared by other scholars (e.g., Oldenberg, who deems most of it "uncertain or hopeless" ["meist fraglich oder hoffnungslos"]). Although in our opinion there are numerous contenders for "hardest hymn" in the R̥gveda (X.106, for example, some of which appears to be written in unbreakable code), this one is certainly near the top of any such list.

The difficulties are found in every aspect of the hymn, beginning with the fact that the divine subject(s) of the various verses of the heart of the hymn are never identified. Then there are lexical problems: a number of rare words or hapaxes; morphological problems, including unusual inflectional and derivational morphology; syntactic problems such as frequent lack of verbs, unclear referents, unclear syntactic roles, and so on—not to mention a general lack of superficial coherence, both between verses and within verses. For all these reasons, the translation given is provisional in general and in many details.

Nonetheless, it is possible to form a hypothesis about what the hymn is "about," and this hypothesis allows one to interpret many of the ambiguities within this framework. Our translation reflects this hypothesis, and in a number of places bracketed identifications have been inserted to guide readers—though we have tried to keep these to a minimum, to avoid too much clutter in the poetry itself, which despite its frequent lack of clarity possesses, in our opinion, both power and beauty, and to allow readers to produce their own interpretations of the hymn.

To be brief, the hypothesis with which we operate is that each verse is applicable to both Agni and Soma, the two crucial deified ritual substances, and therefore many of the verbal contortions are the result of attempting to produce phraseology that is meaningful for each god simultaneously. (This hypothesis is adumbrated by Geldner in his introduction to the hymn, where he suggests that some verses can be read with intentional double reference to Agni and Soma, though he clearly does not consider the whole hymn in this light.) The final two verses (14–15), in a different meter and almost mechanically responsive to each other, mention both Soma and Agni, and may be intended as an implicit answer to the riddle posed by the rest of the hymn. In any case, if our hypothesis is correct, the poem is the forerunner of the much later kāvya tours de force in which, for example, the plots of the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyaṇa are narrated at the same time.

The Soma/Agni simultaneity is especially prominent in the first part of the hymn. Toward the middle of the hymn (starting around vs. 8) another theme emerges, that of the poet learning his craft, seeking true speech. What unites the two themes is the sense that poetic inspiration comes from the ritual itself and from the mysteries of the identification of the two most important ritual substances, so that the poet gains his verbal mastery as the sacrifice progresses. But it is also the case that the sacrifice needs his poetry in order to be properly carried through, and so the poetic skill the poet gains from his contemplation of the mysteries of the sacrifice is put to use immediately in the next verses (9–11), and the result always desired by R̥gvedic sacrificers, the epiphany of Indra on the sacrificial ground, is achieved in verse 12. Because of his contribution to the success of the sacrifice, the poet is lauded in the last verse (13) before the responsive solution to the riddle as the foundation of the whole sacrifice. Thus, the hymn is both a static meditation on a central sacrificial mystery and a roughly chronological progression through the sacrifice.

One of the enigmatic features of the hymn found throughout the hymn is the regular presence of unidentified feminine plurals (vss. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11), especially intriguing in verse 7. Identifying the likely referent(s) for these feminines as the hymn unfolds shows the developing complexity of the hymnic universe of discourse. In the earlier part of the hymn the feminines most probably refer, in the realm of Agni, to the streams of ghee offered into Agni (and also perhaps to the plants he burns)—while, in the realm of Soma, to the waters that swell the soma stalks and to the cows' milk mixed with the pressed soma. As the figure of the poet joins the hymn, the feminines can have a third set of referents, the insights that provide him with poetic inspiration and the words/songs that result from them. (All of the underlying nouns in all three referential systems are feminine in gender and conceptually female.) This complex web of reference is beautifully (or dauntingly) on display in verse 11. In our reading of this verse all three sets of feminines are not bound, that is, not in use, when the soma is being brought to the ritual and the sacrifice has not yet started. But when soma the plant is made into soma the exhilarating drink, all three sets of feminines are hitched up: the poet's words are recited, the streams of milk approach the pressed soma, and the streams of ghee are poured into the fire. The priests direct the various females to their appropriate goals, and at the end of the ritual they are "unhitched."

As an aside, we might mention what appears to be a sly joke, located in almost the middle of the hymn (minus the final riddle-solving verses): in 6a, after five verses of exhausting enigmas with many more to come, the poet says, "Just as he appears, so is he said (to be)"—an assertion about the transparent clarity of the subject that the frustrated audience may view with bitter irony. However, it is of course not merely a joke, for the poet's task is to find the hidden mystical truths of the universe and express them in true words, in bráhman. No matter how superficially baffling, the bráhman captures how "it really is," and so the poet asserts here.

Although numerous puzzles remain in the hymn, we hope to have shown that it is far from "hopeless." It can be read as a consistent unity (though the unity we see may not be the only possible one), and, as so often with complex hymns in the R̥gveda, it is a meditation not only on the ritual but also on poetic craft.

1. Him—in the primordial way, in the earlier way, in every way, in this way here—(him who is) preeminence (itself), who sits on the ritual grass and finds the sun, him facing toward (our) community will you milk out with song, the swift one conquering (the cows? the waters?), among whom you grow strong.
2. Lovely to be seen for beauty are those (tips [of flame/soma streams]), which are the sun of the lower (realm). (As the possessor) of (those) tips who shines forth (even) for the one who doesn't impel (largesse), you are a good herdsman, not for deceiving, o strong-willed one. Far beyond the trickeries of magic your name was (set) in truth.
3. The steed does the oblation follow (and) its [=oblation's] elements are true; the Hotar who goes without harm brings might.
   Always stretching out along the ritual grass, the bullish child, the unaging youth is placed in the middle with his outgrowth.
4. These (hymns?) of yours, easy to yoke, (go) forth on their course to seek the twinned sisters [= butter offerings/waters], strong through truth, that (go) downward toward yonder one [=Agni/Soma], with reins easy to control, directing everything. Krivi [=Agni/Soma/the poet (<kavi)?] steals (their) names [=butter offerings/waters?] at their precipitous fall.
5. Quivering with your powers of endurance (toward) the one covered with little "twigs" that grasps (you) at the pressing [=firewood/sheep's fleece?], resounding among the clearly pregnant (females [=plants/waters/cows]), you beautify yourself at the recitations for the streams, o you with a straight song. Wax strong over the wives, (you who are) alive in the ceremony.

6. Just as he appears, so is he said (to be): They united (him) with his effective shadow in the waters—
(him) who wins wideness for us—(wins) the great (earth), the broad expanse, and lofty immovable might that brings good heroes.
7. (When) unwed, he pursues (women); once he has wives, he truly out(strips) (all) contenders with a mind that seeks conflict—(as) the sun, the sage poet.
He with his goods near at hand will vanquish the (sun's) heat and will win shelter for us, which protects (our) patrimony on all sides.
8. He [=poet] pursues the older sonority of the seers by means of (you [=Agni/Soma]), the beacon of this arrangement [=sacrifice]. Among which (females [=waters/cows/insights]) your name (is), in whatever (place) it has been set, he will find it [=sonority of the seers] through his industry. He who makes the journey by himself, he will get it right.
9. The foremost of these (females) has stepped down into the ocean (of soma). The pressing is not harmed into which she is guided.
Here the heart of the working poet [?] does not tremble, where the thought is found that is his bond to the purified (soma/fire).
10. For he (has a bond) with the insights of the mental lordship of the one deserving the sacrifice, who speaks just so and aims toward the same goal.
With the delightful (poems) [/lusty (warriors)] of the stealthy one we shall win the most expansive prize, to be brought to success only by the wise.
11. (While still) a falcon, (soma) is unboundedness for these (females [=poems/waters/cows]); (when it becomes) the exhilarating drink, it is their girding—for the one deserving the sacrifice, provided with all desirable things, master of artifice.
They [=priests] make (the females) set their goal to go to one after the other (of Soma and Agni) in turn. They know (that) unharnessing and drinking in rounds (are) at hand.
12. The one worthy of the sacrifice, always granting, has smashed away hatreds. "Twisted" (here) by the arms [=activity (of you, the priests)], finding (the praise) that is heard, he is surpassingly in partnership with you.
He [=Indra] comes in response to both the choice ones [=Agni and Soma], and he is radiant when he has a share in the troop [=Maruts] with their (chariots?) that drive forth easily.
13. Bearing the pressed (soma) of the sacrificer, master of the settlements, he [=poet] is the udder, the ladle of all visionary thoughts.
He bears the (two) milk-cows [=Heaven and Earth, or Agni and Soma]; the milk, full of sap, has been brought to perfection. The one who recites following (his teacher), he learns, not the one who sleeps.

14. Who stays awake, him the verses desire; who stays awake, to him go the melodies.
    Who stays awake, to him does this Soma say: "I am at home in fellowship with you."
15. Agni stays awake: him the verses desire. Agni stays awake: to him go the melodies.
    Agni stays awake: to him does this Soma say, "I am at home in fellowship with you."

V.45 (399) All Gods

Sadāpr̥̥ṇa Ātreya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

A lovely hymn, both narrating the opening of the Vala cave by the power of the Aṅgirases' poetic speech and welcoming the dawn of a new day and the sunrise on that mythic model. The hymn begins (vss. 1–3) with a description of sunrise, with no overt mention of the myth, though it clearly lurks in the background. The poet is concerned to apply the mythic model to the current sacrificial situation. He initiates the ritual in verse 4, and then in the two, paired, middle verses in the hymn (5–6), an omphalos, he exhorts his priestly comrades to achieve the poetic vision (dhī́) that has served others well in the past. The particular past he has in mind becomes clear in the following two verses (7–8), which depict the opening of the Vala cave and the Aṅgirases' role in it. The next two verses first pray that the Sun will come up (9) and then announce that he has arisen (10). The exhortations in verses 5–6 have worked! In the last verse (11) the poet (addressing himself, as well as his priestly colleagues) exults over this success: "the poetic vision that wins the sun," the same one that the Aṅgirases possessed, has now been acquired, and it will bring welfare to the community. It is noteworthy that Indra, the usual hero of the Vala myth, is not mentioned in connection with it (though he does make an appearance in vs. 4); presumably the poet wishes to identify himself and his priestly comrades with the chorus of Indra's associates, the Aṅgirases, rather than with the god.

A brief grammatical digression is necessary here in order to show the particular artfulness of this hymn. As noted, the first three verses already describe, in some detail, the dawn and the sunrise, and so it might be thought that the sunrise in verse 10 is an anticlimax. But a remarkable fact about the first three verses is that the description of the sunrise there is couched almost entirely in the verb form known as the injunctive, which has no overt marker of tense. Although its default interpretation is past tense, it can be used also to depict "timeless" events. (Since English lacks such a verbal category, we have used the present tense here.) The sunrise in verses 1–3 is both the mythic model of the Vala-Aṅgiras narrative and, more important, the ideal sunrise to which the poet aspires. In contrast to the insistent injunctives in these verses, when today's sunrise, the successful result of the sacrificers' and poet's efforts, is depicted in verse 10, all four verb forms have the overt marker of past tense, the so-called augment, making it clear that the sunrise there has indeed (just) occurred. Another example of R̥gvedic poets' sensitivity to grammatical categories and their ingenious deployment of them.

1. Through knowledge unloosing the stone of heaven with hymns—the shining (beacons) of the approaching dawn come (out of it)— he uncloses (the doors) to the enclosures: the Sun comes up. The god has opened up the doors belonging to the sons of Manu.
2. The Sun unlooses his beauty like an ensign; the mother of the cows [=Dawn], recognizing (the way), comes here from the pen.
   The rivers (of light) have floods (broad and high) like plains, have floods that chew (their banks). Heaven becomes firm like a well-fixed pillar.
3. In response to this hymn here the womb of the mountain (gapes open) for the primordial birth of the great ones [=dawns].
   The mountain gapes open; heaven achieves success; desiring to win the earth, they [=poets/Aṅgirases] exhaust themselves.
4. With well-spoken words pleasing to the gods, Indra and Agni are now to be called upon by you for help, for with solemn speeches sage poets of good sacrifice who desire to win always sacrifice to the Maruts.
5. Come on now! Today let us become possessed of good poetic vision. Let us send misfortune forth a wide way away.
   Let us put hatreds aside in the distance; let us go forward to the sacrificer.
6. Come on! Comrades, let us create (the same) poetic vision with which the mother opened the enclosure of the cow, with which Manu conquered Viśiśipra, with which the wandering merchant reached the overflowing source (of goods?).
7. The (pressing) stone, guided by the hand, bellowed there, the stone along with which the Navagvas sang for ten months.
   Saramā, going after the truth, found the cows; the Aṅgiras made all things real.
8. When all the Aṅgirases roared along with the cows at the brightening of this great (dawn), at the fountainhead of them [=cows], in the highest seat, Saramā found the cows along the path of truth.
9. Let the Sun drive here with his seven horses to the tract of land stretching widely at (the end of) his long course.
   Let the quick falcon fly to the stalk and the youthful poet shine as he goes among the cows.

10. The Sun has mounted the gleaming flood, now that he has yoked his golden, straight-backed (horses).
    Like a boat through the water the wise ones guided him; the waters, giving heed, stood still nearby.
11. You have acquired the poetic vision that wins the sun in the waters, with which the Navagvas passed ten months.
    Through this vision may we be those who have gods as our herdsmen; through this vision may we pass beyond constraint.

V.46 (400) All Gods

Pratikṣatra Ātreya
8 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 2, 8

Renou pronounces this hymn "banal," and certainly the long enumeration of divinities, listed with little or no characterization or action, does not engage the audience in the same way that the intricacies of the previous All God hymns in this maṇḍala do. However, there are two features of note in the hymn, and these features have, in our view, a covert connection. The hymn ends with two verses praising the Wives of the Gods in general and particular gods' wives by title: Indrāṇī, Agnāyī (wife of Agni), Aśvinī, Varuṇānī (vs. 8); the Wives (of the Gods) are also mentioned in verse 2, and other goddesses are also featured in the hymn: Sarasvatī (vs. 2), Aditi (vss. 3, 6), the Waters (vs. 3), the Rivers (vs. 6). The second feature is that the first verse is very different from the rest—the invocation of divinities only begins in verse 2. In verse 1 the 1st-person poet-sacrificer describes himself as hitched to a chariot-pole and, despite the effort involved, does not wish to be released from this yoking.

Now it is certainly possible that the yoking image only refers to the poet-sacrificer's usual tasks at the sacrifice. However, in conjunction with the emphasis on the gods' wives (pátnīḥ) later in the hymn, we suggest that what this hymn is ever so delicately concerning itself with is an important and controversial innovation: the introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife (pátnī) as a necessary participant in the ritual. As has been argued elsewhere (Jamison 2011, forthcoming a and b), though the Sacrificer's Wife is a fixture already in early middle Vedic ritual (see Jamison 1996a), there is no evidence for her participation in early R̥gvedic ritual. The introduction of the Sacrificer's Wife in the middle to late R̥gveda (presumably beginning with only one or a few priestly circles) seems to have been, understandably, controversial, and though it is not referred to directly in the text, there are covert arguments, pro and con, in a number of hymns. One of the important images of the new ritual pairing of Sacrificer and Wife is that of a pair of draft-animals jointly yoked to a chariot-pole (e.g., VIII.33.18, X.102.10), pulling the sacrifice together, though with the husband maintaining a slight edge in strength and effort. It seems quite possible that this image is found in verse 1: the male yoked to the pole, pulling a feminine referent (the chariot-pole, which is grammatically feminine, but also secondarily the wife), and with no desire to return to the old state of affairs. The last word in this verse, neṣati "he will lead," reminds of the priestly title, Neṣṭar "Leader," the priest whose duty it is to lead the Sacrificer's Wife around the sacrificial ground in later śrauta ritual; he is already marginally represented in the R̥gveda as a leader of the Wives of the Gods (see especially I.15.3).

If this scenario is correct—that verse 1 represents an argument in favor of the new model of sacrifice including the Sacrificer's Wife—then the lists of gods that follow might be a form of insurance. Every possible divinity is called upon to witness and give tacit approval to the innovation. And the Wives of the Gods, who provide the divine model for the Sacrificer's Wife, are called on especially insistently to come to the sacrifice and provide their help and support.

1. I, a knowing one, have yoked myself like a courser to the chariot-pole;
   I draw it [/her=ritual wife], which [/who] furthers (the sacrifice?) while seeking help.
   I do not desire to be released from it [/her], nor to turn back here again. The knowing one who goes in front will lead straight along the paths.
2. O Agni, Indra, Varuṇa, Mitra, (All?) Gods, o Marutian troop and Viṣṇu—provide!
   Both of the Aśvins, Rudra, and the Wives (of the Gods), Pūṣan, Bhaga, Sarasvatī shall enjoy themselves.
3. Indra and Agni, Mitra and Varuṇa, Aditi, the Sun, Earth, Heaven, the Maruts, the Mountains, the Waters—
   I call on (and on) Viṣṇu, Pūṣan, Brahmaṇaspati, also on Fortune, Laud, Savitar, for help.
4. And may Viṣṇu and Wind—the unfailing ones—the Treasure-Giver and Soma create joy for us.
   And may the R̥bhus and Aśvins, and Tvaṣṭar and Vibhvan, consent to wealth for us.
5. And may there come to us here this Marutian troop, dwelling in heaven, worthy of the sacrifice, to sit on the ritual grass.
   May Br̥haspati and Pūṣan provide to us shelter for defense, and Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman.
6. And may these mountains, receiving good praises, and the very bright rivers be (there) for our protection.
   May Bhaga, the apportioner, come here with capacity (and) help. Let Aditi of broad extent hear my call.
7. The Wives of the Gods—let them willingly help us; let them help us to propagate, to win prizes.
   (You) who belong to the earth, (you) who (live) under the commandment of the waters, you goddesses, receiving good invocations, give shelter to us.

8. And let the ladies, the Wives of the Gods pursue (the offering)—Indra's wife, Agni's wife, the Aśvins' queen.
   Let Rodasī and Varuṇa's wife pay heed. Let the goddesses pursue (the offering), which is the regular season for women.

V.47 (401) All Gods

Pratiratha Ātreya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Each verse in this short hymn presents a riddle: a description of a god or divine force whose name is withheld till late in the verse (1, 2) or suppressed entirely (3–6). This is not an uncommon tactic in All God hymns—a particularly deft example is VIII.29. This hymn presents several twists on this device. First, the characterizations seem regularly intended to mislead. For example, verse 1 has a feminine subject, and given the actions ascribed to her, the audience would expect the subject to be Dawn. But instead it is (Poetic) Inspiration (manīṣā́), here identified as the mother of Dawn (presumably because early-morning ritual poetry awakens Dawn and impels her to appear). Again, the attributes of the subject in verse 2 suggest Agni's flames, but the actual referent, the last word of the verse, is "Paths." Second, the riddles get harder as the hymn progresses. As was already noted, in verses 1 and 2 the solution is given, but thereafter it is not. In verse 3 the solution is fairly obvious by the end of the verse, but in verse 4 it is less so. Verse 5 announces itself as an enigma, and it seems to have double application to both the Sun and Agni. There is no agreed upon solution for verse 6.

Although this observation is unconnected to the riddle structure just discussed, each verse (but 5) has a form of div/dyu "heaven" (mostly diváḥ) (vs. 5 has d(u)vé "two," which is phonologically close). The final pāda of the hymn is an "homage to Heaven." Although this homage was not prepared thematically in the hymn, it was prepared verbally, by the repetition of the stem in various syntactic and semantic contexts.

1. Hitching up, she comes from heaven, she who is called the great mother of the Daughter (of Heaven [=Dawn]), waking (men), seeking to win, the youthful one, (coming) from the fathers, constantly calling in the seat (of the sacrifice)—(she is) Inspiration.
2. The nimble ones, hastening at their work, having mounted the nave of the immortal one, the endless, broad ones encircle heaven and earth on all sides—(they are) the Paths.
3. (He is) a bull, the sea, a reddish eagle (that) entered the womb of the age-old father.
   The dappled stone deposited in the middle of heaven strode across (the sky); he protects the two ends of the airy realm: (the Sun).

4. Four bear him, affording rest; ten give the infant suck, for (him to) move.
   Threefold are his highest cows; they circle around the ends of heaven in a single day: (Agni?).
5. Here is the wonder, the enigma, people: that the rivers move, but the waters stay, that two, other than his mother, bear him—the two were born hither and yon but are twins, of the same lineage: (Sun and Agni).
6. They stretch out their insightful thoughts, their (ritual) labors (as warp) for him; the mothers weave garments for their child.
   The bulls, delighting in coupling, go to their wives along the path of heaven.
7. Let this, o Mitra and Varuṇa, let this (hymn), o Agni, be luck and lifetime for us; let it be recited here.
   Might we obtain a fording place and firm standing. Homage to Heaven, the lofty seat.

V.48 (402) All Gods

Pratibhānu Ātreya
5 verses: jagatī

Another enigmatic hymn, made more baffling (as in a number of All God hymns in Maṇḍala V) by the lack of named referents for the descriptive phrases. There is certainly no consensus among scholars about these referents or about the purpose and structure of the hymn; indeed, a number of scholars consider this a "fragment." We find this unlikely, however. The fact that the most difficult verse by far is the middle one (3) suggests that this is an omphalos hymn, and moreover the final pāda (of vs. 5) is typical of a hymn ending.

In our opinion the hymn is appropriate to an early-morning ritual, and the two main referents are Dawn (/Dawns) and Agni. It begins with a typical rhetorical question: what poem to compose for the establishment of the ritual fire at dawn? The second half of verse 1 and first half of verse 2 present striking images of dawn (/dawns) breaking, ending verse 2 with a standard meditation on the aging that every new day brings to mortals. This thought is continued in verse 3, though the focus passes to Agni, who day after day at the ritual prepares the mace for Indra when Indra is present at the sacrifice, while the recurrent dawns mark the passage of time. Agni as the ritual fire remains the subject of the remainder of the hymn (vss. 4–5), with his identity becoming clearer and clearer.

1. What shall we compose for the self-ruling, self-glorious great one [=Agni?] for his own dear establishment, when the mistress of artifice [=Dawn?], choosing the waters in the dark cloud of the variegated dusky realm, stretches them forth.

2. They [=Dawns] have spread their hero-strengthening tracery along the same course through the whole dusky realm.
   A man devoted to the gods drives away the backward-facing (dawns) ever behind (him), and lengthens (his life) with those in front.
3. Along with the pressing stones, through (the periods) of the day and through the nights, he [=Agni?] sprinkles [=prepares] the best mace, when the master of artifice [=Indra?] (is there)— while into his own [=Agni's] house (the Dawns?) proceed by the hundred: rolling up the days, they unroll them (again).
4. I have looked upon this stream(ing) of his [=Agni], like (the swing) of an axe; I have looked upon his face, for the enjoyment of his form, when concurrently he establishes a treasure like a dwelling place abounding in food for the clan whose cry is "carry (the day)."
5. The four-faced one stretches with his tongue out straight, wearing pleasing (garb), putting the stranger in place (as) Varuna (does).
   We do not know, because of our human state, that (source?) from which Bhaga and Savitar will give what is choice.

V.49 (403) All Gods

Pratibha Ātreya
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

This hymn picks up where the previous hymn ended, with the gods Savitar ("Impeller") and Bhaga ("Fortune") and their bounty to mortals. These two gods are the topic of verses 1 and 2 here, and the first four (of five) verses concern the distribution of treasures to men, with a widening circle of gods responsible for these gifts. The context (as vs. 3 makes especially clear) is the distribution of dakṣiṇās (priestly gifts) at the early-morning ritual. Verse 5 asks for more general blessings than just wealth, but in its references to the "formless void" and to "wide space," it also seems to depict dawn, which creates visible and articulated space from formlessness.

1. I hasten toward god Savitar for you today, and toward Bhaga who apportions the treasure of Āyu.
   I would also turn hither you two superior men, who bring many enjoyments—seeking companionship with you, o Aśvins, day after day.
2. In response to the advance of the lord, as a knowing one offer friendship to god Savitar with hymns.
   A discerning one should call on (him) with reverence and on the preeminent one who apportions the treasure of Āyu.

3. Traveling to those lacking gifts, (each god) distributes valuables—Pūṣan, Bhaga, Aditi—at the dawning of the ruddy (Dawn).
   Indra, Viṣṇu, Varuṇa, Mitra, Agni—the wondrous ones beget lucky days.
4. Then Savitar without assault is our defense, then the nurturing rivers follow suit, when, as Hotar of the ceremony, I call upon (them). May we be lords of wealth, with prizes as our treasure.
5. Those who have presented such great reverence to the good ones, who possess well-spoken speech for Mitra and Varuṇa, let the formless void go away (from them); make a wider space (for them). With the aid of Heaven and Earth may we rejoice.

V.50 (404) All Gods

Svastyātreya Ātreya
5 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 5

This little hymn is surprisingly beset by difficulties, especially of syntax, reference, and meter. A particularly intricate set of syntactic constructions modulates from the singular "everyman" of verse 1, through an indefinite plural 3rd person, also representing men in general ("they" 2ab), to an identification of those indefinite men with "us" (2cd)—all of whom desire wealth and the companionship of the god "Leader," identified by the later tradition with Savitar (whom we met in V.49), though this identification is not necessary.

The scene shifts to the sacrifice in the next two verses (3–4), and the "we" of verse 2 becomes the "you" in verse 3, exhorted to do honor to the gods and their wives as guests at the sacrifice. The identities remain off-balance, however: the verb used for "honor" is one whose subject is usually a god and whose object a mortal, so role reversal is implied. And the gods are not identified as "gods," but rather called "men"—using the word nṛ́, which refers to especially elite, noble, or worthy men, and is often elsewhere applied to gods. Verse 4 depicts the mythic model of the soma sacrifice, with Indra invigorated by soma to be a winner. This leads us back to god Leader and prayers for wealth and well-being in response to our ritual offerings (vs. 5).

1. Every mortal would choose the companionship of the god Leader.
   Every one aims at wealth and would choose brilliance, in order to thrive.
2. They are yours, god Leader, as are the ones who (set out) to mimic them.
   As those—for they are to be infused (with good things)—may we be accompanied by wealth, by (other) desirable accompaniments.
3. Therefore, (all of you,) show favor here to the superior men [=gods] as our guests, also to their wives.
   Let the repeller repel into the distance anything standing in the path and (all) hatreds.

4. When the harnessed draft-animal will run, the beast seeking the wooden cup [=soma], the manly minded one [=Indra], with a dwelling full of heroes, (will) win the floods, like wise (thoughts?).
5. This Lord of the Chariot is yours, god Leader. Luck (be) Wealth—luck (be) for wealth, luck for well-being! Let us conceive praise songs as refreshment; let us conceive praise songs for the gods.

V.51 (405) All Gods

Svastyātreya Ātreya
15 verses: gāyatrī 1–4, uṣṇih 5–10, jagatī or triṣṭubh 11–13, anuṣṭubh 14–15

The last of the All God hymns in Maṇḍala V, this hymn is far too long (fifteen verses) for the position it holds, after a series of five-verse hymns. It is also not unified metrically. It likely originally consisted of separate hymns, verses 1–4, 5–7, 8–10, with 11–15 as a later addition.

Both in content and form, all the segments are simple, predictable, and closely tied to the soma-drinking of various gods, especially those appropriate to the morning soma-pressing. This collection of strictly liturgical verses provides a curious finale to the highly wrought, intellectually challenging, and deeply serious All God hymns in this collection.

1. O Agni, to drink of the pressed (soma), come here with all your helpers, with the gods, for the giving of oblations.
2. (All of) you whose insights are truth, whose ordinances are real, come here to the ceremony.
   Drink with the tongue of Agni.
3. You comrade, inspired poet—come here with the inspired poets, the early-traveling gods, to drink the soma.
4. Here is the soma, pressed in the cup, poured around in the basin—the one dear to Indra, to Vāyu.

5. Vāyu, relishing (them), drive hither to pursue (the oblations), for the giving of oblations.
   Drink of the pressed stalk to your satisfaction.
6. Vāyu and Indra, you have the right to the drinking of these pressed (soma drinks).
   You flawless ones, relish them to your satisfaction.
7. The pressed soma drinks mixed with curds are for Indra and for Vāyu.
   Like rivers to the deep, they go to satisfaction.

8. Jointly with all the gods, jointly with the Aśvins, with Dawn, drive hither, Agni. Take pleasure in the pressed soma, as (you did) at Atri's.

9. Jointly with Mitra and Varuṇa, jointly with Soma, with Viṣṇu, drive hither, Agni. Take pleasure in the pressed soma, as (you did) at Atri's.
10. Jointly with the Ādityas, with the Vasus, jointly with Indra, with Vāyu, drive hither, Agni. Take pleasure in the pressed soma, as (you did) at Atri's.

11. Well-being let the Aśvins, let Fortune mete out to us; well-being let the goddess Aditi, let the unassailable ones.
Well-being let lord Pūṣan establish for us; well-being let Heaven and Earth, with kind attention.
12. For well-being we shall call upon Vāyu, on Soma; well-being (let him mete out) who is lord of creation.
On Bṛhaspati with his whole flock (we shall call) for well-being. For well-being let the Ādityas be there for us.
13. Let all the gods be there for us today, for well-being; let Vaiśvānara, Vasu, Agni (be there) for well-being.
Let the gods, the Ṛbhus give aid for (our) well-being. With well-being let Rudra protect us from constraint.
14. Well-being, o Mitra and Varuṇa, well-being, o rich Path.
Well-being for us (let) Indra and Agni—well-being, o Aditi, make for us.
15. With well-being we would follow along our path, like the Sun and the Moon.
May we meet up with one who gives in return, who does not smite, with one who knows.

Maṇḍala V contains the largest collection of Marut hymns in the Ṛgveda, V.52–61, plus V.87. The ten sequential hymns, 52–61, attributed to Śyāvāśva Ātreya, are poetry of the highest order—inventive, exuberant, and beautifully crafted—and they capture both aspects of the Maruts: their social existence as a sort of Männerbund, a group of young, handsome, high-spirited warriors, and their naturalistic existence as personifications of the monsoon/thunderstorm—without losing sight of their divinity and the benefits they provide to men.

V.52 (406) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
17 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 6, 16–17

As befits the first hymn in this Marut cycle, the poet Śyāvāśva addresses himself with an exhortation to praise the Maruts in the first pāda of the first verse. He then describes them in a general fashion and asserts their right to the sacrifice, in a short ring-compositional introduction (vss. 1–5). (For the responsions of verses 1 and 5 as an example of "poetic repair," see Jamison 2006.)

The next section of the hymn (vss. 6–13) depicts the Maruts as the gods of the thunderstorm in a series of vivid images and also fancifully assigns individual names to them (vss. 10–11)—the Maruts are otherwise undifferentiated—ending with another exhortation to the poet to praise them (vs. 13cd). In the last few verses (14–17) ritual honor is given to the Maruts, and they respond with gifts. The last verse (17) resembles a dānastuti, but with the Maruts, rather than humans, as the donors to the poet; they were already identified as "patrons" (sūrí) in the two preceding verses (15–16).

The density of imagery throughout is remarkable; we will give just one example, from verse 9. There the Maruts are said to "clothe themselves in wool in the Paruṣṇī River." The "wool" must stand for foam, off-white and fluffy like newly shorn wool. But the river foam is yet another metaphorical substitute for something else, namely clouds, which the Maruts as storm gods would be clothed in—all of this conveyed in an economical half-verse.

1. Śyāvāśva, chant forth boldly—along with the Maruts possessing chants, who rejoice in [/cheer on] undisguised fame according to their own nature, those worthy of the sacrifice.
2. For they are comrades of steadfast strength—boldly.
   Bold on their drive, by themselves they protect each and every one.
3. They, like streaming bulls, spring across the nights.
   Then the Maruts' might in heaven and earth we ponder.
4. Among the Maruts we would establish your praise and sacrifice—boldly—
   who all, through human (life)spans, protect the mortal from harm.
5. The deserving ones possessing good drops [/gifts], men who are not half-strength, to the Maruts of heaven chant forth—(chant) a sacrifice for those worthy of the sacrifice.
6. (Arrived) here with brilliants, here with battle, the lofty men have launched their spears.
   Following them (came) the lightning flashes—following the Maruts like giggling (girls). The radiance of heaven has arrived by itself.
7. Those who have grown strong as earthlings, who in the broad midspace, or in the precinct of the rivers, or in the seat of great heaven—
8. Exalt the Marut troop, of real strength, ingenious.
   The men, streaming, hitch up by themselves for beauty.
9. And they clothe themselves in wool [=foam] in the Paruṣṇī (River)—they (like) preening water-birds—and with the wheel-rim of their chariots they split the stone with force.

10. "On the Path," "Off the Path," "Within the Path," "Along the Path"— with these names they vaunt themselves to me at the bestrewing of the sacrifice.
11. Then they vaunt themselves as "men (come) down"; then they vaunt themselves as "teams"; then as "those from afar." Their bright forms are worthy to be seen.
12. Chanting in rhythm, seeking water, (like) light-weights they pranced to the wellspring.
    They (seemed indistinct) to me like who knows who, like thieves (concealed), but the helpers (then) came to glitter in my sight.
13. Which lofty ones, whose spears are lightning flashes, are (also) sage poets, ritual adepts—to this Marut flock, o seer, do homage and bring it to a halt with song.
14. To the Marut flock, o seer, (approach) with a gift, as a maiden being given (in marriage) (approaches) her ally [=spouse?].
    Or from heaven do you, bold ones, praised with poetic thoughts, speed with strength.
15. Now (a man) paying mind to them, (who approaches) to the gods as if to udders, he would keep company with a gift, through (the auspices of) the patrons famed on the course [=Maruts] and by their unguents.
16. Those who proclaimed the cow to me on my seeking (their) lineage, the patrons called Pṛ̥śni their mother, then they called their father arrow-possessing Rudra—(they) the skillful ones.
17. Seven upon seven the able ones gave me hundreds, one (hundred) each.
    At the Yamunā (River) a famous thing—I swept up bounty in cattle; swept down bounty in horses.

V.53 (407) Maruts

Śyāvāsva Ātreya
16 verses: kakubh 1, br̥hatī 2, anuṣṭubh 3, puraüṣṇih 4, kakubh 5, satobr̥hatī 6–7, gāyatrī 8, satobr̥hatī 9, kakubh 10–11, gāyatrī 12, satobr̥hatī 13–14, kakubh 15, satobr̥hatī 16

A metrically complex hymn, though there is no reason to consider it a composite. The internal groupings, mostly two-verse units, follow those suggested by Oldenberg (1888: 106–8). The hymn mingles descriptions of and wishes for the Maruts' journey here with descriptions of the storm and the desirable rain the Maruts bring, and indeed the Maruts and the rains are sometimes identified, sometimes modulate from one to the other.

The hymn opens (vss. 1–2), as often, with questions—what is the origin of Maruts and where have they gone? The Maruts themselves answer, indirectly, in verse 3, and demand praise, which is forthcoming in verse 4. The description of a storm follows (vss. 5–7), and the Maruts are urged to come here with their rains (vss. 8–11). The poet returns in verses 12–13 to the question raised at the beginning: to what sacrificer have the Maruts gone? The hope is of course that they have come or will come to us, and the blessings we wish to receive are detailed in the final verses (14–16.)

1. Who knows their birth? Or, who was previously in the graces of the Maruts,
 when they yoked their own spotted (female antelopes)?
2. Those mounted on their chariots—who heard (them)? How did they drive?
 Toward what good giver, (what) friend, did they flow along (as) friends,
 (as) rains (flow) with their refreshments?

3. They say to me—those who drove hither through the days along with the birds, in exuberance,
 the men, unblemished young bloods: "When you see them here, praise them!"
4. Who in their unguents, who in their axes have their own radiance—and in their garlands, in their brilliants, in their spangles, with splendor in their chariots, in their bows.

5. It is following your chariots (when they come) that I take my place for delight, you Maruts of lively drops [/lively gifts], (I delighting) like the heavens (following the waters) when they come with their rain.
6. When the men of good drops [/gifts] have stirred the bucket of heaven here for the one doing pious work, they send the thunder(storm) surging out along the two world-halves;
 along the wasteplaces come the rains.
7. The rivers, having bored with their gush through the dusky realm, have flowed forth like milk-cows, like horses that have streamed from the road at their unharnessing, when the dappled females turn aside.

8. Drive hither, Maruts, from heaven, from the midspace, and from nearby.
 Do not stay away at a distance.
9. Let not the Rasā (River), the Anitabhā, the Kubhā, the Krumu, let not the Sindhu bring you to a halt.
 Let not the overflowing Sarayu hem you around. On us alone let your favor be.

10. Your troop of chariots, the glittering Marut flock of newer ("hymns" [=thunderclaps]) do the rains come following after.
11. Your every troop of these (chariots), every swarm, every flock, with good chants we would stride after, with poetic thoughts.

12. To what well-born one, who had given an oblation, have they driven forth today along this course—the Maruts?
13. —Along which (course) you convey the imperishable granular seed to offspring and descendants.
    Establish for us what we implore you for: generosity through our whole lifetime and good fortune.
14. May we cross over beyond scorners through your blessings, having left behind imperfection and hostilities.
    When it rains, the waters are luck and lifetime; at dawn they are medicine. May we be together with (them/you), o Maruts.

15. Well provided with gods and with heroes in every way will that mortal be whom you protect, o men, o Maruts. May we be those (mortals).
16. Praise the benefactors of the praiser on the journey of this (flock). They will take pleasure as cows do in a pasture.
    Invoke them as they go, like old comrades. With song sing (to) those who desire it.

V.54 (408) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
15 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 14

One of the most intensely descriptive of the Marut hymns, with shifting images of the violent thunderstorms and welcome rain that they provoke. There is no particular progress or development in the hymn, just the succession of exuberant descriptions. The last three verses (13–15) shift to prayers for the Maruts' gifts and help.

1. Forth—for the Marut troop with its own radiance I will anoint this speech, for (the troop) shaking the mountains, for (the troop) with the rhythm of the gharma pot, sacrificing on the back of heaven, of heaven-bright fame—sing (forth) their great manliness.

2. Forth, o Maruts, (go) your forceful, water-seeking, vigor-increasing, horse-yoked, swirling (chariots?).
   They join with lightning; Trita [/the third (heaven)] bellows. The waters resound, swirling in their streambed.
3. With lightning as their might and stones as their missiles, the superior men, the Maruts, turbulent as the wind, shaking the mountains, (though) just with a desire to give water, roll hailstones in an instant—(they) with thundering onslaught, violent, overpowering.
4. Through the nights, o Rudras, through the days, you skillful ones, through the midspace, through the dusky realms, you shakers, through the fields when you drive, like boats (through the water)—through (all these places) of difficult going, o Maruts, you never suffer harm.
5. This is your heroism, your greatness, o Maruts: it stretches across a long wagon-trek [=measure of distance], like the sun.
   (You are) like antelopes on your journey, with ungraspable brilliance, when you have overrun the mountain that does not give horses [/gives non-horses (=cows?)].
6. When the heaving troop has flashed, o Maruts, you will plunder the tree like a caterpillar, you (ritual) adepts.
   Then in concert you will lead Proper Thinking [/Aramati] to us along an easy way, like the eye (of the sun? of the traveler himself?) (leading) the traveler.
7. He is not conquered, o Maruts, nor is he slain, nor does he fail, nor waver, nor suffer harm, nor do his riches give out, nor his help—the seer or the king whom you will "sweeten."
8. The Maruts have teams (of horses) like men who conquer in roving bands; they have (water) skins [=clouds] like hospitable (householders):
   they swell the wellspring. When the strong ones have sounded, they inundate the earth with the stalk of honey.
9. This earth slopes gently for the Maruts; heaven becomes gently sloping for them when they go forth; the paths of the midspace slope gently; gently slope the mountains of lively drops.
10. While—you Maruts of equal gravity, you sunlike men, you men of heaven—you become exhilarated when the sun has risen, your horses certainly never slacken as they run. In a single day you reach the far limit of this road.
11. On your shoulders spears, on your feet spangles; on your breasts brilliants, o Maruts, on your chariot charms.
    Lightning bolts with the flash of fire in your fists, golden (helmet-)lips stretched out on your heads.

12. The vault whose brilliance is ungraspable for the stranger do you, Maruts, shake for the gleaming fig [=rain].
The communities huddle together when (the Maruts) have grown turbulent. The truth seekers sound an extended cry.
13. May we be the charioteers of the vigorous wealth given by you, discriminating Maruts, which does not stay away (from us), any more than Tiṣya [=Dog Star] from heaven. By us enjoy (wealth) in thousands, Maruts.
14. You, Maruts, (aid) our wealth consisting of coveted heroes; you aid the seer inspired in his melody.
You (establish) a charger and a prize for Bharata; you establish a king with attentive hearing.
15. For this treasure I beseech you, you of immediate aid, by which we will extend (our control) over men like the sun.
Take pleasure, Maruts, in this speech of mine, by whose enduring power may we pass through a hundred winters.

V.55 (409) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
10 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 10

The first nine of the ten verses in this hymn end with a refrain, "as they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along," which sets the theme of the hymn. Rather than focusing on the thunderstorm and its accompanying rain (mentioned only incidentally in vs. 5), as in the last few Marut hymns, this one primarily concerns their journey through the midspace. The hymn ends with a few verses (9–10) of invitation to the sacrifice and prayers for benefits.

1. The Maruts, worshiped at the forefront of the sacrifice, with glinting spears and brilliants on their breasts, assumed their lofty vigor.
They speed with their horses, swift but easy to control. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
2. You yourselves assumed your power, as you know (how). Loftily, you great ones, widely do you reign [/shine forth].
And through the midspace they measured themselves with their strength. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
3. Born all at once, good in essence, grown all at once, just for splendor the men increased even further, shining forth like the rays of the sun. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
4. Your greatness is to be emulated, o Maruts; the sight of you is desirable to see like the sighting of the sun.

And establish us in immortality. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.

5. You raise (water) from the sea, o Maruts; you make the rain rain, you overflowing ones.
   Your milk-cows do not wear out, you wondrous ones. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
6. When you have yoked your dappled (mares as) horses to the chariot-poles and you have fastened on your golden cloaks, all rival contenders do you disperse, o Maruts. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
7. Not the mountains, not the rivers obstruct you. Where you have set your attention, Maruts, you go just to that.
   And around heaven and earth you drive. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
8. What previously, Maruts, and what now—what is spoken and what is recited, of all that you become cognizant. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
9. Be merciful to us, Maruts; do not slay us. To us spread out ample shelter.
   Give study to our praise song, our fellowship. – As they drove in beauty their chariots rolled along.
10. Do you lead us to a better (state), away from dire straits, Maruts, when you are being hymned.
    Enjoy our oblation-giving, you who deserve the sacrifice. May we be lords of riches.

V.56 (410) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
9 verses: bṛhatī, except satobṛhatī 3, 7

Unlike the previous Marut hymns, this one introduces—and indeed begins with—other personnel besides the Maruts. The first word in the hymn is a vocative addressed to the god Agni, and he (or perhaps the poet) is addressed elsewhere in the hymn (vss. 2, 5). The Earth appears in verse 3 as a literally battered woman, a remarkable image, and this female figure anticipates that of Rodasī, frequent companion and consort of the Maruts, in verses 8–9.

The poet repeatedly calls the Maruts to come here: the forms "I call," "we call," and "calls" frame and punctuate the hymn (vss. 1, 2, 5, 8, 9), while the invocation of Agni at the beginning and the description of Agni in verse 7 establish the sacrifice as the goal of their journey. But it is the verses describing the journey itself (especially 3–4) that are the most memorable part of this hymn.

1. O Agni—the vaunting flock, emblazoned with brilliants, with unguents, the clans of the Maruts I call down here today, even from the luminous realm of heaven.
2. Just as you [=Agni? poet?] conceive with your heart, in the same way my hopes have gone.
   Those who will come closest to your calls, strengthen them of fearsome appearance.
3. Like (a woman) with a generous (lover), Earth, beaten aside (by your onslaught) [/sexually penetrated], being ecstatic, (seems to) recede from us.
   Like a bear is your strenuous onslaught, o Maruts, fearsome like a headstrong ox.
4. Those who liquefy (the trees) with their strength, at will, like oxen averse to the yoke, even the reverberant stone, the mountain, the peak do they shake on their journeys.
5. Rise up(, o Agni? poet?)—now with praises for these who have grown strong together.
   I call the (flock) of the Maruts, best of many, which no one can precede—(call the flock) like a swarm of cows.
6. Yoke your reddish (mares) to your chariot; yoke the chestnuts to your chariots.
   Yoke the two nimble fallow bays to the chariot-pole, to pull—the two best pullers to the chariot-pole, to pull.
7. And this reddish racehorse here [=Agni], powerfully noisy, has been set here to be seen.
   Let him not make you too long on your journeys, o Maruts: spur him forth on the chariots.
8. The Marutian chariot, seeking fame, do we now call here, on which there stands, bearing great delights, Rodasī in company with the Maruts.
9. This troop of yours, beauty on the chariot, vibrant, inviting admiration do I call here, in which the noble, well-portioned (Rodasī) shows her greatness, the generous one in company with the Maruts.

V.57 (411) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
8 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 7–8

Like the immediately preceding hymn, this one introduces other personnel besides the Maruts, though not ones tied specifically to the sacrifice. The hymn begins by addressing the Maruts by their father's name, "o Rudras," a vocative that returns in verse 7. Their mother Pṛ́śni also figures in the hymn, in verses 2 and 3. The first verse also describes them as "accompanied by Indra" (índravantaḥ). It is notable how rarely Indra is mentioned in hymns dedicated to the Maruts, even though they are his sidekicks and supporters from an Indraic point of view. In the whole Marut cycle in Maṇḍala V this is the only appearance of Indra, and it is tellingly phrased: Indra is himself treated as a sidekick, demoted into a possessive adjective: "possessing/accompanied by Indra." It is ordinarily the Maruts who have this grammatically subordinated role: the adjective marútvant ("possessing/accompanied by the Maruts") is very common and regularly modifies Indra.

In this hymn, then, the Maruts are defined first by their parentage and their companion. The other elements that define them are their attributes, both physical and mental, lists of which are given in verses 2, 4, 5, and 6, constituting a virtual iconography of the Maruts in verbal form. This listing modulates imperceptibly into the beginning of verse 7, a list of goods possessed by the Maruts that they have give to the singers, a subtle way of moving to the requests of the final verses (7–8).

The vivid description characteristic of Marut hymns is not absent here. See especially verses 2–3, with the Maruts as the storm.

1. O Rudras—accompanied by Indra, of one accord, with your golden chariots, come here for good faring.
 Here is a poetic thought from us for you to yearn toward, like the wellspring of heaven for a thirsty man seeking water.
2. You with your axes, your spears, your inspired thoughts, with your good bows, your arrows, your quivers, you possess good horses, good chariots, you whose mother is Pṛ́śni.
 Possessing good weapons, you drive in beauty, Maruts.
3. You shake heaven and the mountains for goods for the pious. The trees duck down with fear at your journey.
 You make the earth quake, you whose mother is Pṛ́śni, when, o powerful ones, you have yoked the dappled (mares) for beauty.
4. The Maruts—having the wind's turbulence and a cloak of rain, quite alike in appearance like twins, well-ornamented, having tawny horses and ruddy horses, unblemished, projecting power, wide like heaven in their greatness.
5. Possessed of many droplets [/banners], of unguents, of good drops, whose appearance is turbulent, whose gifts are not withdrawn, noble by birth, with brilliants on their breasts, chant(er)s of heaven, they share an immortal name.
6. Spears are on your shoulders, Maruts; might, strength, power placed in your arms.
 Manly forces on your heads, weapons on your chariots. All splendor has been emblazoned on your bodies.

7. Rich in cows, in horses, in chariots, in good heroes, in gold—(such) largesse you have given to us, Maruts.
   Make good our eulogy, Rudras. Might I have a share in your divine help.
8. – Hail, Maruts, superior men! Be merciful to us—o you of great bounty, immortal, knowing the (immanent) truth, hearing the realized (truth) [=poetic formulations], sage poets, youths, belonging to the lofty mountains, loftily growing.

V.58 (412) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

Another pleasing Marut hymn with the typical mixture of storm imagery (see esp. vss. 6–7) and portrayal of a wild but beneficial Männerbund. In this latter capacity, the Maruts are seen as the source of various earthly counterparts (vs. 4). Another common theme, the lack of distinction among the various members of the band, is also mentioned (vs. 5). As in V.56.3 a sexual relationship between the Maruts and the Earth is depicted (vs. 7), though without the shock value of the earlier passage.

1. Now will I praise this (flock) full of power, their Marutian flock of newer (hymns [=thunderclaps]), those possessing swift horses who drive themselves impetuously and who as self-rulers are masters of the immortal—
2. The turbulent, powerful flock with bangles on their hands, of boisterous commandment, masters of artifice, granting wishes, who are joy itself, immeasurable in their greatness. O poet, extol the powerfully generous men.
3. Let the water-conveyors come here to you today, all the Maruts who speed the rain.
   This fire which is kindled here, o Maruts, enjoy it, you sage poets, youths.
4. You beget for the people a take-charge king, fashioned for distinction, you who deserve the sacrifice.
   From you comes the fist-fighter, quick with his arms, from you the one of trusty horses and good heroes, o Maruts.
5. Just like wheel-spokes, there is no last one; like the days they keep arising, not stingy with their mighty powers.
   The sons of Pr̥śni, highest, wildest—the Maruts have equipped themselves with their own poetic thought.
6. When you have driven forth with your dappled mares, your horses, with your chariots with their firm wheel-rims, o Maruts, the waters surge; the trees dissolve; let the ruddy bull, the Heaven, roar down.

7. Even the Earth has spread herself at their journey. Like a husband an embryo, they have implanted their own strength (in the earth).
   Certainly they have yoked the winds as horses to their yoke-pole; they have made their own sweat into rain—the Rudras.
8. – Hail, Maruts, superior men! Be merciful to us—o you of great bounty, immortal, knowing the (immanent) truth, hearing the realized (truth) [=poetic formulations], sage poets, youths, belonging to the lofty mountains, loftily growing.

V.59 (413) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
8 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 8

This hymn is constructed around a series of similes and metaphors, some of which (see esp. 3a) push the boundaries of similarity and require a mental leap from the audience, while in others (e.g., 3d) the near identity between the two entities compared renders the simile-marking almost redundant. The hymn's subject, as usual, is the power of the Maruts on their travels, power manifested both as the storm and as a warriors' onslaught. The puzzles in this hymn begin with its opening: no entirely satisfactory referent for the "scout" or "spy" of 1a has been found, though many have been suggested.

1. Your scout has stridden forth, to give good faring. I will chant to heaven. I proffer my truth [=hymn] to the earth.
   They sprinkle the horses, passing through the dusky realm. They let their own radiance slacken with floods (of rain).
2. In fear of their onslaught the Earth trembles. Like a loaded boat she streams, going a wayward course.
   They who, visible from afar, are conspicuous on their travels, the men have taken their places amid the great rite of distribution.
3. (Your) horn, like (those) of cows, stands tallest for splendor; (your) eye is like the sun in his surging through the dusky realm.
   Like steeds of good quality, you are pleasing. Like young bloods, you are conspicuous for splendor, o men.
4. Who can reach up to the great things of you great ones? Who to your poetic skills, Maruts, who to your manly deeds?
   You set the earth to quivering like a dustmote, when you press forward, to give good faring.
5. Like reddish horses [=flames of fire] they are of the same lineage, like champions in the vanguard, they have fought in advance.
   Like very strong young bloods, the men have grown strong. They confound the eye of the sun with their rains.

6. They, bursting forth with no oldest one, no youngest, no middle, have grown forth in their greatness.
   Noble by birth, having Pṛśni as mother, young bloods of heaven—come here to us.
7. They who, like birds in formation, have flown with their strength to the ends of heaven from (heaven's) lofty back—their horses, as both (races [=human and divine]) know, have stirred forth the spurting (waters) of the mountain.
8. Let heaven bellow, let Aditi (come) to pursue our (oblations). Let the dawns, bright with drops, take their places together.
   These have stirred the heavenly bucket hither—o seer—the Maruts, (sons) of Rudra, being hymned.

V.60 (414) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
8 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 7–8

Like V.56, this hymn begins with an invocation of Agni, the ritual fire, who is also conspicuously addressed along with the Maruts in each of the last three verses (6–8). The prominence of Agni identifies the Maruts' journey to and participation in the sacrifice as the goal of the hymn. Their journey itself provokes the usual cosmic reactions—fear and trembling (vss. 2–3)—and the dazzling beauty of the Maruts also receives its usual expression (vs. 4). Verse 5 provides an almost domestic picture of their parentage. Notable also is the dicing imagery in verse 1.

1. I solemnly invoke helpful Agni with reverences. Seated in front, he will pull out a perfect ("hand" of dice) for us.
   I press forward as if with chariots seeking prizes. With respectful circumambulation (of Agni) might I bring to fulfillment the praise of the Maruts.
2. Those who have mounted on the famed dappled mares, on the well-naved chariots—the Rudras, the Maruts—even the trees duck down with fear of you, powerful ones. Even the earth trembles, even the mountain.
3. Even the mountain, grown great, has fear; even the back of heaven trembles at your roar.
   When you are at play, o Maruts, equipped with spears, you run toward a single goal like the waters.
4. Just like wooers coming from wealth, with golden (ornaments) they have emblazoned their bodies through their own powers.
   For splendor the very splendid ones, powerful on their chariots, all together have furnished themselves marks of greatness on their bodies.

5. Without an oldest one, without a youngest, these brothers have grown strong together for good fortune.
   Their father (was) the youth, the skillful Rudra, and Pṛśni their good-milking (mother); day-bright (are the days) for the Maruts.
6. If you are in the highest heaven, o Maruts, or in the middle one, or if you are in the lowest one, you of good fortune, from there, o Rudras, or you now, o Agni, be cognizant of this oblation of ours, when we will perform sacrifice.
7. O Maruts, affording all possessions, and Agni too—when you (Maruts) drive yourselves from higher heaven along (its) backs, exulting, boisterous—(all) you who have care for the stranger, establish a thing of value for the sacrificer who presses soma.
8. O Agni, with the Maruts, the versifiers in their beauty, drink the soma, you exulting along with those who are splendor in a flock, along with the pure Āyus who set all in motion, o Vaiśvānara, along with your age-old beacon.

V.61 (415) Maruts

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
19 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 5 and satobṛhatī 9

With its nineteen verses, this hymn is out of place by the normal rules of arrangement of the saṃhitā. It also falls into several sections on thematic grounds (vss. 1–4, 5–10, 11–16, 17–19). However, at least the first half (1–10) displays the cleverness and sly humor of Śyāvāśva, who names himself directly in verse 5 and punningly in verse 9, and perhaps represents a jeu d'esprit of the poet, appended to the more solemn Marut hymns that precede it. Note that Śyāvāśva names himself only in the first of those hymns (V.52.1) and in this last one.

The Maruts are the clear subject of verses 1–4 and 11–16, and each of these sections is followed by a dānastuti, or verses culminating in a dānastuti: 10 and 17–19. We therefore suggest that we are dealing here with two originally separate hymns, 1–10 and 11–19, and that the first at least bears clear marks of Śyāvāśva's authorship.

Since the second of these is less interesting than the first, we will discuss it first here. The six verses (11–16) treating the Maruts are fairly conventional. Verse 17 serves as a transition to the dānastuti, addressed, oddly, to the goddess Night, who is urged to carry the poet's hymns to his patron, called Dārbhya here, and Rathavīti in the following two verses. Both parts of the latter name are punned upon: ratha "chariot" in verse 17 ("like a charioteer"), -vīti "pursuit" in verse 18 in the verb form (ápa) veti "go off track," and he is praised for his generosity in general terms (19).

The first hymn is a much less staid affair. The four opening verses to the Maruts begin with questions about the Maruts and then in increasing detail about their horses and horse-tackle. And in verses 2c and 3b the Maruts are depicted as riding horseback (one of the very few pieces of evidence for this activity in the R̥gveda); in verse 2 the reference is unremarkable, but in verse 3 the men's posture on the horse reminds the poet of women spreading their thighs in sex (or possibly childbirth, though this seems less likely). From this point on the hymn takes a sexually suggestive turn. In verse 4 the Maruts are sent off with "lucky women," and we move abruptly into the second section of the hymn.

That section ends with a real dānastuti verse (10) in praise of a patron named Vaidadaśvi. We might expect the four preceding verses (5–9) to form part of the dānastuti as well, and there are prominent dānastuti-like elements in them, but they also subvert the dānastuti model or provide a counter model—not least because they concern a woman and profess the unorthodox opinion that women can be superior to men. Verse 5 introduces an unidentified woman who "gains" the sorts of things poets usually receive in dānastutis, using the root for "gain" (san) that is standard in such contexts. (The notion that a woman would be in such a position is so unusual that most translators simply translate the word as if it means "give"—though a woman who gives livestock is no more standard a figure than one who gains it.) From the second half of the verse it is clear that she must be the favored consort (perhaps even the "Favorite Wife" of later Vedic ritual) of Śyāvāśva's patron. The poet then seems to reflect (vss. 6–8) on the qualities of women in general, in contrast to men, allowing that some women may actually be better than men, especially men of bad character—and among those especially a stingy man (vss. 6, 8), who doesn't deserve to be called a man except in the technical matter of blood money (vs. 8). The tone in these verses is colloquial and conversational. After this seeming digression, with the subtle hint to his patron about the perils of stinginess, we return in verse 9 to a flesh-and-blood woman, who is working her wiles on the poet, who calls himself "Dusky" (śyāva). The verse is an elaborate pun: on the one hand she is narrating the course of a race, and the "two chestnuts" in the second half of the verse can be two horses given to the poet, "straining forward" to win. But the tone is very intimate; the "course" may be the progress of sexual intercourse between the girl and the poet, and the second half of the verse, using the same verb (ví √yam "spread apart") as in the first sexually suggestive passage in verse 4, can describe the "spreading apart" of two female body parts. The girl in verse 9 thus appears to be part of the "gift" that Śyāvāśva received for his poem, and the complex set of double meanings in this verse are certainly a worthy "praise of this gift." Is the girl in this verse the same as the one in verse 5? Śyāvāśva seems to imply this, but we will never know for sure.

1. Who are you, men, the fairest ones, who one by one have driven here from the farthest distance?
2. Where are your horses, where your reins? How have you been able? How have you driven here?
   (Where is) the seat on their back, the bridle at their nostrils?

3. (Where) the whip on their haunch? The men have spread apart their thighs (on horseback), like wives at the making of sons.
4. Go forth, heroes, you young bloods with lucky women, so that you will be hot as fire.

5. She gains livestock in horses and cows and (livestock) consisting of a hundred sheep—the one who keeps plumping up her arm as a pillow for the hero praised by Śyāvāśva.
6. Now a woman can be more reliable, better than a man if he's estranged from the gods, ungenerous—
7. While she pays attention to a famished man, or to a thirsting one, or to one who has desires [/lust], and sets her own mind upon the gods.
8. And some other guy, a niggard not deserving praise, (may be) called a "man," but he is only equivalent (to a man) in the matter of wergeld.
9. But a young woman, having beguiled (me), whispered the course to me, "Dusky" [=Śyāvāśva], face to face.
   The two chestnuts spread apart [/strained forward] for the much-rewarded one, for the inspired poet of lasting glory—
10. Whoever will give me a hundred milk-cows as Vaidadaśvi (did),
    (he is) like a victor in his munificence.

11. (The Maruts), who drive themselves with their swift horses, drinking the exhilarating honey, here they have acquired their fame.
12. With whose splendor they flash through the two world-halves on their chariots, like the bright ornament in heaven above.
13. This youthful Marutian flock with its glittering chariot is not to be scorned; charging to beauty it is unrepulsable.
14. Who now knows about them, where the shakers are reaching elation, those born of truth, unblemished?
15. You, who seek admiration, are those who lead the mortal forth with an insight right to the point, are those who listen to his invocations on your journey.
16. You who care for the stranger—roll here to us desirable, greatly shimmering goods, you who deserve the sacrifice.

17. This praise of mine, o Night, carry off to Dārbhya,
    (my) hymns (carry away) like a charioteer, o goddess.

18. And then speak for me thus to Rathavīti who has pressed the soma:
    "My desire does not go off track."
19. This Rathavīti dwells in peace, a bounteous patron throughout the cow-rich (clans) [/along the Gomatī River], set back among the mountains.

V.62 (416) Mitra and Varuṇa

Śrutavid Ātreya
9 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn calls on Mitra and Varuṇa for rain, as 3cd makes clear. Their ability to send the rain is connected with their kingship, and the poet suggests that connection in several images. The gods' throne sits "within the libations" (vss. 5, 6), which not only are the oblations made to them but also signify the rainwater. The banner that increases through their commandment (vs. 5) is the banner "of the ruler" (cf. V.69.1), and here the rain is the emblem of their kingship. Their rule is strong, supported by a thousand pillars (vs. 6), but the pillar of their throne is also the lightning (vs. 7ab) that accompanies the rain, and its foundation is in land that yields plants (vs. 7c).

Framing the rain, which is the subject of verses 2–7, is the sun (vss. 1, 8). The first verse remains mysterious. The first hemistich places Mitra and Varuṇa's "enduring truth" in the night sky or in any case, in that place where "they," most likely the gods generally, unhitch Sūrya's horses to let them pasture during the night. Yet even before dawn the poet's vision allows him to see "that One," the sun, and together with the sun, the hidden truth of the two gods. The sun may also be the "single felly" mentioned in 2d, and if so, the verse looks forward the appearance of the sun after the rain. After the invocations to the gods for rain, the sun returns to the poem once again, this time visible to all at dawn and closely associated with the golden throne of Mitra and Varuṇa.

1. Your enduring truth is hidden by truth, there where they unhitch the horses of the sun.
   Ten times a hundred [=rays of the sun?] stand together: I saw that One,
   the most splendid of the lovely forms of the gods.
2. That is surely your greatness, Mitra and Varuṇa: while standing at rest, they have given milk throughout the days.
   You two swell all the pasture's streams of milk. The single felly has turned here after you two.
3. You upheld the earth and heaven, o you two kings, Mitra and Varuṇa, by your great powers.
   Make the plants grow! Swell the cows! Send the rain gushing down, o you of lively waters!

4. Let the horses in good harness convey you here. Let them with guided reins come near to this place.
   A cloak of ghee whirls along after you. From of old, rivers flow near.
5. Guarding (the commandment) that increases your famed, broad banner, as if guarding the ritual grass with a yajus-recitation, you sit upon the throne amid the libations, o Mitra and Varuṇa of firm skill, receiving homage.
6. You are the two far-protectors with unbloodied hands for him who performs rituals well, whom you two safeguard, Varuṇa, amid the libations.
   Never becoming angry, you two kings together bear a thousand-pillared rule.
7. Metal cloaked in gold, its [=the throne's] pillar flashes in heaven like a horsewhip, anchored in the good or fruitful land. We would win honey upon your throne.
8. You two mount the throne possessing golden color at the break of dawn, (the throne) possessing a metal pillar at the rising of the sun, o Mitra and Varuṇa. From there you observe guiltlessness and guilt.
9. Your very stout, unbroken protection, which is not to be pierced, o you herdsmen of the living world, bringing good waters—with that help us, Mitra and Varuṇa. Seeking to win, may we be victorious.

V.63 (417) Mitra and Varuṇa

Arcanānas Ātreya
7 verses: jagatī

Like the previous hymn to Mitra and Varuṇa, this hymn is also a plea for monsoon rains. It gives a vivid picture of the monsoons with their thunder and lightning (vss. 5, 6) and the coming of the rain (esp. vss. 1, 4). The poet uses sound repetition, perhaps in imitation of echoing thunder or recurring lightning or perhaps simply as a demonstration of his poetic ability: 2d . . . -vī ví caranti . . . , 3b . . . vícarṣanī, 3c citrébhir . . . , 4b carati citrám . . . , 5c . . . citrā́ ví caranti . . . , 6b . . . citrā́m vadati tvíṣī- . . . , and 7d . . . -vi cítryam. . . . Also across 3ab samrā́jā ugrā́ vr̥ṣabhā́ divás pátī, pr̥thivyā́ mitrā́váruṇā vícarṣaṇī, the two lines have exactly the same metrical structure and repeated vowels in the same syllables.

The hymn several times refers to the māyā́, the "cunning" of Mitra and Varuṇa (vss. 3, 4, 6, 7), which in its first and last attestations is described as the "cunning of a lord (ásura)" (vss. 3, 7), thus connecting Mitra and Varuṇa's ability to control the rain by their cunning with their kingship. They are likewise twice called "sovereign kings" (samrā́j) (vss. 2, 3). The prefix sám- "together," signifying their unifying rule, contrasts with the repeated prefix ví- "apart," which indicates the diverse things over which they hold sovereignty. This theme is announced in 2ab, where they are called samrā́jau over the world vidáthe "in its division."

Also translated and discussed in Brereton (1981: 104–6).

1. O herdsmen of the truth, o you whose nature holds true, you two stand upon your chariot in the most distant heaven.
   For him whom you two help here, Mitra and Varuṇa, the rain swells rich in honey from heaven.
2. As sovereign kings, you two of sunlike appearance rule over this living world in its division, o Mitra and Varuṇa.
   We implore the gift that is rain, that is immortality. Thunder ranges through Heaven and Earth.
3. Sovereign kings, powerful bulls, and lords of heaven and of earth, Mitra and Varuṇa, who know no boundaries—you two approach the roar with shimmering clouds. You make heaven rain by the cunning of a lord.
4. Mitra and Varuṇa, your cunning rests upon heaven. The sun, your light, moves as a shimmering weapon.
   You hide it in heaven by cloud and by rain. O Parjanya, the honeyed drops are arising.
5. The Maruts harness their easy-running chariot for beauty, like a champion on cattle raids, o Mitra and Varuṇa.
   Thunder ranges through the shimmering air. O sovereign kings, sprinkle us with milk from heaven.
6. O Mitra and Varuṇa, Parjanya speaks his refreshment-bringing word, shimmering and shattering.
   The Maruts clothe themselves in clouds by your cunning. Make heaven rain, ruddy and spotless.
7. According to your nature, o Mitra and Varuṇa who perceive inspired words, you two guard your commandments by the cunning of a lord.
   By truth you rule over the whole living world. You place the sun here in heaven as your shimmering chariot.

V.64 (418) Mitra and Varuṇa

Arcanānas Ātreya
7 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 7

As often, the central verse of the hymn is its most enigmatic. The poet condenses this verse so that a number of interpretations are possible, all of them applicable to the situation. The word upamá, here translated "closest," might also mean "best." Indeed, most translators choose the latter interpretation, but in the verses leading up to this one, the poet constantly emphasizes the intimacy of Mitra and Varuṇa: In their arms they gather "the realm of solar glory" (vs. 1), which is likely both the celestial realm and the realm of the sacrifice. They stretch forth their arms to the sacrificers, who call on their affection (vs. 2). The sacrificers are accompanied by the protection of Mitra, "who never does injury" (vs. 3). In verse 4 the poet brings something close to the gods, although he does not state clearly what it is. In the more obvious reading it might be the sacrificial offerings and the sacrificial recitations. But it might also be gifts to the priests, or the inhabitants in the patrons' dwellings, or the talent and learning that the priests bring to the ritual performance. In short, it might be everything that is part of the sacrifice or even part of the lives of the patrons and priests.

In the final verses this theme of the closeness of Mitra and Varuṇa to the sacrificers is expressed through a number of different strategies. The simile in 7cd is particularly striking. It turns on two homophonous present stems dhāva, one of which means "run" and the other "rinse, cleanse," with the shift from one to the other signaled by the change from "feet" to "hands." This word play maintains the sense of closeness of the sacrificers and the gods, since "cleanse" refers to a typical priestly action, while "run" is the desired action of the gods. That theme continues in verses 4 and 5, in which the poet invites Varuṇa and Mitra to the dwelling of generous patrons, which is also the gods' "seat" or "abode" (vs. 5). And verse 6a begins yuvám̐ naḥ "you two for us," setting the 2nd- and 1st-person pronouns next to one another.

1. With our verse we summon for you all Mitra and Varuṇa, who cares for the stranger, who, like corrals, have encompassed the realm of solar glory in their two arms.
2. Let these two arms stretch forth with kind attention to him who chants, for again and again, in all places of the earth, I call on your benevolent affection.
3. That I might now reach the way, I would travel by the path of Mitra.
   They go together with the protection of him [=Mitra] who is dear, who never does injury.
4. Mitra and Varuṇa, with my verse I would set closest to you two what is in the dwelling of generous patrons and what serves praise singers to contend over.
5. O Mitra, (you) and Varuṇa—(come) here for us with your bright lights, here into your seat, into their own dwelling, (that) of the generous patrons, for your partners to grow strong.
6. For us, among whom you two maintain your dominion (here) and aloft, o Varuṇa—for us make wide space to win the prize for the sake of wealth and well-being.

7. While (Dawn) with her shining cattle is breaking at the (sacrifice) under divine dominion, do you two worthy of the sacrifice run to me here by foot, as if (cleansing by hand) soma pressed by priests with skilled hands, o you two superior men, as you maintain Arcanānas.

V.65 (419) Mitra and Varuṇa

Rātahavya Ātreya
6 verses: anuṣṭubh, except paṅkti 6

The poet begins by invoking himself as the "perceptive" poet (vss. 1–2), who then speaks on behalf of the sacrificers (vs. 3). The basic theme of the hymn is the request that Mitra and Varuṇa help create a peaceful dwelling place that is broad and secure for people and animals during the period that the tribe is settled. While the poet addresses both Mitra and Varuṇa, his principal address is to Mitra: Mitra alone is mentioned in verse 4, in verse 5 Varuṇa appears only as the complement of Mitra, and in verse 6 Varuṇa's presence is merely implied in the dual personal pronoun. Mitra is the god of alliances, and the reason for the focus on Mitra here is that the poet particularly wants people to occupy their proper places (vs. 6) by honoring their agreements with one another. The verb √yat "arrange" in this verse is elsewhere associated with the action of Mitra, who governs peoples through the pacts and alliances made among them.

The word mitrá can refer not only to the god Mitra but also to a mitrá, an ally, and the poet makes use of this ambiguity in verse 4. The god Mitra wins a dwelling free from threat or constraint through the power of divinely sanctioned alliances, and therefore one who is a true ally, who embodies the principles of the god of alliances, also wins such a dwelling. The connection between the god Mitra and the human ally is further suggested by verse 3, in which Mitra and Varuṇa are invoked to give out the prizes of victory, and verse 4, in which the person in a parallel fashion distributes offerings.

1. He who is perceptive has strong resolve. Let him speak among the gods for us—he whose songs beautiful Varuṇa or Mitra longs for.
2. Since these two are kings of most glorious luster and farthest fame, they are lords of the settlement, who grow through the truth and possess the truth, among every people.
3. Imploring you for help, I address you two ancient ones together:
   "Through your good perception, with your good horses, (race) toward the prizes of victory to give them out."

4. Mitra [/an ally] then wins a broad way for peaceful dwelling, even out of narrow straits, since the favor of triumphant Mitra belongs to him who distributes offerings.
5. Blameless, helped by you, we would be completely within the most extensive help of Mitra, whose complement is Varuṇa.
6. The two of you, o Mitra, arrange this people and lead them together.
   Do not overlook the generous one nor us seers. Give us wide space under your protection.

V.66 (420) Mitra and Varuṇa

Rātahavya Ātreya
6 verses: anuṣṭubh

This hymn shows similarities to the preceding hymn, attributed to the same poet. Note especially the first line, whose beginning, ā́ cikitāna sukrátū "Here are the two of strong resolve, o perceptive mortal," uses similar lexical elements as 65.1a yáś cikéta sá sukrátuḥ "He who is perceptive has strong resolve." In V.65 the poet singles out Mitra, especially in the last three verses of the hymn. Here the poet addresses Varuṇa alone in the first verse and Mitra alone in the last. This strategy has the effect of defining a beginning and ending to the hymn, but there are also thematic reasons for this distribution of divine names as well. Verse 1 mentions the "truth" (ṛtá), which is particularly associated with Varuṇa, who presides over the truth, and in verse 6 the poet hopes that his people will take their places (yátemahi) under the gods' protection. The root √yat "arrange," here in the middle voice in the sense of "take one's place," is characteristically associated with Mitra's task of "arranging" peoples according to the alliances among them, as was noted in the introduction to V.65.

Renou characterizes this hymn as a eulogy of poetic power and an ṛtá, and he is right that these are central concerns of the poet. The power of the hymn is indirectly suggested in verses 1–2. In verse 1 the hymn is "set in place" (dadhītá) in the ritual, and this act finds a social and cosmological echo in the next verse, where the rule of Mitra and Varuṇa "is set in place" (dhāyi) in the way that the sun is set in place. That is to say, in terms of the verse sequence of the poem, the hymn appears in the ritual and then the rule of the gods appears. In verses 3–4 there is an extended description of the poet's work that implicitly compares it to a raid. As they often are in the Ṛgveda, the "chariots" sought by the poet (vs. 4) may be hymns or even sacrifices that journey to the gods. In verse 5 the gods perceive the hymn of the poet, brought to them by the "beacon of the peoples." While interpreters have variously identified this beacon, we believe that it is most likely Agni (cf. V.11.2), who transports hymns and offerings to the gods.

One of the poet's strategies that makes this hymn interesting but difficult to interpret is his use of indeterminate ellipsis (cf. vss. 1, 2, 3) and obscure reference (esp. vs. 5). Verses 5–6 are the most intriguing example, because they form the climax of the hymn. In 5ab the poet dramatically declares that he will enunciate the "lofty truth," but as is often the case, this lofty truth that he expresses in 5cd is an abstruse one. By the double reference of yā́mabhiḥ to a poet's entreaties and to river courses, the words of the poet are compared to flowing streams. These streams flow over Heaven and Earth, which expand for the poet in response. In this reading of the hemistich, the masculine dual jrayasānaú "who extend" would be completed by dyā́vā or the like, "Heaven and Earth." This is suggested by the vocative pr̥thivi in 5a, echoed by pr̥thú in c, for dyā́vā regularly appears alongside the nominative pr̥thivī́, as in I.159.1, II.12.13, II.41.20, VI.11.1, VII.69.1, and VIII.72.9. But the poet's words carrying their entreaties also flow beyond to Mitra and Varuṇa, who likewise become even greater through them. Verse 6 then is a phalaśruti, a "declaration of benefit," expressing the expectation of the poet and his people that they will live safely under the rule of Mitra and Varuṇa.

1. O perceptive mortal, here are the two gods of strong resolve who care for the stranger.
   It [=the hymn] should be set in place for Varuṇa, whose garment is the truth, for his great pleasure.
2. Because these two together have achieved lordly dominion that is not overturned, so then, like the lovely sun, (their dominion) over the sons of Manu has been set in place like their commandments.
3. (We search for) you two in our quest for chariots (and for) a broad pasture-land for them.
   With our praise songs we will boldly conceive the good praise of him by whom the oblation is given,
4. Because then, you undeceivable ones, by the fortresses of your skill you perceive our verbal craft through the beacon of the peoples [=Agni], o you of purified skill.
5. O Earth, this is their lofty truth in the seers' quest for fame:
   by (the seers') entreaties they [=poetic streams] flow beyond the two [=Heaven and Earth], who rightly extend widely,
6. So that—o Mitra, o you two quick-eyed ones—we and our patrons would take our places within your very extensive, much-protecting sovereignty.

V.67 (421) Mitra and Varuṇa

Yajata Ātreya
5 verses: anuṣṭubh

This hymn emphasizes the multiplicity of the Ādityas, which the hymn connects with their presence in multiple places and their lordship among different peoples (vss. 2, 4). It invokes the Ādityas in the first verse and then Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman; in verse 2 just Varuṇa and Mitra, and then in verse 3 Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman once again. The climax comes in the last verse, which suggests that all the forms of the Ādityas culminate in Mitra or Varuṇa—or, rather, in the two of them together. We offer this interpretation tentatively since the key lines are 5ab. As the parenthetical insertions in our translation indicate, it is not clear precisely how these lines should be construed.

1. Yes indeed! It is just so, o god: the appointed place is worthy of the sacrifice and lofty, o Ādityas, o Varuṇa and Mitra, o Aryaman. You two have achieved the highest lordship.
2. O Varuṇa and Mitra, when you two take your seat upon the golden womb, as maintainers of the separate peoples, offer your favor, o you caring for the stranger.
3. Because all of them—Varuṇa, Mitra, and Aryaman—know all things, they follow their commandments like tracks. They protect the mortal from harm.
4. For they are real, touching the truth and truth-possessing among every people; they are those leading well, giving good drops [/gifts], and making a wide space even from narrow straits.
5. Now which of you two, (which) of (all your) forms, o Mitra—or (is it) Varuṇa?—is not praised?
   Thus our thought hastens to you two; from the Atris a thought hastens.

V.68 (422) Mitra and Varuṇa

Yajata Ātreya
5 verses: gāyatrī

The poet is intent on praising the expanse of Mitra and Varuṇa's power: he says they are of "great dominion" (vs. 1) and are "proclaimed among the gods" (vs. 2). Then combining their power among both gods and humans, he calls them masters over "earthly and heavenly" wealth and possessing "dominion among the gods" (vs. 3). The climax and purpose of this praise of their power on earth and in heaven is finally expressed in the last verse: they are lords of rains, which come from heaven to earth.

1. Sing forth to Mitra and to Varuṇa with your inspiration and song.
   O you two of great dominion, lofty is our truth.
2. Sovereign kings, whose womb is covered with ghee, both Mitra and Varuṇa are gods proclaimed among the gods.
3. Show us your mastery over great wealth, earthly and heavenly.
   Great is your dominion among the gods.
4. Serving the truth by the truth, they two have attained vigorous skill.
   Undeceiving, the two gods grow strong.
5. Bringing the heavens to rain and the waters to streaming, the two lords of refreshments, bringing gifts, have attained their lofty throne.

V.69 (423) Mitra and Varuṇa

Urucakri Ātreya
4 verses: triṣṭubh

In the last half of the hymn the poet connects Mitra and Varuṇa to their mother Aditi, the goddess who embodies guiltlessness. He invokes her for wealth, a continuing lineage, good fortune, and health (vs. 3). It is not clear, however, whether it is she whom the poet invokes in 3d or whether it is the two gods. The object is suppressed perhaps to create intentional ambiguity, since the gift that comes from guiltlessness is also the gift from Mitra and Varuṇa. The connection between Aditi, Mitra, and Varuṇa is confirmed in the last verse, which call them Ādityas, "sons of Aditi."

1. The three realms of light and the three heavens, the three airy spaces do you two uphold, o Varuṇa and Mitra, strengthening the emblem of your lordship, protecting your unaging commandment.
2. O Varuṇa and Mitra, your milk-cows are filled with refreshments. Your rivers give honey-rich milk.
   Three brilliant bulls [=fires?] stand far and wide, the semen-givers of the three holy places.
3. In the early morning, at midday, and at the rising of the sun, again and again I call upon the goddess Aditi for wealth in its entirety, o Mitra and Varuṇa. I invoke (her) for kith and kin, for luck and life.

4. (You) two heavenly Ādityas, who are the upholders of the earthly space and the realm of light—
   o Mitra and Varuṇa, the immortal gods do not violate your enduring commandments.

V.70 (424) Mitra and Varuṇa

Urucakri Ātreya
4 verses: gāyatrī

The most interesting question about this hymn is why Mitra and Varuṇa are here called Rudras, and the most interesting verse is the mysterious final one. Rudra is a healer but also a terrifying archer, and the purpose of the poet may be to make sure that the vengeance of Mitra and Varuṇa, which is like the fury of Rudra, be turned against his enemies. Mitra and Varuṇa should protect and rescue him and direct their anger toward the Dasyus, not toward him (vs. 3).

This observation may help us understand the last verse, although its meaning remains uncertain. As also in IV.3.13, we read the beginning of pāda a as mā́ akásya, rather than mā́ kásya with the Padapāṭha and most other interpreters. The fear expressed in ab, then, is that the poet will be destroyed and thereby become a nonentity. This fear is not only for the present, but also for the future. In pāda c the poet asks that after death he not become a nobody, a nonentity, but that in heaven his remains form a new body and that on earth his life continue in his lineage.

1. Since now there is help from you two, even in (its full) quantity and breadth,
   I have won the favor of you two, o Varuṇa and Mitra.
2. We would attain you two together, o you without deception, and your refreshment for our nurture.
   We would be such ones, o you two Rudras.
3. Protect us, Rudras, by your protections, and rescue us, since you are good rescuers.
   We in our own persons would overcome the Dasyus.
4. O you of undeceived will, may we in our own persons not endure (becoming) the specter of a nobody, neither in our remains nor in our lineage.

V.71 (425) Mitra and Varuṇa

Bāhuvr̥kta Ātreya
3 verses: gāyatrī

This and the following hymn are attributed to the same poet, and indeed have similar purposes and deploy similar techniques. Both hymns are straightforward invitations to Mitra and Varuṇa to come to the rite and to drink the soma. In V.71 the poet emphasizes his invocation to the two gods by repeating their names at the beginning of pāda b of each verse. The repetition is underlined by the fact that the names are followed in each case by just a single word completing the line, a word that has a different grammatical form and syntactic function in each verse.

1. Come here to us with might, o you caring for the stranger, o Varuṇa and Mitra,
   to this cherished rite.
2. Because you are kings of all, being masters, o attentive ones, o Varuṇa
      and Mitra,
   make our insights swell.
3. Come here toward the pressing of the pious man, o Varuṇa and Mitra, to drink of this soma.

V.72 (426) Mitra and Varuṇa

Bāhuvr̥kta Ātreya
3 verses: uṣṇih

In this hymn, which continues the themes and techniques of the preceding hymn, the poet repeats a refrain that asks the gods to be present and to receive the soma offerings. In verse 2 of this hymn he does not mention the names of the gods, as he does in the first and third verses, but rather begins pāda a with vraténa "by your commandment" and ends pāda b with yātayájjanā "who arrange the peoples." The word vratá is particularly associated with Varuṇa, both conceptually and etymologically, and √yat "arrange" describes the function of Mitra. Instead of pairing the two names, the poet has created a chiasmic pairing of the most characteristic functions of the gods.

1. Like Atri, we pour an offering to Mitra and Varuṇa with our songs.
   – Sit down upon the ritual grass to drink the soma.
2. By your commandment, you are those two who give peaceful dwellings that endure, who arrange the peoples according to your foundation.
   – Sit down upon the ritual grass to drink the soma.
3. Mitra and Varuṇa take pleasure in our sacrifice to their liking.
   – Let them sit down upon the ritual grass to drink the soma.

V.73 (427) Aśvins

Paura Ātreya
10 verses: anuṣṭubh

The central theme of the hymn is the journey of the Aśvins: their journey that encompasses the whole world and their journey to the poet's sacrifice. Geldner describes this hymn as strophic, consisting of five paired verses; this structure expresses the thematic division of the hymn.

Verses 1–2 describe the Aśvins as moving somewhere, possibly near or possibly far, but in any case the poet invites them to travel here to his sacrifice. Since the poet has begun with a reference to journeys of the Aśvins, it is not surprising that he then turns to a description of their wonderful chariot. According to the interpretation we offer here, one wheel of that chariot is the sacrificial fire (vs. 3). Behind this symbolism is likely the recurrent representation of the sacrifice as a chariot, particularly as the Aśvins' chariot. The other wheel of their chariot is the sun (vs. 4). Running on these two wheels the Aśvins both range over the whole world and are present at the sacrifice.

Verses 5–6 are connected by the theme of heat, and as in the case of the two wheels, one form of heat is cosmic, the other form ritual. In verse 5 Sūryā, the daughter of the Sun, mounts the chariot of the Aśvins, which drives onward ahead of the rising, burning sun. In verse 6 what is called gharmá "hot" is either the Pravargya pot, in which the milk for the Aśvins is heated, or the hot milk itself. While verse 5 refers primarily to the sun and verse 6 to the Pravargya rite, there is also a secondary, implied reference to the ritual in verse 5 and to the sun in verse 6. The motif of Sūryā's mounting the Aśvins' chariot is always a courtship or wedding image. Here in verse 5 she may be brought as bride to Soma (cf. X.85), who is, of course, at the center of the rite.

Because the interpretation of 8ab is uncertain, the connection between verses 7–8 is less clear than in the other pairs of verses. In verse 7 the horse thunders as he brings the Aśvins to the rite at the invitation of Atri, who may be not the Atri of legend but his present or future descendant. In verse 8ab the subject is suppressed, and various interpreters have suggested various possibilities: the Aśvins' honeyed whip (Geldner), the hymn (Sāyaṇa, Geldner, cf. VIII.6.43), a cow (Pirart 2001: 243–44, cf. II.16.8). It could even be the "thundering" of the lead horse from the previous verse. We have left the identification unclear, although a reference to the hymn (dhī́) in one way or another appears to us likely. The balance between the Aśvins' presence in the cosmos and in the rite is repeated in 8cd, which describes the Aśvins' journey across the seas and the ritual offerings made to them.

The concluding verses then restate the theme of the Aśvins' journey throughout the world and explicitly connect that journey to the ritual, since they compare the hymns that bring the Aśvins to chariots.

1. Whether today you two are far distant, whether close by, o Aśvins, or whether—o you who bring many enjoyments many times—
   (you are) in the midspace, come here.
2. Here are these two who appear most often, bringing their many wondrous powers.
   With longing for space, I beseech the pair who are not poor. I call upon the two most powerful ones to give enjoyment.

3. You maintain at rest your chariot's one wheel [=the sacrificial fire], the marvel to be marveled at.
   With the other (wheel) [=the sun?] you fly around the generations of the descendants of Nahuṣa and the airy regions by your greatness.
4. And that is accomplished by this (chariot) of yours—(that act) of yours which is praised throughout all (generations):
   Born separately, faultless, you two together have come to kinship with us.

5. When Sūryā mounts your ever swift-running chariot, your ruddy birds keep its [=the sun's] glowing heat from burning.
6. O you men, Atri will be attentive to you two with his good thought and attention, when he scurries toward your faultless hot(-vessel) with his mouth, o Nāsatyas.

7. Your powerful lead horse is moving. Its thundering is heard on its journeys, o Aśvins, when Atri will turn it here along with your wondrous powers, you men.
8. The one that swells with honey follows you two closely, o you honey-seeking Rudras.
   When you two will cross beyond the seas, they [=priests] bring cooked foods to you.

9. It is really true, o Aśvins: they call you joy itself.
   On their journey these two are the most often summoned on the journey; here on their journey they are the most merciful.
10. Let these strengthening formulations for the Aśvins be most luck-bringing—these that we fashion like chariots. We have spoken lofty reverence.

V.74 (428) Aśvins

Paura Ātreya
10 verses: anuṣṭubh

The hymn opens with the poet wondering where the Aśvins can be (vs. 1). Are they with another people (vs. 2)? Or to whom are they traveling (vs. 3)? The poet wishes them to come to Atri—as in the last hymn, the poet himself (vs. 1)—and to seek out his poetic formulations (vs. 3), not those of others. Several verses later, the poet returns once more to beg the Aśvins' attention (vs. 6), to ask again whose inspired poetry and sacrifices have attracted the Aśvins (vs. 7), and to urge them to come to him (vss. 8–10). The last verse of the hymn echoes the first: verse 1 asks where the Aśvins are (kū́ ṣṭhaḥ) and whether they will hear the poet (śravathaḥ); verse 10 addresses them wherever they are (kárhi cid) and anticipates that they will hear him (śuśrūyā́tam). Also, in the first verse the poet addresses the Aśvins as manāvasū "whose goods are zeal"—that is, as those who bring vigor and passion to sacrificers—and vṛṣaṇvasū "whose goods are bull-like," but in the last he speaks not of goods that the Aśvins bring but rather of the "good benefits" (vásvīḥ... bhújaḥ) the Aśvins will receive, thus reversing the beneficiaries of the goods.

How the internal verses set within this frame are connected to the rest of the hymn is not clear. They tell how the Aśvins rescued Paura from real or metaphorical waters (vs. 4) and Cyavāna from old age and impotence (vs. 5). The story of Paura, whom the Anukramaṇī identifies as the poet of the hymn, is told elliptically. There is a cryptic etymological play on Paura's name in 4ab that suggests that Paura had lost the prosperity that was his by right, or at least by name, but that he was restored to "muchness" by the Aśvins. Unfortunately, the meaning of paurá is not secure and therefore neither is this interpretation. This word play on paurá is set within a causal hí-clause, which normally would be dependent but here apparently is not, and it is then followed by an incomplete dependent clause, which lacks both subject and verb. The abstract dative gr̥bhītátātaye "for captivity" suggests supplying a verb derived from √gr̥bh "capture"—"they capture him" or the like—but this interpretation is not at all secure. Is the fragmented syntax an icon of the desperate situation that the Aśvins were able to redress?

1. Where in heaven are you today, o divine Aśvins whose goods are zeal?
   Will you hear this, o you whose goods are bull-like? Atri is trying to win you.
2. Where are these two? Where are they famed—the Nāsatyas, the two gods in heaven?
   Among what people do you take your place? Which of you two is in company with rivers?
3. To whom do you journey? To whom do you come? Toward whom do you harness your chariot?
   In whose formulations do you delight? We wish you to seek (ours).
4. For you two bring to life even Paura, who was swimming in the waters, for the sake of "muchness" (paurá), o (you who are) "Muchness" itself, when him for captivity, like a lion in the track of deceit...
5. You remove the covering like a cloak from Cyavāna, who had become old;
   as a youth—since you two made him so again—he meets the desire of his wife.
6. Because your praise singer is here and we have in our sights (to see) your splendor, now hear me and come with help, o you whose goods are prizewinners.

7. Which of the many mortals has won you two today for himself?
   Which inspired poet, o you conveyed by inspiration? Who with his sacrifices, you whose goods are prizewinners?
8. Let your chariot, fastest traveling of chariots, travel here, Aśvins, even across the many (regions), as it seeks us—(it is) the praise song among mortals here.
9. Let our celebration of you be our luck, o honey-seekers.
   Like a pair of falcons fly this way with your birds, o discerning ones.
10. Aśvins, when you should hear this call anywhere, good benefits are yours and nourishments nourish you.

V.75 (429) Aśvins

Avasyu Ātreya
9 verses: paṅkti

Two themes dominate this hymn. One, announced at the beginning of the first verse, is the chariot of the Aśvins, which conveys the gods to the sacrificial place. The other is the call of the poet, the theme of the hymn's refrain. The two are intimately connected, since the purpose of the poet's praise is to bring the Aśvins on their chariot to the sacrificial ground. In verse 2 the poet imagines the chariot passing by the hymns of other sacrificers that claim to win the Aśvins and continuing on toward his sacrifice. Because the hymn is leading the Aśvins toward the poet, the voice of the poet rides on the chariot (vs. 4), and the Aśvins' horses are harnessed by the thought of the poet (vs. 6). In 7cd the Aśvins are invoked to travel tiráś cid "even across," but it is not clear across what. Geldner (and others, see Pirart 2001: 290–92) suggests a haplology of aryáḥ* because of the following aryayā́. In this interpretation, the line could mean "even across what belongs to the stranger" or "even across the strangers" or the like. By contrast, we interpret pāda c as a recollection of 2b and therefore supply the phrase "all those 'I shall win'-s." But in either case the Aśvins are again asked not to be seduced by the hymns and sacrifices of others, but to drive by them, heeding the poet's summons to his sacrifice.

1. The most loved chariot—a bull and a vehicle for goods—does your praise singer, the seer, attend upon with his praise, o Aśvins.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
2. Journey here, Aśvins, beyond and across all those "I shall win"-s. o you wondrous ones with golden tracks, with good favor, with the Sindhu as your vehicle.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
3. Bringing treasures to us, Aśvins, come here, both of you, o Rudras with golden tracks, whose goods are prizewinners, since you are pleased.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.

4. The musical (voice) of him having good rhythm is set upon your chariot, o you whose goods are bull-like, and your wild animal of marvelous form [=the sacrificial fire?], your lead horse, creates nourishments.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
5. As vigorous charioteers of attentive mind hearing a summons, with your birds (as your team) you run down unduplicitous Cyavāna.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
6. Men, let your horses harnessed by thought, frothing at the mouth, let your birds carry you here, together with your good favors, to drink (soma), Aśvins.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
7. Aśvins, come here to this place. Nāsatyas, do not lose the track.
   Even beyond (all those "I shall win"-s) in the search for your compatriot, journey around your course, o undeceivable ones.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
8. In this sacrifice, o undeceivable lords of beauty, you attend to the singer seeking help as he sings—both of you, Aśvins.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.
9. Dawn with her glowing herds has appeared. Agni has been installed at the right ritual moment.
   The immortal chariot has been harnessed for you, o wondrous ones whose goods are bull-like.
   – O honey-rich ones, hear my summons.

V.76 (430) Aśvins

Atri Bhauma
5 verses: triṣṭubh

In the later ritual the Hotar recites this hymn in the evening as the Adhvaryu and his assistants fan the fire to heat the Pravargya vessel. Verse 1 refers directly to the hot milk oblation offered to the Aśvins in the Pravargya ritual, but, as Houben (2000: 10) observes, the hymn itself indicates the dawn as the time of its recitation. Time is a central theme of the hymn: it is now that the Aśvins are praised (vs. 2), and at present the oblation is extended to the Aśvins (vs. 3). The Aśvins should respond to the praise and the offering because they come at all times, both day and night (vss. 2, 3). Because of the present offering and the ever-presence of the Aśvins, the poet hopes for the Aśvins' "present help" (vs. 5).

Although perhaps not as strongly, the poet puts a similar emphasis on place. The Aśvins should "journey here" (vs. 1, 3), where they are praised (vs. 2), for this is their place, home, house, and dwelling (vs. 4). The result is that wealth and good fortune will be here (vs. 5).

1. Agni shines toward the face of Dawn. The words of inspired poets, traveling to the gods, have arisen.
   Now, o you two charioteers, directed this way, journey here toward this hot-(vessel) swelling (with milk), Aśvins.
2. The best who come, they do not compromise the (offering) prepared (for them). Near and now the Aśvins are praised with songs here as the best who come with help by day and at the evening mealtime, in response to trouble and as the best luck for the pious man.
3. And journey here at the ingathering of cattle and at the early morning of the day, at midday and at the rising of the sun, and by day and at night with your most luck-bringing help. Does the drink not right now stretch to the Aśvins?
4. For from of old this is your place, your home. This is your house, Aśvins, this your dwelling.
   Journey here to us from lofty heaven and mountain, here from the waters, carrying refreshment and nourishment.
5. – May we come together with the present help of the Aśvins, which is joy itself and provides good guidance.
   Here to us bring wealth and here heroes, you two immortals, and here all that brings good fortune.

V.77 (431) Aśvins

Atri Bhauma
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Like the preceding one, this hymn is attributed to Atri, and shares with it the same meter and same final verse. The hymn refers to the Aśvins in the third person in every verse except the central one (3), when the poet turns to the Aśvins and addresses them directly, describing to them the chariot that brings them to his sacrifice. The description of the chariot compares or even identifies this chariot with the sacrifice, since "golden-skinned, honey-colored, ghee-backed, and carrying nourishments" can easily describe the sacrificial fire.

The time of the Aśvins' arrival is the particular concern of the poet. They are the gods prātaryā́vaṇā "who journey in the early morning," and the poet insists that his hymn and offerings are given at the right time. They are not given too early when it is still dark, for the evening is the wrong time to make the offerings (vs. 2ab)—although whether it is the wrong time in general or the wrong time for the Aśvins in particular is unsure. Likewise, unlike others he does not make his offerings too late, after dawn has already broken (2cd). The "ungenerous vulture" in 1cd is probably a sacrificer who gave too few offerings too late.

1. Sacrifice to the first ones, the two who journey in the early morning.
   They will drink before the ungenerous vulture [=rival sacrificer].
   Since the Aśvins receive the sacrifice in the early morning, the poets proclaim them as those who receive the first portion.
2. Sacrifice to them in the early morning, urge on the Aśvins: there is no (sacrifice) in the evening, (when it is) displeasing for it to travel to the gods.
   And it is the other one, not us, who sacrifices when dawn has (already) come: the earlier the sacrificer, the greater his gain.
3. Golden-skinned, honey-colored, ghee-backed, and carrying nourishments, your chariot turns here, swift as thought and fleet as the wind, by which you journey beyond all difficult ways, o Aśvins.
4. Who has toiled most for the Nāsatyas and will give the most pleasing (offering) at the distribution of food, he carries his offspring across by his labors. He would ever pass beyond those who do not raise their radiance on high.
5. – May we come together with the present help of the Aśvins, which is joy itself and provides good guidance.
   Here to us bring wealth and here heroes, you two immortals, and here all that brings good fortune.

V.78 (432) Aśvins

Saptavadhri Ātreya
9 verses: uṣṇih 1–3, triṣṭubh 4, anuṣṭubh 5–9

In the normal arrangement, hymns of more verses precede those of fewer verses, but this hymn of nine verses follows hymns of five, a discrepancy that suggests that this hymn is either a later addition to the collection or a composite, created of originally separate hymns, or both. Formally and thematically it appears to be a composite. It uses three different meters, unevenly divided among its verses. The first three verses, which invite the Aśvins to the soma-pressing, are all in the same meter, begin with an invocation to the Aśvins, and have a common refrain. They thus form a coherent piece. The last three verses, likewise in the same meter, are an incantation to facilitate childbirth at the proper time. Verse 7 apparently addresses the father of the child, verse 8 the child himself, and verse 9 the Aśvins or whatever other powers might help the childbirth. As Pirart (2001: 330–31) notes, this incantation has parallels at Atharvaveda Śaunaka I.11.6 and Vājasaneyisaṃhitā Mādhyaṃdina VIII.28.

The middle three verses provide a transition from the invocation in verses 1–3 to the incantation in verses 7–9. Verse 4, which alone is in triṣṭubh meter, continues to ask the Aśvins to come, but they are to come not to attend the soma rite but to bring help, as they did when they rescued Atri. Atri's situation, stuck within the earth cleft and unable to come out, is compared to that of a woman in need, probably a woman in a difficult pregnancy whose child does not come out. Then verses 5–6 likewise compare the situation of Saptavadhri. He too is stuck and needs to be set free by the Aśvins, and his release is similarly compared to the opening of the womb so that a child may be born. The details of Saptavadhri's difficulty and even Saptavadhri's identity are unclear—he appears to be Atri in X.39.9 but elsewhere he is a different seer. According to Sāyaṇa he was trapped in small wooden casket from which the Aśvins set him free, but this narrative is likely a commentarial invention.

The entrapment of these seers, already compared in the telling to the situation of a woman in labor, not only introduce the incantation in the last verses, but also provide paradigmatic narratives for the birth of the child. As the Aśvins released these seers, so they will release the child from the body of his mother.

1. O Aśvins, come here! O Nāsatyas, do not lose the track!
   – Like wild geese, fly here to the soma-pressings.
2. O Aśvins, like antelopes, like buffaloes searching after pasturage, like wild geese, fly here to the soma-pressings.
3. O Aśvins, whose goods are prizewinners, take pleasure in our sacrifice to your liking.
   – Like wild geese, fly here to the soma-pressings.

4. As when Atri, sinking down into the earth cleft, called upon you again and again, like a young woman in need (at childbirth), now by the very speed of a falcon, come here, Aśvins, with your most luck-bringing (help).
5. O tree, spread apart, like the womb of a woman about to give birth.
   Hear my call, Aśvins, and free Saptavadhri.
6. For the seer Saptavadhri, who is fearful and in need, o Aśvins, you bend the tree together and apart by your cunning.

7. As the wind sways a lotus-pond in every direction, so let your unborn child stir. Let him in his tenth month come out.
8. As the wind, as the forest, as the ocean stirs, so you in your tenth month—descend together with the afterbirth.
9. Having lain for ten months within his mother, let the boy come out, alive and unharmed—alive from his living mother.

V.79 (433) Dawn

Satyaśravas Ātreya
10 verses: paṅkti

A hymn with a remarkably unwavering focus on material gain. Since the priestly gifts (dakṣiṇā) are distributed at the dawn ritual, the goddess Dawn is often associated with wealth and giving, but here very little attention is given to any other aspect of the goddess. The tone is set by the increasingly monotonous refrain: "o well-born lady, liberal with horses." Several patrons are named in the first verses (1–3), and the poet hopes that patrons in general will be the recipients of Dawn's bounty, in order for them to redistribute it to the poets (4–8).

The usual attention to Dawn's beauty, her first appearance, her journey, her cows, and so forth is entirely missing in this hymn, which does, however, contain one striking image, in verse 9. Why a laggard Dawn would be compared to a thief isn't entirely clear, but it is quite possibly because thieves worked at night.

1. Awaken us today for great wealth, o Dawn, as heaven-bright one, just as you also awakened us at Satyaśravas Vāyya's
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
2. You who dawned forth at Sunītha Śaucadratha's, o Daughter of Heaven, dawn forth at the mightier Satyaśravas Vāyya's
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
3. As one bringing goods hither, dawn forth for us today, o Daughter of Heaven—you who dawned forth at the mightier Satyaśravas Vāyya's
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
4. The (oblation-)conveyors who greet you with praises, far-radiant one—those very splendid ones (will become) possessed of gifts and lovely presents, through your bounties, o bounteous one
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
5. For whenever these throngs appear to you (fit) for the giving of bounties, eager, they surround those who give immoderate benefit [=patrons]
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
6. Upon them confer glory in heroes, bounteous Dawn—upon the patrons, who, bounteous (themselves), have granted us immoderate benefits
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
7. To them bring lofty brilliance and glory, o bounteous Dawn, to the patrons who apportion to us benefits consisting of horses and cows
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
8. And bring to us refreshments along with cows, o Daughter of Heaven, simultaneously with the rays of the sun, with his glittering, gleaming beams
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.
9. Dawn forth, Daughter of Heaven. Don't keep dragging out your work over a long time, lest the sun scorch you with his beam as (he might) a swindling thief
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.

10. So much you ought to give, o Dawn, or more—you who, as you dawn, far-radiant one, do not dwindle for the praisers
 – o well-born lady, liberal with horses.

V.80 (434) Dawn

Satyaśravas Ātreya
6 verses: triṣṭibh

Although this hymn is attributed to the same poet as V.79 by the Anukramaṇī, it is entirely different in tone. Dawn's association with wealth is mentioned in verse 3, but the focus is first on her journey (vss. 1–3) and then, in the second half of this brief hymn (vss. 4–6), on the beauty of her body as it is slowly revealed in the growing light, in images of delicate sensuality.

Each verse but the first begins with the emphatic pronoun eṣā́ "she," and there is no doubt that "she" is all that matters in the hymn.

1. The lofty one whose course is brilliant, who is truthful through her truth, whose breath is ruddy, who is widely radiant, goddess Dawn who brings the sun here—in response to her do the inspired poets awaken with their poetic thoughts.
2. She, worthy to be seen, awakening the people, making the paths easy to travel, drives in the vanguard with a lofty chariot, herself lofty, setting all in motion. Dawn extends her light in the vanguard of the days.
3. She, after hitching up with her ruddy cows, without fail has produced her wealth unremittingly.
 Blazing paths for good passage, the goddess, praised by many, bringing all valuables, radiates widely.
4. She, the dappled one, becomes doubly exalted as she reveals her body in the east.
 She follows along the path of truth, straight to the goal. Like one who knows the way, she does not confound the directions.
5. She, like a beauty who knows her own body, has stood up erect like a bather for us to see.
 Thrusting away hatred and the shades of darkness, Dawn, the Daughter of Heaven, has come here with her light.
6. She, the Daughter of Heaven, facing toward men, lets her breast spill over like a fortunate young wife, disclosing desirable things to the pious. The young woman has created light once again, as before.

V.81 (435) Savitar

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
5 verses: jagatī

The Anukramaṇī attributes both this and the next hymn, also to Savitar, to Śyāvāśva, the poet of the Marut cycle in this maṇḍala, and indeed the poet names himself at the end of the last verse (5). However, the subject of Savitar does not seem to have inspired him to the same poetic heights as the Maruts did. The hymn depicts Savitar as a power in the cosmos (especially vss. 2–5), but also as a poet and distributor of benefits to mortals (1–2ab).

1. They hitch up their mind and they hitch up their insights—the inspired poets attentive to the poetic inspiration of the lofty inspired poet.
   He distributes the ritual offerings as the only one who knows the patterns. Great is the encircling praise of Savitar.
2. The sage poet fastens all forms upon himself. He has impelled benefit to the two-footed and the four-footed.
   He has looked out across the firmament—Savitar worthy to be chosen. He rules following the lead of Dawn.
3. Whose lead the others have followed: the gods (following) the might of the god with their power; who measured out the earthly (spaces)—he, the steed [/Etaśa], (also) measured out the (heavenly) spaces with his greatness: god Savitar.
4. And you travel, Savitar, through the three luminous realms, and you are at home with the rays of the sun.
   And you encircle the night on both sides, and you become Mitra [/an ally], o god, through your supports.
5. And you are master over impulsion, just you alone, and you become Pūṣan through your journeys.
   And you rule over all this world here. Śyāvāśva has achieved his praise for you, Savitar.

V.82 (436) Savitar

Śyāvāśva Ātreya
9 verses: gāyatrī, except anuṣṭubh 1, arranged in tr̥cas

Structuring this hymn is an insistent pun on the name of Savitar (“the Impeller”) derived from the root sū “impel”: there are eight separate verbal and nominal forms of this root in the hymn. Savitar is also identified as the Apportioner (Bhaga), who often elsewhere appears as a separate divinity though regularly associated with Savitar, and what he is urged to impel is, for the most part, a good portion for us.

1. This we choose of Savitar's: the sustenance of the god—the Apportioner's best vanquishing power, which best confers wholeness—(that) would we acquire.
2. For of this Savitar here—his own very self-glorious self-sovereignty they do not confound in any way.
3. Because he, Savitar the Apportioner, will impel treasures to the pious, we beg him for the brilliant portion.

4. Today, god Savitar, you have impelled to us a good portion consisting of offspring.
   Impel away the bad dream.
5. All difficulties impel away, god Savitar.
   What is beneficial, that impel here to us.
6. (If we are) without offense to Aditi, at the impulsion of god Savitar might we acquire all things of value.

7. With our hymns we choose today the one with all the gods in his charge, the lord of settlements,
   whose impulsion comes true: Savitar.
8. Who goes in front of both these two day-halves unremittingly and with good intentions: god Savitar.
9. Who makes all these creatures hearken with his signal-call and will impel (them) forth: Savitar.

V.83 (437) Parjanya

Atri Bhauma
10 verses: triṣṭubh 1, 5–8, 10, jagatī 2–4, anuṣṭubh 9

Parjanya ("Thunder") is the subject of only three hymns in the R̥gveda. This lovely hymn, much translated, is reminiscent of the Marut hymns in this maṇḍala, though not ascribed to the same poet. (The Maruts are addressed here in vs. 6.) Vivid images of the power of the thunderstorm are mingled with expressions of thanks for the fructifying effects of the accompanying rains, depicted as sexual in nature. In the last verse the poet describes all the good Parjanya has done, but gently urges him to desist.

1. Address the powerful one with these hymns. Praise Parjanya. With reverence seek to entice him here.
   The constantly roaring bull of lively drops deposits his semen as embryo in the plants.
2. He smashes apart the trees and also smashes the demons. All creation fears him who has the mighty weapon.
   And (even) the blameless one shrinks from the one of bullish powers, when Parjanya, thundering, smashes those who do ill.

3. Like a charioteer lashing out at his horses with a whip, he reveals his rain-bearing messengers.
   From afar the thunderings of the lion rise up, when Parjanya produces his rain-bearing cloud.
4. The winds blow forth; the lightning bolts fly. The plants shoot up; the sun swells.
   Refreshment arises for all creation, when Parjanya aids the earth with his semen.
5. At whose commandment the earth bobs up and down, at whose commandment the hoofed (livestock) quivers, at whose commandment the plants take on all forms—you, Parjanya—extend to us great shelter.
6. Grant us rain from heaven, o Maruts; make the streams of the bullish stallion swell forth.
   (Parjanya,) come nearby with this thundering, pouring down the waters as the lord, our father.
7. Roar! Thunder! Set an embryo! Fly around with your water-bearing chariot.
   Drag the water-skin unleashed, facing downward. Let uplands and lowlands become alike.
8. The great bucket—turn it up, pour it down. Let the brooks, unleashed, flow forward.
   Inundate Heaven and Earth with ghee. Let there be a good watering hole for the prized cows.
9. When, o Parjanya, constantly roaring, thundering you smash those who do ill, all of this here, whatever is on the earth, rejoices in response.
10. You have rained rain: (now) hold it back. You have made the wastelands able to be traversed.
    You have begotten the plants for nourishment, and you have found (this?) inspired thought for the creatures.

V.84 (438) Earth

Atri Bhauma
3 verses: anuṣṭubh

This tiny hymn is attributed to the same poet as the preceding hymn to Parjanya and complements that hymn. The poem is a sort of riddle: the first verse establishes that Earth is the addressee, and in the next verse the address to a feminine being (the word “earth” is feminine in gender and conceived of as female) continues. But none of the characteristics mentioned in that verse seem particularly Earth-like. She is addressed as oscillating and silvery; she is associated with the nights; she "flings" moisture. The riddle is—under what circumstances could Earth be so described? The answer: under the darkness of the monsoon clouds, when thunder causes her to shake (thus "oscillating"; see V.83.5) and she is "silvery" with rain, which she "flings" in the forms of streams and rivulets down her slopes, mentioned in verse 1. This solution was adumbrated by Thieme (1964: 58) and is discussed further in Jamison (2013).

If the audience doesn't solve the riddle in verse 2, verse 3 provides the answer.

1. Yes indeed! (It is) just so: you bear the pressure of the mountains, o Earth,
   as you bring the ground to life with your greatness, o gently sloping great one.
2. Praises sound in response to you, oscillating lady, through the nights, as you fling the swelling moisture forward like a (horse) neighing for a prize, silvery one—
3. You who, steadfast yourself, keep fast the trees all across the earth by your strength, when the lightning bolts of the dark cloud and the rains from heaven rain for you.

V.85 (439) Varuṇa

Atri Bhauma
8 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is often admired and translated because of its grand vision of Varuṇa as a creator god (vss. 1–6) and as a god who forgives the faults of human beings (vss. 7–8). But what is the connection between these two sides of Varuṇa? The poet joins the two functions of Varuṇa formally by the repetition of the accented preverb ví-, meaning "out," "apart," or the like. In fashioning the world and sustaining life, Varuṇa "split apart" (ví… jaghā́na, 1c), "stretched out" (ví… tatāna, 2a), "soaks" (vy ùnatti, 3d), and "measured out" (ví mamé, 5d). All this leads up to the plea that Varuṇa "unbind" (ví ṣya, 8c) the wrongs that people commit. With their sense of opening up and freeing, the verbal compounds with ví- create not only a verbal connection between Varuṇa's cosmogonic and redemptive acts, but a logical one as well. On the cosmological plane Varuṇa spread out the world beneath the sun (vs. 1cd), stretched out the midspace (vs. 2ab), and lets loose the rain (vss. 3–4) and the rivers (vs. 6). Analogously, on the moral plane he loosens the fetters that people's evildoing would otherwise create (vs. 8). Thus the hymn is dominated by the name of Varuṇa, which occurs in every verse except one (vs. 6) and the preverb ví-. Even where these do not appear, the poet echoes váruṇa and ví- throughout the hymn by repeating words containing -v- and, especially, beginning with v-, for example, váneṣu and vā́jam opening 2a and 2b, téna víśvasya and yávaṃ ná vr̥ṣṭír ví at the beginning of 3c and 3d, váruṇo vāṣṭi in 4b, vasata and vīrā́ḥ in 4c and 4d, and so forth.

In all of this, verse 6 is anomalous, since it does not mention Varuṇa by name and does not contain ví- or even a word beginning with v-. It is generally more difficult to explain why something does not occur than why something does, but the position and content of the verse suggest possible reasons for these omissions. First, the verse may be marked, albeit by absence, because it is the transitional verse from the cosmological themes of the first part of the hymn to the redemptive one of the last two verses. Second, the theme of the verse is the mystery of the god. Its center is the paradox in 6cd that the "sea"—whatever body of water is meant by that—never fills despite the waters flooding into it. The opening line of the verse mentions Varuṇa's māyā́, his "cunning," and calls him the kavítama, "the foremost sage poet," the one who best knows and best articulates what he knows. The poet may have suppressed overt mention of Varuṇa's name to indicate the impenetrability of his power and mind.

1. Chant forth to the sovereign king a lofty and deep formulation, dear to famed Varuṇa, who, like a butcher an animal hide, split apart the earth to form an underlayer for the sun.
2. He stretched out the midspace upon the trees, the prize of victory in the steeds, the milk in the ruddy (cows);
   Varuṇa placed resolve in hearts, fire in waters, the sun in heaven, and soma on the stone.
3. Varuṇa has poured out the cask with its opening below upon the two world-halves and the midspace.
   By this he is king of the whole living world. Like rain the barley, he soaks the land.
4. He soaks the land, the earth, and heaven. When Varuṇa wishes milk to flow, then surely it does:
   the mountains cloak themselves with the rain cloud; showing their might, the heroes [=the Maruts?] let themselves loose.
5. I proclaim this great cunning of the lordly, famed Varuṇa, who, standing in the midspace as if with a measuring rod, measured out earth with the sun.
6. And now no one defies this great cunning of the foremost sage poet, the god:
   that the mottled streams, pouring out, do not fill the single sea with water.
7. O Varuṇa, the offense that we have committed against any partner, be he one by alliance or one by custom, or against a brother, or against a neighbor—whether native or foreign—o Varuṇa, loosen that.

8. If (we have cheated) as gamblers cheat in a dice game, whether overtly or whether we are unaware, unbind all these things (so they will be) like loose things, o god. Then would we be dear to you, Varuṇa.

V.86 (440) Indra and Agni

Atri Bhauma
6 verses: anuṣṭubh, except virāṭpūrvā 6

Although Agni and Indra separately receive the largest number of R̥gvedic hymns of any of the gods, they have little to do with each other conceptually or ritually, and the relatively few hymns they share (eleven in all) tend either to be banal, boiler-plate hymns without much content, or else ones favoring one or the other of the gods. There are elements of both types in this hymn. On the one hand, Indra and Agni are invoked as a pair through much of the hymn with fairly all-purpose phraseology. On the other, the two exploits described (in 1cd and the very difficult 3cd, the middle of the hymn) are Indraic: the first a clear reference to the Vala myth, though with Trita, not Indra, as hero; the second a reference to the Vr̥tra myth, with some curious features, especially the unidentified wooden object.

1. Indra and Agni, the mortal whom you both help in the prize-contests, that one splits open even the fastnesses to (reach) their brilliant (contents), as Trita (did) the voices (of the cows? of the rivers?).
2. You two who are difficult to surpass in battles, who are worthy of fame at the prize-contests, who sur(mount) the five domains—these two, Indra and Agni, we invoke.
3. Vehement is the force of those two bounteous ones, sharp their missile.
With the wooden (weapon?) in the hands of the Vr̥tra-smasher he [=Vr̥tra-smashing Indra] goes questing (in his quest) for cattle.
4. In our quest for chariots we call upon you two, Indra and Agni, the two lords of powerful generosity, the knowing ones who most long for hymns.
5. The two, growing strong through the days, the two gods undeceptive to the mortal, just these two do I set in front, the two gods like portions for a steed, though themselves deserving (portions).
6. Thus to Indra and Agni this forceful oblation [/invocation] has been offered, like ghee purified by stones.
You two, fix lofty fame fast in the patrons, wealth in the singers—fix refreshment in the singers.

V.87 (441) Maruts

Evayāmarut Ātreya
9 verses: atijagatī

This final hymn of Maṇḍala V is clearly an addition to the original collection, and it is composed in an unusual lyric meter found only in this hymn and a few scattered verses in the rest of the saṃhitā, consisting of five pādas arranged in two half-verses: 12 12 / 12 8 8. (It is convenient here to place the final two pādas on a separate verse line.) The end of the first hemistich of each verse is marked by the unusual formation evayā́marut, which serves as an internal refrain, syntactically unconnected to the rest of the verse. This word is aberrantly formed, and our translation reflects what we consider its intent, rather than a literal value. (The Anukramaṇī names Evayāmarut as the poet of this hymn, but the name is obviously secondarily derived from the refrain. We would not be surprised if Śyāvāśva was responsible for this playful Marut hymn.) Indeed, the syntax is lax in a number of verses, which appear to be constructed of metrical phrases with internal syntactic unity but loosely strung together.

In terms of content the most striking feature is the close association between the god Viṣṇu and the Maruts. The Maruts are mentioned with Viṣṇu in other places in the R̥gveda, but not in such a sustained fashion as here. The thematic connection between them is not entirely clear, but Viṣṇu's famous three strides from earth to heaven, via the midspace, do remind us of the ever-journeying Maruts, who generally inhabit the midspace but are found also both in heaven and on earth.

1. Let your thoughts go forth to mighty, mountain-born Viṣṇu, accompanied by the Maruts—Maruts on the march—to the troop worshiped at the beginning of the sacrifice, well-spangled, powerful, fortunate in their quest, of boisterous commandment, (who are) strength (itself).
2. Who—(both) those produced by might and those self(-produced)— proclaim (their strength) with their know-how—Maruts on the march—with regard to your will—its strength, o Maruts, is not to be assailed; with regard to their giving, their might—that (strength) is like unassailable mountains.
3. Who are heard from lofty heaven through a hymn [/on the mountain], beautifully blazing, good in their essence—Maruts on the march—in whose seat no meddler holds sway—flashing out by themselves like fires—(the chariots?) of the boisterous ones (go) forth streaming.
4. The wide-striding one [=Viṣṇu] has stridden forth from the great common seat—Maruts on the march.
 When from his own (seat) upon the (mountains') backs he has hitched up by himself

the competitors of extensive might, he goes, growing strong with kindness, with the superior men.

5. Vehement like your roar, the driving turbulent forceful bull [=Viṣṇu] sets (the earth) atremble—Maruts on the march—with whom the victorious self-luminous ones stretch out straight—the golden ones possessing taut reins, good weapons, arrows.
6. Your might has no further shore, o you whose strength has grown. Let your turbulent strength be of aid—Maruts on the march—for, in the sight of all, you are firm-mounted (charioteers) in the onslaught.
   Deliver us from insult, (you who are) like blazing fires.
7. Let these Rudras, good battlers, like fires powerfully brilliant, be of aid—Maruts on the march.
   Long and broad the earthly seat spreads out, when at the drives of them, whose offenses are beyond harm, the troops of great (Viṣṇu) ap(proach).
8. Without hatred, come on your way to us here, Maruts. Hear the call of the singer—Maruts on the march.
   O you of equal spirit, along with great Viṣṇu, like charioteers with wondrous skill, keep hatreds far away in the distance.
9. Come to our sacrifice, you worthy of the sacrifice, with its good labor. Hear the call in undemonic (spirit)—Maruts on the march.
   Like the most ancient mountains in distant heaven, you, o discerning ones, should be difficult to restrain at an insult to this one [=singer].

VI

Maṇḍala VI

The VIth Maṇḍala, attributed to the Bharadvāja clan, contains seventy-five hymns. The Anukramaṇī identifies the majority of the hymns as products of the eponymous clan poet himself, Bharadvāja, whose patronymic is Bārhaspatya. These include all of the Agni series (1–16), much of the Indra series (17–30 and 37–43), the Pūṣan series (53–60), and the miscellaneous hymns to various divinities toward the end of the maṇḍala (61–74). The composite hymns coming at the end of the Indra series (44–46, also 48) are ascribed to a different Bārhaspatya poet, Śaṃyu Bārhaspatya, but since Śaṃyu is a speaking name ("seeking luck," reinterpreted from the archaic compound śaṃyóḥ "luck and lifetime"), this name may well be a nickname of Bharadvāja. The remaining hymns are attributed to several different descendants of Bharadvāja, all bearing the patronymic Bhāradvāja; these include a number of Indra hymns (31–36, 47), the All God series (49–52), and the final hymn of the maṇḍala, the famous weapon hymn (75).

Although the Indra hymns outnumber the Agni hymns, the Indra hymns are, for the most part, not terribly notable, though deftly executed. By contrast, the Agni hymns specialize in imaginative descriptions of physical fire, and VI.9, a hymn ostensibly dedicated to Agni Vaiśvānara, contains one of the most striking meditations on the acquisition and employment of poetic craft in the R̥gveda. The hymn VI.28, interrupting the Indra cycle, contains a charming blessing of the cows, and the "clan" hymn, VI.48, repays the attention its difficulties demand. This hymn contains, inter alia, a remarkable, if cryptic, address to the god Pūṣan, and Pūṣan is an especial preoccupation of the Bharadvāja poets, with VI.53–60 containing the only sustained cycle of hymns in the R̥gveda addressed to this minor deity. Other gods, well represented in other maṇḍalas, receive relatively short shrift: there is only a single hymn to the Maruts (66), two to Uṣas (64–65), and so on.

VI.1 (442) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
13 verses: triṣṭubh

A rather stately hymn, appropriate for the first in the Agni sequence in Maṇḍala VI. It concerns only the ritual fire, with almost no mention of its physical substance, and unlike the typical dawn kindling sequence, the hymn depicts the arrival and installation of Agni as Hotar and, especially, the ritual fire as joint possession and responsibility of the whole Ārya community, as Proferes (2007: 33) points out. As the first hymn in the maṇḍala, it thus establishes an image of a settled and well-ordered society unified in its devotion to the gods to which the rest of the maṇḍala will be dedicated.

The arrival and installation occupy verses 1–3; verses 4–8 show Agni's reach through the community, from the individual house, to the clan and settlements, and indeed to all who claim Manu (the first sacrificer) as ancestor. Verses 9–10 detail the homage and service Agni deserves, and the remaining verses (11–13) the favors we ask in return.

1. You, o Agni, as first minder of this insightful thought here, became the Hotar, o wondrous one.
 You, o bull, made (the thought) into power difficult to surpass, to overpower all (other) power.
2. Then you sat down as Hotar, superior sacrificer, prospering in the footprint of refreshment, to be reverently invoked.
 You are the first that men have followed when they seek the gods, distinguishing themselves greatly for wealth.
3. The wakeful ones have followed (you) when you come with many goods as if with a troop, (and they follow) the wealth nearby you—gleaming Agni, lovely to see, lofty, who receives the omentum (of the sacrificial beast as offering), shining through all the days.
4. Pursuing the track of the god with homage, seeking fame, they will attain fame indestructible;
 even the names they have assumed are worthy of worship. They take pleasure in your auspicious manifestation.
5. You do the settlements strengthen on earth; you (do) both of the "riches of the peoples" [=patrons and singers?] (strengthen).
 You, o surpassing one—become a rescuer worthy of note, a father, a mother forever for the sons of Manu.
6. Dear Agni is to be served among the clans. As Hotar he has sat down, the gladdening superior sacrificer.
 You, shining in our house, do we reverently approach, on bended knee, with homage.
7. You do we of good insight implore when you are new, Agni, seeking your benevolence, seeking the gods—you led the clans, while shining through the lofty luminous realm of heaven, o Agni.
8. (You do we implore), the sage poet, the clanlord of each and every clan, the lavishly overflowing bull of the settled domains, impelling the forward progress (of the sacrifice), prospering, pure—Agni who deserves the sacrifice, who rules over riches.

9. O Agni, that mortal has sacrificed and ritually labored who after kindling you has achieved your oblation-giving, who knows his way around the offering with its acts of homage. Just he will acquire all things of value, when aided by you.
10. To you right here, the great one, great honor would we do, with acts of homage, o Agni, with kindling wood, and with oblations, with the altar, o son of strength, with hymns, with solemn words. May we take our place in your auspicious benevolence.
11. You who stretch through the two world-halves with your light and who through (words of) fame deserve to be famed as surpassing, with lofty substantial prizes for us, with rich ones, Agni, radiate out more widely.
12. O good one, manfully establish for us forever and for our progeny and posterity abundance of livestock.
   Let there be for us many lofty refreshments that keep evil at a distance and auspicious things bringing good fame.
13. Many goods many-fold in their goodness might I attain of you through seeking you, o King Agni.
   For many are the goods in you, o Agni of many favors, for the one who does (you) honor, since you are king.

VI.2 (443) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: anuṣṭubh, except śakvarī 11

In its first half (vss. 1–5) this hymn echoes the themes of VI.1: Agni as the joint concern of all the separate units of Ārya society (and indeed of the gods as well) and the success that attends the man who fulfills his ritual responsibilities to Agni. The hymn ends the same way (vss. 10–11), with special mention of Agni's position in the individual house as well as his role as clanlord. The similarity between beginning and ending is marked by a signal of ring composition: the god Mitra compared to Agni in both the first and last verses. Agni is often compared with or identified with Mitra ("Ally, Alliance") because of his position on earth as guest and helper of men, though himself a god, and because, as god, he mediates the sacrificial alliance between gods and men.

By contrast, the verses in between (6–9) offer a sequence of increasingly dense and complex images of fire, starting with a simple one of whirling smoke and sunlike brightness (vs. 6), but the comparisons in verses 7cd–8 rely on multiple puns and terse and elliptical phraseology. This middle section sets the stage for the rest of the Agni cycle with its focus on the physical aspects of fire.

1. You, o Agni, like Mitra are indeed master of the glory belonging to the settlements.
   You prosper fame like prosperity, o good one without boundaries.
2. It is you then that the boundaried domains reverently invoke, with sacrifices and with hymns; to you drives the prizewinning (horse), avoiding the wolf, crossing (the mid)space, the one common to all the boundaried domains.
3. In concert the men of heaven kindle you as beacon of the sacrifice, when the human race here, seeking favor, has called upon (you) in the ceremony.
4. The mortal who will bring (the sacrifice) to fulfillment with his insight and will perform ritual labor for you of good gifts, with the help of lofty heaven he crosses hatreds like narrow straits.
5. The mortal who after kindling (you) will achieve the offering to you and the whetting of you, he prospers his dwelling place, (so that it has many) branches and hundred(-year) lifespans, o Agni.
6. Your smoke, when it is in heaven, is turbulent in motion, stretched out (there) gleaming, for you shine with your body, o pure one, like the sun with its brilliance.
7. For now you are to be reverently invoked among the clans, as our dear guest, to be protected like a son who brings delight to the home, (but also) to be enflamed like a battle-lusty (warrior) in a stronghold.
8. For according to your purpose you are anointed in the wood(en cup) (like soma) [/in your home =hearth] [/driven into the wood(en cup)] like a prize-seeker who gets results.
   (You are) encompassing like a household (that encompasses all its members) through your independent power; (you are) made to go in circles like a young steed (being trained).
9. You (eat) just these unstirrable things, Agni, like livestock in a pasture.
   (This is your) principle: that your dexterous (flames?) hew the woods, o unaging one.
10. Because you pursue (your ritual duties) as Hotar in the house for the clans who perform the ceremonies, o Agni, make them unified, o clanlord; enjoy (our) oblation, o Aṅgiras.
11. O god Agni with the might of Mitra, to us you call the gods, call the grace of the two world-halves.
    Pursue well-being, good dwelling, pursue the men of heaven. May we cross over hatreds, over narrow straits difficult to traverse.
    May we cross over; with your help may we cross over.

VI.3 (444) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

The first two verses of this hymn promise success to the mortal who behaves properly and performs his sacrificial duties well. With these decorous sentiments out of the way, the poet can indulge himself for the rest of the hymn (vss. 3–8) in a series of compressed and vivid images of fire as a natural substance, involving both sight (esp. vss. 3–5, 8) and sound (esp. vss. 6–7). The almost feverish succession of image upon image and the contorted phraseology are reminiscent of the depictions of natural fire in VI.2.6–9, but allowed even freer rein and more space. The hymn ends abruptly, without the usual prayers for benefits or even a summary verse calling attention to the praise just offered to Agni. It is a wild, exhilarating, and often baffling ride, especially in the original Sanskrit.

1. O Agni, he who protects the truth and is born in truth will dwell in peace; he who seeks you as god will reach broad light, that mortal whom you, o god, as Varuṇa in concert with Mitra, protect from narrow straits along with abandonment.
2. He has sacrificed with sacrifices, he has labored with ritual labors; for Agni who brings wishes to success he has performed pious work—so the displeasure of eminent ones will never reach that mortal, nor will narrow straits, nor delusion.
3. (You) whose appearance is spotless like that of the sun: when your fearsome insight comes here as you blaze, rich spoils (become yours), since (you are) armed. (But) on his own this one here [=you, Agni], born in the wood(s), is sometimes a cozy nest.
4. Sharp is his course, great his form. He will snap with his mouth like a horse being bridled.
   Lolling his tongue out, like an axe (its blade), he makes the wood "run" like runny stuff [=liquefies it] as he burns.
5. He, just like an archer, has aimed (his arrow), about to shoot. He has whetted its point like a blade of copper—he, the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice), who is like a bird whose swooping is brilliant by night, who sits in the woods [/on wood], whose plumage is (fit for) rapid flight.
6. Like a hoarse-voiced (singer), at the dawning of the ruddy (dawn), he keeps muttering [=crackles] with his flame, he of Mitra's might, the ruddy one who (mutters) to them by night, who (mutters) by day to men—the immortal ruddy one who (mutters) by day to men.
7. He whose (roar), like that of heaven, keeps roaring as he does honor, (that) bull keeps roaring in the tree, in the plants—

he who, like a traveler in the (sun's) heat, going with a swoop, with a flight, has *stretched with his goods to the two world-halves, who (thus) have (in him) a good husband.

8. Or who (flashes) at his feedings (of fuel) and at the associated chants [/with his associated rays], (that one) keeps flashing like lightning with his own tempests.
   Or who fashioned the troop of Maruts like a R̥bhu [/craftsman], he, turbulent and wild, has flashed.

VI.4 (445) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

A more conventionally structured hymn than the last two with less knotty phraseology. It begins (vs. 1) by asking Agni to sacrifice for us today as always, in his accustomed role (vs. 2). It ends (vss. 7–8) with a statement of our service to Agni and prayers for benefits. The verses in between (3–6) describe fire in its naturalistic aspect, as in the two previous hymns but generally in more straightforward terms (vs. 5 is an exception and has been variously interpreted).

1. Just as you, o Hotar, will (always) sacrifice with sacrifices at Manu's attendance on the gods, o son of strength, even so for us today sacrifice in the same way to the same gods—you willing, to them willing, o Agni.
2. Far radiant like a vision at dawn, Agni worthy to be acquired takes delight in our extolling—he who through his whole life has been the immortal among the mortals, their guest who awakes at dawn, the Jātavedas.
3. He, whose formless mass [=smoke] they [=mortals] marvel at as the heavens do, he (then) clothes himself in lights, like the brilliant sun.
   He who, unaging and pure, dispels (hatreds), he has pierced the primordial (establishments) even of the Devourer.
4. You, o son (of strength), are eloquent when you sit for your meal. Agni right from birth has made his own course into his food.
   You, o winner of nourishment, establish nourishment for us. Like a king, you have conquered; you dwell peacefully in a place without wolves.
5. He who eats the wild food sharply, like the wind he goes as ruler across the nights.
   May we, who (serve) you, outstrip the hostilities of (ill-)intentions, as a steed does the (other) "flying" (steeds), as he curves around the curves (of a racecourse).

6. Like the sun with its radiant rays, o Agni, you stretch through the two world-halves with your light.
   The bright one, anointed, leads (us) around the dark shades with his flame, like the descendant of Uśij [=fire-priest/poet Kakīṣvant Dairghatamasa] soaring in flight [=in exhilaration of soma?].
7. Since we have chosen you, most gladdening with (your) ray-flames, with our (chant-)flames, listen hard to us, Agni.
   You, Āyu, like Indra by virtue of your power or your divinity, do the most manly ones fill with benefit.
8. Now for us, Agni, pursue well-being and riches along wolfless paths. Carry us across narrow straits.
   Grant these things to the patrons and favor to the singer. – Having good heroes might we rejoice for a hundred winters.

VI.5 (446) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

An unremarkable hymn. It begins "I call for you (all)"—the poet announcing that he is performing his ritual task for his priestly colleagues. He continues with praise of Agni and description of his roles, including that of giver of goods (vss. 1–3). The next two verses contrast the enemy of the mortals present and the punishment he should receive from Agni (vs. 4) with the pious server and the rewards he deserves (vs. 5). Two more verses (6–7) urge Agni to perform these tasks.

1. I call for you upon the son of strength, the youth of undeceptive speech, the youngest one, with our thoughts—the provident one of many choices who sends all choice treasures, the one without deceit.
2. To you, o Hotar of many faces, the sacrificial ones have set goods in motion at evening and at dawn, you, the pure one, in whom (all) auspicious things are encompassed, as the earth (encompasses) all creatures.
3. You sat down among these clans here from olden days; by your will you became charioteer of valuables.
   Therefore you send goods in due order to him who does (you) honor, o observant Jātavedas.
4. Whoever at a distance will assail us, whoever close by will be rapacious, o Agni with Mitra's might, with your own unaging bulls [=flames], most scorching one, scorch him with your scorching heat, o you of scorching heat.

5. Whoever with sacrifice and with kindling wood, who with solemn speeches and with chants will ritually serve you, o son of strength, he, provident among mortals, o immortal one, shines out with wealth, with brilliance, with fame.
6. Do this straightaway, o Agni, when prompted: thrust away rivals with strength, strong one.
   When you are praised through the days, anointed with words, then take pleasure in the singer. Listen to his thought.
7. May we attain this desire, Agni, through your help. May we attain wealth, o wealthy one, which affords good heroes.
   May we attain the prize when we seek the prize. May we attain your unaging brilliance, o unaging one.

VI.6 (447) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

Most of this hymn consists of a vivid depiction of destructive fire raging across the earth, though the first half-verse establishes a ritual context and the last verse (7) begs Agni for wealth. The hymn is full of phonetic and etymological figures, particularly the last, intensely alliterative verse.

1. Forth to the son of strength with newer (speech), with a sacrifice, seeking a way, seeking help, he [=the mortal] goes in pursuit—to the heavenly Hotar, wood-hewing, gleaming but with a black course.
2. He is (like) the brightening thunder abiding in the luminous realm, the youngest one with his unaging, ever-roaring (flames), the pure one, the latest fire of many, who travels along many broad expanses as he devours.
3. Sped by the wind, your flaming beams, o flaming Agni, spread out wide asunder.
   Powerfully destructive, (like) the heavenly Navagvas, they conquer the woods, breaking them boldly—
4. Your flaming flames, o possessor of flame, which shear the earth—(flames) like unharnessed horses.
   Then your flickering radiates forth widely, marshaling itself on the back of the dappled one [=earth].
5. Then the tongue of the bull keeps flying forth, like a cattle-raider's missile let loose.
   Like the onslaught of a champion is the ardor of Agni. The fearsome one, difficult to obstruct, fragments the woods.

6. With the radiance of the great goad [=sun] you stretch across the earthly expanses boldly.
   Thrust away fears with your strengths; rapaciously grind down the rapacious rivals.
7. O bright one with bright dominion—(that which is) bright, brightest, showing brightly to us, conferring vigor:
   wealth, glittering, lofty, conferring many heroes—o glittering one, with your glittering (flames) bind (that) to the singer.

VI.7 (448) Agni Vaiśvānara

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 6–7

The hymn is dedicated to Agni as Vaiśvānara ("belonging to all men"), but the focus is primarily on his relationship with the gods (see, e.g., vss. 1–2, 4), on his cosmic reach and cosmogonic powers (see, e.g., vss. 1, 5–7), in which aspect he is identified with the sun (see esp. vs. 5), and, especially, on his birth: the root jan "beget/be born" is found in each of the first five verses. It is only verse 3 that depicts Agni's relationship with mortals.

1. The head of heaven, the spoked wheel of the earth, Agni Vaiśvānara, born in truth, sage poet, sovereign king, guest of the peoples—as a drinking cup to their mouth did the gods beget (him).
2. Navel of sacrifices, seat of riches, the great watering trough—toward (him) did they cry out together.
   Vaiśvānara, charioteer of the ceremonies, beacon of the sacrifice—(him) the gods begot.
3. From you is born the inspired poet who wins the prize, o Agni; from you the heroes vanquishing hostility.
   O Vaiśvānara, establish in us goods to be craved, o king.
4. Toward you, o immortal one, while you are being born, do all the gods cry out together as if to their young.
   According to your intentions they went to immortality, o Vaiśvānara, when you came to light in your two parents [=kindling sticks].
5. Vaiśvānara Agni, these great commandments of yours no one dares venture against, since, while (just) being born in the lap of your parents, you found the beacon of the days in the (ritual) patterns.
6. By the eye of Vaiśvānara have the backs of heaven been measured out, by the beacon of the immortal one.
   On his head alone are all the creatures; like twigs have his seven outgrowths [?] grown.

7. He, the very resolute one, who measured out the dusky spaces, (measured) out the luminous realms of heaven—the sage poet Vaiśvānara—who extends himself around all creatures, he is the undeceivable herdsman, the protector of the immortal.

VI.8 (449) Agni Vaiśvānara

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
7 verses: jagatī, except triṣṭubh 7

Another Vaiśvānara hymn, and the cosmic aspects of Agni (and his double, the Sun), extensively treated in VI.7, are touched upon (vss. 2–3). Verse 1 strongly establishes a sacrificial context, however, which returns in verse 4, relating the primal establishment of the ritual fire. The remaining verses (5–7) beg him for benefits.

The hymn is also structured by a phonetic figure, the constant repetition of initial v- (see, e.g., 2c, 3a, 3c, all beginning with the preverb ví), indexing the epithet vaiśvānara, a form of which occurs in every verse but 5.

1. Of the fortifying bull, flame-red, I now proclaim the might, proclaim the rites of Jātavedas.
   For Vaiśvānara a newer thought purifies itself, gleaming like soma, (a thought) dear to Agni.
2. (Even?) while being born in the highest distant heaven, Agni, as protector of commandments [=Varuṇa], guarded the commandments.
   He, the very effective one, measured out the midspace; Vaiśvānara touched the vault with his greatness.
3. He propped apart the two world-halves, as unerring envoy [/Mitra]. He made the darkness pregnant with light.
   He rolled out the two Holy Places [=world-halves] like skins. Vaiśvānara assumed all bullish power.
4. In the lap of the waters the buffaloes grasped (him). The clans reverently approached the king worthy of verses.
   The messenger of Vivasvant brought Agni hither—Mātariśvan (brought) Vaiśvānara from afar.
5. In every generation, o Agni, establish for the singers glorious wealth for ritual distribution and a newer (thought).
   As if with a metal wheel-rim, o unaging king, hew down like a tree the one who curses, with your sharpness.
6. Among our benefactors, o Agni, uphold dominion, unbowed and unaging, and an abundance of heroes.
   May we conquer spoils in hundreds and thousands, o Vaiśvānara Agni, with your help.

7. With your undeceivable herdsmen, o object of our quest, protect our patrons, o triply seated one.
   And guard the troop of those who have given to us, o Agni Vaiśvānara, and extend (their/our lifetime), when you are praised.

VI.9 (450) Agni Vaiśvānara

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
7 verses: triṣṭubh

A powerfully enigmatic hymn, in which the poet reflects on the craft of poetry, worries about his ability to practice it, and, on having received the revelation of the mysteries from the ritual fire, takes heart and assumes his poetic vocation. In this progression the hymn is very reminiscent of IV.5, also a hymn to Agni in his Vaiśvānara aspect and one in which a poet receives his poetic inspiration from Agni.

The first and last (7) verses establish a ritual context: the fire is being kindled in the darkness just before daybreak; its light, which dispels the physical darkness, will be configured as the metaphorical light of inspiration in the rest of the hymn. Verses 2–3 are responsive verses, with verse 2 couched in the 1st-person singular voice of the poet. He confesses his lack of knowledge of poetic craft, metaphorically expressed as weaving. The burden is all the greater in that he feels pressure to surpass his father, whose poetic heir he is. On the basis of the second pāda of this verse, many scholars have interpreted the whole hymn as a depiction of a brahmodya, a poetic contest among rival poets, but we see no evidence of a formal contest here, simply a poet struggling to find his place as a poet within the bardic tradition.

The response to this verse in verse 3 provides the answer to the poet's perplexity: he will learn his craft if he rightly perceives the ritual fire (who is not mentioned by name). This verse not only provides the answer, but serves as an example of the poet's growing skill, for the last pāda of the verse can be read with double application, both to the poet and to Agni. On the one hand, the repetition of "higher" and "below" from 2cd suggests that the same father-son pair is referred to as there, and that the poet is asserting that he will indeed obtain the upper hand over his father from the revelation of Agni. On the other, the pāda can be read as a riddling definition of the god Agni himself, who "moves about below" on the human plane, but "sees above the other" (perhaps the sun, as another form of fire), because he goes all the way to heaven bearing men's oblations to the gods. Thus, what we translate as " '(He [=the poet] is) the herdsmen of the immortal'—(the son who, though) he moves about below, sees above the other [=his father]" can also be read as "(He [=Agni] is) the herdsmen of the immortal, who, though he moves about below, sees above the other [=sun?]."

That Agni is the object to be rightly perceived, referred to but not named in verse 3, which will confer poetic prowess, is made very clear in verse 4, though again the name Agni does not appear—only unmistakable descriptions of fire. The immediacy of the revelation is underlined by the repeated near-deictic pronoun "here (is)" (a: ayám, b: idám, c: ayám). This anonymous but unambiguous description of Agni is continued in verse 5, where he is the entire focus also of the gods. Also important in verse 5 is the characterization of Agni as "swiftest mind," for it is the mental energy of Agni that the poet is absorbing.

In verse 6 the 1st-person poet returns, and with clear excitement testifies to the new flights of his poetic perception and imagination, matching the swift-flying mind of Agni in verse 5. The "light deposited in my heart" is clearly the light of Agni's inspiration. He ends the verse with questions about what he will now say and think—no longer out of a feeling of powerlessness (as in vs. 2), but a sense of future possibilities. (This difference is also conveyed by a change in verbal tense/mood: in verse 2 he wonders about his speech in the subjunctive mood; here he uses the future tense, conveying certainty.)

The hymn has a neatly structured omphalos shape. Verses 1 and 7 are the ritual frame; verses 2 and 6 contain the contrasting 1st-person self-descriptions of the poet; verses 3 and 5 provide the inner frame, identifying Agni as the object of perception of both gods and men; while verse 4 is the omphalos, with its insistent, deictic revelation of Agni immediately before the poet's (and our) eyes.

1. The black day and the silvery day roll out through the two dusky realms according to their knowing ways.
   Agni Vaiśvānara, (even) while being born, like a king suppressed the dark shades with his light.
2. I do not know the thread, nor know how to weave, nor (know) what the wanderers [=fingers? threads? shuttles?] weave at their meeting.
   Whose son will be able to speak what is to be said here, as someone higher than his father, (who is) below?
3. Just he (knows) the thread; he knows how to weave; he will be able to speak what is to be said in proper order—
   (the one) who will rightly perceive him [=Agni]: "(He [=the poet] is) the herdsmen of the immortal"—(the son who, though) he moves about below, sees above the other [=his father].
4. Here is the foremost Hotar: look at him. Here is the light, immortal among mortals.
   Here was he born, set steadfast down here, immortal, becoming strong through his own body.
5. The steadfast light, set down to be seen—the mind swiftest among (all) those that fly—all the gods, of one mind and one perception, come separately straight to (him) as their single resolve.

6. My two ears fly widely, widely my sight, widely this light that was deposited in my heart.
   Widely goes my mind, my intentions at a distance. What shall I say, and what now shall I think?
7. All the gods, in fear, offered homage to you, Agni, while you were (still) standing in the darkness.
   Let Vaiśvānara give help to aid us; let the immortal one give help to aid us.

VI.10 (451) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
7 verses: triṣṭubh, except dvipadā virāj 7

The sentiments in this hymn are familiar ones: Agni as ritual fire being kindled at the sacrifice, blazing brightly, receiving praise, and bestowing blessings on the poet and his patrons. It is characterized, however, by a subtle strain of deliberately misleading expectations (in part necessarily obscured by translation). On several occasions the audience would automatically assign a referent on the basis of formulaics and context only to discover later in the verse that the assumed reference is wrong. In translation this is most easily seen in verse 3, where the first phrase appears to describe Agni, but it turns out to be instead the poet serving Agni. The beginning of verse 2 belongs to a formula found in a number of places in the R̥gveda that imposes an identification of Agni on the opening demonstrative "that." It is only in the second half of the verse that it becomes clear that the demonstrative instead modifies "praise." The extreme ellipsis of verse 2 contributes to this game of disappointed expectations: two objects in that verse lack overt verbs to govern them.

1. Set in front your gladdening, heavenly Agni, (who receives) well-twisted (hymns), while the sacrifice, the ceremony is proceeding.
   (Set him) in front with solemn words, for he is far-radiant for us. As Jātavedas (he) will perform good ceremonies.
2. That—o heaven-bright Hotar of Manu, o Agni of many faces, on being kindled along with the (other) fires—
   (that) praise (take to yourself) which (I chant) to him forcefully like Mamatā [/in my me-ness]. My thoughts purify themselves like gleaming ghee.
3. That one is swollen with praise among mortals who as inspired poet performs ritual service for Agni with solemn words.
   With brilliant help the one of brilliant flame sets him [=the poet] to the winning of a stable full of cows.
4. He who, (even) while being born, has filled the two wide (world-halves) with his light, visible from afar—(though) his course is black—so even across the dense darkness of the night the pure one is visible with his flame.

5. Now, Agni, with your help that brings many prizes, establish brilliant wealth for us and for our benefactors—those who, by their generosity and fame, surpass the others, and by good heroes en masse dominate the peoples.
6. Eagerly take delight in this sacrifice here, Agni, which the seated one with his oblation offers to you.
 Among the Bharadvājas you have taken to yourself the well-twisted (hymn); aid in the winning of the prize to be secured.
7. Dispel hatreds; increase refreshment. – Having good heroes might we rejoice for a hundred winters.

VI.11 (452) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verse: triṣṭubh

The insistent emphasis throughout this hymn is on Agni as Hotar priest and sacrificer, who sacrifices both for and to himself.

1. Perform sacrifice yourself as superior sacrificer, o Hotar Agni, when prompted, pressingly as if at the hitching up of the Maruts.
 Here to us you should turn Mitra and Varuṇa, the Nāsatyas, Heaven and Earth to the Hotar-work.
2. You are our most gladdening Hotar, without deceit, god among men through (all) the rites.
 As the conveyor (of oblations) with your mouth, o Agni, with your pure tongue perform sacrifice yourself to your own self.
3. For even the wealthy Holy Place longs for (this) in regard to you, (to put you) forward to sacrifice to the gods, to their races, for the singer, when the most inspired of the Aṅgirases, the inspired poet rhythmically speaks his honey, hoarse-voiced in his quest.
4. He has flashed, the very clever, wide-radiant one. O Agni, perform sacrifice yourself to the two world-halves of broad extent—
 (you, Agni,) whom, like Āyu, they anoint with reverence—the five peoples having bestowed oblations (anoint) him who receives the pleasurable offerings.
5. When I twist the ritual grass with reverence beside the fire, the ladle filled with ghee, along with a well-twisted hymn, has (already) been held forth; the sitting place (of Agni) has been fastened to the seat of the earth. The sacrifice has been fixed (on him), like (a man's) eye on the sun.

6. Be favorable to us, o Hotar of many faces, along with the gods, on being kindled along with (the other) fires, o Agni.
   O son of strength, clothing ourselves in riches as if in a girthband, may we slip beyond difficult straits.

VI.12 (453) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

As often, the attempt to capture in words the actions of natural fire calls out the best in the poet. The hymn has a skeleton of typical ritual description, especially at the beginning, but this seems a simple and inert structure into which to insert a series of increasingly contorted and fanciful images of fire.

1. In the middle of the dwelling, as Hotar, ruler of the ritual grass, (ruler) of the goad, Agni is to sacrifice to the two world-halves.
   Here is the truthful son of strength spread from afar like the sun, with his flame.
2. You in whom heaven in its entirety [=all the gods] will now perform sacrifice, as it were—you the very clever, the means of sacrifice, the king—
   (you) with your three seats, like the plumage of (a bird) that has traversed (the sky?), are to sacrifice the oblations, the bounties of the sons of Manu.
3. (He) whose (course) is sharpest, the spoked wheel (of the sacrifice), the ruler in the wood, like a goad on the (race)course, he has flashed as he grows strong (on the hearths).
   The immortal one appears like an undisguised reaper in person, (moving) without obstruction among the plants.
4. By our fortifying (hymns), Agni like (a horse) at running is praised in the household, as Jātavedas.
   He whose food is wood, winning like a steed with its determination, like a father he is to be woken dawn after dawn by sacrifices.
5. Then they marvel at his light when, carving (the trees) at will, he travels along the earth.
   He who immediately, when unloosened, streams ever faster, like a debtor (turned) thief he has headed straight across the waste places.
6. Do you, o steed, *drive here to us, when you are kindled along with all the (other) fires, o Agni.
   You pursue riches; you drive across misfortunes. – Having good heroes might we rejoice for a hundred winters.

VI.13 (454) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn stays focused on its theme of Agni as the possessor and distributor of treasures and blessings, and of the mortals who receive these goods through service to Agni.

1. From you, well-portioned one, do all good portions spread out, like branches from a tree—at your attentive hearing—wealth, the victory prize at the overcoming of obstacles, rain from heaven, the streaming of waters, (everything that is) to be reverently invoked.
2. You are our Apportioner, for your treasure here is for our refreshment. Like an encompassing (household), you of wondrous luster hold sway (over treasure), as Mitra does over lofty truth, o Agni. You, god, are the distributer of an abundance of valuables.
3. That lord of settlements smashes the obstacle with power, o Agni, (that) inspired poet carries the prize away from the niggard, whom you, o provident one born of truth, incite with wealth, in concert with the Child of the Waters.
4. The mortal who has achieved the "whetting" of you, o son of strength, through hymns and solemn pronouncements, through sacrifices and the altar, he acquires all wealth, according to his wish, o god Agni. He shows mastery through his goods.
5. These (goods) bringing good fame, consisting of good heroes, establish here for men to thrive, o Agni, son of strength, since with your power you make an abundance of livestock as vigor (even) for the wolf, for the famished stranger.
6. O Agni, son of strength, eloquent, of extensive power, grant us progeny and posterity and prizewinning (steeds).
   With all my hymns may I attain to fulfillment. – Having good heroes might we rejoice for a hundred winters.

VI.14 (455) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: anuṣṭubh, except śakvarī 6

Though it begins with friendship, insight, and refreshment (vs. 1), this is a martial hymn, naming Agni as the priest specific to the Ārya (vs. 2) and asking him to give heroes and victory to the Ārya in their battles with the non-Ārya and to our particular group of Ārya in internal conflicts (vss. 3–5). The hymn is noteworthy in using the metaphor of riches/wealth for an abundance of good fighting men: the phrase "riches of the stranger" in verse 3 refers, in our opinion, to the manpower of the Ārya, and this metaphor is repeated in verse 5.

1. The mortal who (has placed his) friendship in Agni and has savored insight through his insightful thoughts, chewing (it [=insight]) now, he should be the first to choose (it as) refreshment, for help.
2. For just Agni is provident; Agni is the seer, the best ritual adept.
   Agni as Hotar do the clans of Manu reverently invoke at the sacrifices.
3. For, o Agni, they [=the clans of Manu], the "riches of the stranger," contend with each other, every man for himself, for (your) help—
   (that is,) the Āyus—(while at the same time) overcoming the Dasyu (and) seeking to vanquish with their commandments the one who follows no commandment.
4. Agni gives a hero winning the waters, vanquishing with his attack, as lord of settlements, whose rivals tremble at the full sight of his vast power, in fear.
5. For Agni, the god, through his know-how delivers from scorn (that) mortal whose "wealth" is victorious and unobstructible, unobstructible in the prize-contests.
6. O god Agni with the might of Mitra, to us you call the gods, call the grace of the two world-halves.
   Pursue well-being, good dwelling; pursue the men of heaven. May we cross over hatreds, over narrow straits difficult to traverse.
   May we cross over; with your help may we cross over.

VI.15 (456) Agni

Vītahavya Āṅgirasa or Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
19 verses: jagatī 1–2, śakvarī 3, jagatī 4–5, atiśakvarī 6, jagatī 7–9, triṣṭubh 10–14, śakvarī 15, triṣṭubh 16, anuṣṭubh 17, bṛhati 18, triṣṭubh 19, arranged in tṛcas

With its nineteen verses, this hymn as a unity would clearly be out of place in the arrangement of the maṇḍala, but dissolved into a series of five independent tṛcas, its first fifteen verses fit well. The last four verses (16–19) are considered by Oldenberg (1888: 194) to be a later addition, and their vocabulary shows certain signs of comparative modernity.

The content of these triads is generally unremarkable, concentrating on the installation of the ritual fire, Agni's sacrificial role as envoy between gods and men, and the ritual service performed for him by mortals. To some extent the tr̥cas seem to be exercises in variation; for example, the first verses of the first two tr̥cas (1, 4) share some key words and phrases and can in part be interpreted by comparison with each other.

1. This guest of yours here, waking at dawn, lord of all clans will I stretch toward with my hymn.
   He, ablaze right from his birth, pursues any (food) whatever from heaven here. For a long time the embryo eats just what is immovable.
2. Whom the Bhr̥gus installed like a well-installed envoy, to be reverently invoked at the "tree" [=sacrificial post], with flames erect, you, o infallible one, well pleased in Vītahavya, are magnified with eulogies every day.
3. You—become a strengthener of our skill, one who keeps the wolf away, an overcomer of the stranger, distant or close.
   O son of strength, (hold out) riches among mortals, hold out shelter of great extent to Vītahavya, of great extent to Bharadvāja.

4. Your flashing guest with his solar glory, Agni, the Hotar conducting good ceremonies for Manu, possessing heaven-ruling speech like an inspired poet, the oblation-conveying spoked wheel (of the sacrifice)—to (this) god I stretch with my well-twisted (hymns).
5. Who with his pure, conspicuous body shines on earth as if with the radiance of Dawn, who goes in triumph on his course now like the victor in the battle with Etaśa [=the sun's horse], who is athirst (for oblations?) here, like (a traveler) in the (sun's) heat, the unaging one—
6. To your every fire do friendly service with a kindling stick, to your every dear guest in hymning (them).
   Seek to win the immortal one with your hymns, for the god will win what is choice among the gods; for the god will win friendship for us among the gods.

7. Agni kindled with kindling wood do I hymn with a hymn—the blazing pure one in front, steadfast at the ceremony, inspired poet, Hotar of many favors, without deceit—the sage poet we beseech with appeals for grace as Jātavedas.
8. You, Agni, have they established in every generation as immortal messenger, as oblation-conveyor, as protector to be reverently invoked.

Both gods and mortals set down with homage the wakeful one as their far-extending clanlord.

9. Seeking manifestation, o Agni, following the commandments of both (men and gods) you speed between the two airy realms altogether.
   Since we choose for ourselves your thought as grace, so become a kindly provider of threefold defense for us.

10. Him, of lovely countenance, of lovely appearance, of lovely outlook, might we, who do not know, serve as the one who knows better.
    He will perform sacrifice, knowing all the patterns; Agni will proclaim our oblation among the immortals.

11. Him, o Agni, do you protect and him do you rescue, who has achieved an insightful thought for you, the sage poet, o champion, or (who has achieved) the "whetting" of the sacrifice, or its (proper) outcome. Just him do you imbue with power and with wealth.

12. You, Agni—protect (us) from the rapacious one, and you, mighty one—(protect) us from reproach.
    Let the smoke-enwrapped (oblation) come entirely to you, to the fold (of the gods); let thousandfold desirable wealth (come) entirely.

13. Agni is the Hotar, the houselord; he is the king. He knows all the creatures, as Jātavedas.
    He who is of gods and of mortals the best sacrificer, let him, the truthful one, set the sacrifice in motion.

14. O Agni, pure-flamed Hotar of the ceremony, when today you pursue (the oblations) of the clan—for you are the sacrificer—you will offer true (hymns?) as sacrifice when you have become manifest in your greatness. O youngest one, convey the oblations that are yours today.

15. For you watch over the well-placed pleasurable offerings then. One should set you down, to sacrifice to the two world-halves.
    Help us, bounteous one, in the winning of prizes. Agni, may we cross over all (narrow straits) difficult to traverse; may we cross over them—with your help may we cross over.

16. O Agni of the lovely face, with all the gods sit first on the woolly womb, the ghee-rich one that forms a nest. Lead the sacrifice straight, for the impeller (of the sacrificer), for the sacrificer.

17. This Agni here the ritual adepts churn, as Atharvan (did)— (Agni) who, (though) he sought a crooked (path), they led here unerring from the dark (places).

18. Be born, to pursue the gods in their entirety, for well-being.

Convey the gods hither, the immortals growing strong through truth.
You cause the sacrifice to touch the gods.

19. O Agni, houselord of the people(s), we have made you lofty with kindling wood.
May our household (arrangements) not be "one-horse." With your sharp sharpness hone us thoroughly.

VI.16 (457) Agni

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
48 verses: gāyatrī, except vardhamānā 1, 6, anuṣṭubh 27, 47–48, triṣṭubh 46, arranged in tr̥cas

This lengthy hymn must, like the last one (VI.15), be dissolved into tr̥cas in order to fit the numerical arrangement of the maṇḍala. As Proferes (2007: 9) points out, this is an assemblage of Bharadvāja kindling verses, similar to the collections made by the Vaiśvāmitras (III.27) and the Atris (V.28), likewise placed at or near the end of their Agni cycle. Again, the content stays primarily focused on the ritual aspects of Agni. Personal and family names are found fairly commonly (see especially the second [vss. 4–6, and cf. vs. 19] and fifth [vss. 13–15] tr̥cas). There are overt signs of unity within some of the tr̥cas: for instance, both the second (vss. 4–6) and the third tr̥cas (vss. 7–9) begin each verse with a form of "you"; a variant of this is found in the fifth tr̥ca (vss. 13–15).

1. You, Agni, were established as Hotar of all sacrifices by the gods for the human race.
2. With your gladdening tongues sacrifice for us to the great ones in the course of the ceremony.
Convey the gods hither and sacrifice,
3. For you, o ritual adept, know the ways and the paths in their straight course, o strong-willed god Agni, very effective at the sacrifices.

4. You does Bharata, along with his prizewinners, reverently invoke, now yet again, for blessing.
He has sacrificed to the sacrificial one at the sacrifices.
5. You—(give) these many valuables to Divodāsa the (soma) presser, to Bharadvāja the pious.
6. You, as immortal messenger—convey the divine race hither, when you hear the lovely praise of the inspired poet.

7. You, Agni, do the very attentive mortals reverently invoke as god at the sacrifices, to pursue the gods.

8. Begin the sacrifice: your manifestation and your resolve do those of good drops, the desirous ones, all take pleasure in.
9. You are the Hotar established by Manu, the conveyor (of oblations) with your mouth, the very wise one.
Agni, sacrifice to the clans of heaven.

10. Agni, being hymned, travel hither to pursue (the oblations), to give the oblations.
Sit down as Hotar on the ritual grass.
11. You, Aṅgiras, with kindling sticks, with ghee do we strengthen.
Blaze aloft, youngest one.
12. You seek to win for us here a broad, praiseworthy, lofty mass of heroes, god Agni.

13. You, Agni, did Atharvan churn forth from the lotus,
(did) the liturgists (churn) from the head of the whole (world?).
14. You did Dadhyañc, the seer, son of Atharvan, kindle as obstacle-smasher, stronghold-splitter.
15. You did Vr̥ṣan Pāthya kindle as best Dasyu-smasher, winning the stakes in every battle.

16. Come here. I will speak to you, Agni, in this way: "(There are) other hymns, but with these drops here you will become strong."
17. Wherever your mind is (set), (there) you will set your skill next, there you will make your seat.
18. Since what is granted to you will not be (just) a speck, you good one, who are on (our) side, therefore you will win (us) friendship.

19. Agni has come here, the one belonging to the Bharatas, obstacle-smasher, manifest to many, lord of the settlements of Divodāsa.
20. For he will piously offer wealth beyond all earthly (goods) by his greatness, winning (though) himself unwon, indestructible.
21. O Agni, as of old but anew, with lasting brilliance you stretch aloft with your radiance.

22. Comrades, boldly chant forth to Agni your praise and sacrifice and sing to the ritual adept.
23. For he is the one who has sat through the human (life)spans as Hotar with a poet's purpose, and as the messenger conveying the oblations.

24. To the two kings of blazing commandments [=Mitra and Varuṇa], the Ādityas, the Marutian flock, o good one, sacrifice here, and to the two world-halves.

25. Good is your manifestation, Agni, for the prospering mortal—
    (the manifestation) of (you) the immortal, o child of nourishment.
26. Acccording to your will let the giver be best off, winning you today, acquiring a good legacy.
    The mortal has achieved a (hymn) with a good twist.
27. Those aided by you, Agni, (are ones) prospering through their whole lifetime, overcoming the hostilities of the stranger, vanquishing the hostilities of the stranger.

28. Agni with his sharp flame will run down every rapacious one.
    Agni will win us wealth.
29. Wealth in good heroes bring here, o unbounded Jātavedas.
    Smash the demonic forces, o you of good resolve.
30. You—protect us from narrow straits, o Jātavedas, from the one who bears malice.
    Guard us, o poet of the sacred formulation.

31. The mortal of evil ways who will deliver us to the murderous weapon, o Agni, from him protect us and from narrow straits.
32. You, god—deflect with your tongue that evil-doer, the mortal who wishes to smash us.
33. To Bharadvāja hold out shelter of great extent, o overpowering Agni, and goods worthy to be chosen.

34. Agni will keep smashing obstacles, seeking chattels, amid admiration—kindled, blazing when bepoured (with ghee)—
35. In the womb of his mother, as the father of his father, having flashed forth at the imperishable (syllable?), sitting on the birthplace of truth—
36. Bring here a sacred formulation bestowing offspring, o unbounded Jātavedas, o Agni, (a formulation) that will shine in heaven.

37. Toward you of delightful appearance, have we, affording (you) pleasure, released our songs, o might-made Agni.
38. Toward your shelter we have come, as if into shadow from the (sun's) heat, o Agni of golden appearance—

39. You who, like a powerful sharpshooter, like a sharp-horned buffalo, have broken strongholds, o Agni.

40. Whom they carry like a bangle on the hand, like an infant just born,
 Agni, who conducts good ceremonies for the clans,
41. (That) god carry forward, to pursue the gods, (him) the best finder of goods.
 Let him sit down on his own birthplace.
42. "Whet" the dear guest, just born on (the old fire) Jātavedas, the houselord in his comfortable (birth)place.

43. God Agni, yoke (them) then!—those horses of yours that go straight to their goal, that convey (the gods) in accord with your fervor.
44. Drive here to us. Convey (the gods) here to the pleasurable offerings, to pursue (them).
 (Convey) the gods here to drink the soma.
45. O Agni belonging to the Bharatas, constantly flashing brilliantly upward with your inexhaustible (flame), blaze, radiate widely, unaging one.

46. The mortal who with pursuit would seek friendship with the god, he, offering oblations at the ceremony, should reverently invoke Agni.
 With outstretched hands he should seek to win with homage the Hotar whose sacrifice comes true in the two world-halves.
47. Here to you, Agni, we bring with a verse an oblation fashioned by our heart:
 let the oxen, bulls, and mated cows be yours.
48. Agni do the gods kindle at the front, as the best obstacle-smasher by whom goods are brought here and the demonic powers crushed—by the prizewinner.

VI.17 (458) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
15 verses: triṣṭubh, except dvipadā 15

This hymn is divided into two roughly equal parts, with the first devoted to the Vala myth (vss. 2–6), the second to the Vṛtra myth (vss. 8–12). The first verse announces these two themes in order, allotting each a half-verse. The two mythic segments are separated by a verse about Indra's general cosmogonic deeds (7); the last three verses (13–15) urge Indra to use the same powers to help the poet and his patrons.

The account of both narratives emphasizes the role of soma in rousing Indra to his great deeds, and the hymn begins with three verses (1–3) with the insistent imperative "drink!" The Vala myth is in fact configured as a model for Indra's behavior in the present with the mythic deeds presented as still to happen: he is enjoined to drill through to the cattle pen (vss. 2, 3) and to disclose the sun (vs. 3). The hymn thus appears to be associated with the activities at dawn. The Vr̥tra myth is more consistently presented as a deed in the past (though see vss. 8, 11).

1. Drink the soma! The cattle enclosure that you will drill through to, mighty Indra, when you are greatly sung—you bold mace-bearer, who will hew apart Vr̥tra and all hostile things with your powers—
2. Drink it! You who are the victorious possessor of the silvery drink, who are the belipped, who are the bull of poetic thoughts, who are the cowpen-splitter, the mace-bearer, who are the mounter of fallow bays, you, Indra—drill through to the shimmering prizes.
3. Drink it in just this way, as of old. Let it exhilarate you. Hear our sacred formulation, and grow strong through our songs.
   Disclose the sun, swell refreshments, and smash rivals. Indra, drill through to the cows.
4. The exhilarating drinks here, when drunk, make you grow loftily brilliant, o autonomous Indra;
   the invigorating drinks continually excite (you who are) great, without deficiency, powerful, distinguished, conquering—
5. Becoming exhilarated on which, you made the sun and dawn to shine, as you shattered the strongholds.
   You shoved the great, immoveable rock that was enclosing the cattle from its own seat, Indra.
6. Through your will and your wondrous skills you secured the cooked (milk) in the raw (cows) by your ability.
   You opened the doors, opened up the strongholds for the dawn-red ones.
   Accompanied by the Aṅgirases, you sent the cows surging up from the enclosure.
7. You filled the earth broad and wide—great is your wondrous skill.
   Towering, you propped up heaven aloft, Indra.
   You fixed fast the two world-halves, whose sons are the gods, the two ancient but youthfully exuberant mothers of truth.
8. Then all the gods set you in front alone, o Indra, as the powerful one to "carry (the day)."
   When the non-god has vaunted himself to the gods, they choose Indra here at the winning of the sun.

9. Then even Heaven, she [=Earth] likewise also, bent away from your mace, through fear of your own battle fury, when Indra struck down the vaunting serpent to lie there for a full lifespan.
10. Then Tvaṣṭar turned the mace with its thousand spikes and hundred edges for you who are great, o powerful one, that eager, devoted (mace) with which you utterly crushed the screaming serpent, you possessor of the silvery drink.
11. (You) whom all the Maruts in concert will strengthen, for you, Indra, he [=Agni] cooks a hundred buffaloes.
   Pūṣan, Viṣṇu (and the others) rinse the exhilarating Vṛtra-smashing plant, three lakes (full), for him.
12. You sent surging here the great gush of rivers that had been blocked and surrounded, the wave of waters.
   Along their slopes, along their path, Indra, you set the busy (waters) tossing, downward to the sea.
13. Indra having done all these things in just this way, the great, mighty, ageless giver of strength, possessing good heroes, good weapons, and a good mace—you—might our new sacred formulation turn here for help.
14. Provide our inspired poets with brilliance—for (them to acquire) the prize: fame and refreshment, and wealth, o Indra; at Bharadvāja's (provide) our patrons with superior men, o Indra. And, as ever, be there for us, Indra, on the decisive day.
15. With this (hymn) might we win the prize established by the gods.
   – Having good heroes might we rejoice for a hundred winters.

VI.18 (459) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
15 verses: triṣṭubh

The poet of this hymn seems to be aiming to deploy as many different words for power, might, strength, and so forth in as many different derivational forms as possible. The sheer power of Indra, thus expressed, overshadows his particular deeds, which are mentioned in a somewhat cursory way: Vala (vs. 5), Vṛtra (vs. 6, also 9 and 14), the destruction of various named monsters (vs. 8). The poet is also fond of figures involving a positive and a twist on its negation: "vanquishing but unvanquished" (vs. 1), and so forth.

This focus on Indra's power betrays some nervous worry about the existence of that power, expressed especially in the rhetorical question and answer in verses 3–4. A number of hymns in the Ṛgveda raise the question of whether Indra himself exists; here the existential anxiety has been displaced to an abstract entity, his might, but the poet asserts its existence so often and so unequivocally that his audience can scarcely doubt it. Needless to say, the recital of Indra's strength is not disinterested: the poet calls for Indra to use his powers in defense of the poet's people and, in the last verse (15), to perform the deed that exists for him to do (a nice return to the existential theme), in order to merit another poem from the poet.

1. Praise him whose might is overpowering, the vanquishing but unvanquished, much-summoned Indra.
   Mighty, conquering but unconquered, the bull of the settled domains—strengthen him with these songs.
2. He—the fighting warrior, creator of tumult, combat-hardened, the powerfully destructive, bellowing partaker of the silvery drink, with high-mounting dust—alone became the victorious rouser of the communities of the sons of Manu.
3. It was just you who tamed the Dasyus, and who alone vanquished (their) communities for the Ārya.
   Does that heroic power now exist for you, Indra, or does it not? You will announce that at the proper season.
4. It certainly does exist for you!—so I think: strength, o strongest one, (has come) to you, who were powerfully born, the surpassing surpasser—mighty (strength) has come to the mighty one, more powerful (strength) to the powerful one who, himself not feeble, furthers the feeble.
5. "Let our age-old partnership with you (all) (still) exist," with the Aṅgirases speaking in just this way—along with them you smashed the prospering Vala cave, o wondrous shaker of the unshakable, and you opened its strongholds and its doors, all of them.
6. He is to be summoned with insightful thoughts—the mighty one who performs the master's part in the great overcoming of Vr̥tra, in the winning of progeny, in (the winning of) posterity. As the mace-bearer he became worth tussling for in battles.
7. Through his greatness and his immortal name he has extended himself over the races of the sons of Manu.
   He is at home with brilliance and with power and wealth, and he, the best of men, with heroism—
8. He, the man who is not to be confused and is not wrong, bearing a name that is good to think upon. Cumuri and Dhuni did Indra wring out, and Pipru, Śambara, and Śuṣṇa—to shake their strongholds and for (them) to lie there even now.
9. With your helpful energy, (ever) more to be admired, up and mount your chariot, Indra, for the Vr̥tra-smashing.
   Place your mace in your hand on the right side. Stimulate your magical powers, o you who give much.

10. As fire does dry wood, like a terrifying missile burn down the demon with your lance, o Indra.
    He who shattered the obstacles to progress with a (lance) both deep and high, he smoked them out and subjugated them.
11. Along a thousand paths affording powerful prizes, o powerfully brilliant Indra, drive here in our direction with wealth, o much summoned son of strength, whom a godless man never has the power to repel.
12. The greatness of the powerfully brilliant, stalwart, ardent one has overflowed from heaven and earth.
    There exists no rival for him, nor counterpart, no opponent for the strong one with many magical powers.
13. This deed done by you stands out today—that for his sake [=Tūrvayāṇa's?] (you ground down) Kutsa, Āyu, and Atithigva; many thousands did you grind down to earth. You led Tūrvayāṇa up boldly.
14. Then, o god, all the gods cheer you on for the serpent-smashing, (you) the best poet of poets, when you will create wide space for oppressed heaven, for its people and for yourself as you are being sung.
15. Heaven and Earth and the immortal gods give way to your might, Indra.
    Do, o doer, what undone (deed) exists for you (to do). Generate a newer hymn for yourself along with sacrifices.

VI.19 (460) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
13 verses: triṣṭubh

Like the previous hymn, this one exults in the mighty powers of Indra and in the rich lexicon that describes them, although it is perhaps somewhat less insistent (but see vs. 6ab). Also as in VI.18 the poet exhorts Indra to put his powers to good use for the men associated with the poet. The three middle verses (6–8) all contain the phrase "bring here to us," each with a different abstract power as object, and the remaining verses continue these requests for aid and support, especially in defeating enemies and rivals.

1. Great is Indra—manful, filling the domains and doubly lofty, undiminishing in his powers.
   Inclined toward us, he has been strengthened for his heroic deed. Wide and broad, he was well made by his makers.

2. The Holy Place positioned just Indra for winning, him lofty and towering, unaging and youthful, swollen with invincible strength, who in just a single day grew strong and not by halves.
3. Broad are your forearms, ample your fists. Mete out full measures of fame in our direction.
   Like a herdsman to his flocks of livestock, as household master, o Indra, turn here to us in the contest.
4. Striving for the prizes of victory here and now, we would summon him for you, the elusive Indra along with his able (men); (might we be) irreproachable, blameless, and invulnerable, just as the ancient singers were.
5. Of steadfast commandment, giving spoils, strengthened by soma (is he), for he is the possessor of much livestock, of goods worth winning.
   The paths of wealth have joined in him, like the rivers uniting in the sea.
6. Bring here to us, o overpowering champion, the strongest strength, the mightiest mighty might.
   All things brilliant and bullish that belong to the sons of Manu—give them to us, o master of the fallow bays, to exhilarate us.
7. Your exhilaration, conquering in battle, never shirking—bring us that, swollen with strength, o Indra, through which we could be considered victors in the winning of progeny and posterity, aided by you.
8. Bring here to us, Indra, the bullish unbridled force that gains the stakes, swollen with strength, of good skill, through which we will vanquish our rivals in battles, both kin and non-kin, with your help.
9. Let your unbridled force, a bull, come here from behind, here from above and below, here from in front.
   Let it come altogether toward us from all sides. Indra, grant to us sun-like brilliance.
10. Manfully, with your most manly help, Indra, we would win what is worth winning through your attentions.
    Because you are master of both kinds of good, o king, grant a great, substantial, lofty treasure.
11. Him, accompanied by the Maruts, the bull grown strong, not stingy, the heavenly commander—Indra—
    the all-conquering, mighty giver of strength—him we would invoke here for present help.
12. The person who thinks himself to be ever so great, o mace-bearer—make him subject to these superior men, among whom am I—for therefore do we summon you at the contest of champions when the earth, lineage, cows, and waters (are at stake).

13. By these partnerships with you, o much invoked one, might we be higher than each and every rival.
  Smashing both kinds of obstacles, o champion, we would be exultant through lofty wealth, when helped by you.

VI.20 (461) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
13 verses: triṣṭubh, except virāj 7

Unlike the usual model, this hymn begins with the prayer for gifts from the god (vs. 1). But most of the rest of the hymn is devoted to a verse-by-verse listing of Indra's great deeds, not only the standard Vṛtra (vs. 2) and Vala (vss. 3–4) tales, but also the defeat of a series of named enemies on behalf of named mortal clients. Some of these stories are familiar (the Śuṣṇa/Kutsa story, vss. 4–5, and the stealing of Namuci's head, vs. 6), and some are mentioned much more rarely (e.g., Vetasu and Tuji, vs. 8), with unclear details. Many of these same stories are also treated in VI.26.

1. O Indra, wealth that in its vast power surmounts (the wealth) of the stranger, (namely) the peoples in battles, as heaven does the earth, that brings thousands as plunder, wins fertile fields, and overcomes obstacles—give that (wealth) to us, o son of strength.
2. All lordly power, like (that) of heaven, was entirely ceded to you by the gods, o Indra, when you, accompanied by Viṣṇu, smashed the serpent Vṛtra, who had obstructed the waters, you possessor of the silvery drink.
3. Overpowering, mightier and stronger than the strong, he for whom the sacred formulation is created, whose greatness increased—Indra became king of the somian honey when he aided the splitting of all the strongholds.
4. The Paṇis were felled here by hundreds (of deadly weapons), o Indra, for the sake of the ten-armed poet at the winning of the (sun's) rays; by the deadly weapons the magic powers of the voracious Śuṣṇa (were felled). Nothing at all had he left over from the meal.
5. A whole lifetime of great deception was set aside when Śuṣṇa was felled at the flying of the mace.
  Sharing the same chariot, Indra made a wide way for Kutsa, the sharer of his chariot, at the winning of the sun.
6. Like the falcon stealing the exhilarating plant for him, he, stealing the head of the Dāsa Namuci, helped Namī Sāpya as he slept. He imbued (him) with wealth, with refreshment, and with well-being.

7. You split open the fortified strongholds of Pipru, who had the tricks of a snake, o mace-bearer, as if with swelling strength.
   O generous giver, you gave that legacy not to be spurned as a gift to the pious Ṛjiśvan.
8. Indra showed the favor of his dominance to Vetasu of the ten tricks and ten arms and to the thrusting (Tuji), (saying,) "Tugra as perpetual vassal for brilliant (Vetasu) shall I dispatch, like (calves) to their mother, to go (to him)."
9. Unopposable, he will vanquish the contenders, bearing his Vṛtra-smashing mace in his fist.
   He mounts his two fallow bays, like an archer upon his chariot seat; those yoked by speech convey lofty Indra.
10. Might we win anew through your help, Indra. The Pūrus start up the praise with this (hymn) along with sacrifices.
    When he split the seven autumnal strongholds, their shelter, he smote the Dāsa (clans), doing his best for Purukutsa.
11. You, Indra, became the first strengthener. Making wide space for Uśanā Kāvya, (to him as?) grandfather you handed over Navavāstu, who was to be delivered up, as his own grandson.
12. You, the tumultuous one, Indra, set the tumultuous waters in motion, flowing like streams.
    When you will cross the sea, o hero, make Turvaśa and Yadu cross to well-being.
13. Everything in the contest is yours, Indra. Dhuni and Cumuri sleep, whom you put to sleep.
    Just he will shine: Dabhīti who presses for you with the soma juices, who brings the firewood and the cooked food, along with the chants.

VI.21 (462) Indra (1–8, 10, 12), All Gods (9, 11)

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
12 verses: triṣṭubh

The first pāda of this hymn introduces one of its major concerns: the relationship between the current poet and the generations of previous poets to whose lineage he belongs and the question of whether Indra will pay the same attention to the current poet as he did to the older ones (see also vss. 4–6, 8, 10). This theme is connected to the common worry about whether Indra himself exists and, if so, where—subtly articulated in verses 2 and 4, and triumphantly refuted in the last pāda of verse 10. The themes are connected by the anxiety about Indra's epiphany (see esp. vs. 4). Since the goal of the soma sacrifice is to produce Indra's epiphany, that is, his appearance at our ritual ground, then his absence may result either from his favoring another group of sacrificers and poets or from the fact that he doesn't exist at all!

1. These insights of this latest of many bards, (insights) deserving to invoke, newly invoke you who deserve invoking, o hero, the unaging chariot-mounter.
Extensive wealth is sped by their eloquence.
2. I will praise him who is known as "Indra," whose vehicle is songs, who is strengthened by sacrifice along with songs, him of many wiles, whose greatness projects beyond heaven and earth in their greatness.
3. Just he made the patternless darkness in its extension to be patterned by the sun.
When do mortals, seeking gain, not violate the ordinances that belong to you, the immortal, o autonomous one?
4. He who did these things, where then is he—this "Indra"? Upon what people does he attend? Among which clans?
What sacrifice is weal for your thought, your wish? What chant, Indra? Which one is your Hotar?
5. For up to now they have been ever toiling for you, o doer of many (deeds)—those who were born long ago, your ancient comrades, those in between, and the current ones. Much-invoked one, take cognizance of the one who is closest.
6. The closer ones, asking about him, have guided themselves following your distant, ancient (acts) worthy of fame, Indra.
As far as we know it, that far we chant to you as the great one, you hero with the sacred formulation as your vehicle.
7. The face of the demon has spread out against you, who were born great. Stand up to it well!
With your ancient, conjoined comrade, your mace, o bold one, thrust these away.
8. Listen, Indra, to the current (bard) creating sacred formulations, you hero who give succor to bards—for you, as the friend of our ancestors in olden days, have always been easy to invoke in the quest.
9. Bring forward for help Varuṇa, Mitra, Indra, and the Maruts, to help us today, forward Pūṣan, Viṣṇu, Agni and Plenty, Savitar, the plants, and the mountains.
10. These singers here with their chants chant to you, o you of many talents, receiving the first of the sacrifice.
Listen to the call of him who calls you here as you are called. Immortal one, there exists no one like you, other than you.

11. Now drive here, right up to my speech, since you know, o son of strength, together with all those worthy of the sacrifice, who had Agni as their tongue and served the truth, who put Manu very close to Dasa.
12. Become a leader for us on easy roads and on difficult ones, since you are known as a path-maker.
    The broad, unflagging (horses), the best conveyors—with them convey the prize to us, o Indra.

VI.22 (463) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
11 verses: triṣṭubh

Like the previous hymn, this one compares the current poet to previous generations of poets (see vss. 2, 4, 7) and asks Indra directly what in the sacrifice might please him (vs. 4 [cf. VI.21.4]). In fact, the same phrase is used in both hymns to introduce other questions: VI.21.6 tám pr̥chántaḥ "(the singers) asking about him" and VI.22.5 tám pr̥chántī "(the song) asking about him." In each case the subject (singers or song) seeks information about ways to make contact and find favor with Indra, though the anxiety seems less in this hymn than in VI.21.

The similarities between VI.21 and 22 extend to their final verses. The exhortation to come here with his teams in VI.22.11 is structurally and semantically, though not lexically, parallel to two halves of the two final verses of VI.21, 11ab and 12cd—an interesting example of how a poet can expand an underlying formulaic sequence by inserting new material.

Otherwise, the hymn alternates verses praising Indra's qualities and deeds in list-like fashion (e.g., vss. 1cd, 2cd) and begging him for wealth and martial help (e.g., vss. 3, 8, 10). Stylistically it is noteworthy that in much of the hymn, particularly at the beginning, the initial word of every half-verse refers to Indra (1a, c; 2a, c; 3a; 5a, c; 7a, c; 11a). In 3c, the first half-verse in the hymn not beginning with a word referring to Indra, the poet tricks us by playing on our expectations: the yáḥ "who" could easily be Indra, as it was earlier (see 1a, c), but in fact has a different referent. The most complex verse syntactically is verse 5, which is perhaps fitting, as it describes the poet's own song.

1. To him who alone is to be called by the separate peoples, to Indra chant with these hymns, to the bull with bull-like strength who is master, the real "real thing" with many magic wiles, mighty.
2. To him (chanted) our earlier ancestors, the Navagvas, the seven inspired poets, inciting (him), to him who catches up to the cheat, the surpassing one who stays on the mountains, whose speech is without deception, to the strongest one, with their thoughts.

3. This Indra do we beseech for his wealth, consisting of many heroes, of superior men, of much livestock, which is not stunted, not aging, and is filled with sunlight. O master of the fallow bays, bring that here to elate (us).

4. Will you declare this to us—whether ever before singers have obtained your favor, Indra?
What is your portion? What is the vital energy that belongs to a smasher of (rival) lords, you headstrong hammer-head, invoked by many, bringing many goods?

5. The quivering, surging (song), asking about him whose hand holds the mace, who stands upon the chariot—about Indra, whose song it is—
(him who is) powerfully grasping, powerfully ranging, taking on wild frenzy—(the song) seeks her way; she catches up to the bulging one [=Indra].

6. With this magic power (of yours), with the mountain [=mace] that has the speed of thought (you shattered) him who had grown strong through his magic power, you self-powerful one.
You boldly shattered even the immovable, firm fastnesses, o you of good might who confer abundance.

7. (It is) for you [=poets] to tug at him, the strongest one, from every direction with a newer insight, him the ancient one as the ancients did.
Indra, who is without measure, the good conveyor, will convey us across all difficult depths.

8. You set ablaze the earthly and heavenly (realms) and the midspaces against the deceitful people.
Scorch them on every side with your flame, o bull. Enflame the earth and waters against the hater of the sacred formulation.

9. You become the king of the heavenly folk and of the earthly, moving world, o you of glittering face.
Set your mace in your right hand, Indra. Unaging one, you fragment all magic wiles.

10. (Set) here uninterrupted well-being for us, lofty and not negligible, for us to overcome our rivals, Indra, (well-being) by which you will make the Dāsa and Ārya obstacles easy to thrust away, o mace-bearer, and those from the Nahuṣas.

11. Come here to us with the teams that bring all desirable things, you ritual adept summoned by many, you who receive the first of the sacrifice.
(The teams) that neither a non-god nor a god will hinder, with them drive here swiftly in my direction.

VI.23 (464) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn focuses on Indra's vital connection with soma and on the reciprocal relationship between the soma-presser and Indra, the soma-drinker. This theme is established in the first pāda of the first verse, and every subsequent verse has some reference to soma: all but verse 8 contain a form of the word sóma (and vs. 8 does make clear reference to soma-induced exhilaration), and of those, all but verse 7 have "pressed," "pressing," or "presser" as well. The other ritual aspects of the soma sacrifice, especially the poetry and sacred formulations, also receive frequent mention. The reminders to Indra that sacrificial labor should be requited with gifts and help from the god occur throughout the hymn, but are not annoyingly obtrusive.

Stylistically the hymn is noteworthy for its pairs of syntactically linked verses: 1–2 with their "or when" clauses; 3–4 with their run of agent nouns governing accusative objects; 5–6 with a number of repeated formulae.

1. You are intertwined in the pressed soma, Indra, and in the praise song, in the sacred formulation, and in solemn speech as it is recited, when, bounteous one, you drive with your two yoked fallow bays, bearing your mace in your arms,
2. Or when on the decisive day, Indra, you help the soma-presser in the smiting of obstacles [/Vr̥tra] and at the contest of champions, or when, (yourself) being unafraid, as their skill became fearful, you subdued the vaunting Dasyus, Indra.
3. Let Indra be the drinker of the pressed soma, the mighty one ever leading the singer forward with his help, the maker of wide space for the hero and the soma-presser, the giver of goods to his praiser, even a feeble one,
4. Going to even such pressings as these with his two fallow bays, bearing his mace, drinking soma, giving cows, who makes the manly hero possessed of hale heroes, the hearer of the singer's call, for praise songs are his vehicle.
5. It is for him that we toil at what he holds dear—for Indra, who has performed labor for us from of old.
 When the soma is pressed, we sing praise; (a priest) recites the solemn words, so that the sacred formulation will be strengthening for Indra.
6. For you have made the sacred formulations strengthening for yourself, to the extent that we have toiled for you, Indra, with our thoughts.
 When the soma is pressed, o soma-drinker, might we make (the pressings/the formulations) to be most wealful, enjoyable means of increase (for you) through our sacrifices.

7. As giver, take notice of our offering cake; drink the soma, foamy with cows [=milk], Indra.
   Sit right here on the ritual grass of the sacrificer. Make wide, wide space for him in devoted pursuit of you.
8. Find elation according to your liking, mighty one. Let these sacrifices reach you.
   Let these calls among us (reach) the one called by many. Might this insightful thought guide you here for help, Indra.
9. So that he (will be) together with you at the pressings, comrades, fill him with soma juices, Indra the benefactor.
   Surely he will be there for us for the taking? Indra will not neglect the soma-presser, not neglect to help him.
10. Just in this way, when the soma is pressed, Indra has been praised among the Bharadvājas. Just he has power over the liberal man, so that he [=liberal man] will be a patron to the singer. Indra is a giver of wealth that brings all desirable things.

VI.24 (465) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
10 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn begins, like the last one, with a strong statement of Indra's relationship with soma, but it then turns to more general praises of the god (vss. 2–8), with some striking similes, metaphors, and etymological figures. The importance of mortal praise and worship for maintaining Indra's powers is not forgotten; see verses 7–8 and especially verse 6, which seems to concern the traffic in praise: inspiration going out from Indra to the poets and then returning to him as praise (for a similar sentiment and phraseology, see VI.34.1). The last two verses (9–10) ask for Indra's gifts and protection.

1. Bullish exuberance, noise, and solemn words are in Indra; he is the drinker of the pressings and in possession of the silvery drink, when the soma juices are in his company.
   He is worthy to be chanted by men with solemn words as the bounteous one, the heaven-ruling king of hymns, whose help is imperishable.
2. The surpassing hero, favorable to men, discriminating, the hearer of the singer's call, whose help is wide-ranging, the good one, the Laud of Men, who gives succor to bards, praised as the prizewinner, he gives the prize at the rite of distribution.
3. Like an axle beyond its two wheels, your lofty (greatness), o champion, projects beyond the two worlds in their greatness.

(Like) the branches of a tree, your forms of help have grown outward, o much-invoked Indra.

4. The abilities that belong to you, the able one, o you of many abilities, are converging like streams of cattle.
(They are) like cords for calves, Indra, binding without bonds, o you of good bonds [/gifts].

5. One deed today and another tomorrow, one which is not and another which is—Indra makes (them) happen in an instant.
Mitra and Varuṇa, also Pūṣan, are there for us, but it is he [=Indra] who keeps the will of the stranger contained.

6. Like waters forth from the back of a mountain, they proceeded forth from you along with solemn words and sacrifices, Indra.
Along with these good praises, seeking the prize they have (also) gone to you, like horses to a contest, o you whose vehicle is songs.

7. Indra, whom the autumns do not age, nor do the months, nor days make lean—may his body, even though he is fully grown, grow stronger while it is being celebrated by praises and solemn words.

8. He does not bow to the tough, nor to the stubborn, nor to the vaunting one sped by the Dasyus, when he receives praise.
Even the towering mountains are flatlands for Indra. Even in the deep there is a ford for him.

9. With a (vessel) that is deep and wide, o bearer of the vessel, hold forth to us refreshments and prizes, you drinker of the pressings, and stand erect with your help, allowing no harm, at the early brightening of the night, at its final turn.

10. Accompany our leader to help him at the close encounter, or protect him from harm from here, Indra.
Protect him from harm at home and in the wilderness. – Having good heroes might we rejoice for a hundred winters.

VI.25 (466) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
9 verses: triṣṭubh

The clear purpose of this hymn is to solicit Indra's aid against enemies in battle. The various types of opponents are vividly described, as well as the potential types of hostile encounter: see especially the apparent wrestling match in 4ab. But the poet's expressed confidence in Indra's ability to provide the decisive assistance is also a subtle way of asserting the supremacy of Indra. This second theme can be seen more clearly by examining the structure of the hymn: verse 5, which concerns the invincibility of Indra, is the exact middle of the hymn and serves as an omphalos; verses 4 and 6 match each other in structure and referents and form a ring around the omphalos, with a further ring provided by repeated phrases in verses 1/2 and 8/9, with Indra's supremacy repeated in verse 8.

1. What is your nearest help, what your farthest, and what your midmost, tempestuous Indra, with those (forms of help) help us well at the Vṛtra-smashing and with these prizes, as the great one among us, o mighty one.
2. With these (forms of help), o Indra, (you who) allow no harm—cause the contenders who oppose (us) to falter, cause the battle fury of the foe to falter; with them bring down all the attackers (to be) scattered asunder, bring down the Dāsa clans for the Ārya.
3. O Indra, the rapacious ones who, kin or not kin, have hitched themselves up, turning here against us, (render) their powers faltering, smash their bull-like (strengths), put them far away.
4. Now a champion may defeat (another) champion with his limbs when the two, their bodies gleaming, will set upon each other in their struggle to overcome, or when, with offspring, cattle, lineage, waters, and fields at stake, their two war-cries will dispute with each other.
5. Yet no champion, no overpowering and no bold one, no one thinking himself a fighter has fought against you.
   Indra, none of these is equal to you. You dominate all that have been born.
6. He is master of the manly power of both of these (armies) when the ritual adepts call on him in the clash, when, whether an obstacle or a dwelling place rich in men is at issue, the two (armies) in their expansion keep tussling mightily back and forth with one another.
7. So then, when your separate peoples will stir, Indra, become the rescuer and defender (of those,) our most manly patrons, who have set us ahead of the stranger, o Indra.
8. It was conceded to you, to your great Indrian power; everything was entirely conceded to you at the Vṛtra-smashing; dominion was conceded, victorious might conceded, o Indra worthy of sacrifice, conceded to you by the gods at the victory over men.
9. In just this way for us herd together the contenders in the battles. Indra, subdue the godless ones who oppose (us).
   And with your help, Indra, might we Bharadvājas know (this), as we sing just now at dawn.

VI.26 (467) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

The hymn begins (vss. 1–2) with an appeal to Indra for help in battles and contests, much as in the immediately preceding hymn. The first two verses also play with the word vā́ja "prize," perhaps punning on the name of the poet and his bardic clan, Bharad-vāja. The middle part of the hymn (vss. 3–6) gives brief accounts of Indra's battles against various named enemies and his aid to various named mortal allies; in this structure it is very reminiscent of VI.20, and many of the same incidents, with the same, often obscure names, are found in both hymns. The final two verses (7–8) beg Indra to show the same powers in aid of the poet and his patrons. The structure of the hymn is thus both fairly conventional and also symmetrical, with requests to the god in the first two and last two verses and the middle four verses providing previous models for the aid the god is asked to supply.

Stylistically noteworthy is the regular fronting of the personal pronoun. Beginning with verse 2, every half-verse through 5a has a fronted form of the 2nd-person singular pronoun "you" (and usually another one in an even pāda: 2d, 3b, 4d), either nominative t^{u}vám or accusative tvā́m. The rest of verse 5 briefly breaks the pattern, which returns in verse 6. Then, interestingly, the 1st person asserts itself: 7a ahám "I", 8a vayám "we," with 2nd-person genitive táva (7b) and instrumental tváyā (7c) interspersed. This distribution corresponds to the thematic structure of the hymn, with the recounting to Indra of his own deeds followed by requests of him by us mortals on our own behalf. Verse 7 brings the 1st person "I" and 2nd person "you" into happy conjunction.

1. Hear us, Indra. We are calling to you as we are "boiling over" at the winning of the great prize.
   When the clans clash together at the contest of champions, give us mighty help on the decisive day.
2. To you does the prizewinner, son of a prizewinner, call, at the winning of the great prize to be secured, to you, Indra, the surpassing master of settlements, when there are obstacles; to you does the fist-fighter look as he fights for cattle.
3. You spurred the poet [=Uśanā Kāvya] on at the winning of the (sun's) rays. You wrung out Śuṣṇa for the pious Kutsa.
   You struck far away the head of the invulnerable one, intending to do (a deed) worthy to be proclaimed for Atithigva.
4. You brought forward the towering battle-chariot, and helped the bull Daśadyu as he did battle.
   You struck down Tugra for Vetasu, in partnership. You, Indra, strengthened Tuji, the singer.

5. You made that hymn (endowed) with might, Indra, so that you could tear out hundreds and thousands (of goods), o champion.
   You struck the barbarian Śambara down from the mountain and furthered Divodāsa with glittering help.
6. You, reaching elation through the hospitality offerings and the soma juices, put Cumuri to sleep for Dabhīti.
   You, showing favor to Piṭhīnas, in partnership, smashed Raji and his sixty thousand with your power.
7. Might I also, together with my patrons, attain this, the greater favor and might that are yours, Indra, when along with you our heroes are praised, you who have our heroes as companions, along with Nahus who provides threefold defense, o strongest one.
8. Might we be your dearest comrades, Indra, at this invocation to heavenly brilliance, o great one.
   Let the son of Pratardana, glorious in dominion, be the most glorious at the smashing of obstacles and the winning of rich stakes.

VI.27 (468) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
8 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn traces a satisfying arc from beginning to end: the trajectory is not predictable, but the progress from a large and open question to extreme specificity is neatly handled. It begins with a question, a question all the more open because one of the crucial terms is unspecified (though easily supplied), the repeated pronoun asya "of it"—referring, clearly, to soma. The question is what did Indra make or create under the influence "of it," and the surprisingly broad answer given in the responsive verse 2 is "what exists."

The unqualified comprehensiveness of Indra' production—"being," "what exists"—is contrasted with our imperfect knowledge of his powers in verse 3. But even what small proportion of that power we have experienced (vs. 4) was more than sufficient to destroy the Vr̥cīvant army of the enemy Varaśikha for the benefit of the poet's patron, Abhyāvartin Cāyamāna—a battle described in verses 4–7. The second half of verse 6 is especially notable for its warrior slang: the phrase "playing the lord's role for an arrow," which also appears in X.27.6, in our opinion refers to warriors' boasting, and "breaking their pots," which many commentators have tried to interpret literally, must show the same use of "pot" for "head" as, for example, German "Kopf" and French "tête." In our opinion the site of the battle is the confluence of two rivers, mentioned by name in verses 5 and 6, and then referred to jointly in verse 7. The dual bovines in that verse have been variously interpreted, but in our opinion, despite a problem with grammatical gender, the most likely referents are the rivers, in a phrase very reminiscent of one (III.33.1) describing two rivers as mother cows licking each other in the famous hymn III.33, the dialogue between the poet Viśvāmitra and two rivers.

The final verse is a dānastuti, praising and detailing the gift made by Abhyāvartin Cāyamāna to the poet. The poet gives his patron the epithets "bounteous," a standard qualification of Indra (as in vs. 3 in this very hymn), and "universal king," also regularly used of Indra (among other divinities). He thus verbally associates his patron with the unlimited power of Indra, as it was portrayed earlier in the hymn.

1. What did Indra create in the exhilaration of it, what at the drinking of it? what in the fellowship of it?
   Or those [=priests] who were there with joy at the installation of it—what did those previous ones acquire? what do the current ones?
2. Indra created what exists in the exhilaration of it, what exists at the drinking of it; what exists in the fellowship of it.
   Or those [=priests] who were there with joy at the installation of it—the previous ones acquired what exists; the current ones what exists.
3. But yet we do not know your whole greatness, nor bounteousness, o bounteous one, nor every current benefit (of yours). O Indra, your (whole) Indrian strength has not shown itself.
4. (But) there has appeared just that Indrian strength of yours with which you smashed the posterity of Varaśikha, when from the blast of your mace when it was smashed down, from just its sound, their farthest (division) shattered, Indra.
5. Indra smashed the posterity of Varaśikha, doing his best for Abhyāvartin Cāyamāna, when at the Hariyūpīyā (River) he smashed the Vr̥cīvants in the front division, and the rear (division) shattered from fear.
6. O much-invoked Indra, at the Yavyāvatī (River), though they were a hundred thirty altogether and armor-clad, with a yen for fame, the Vr̥cīvants, playing the lord's role for an arrow, breaking their own "pots," came to failed ends.
7. He for whom the two ruddy cows [=rivers?], seeking good pasturage, acted the go-between as they licked each other again and again, he handed Turvaśa and the Vr̥cīvants over to Sr̥ñjaya, doing his best for the son of Devavāta.
8. O Agni, chariot-steeds by twos and twenty head of cattle together with brides does the bounteous, universal king give to me—
   Abhyāvartin the son of Cayamāna. Difficult to attain is this priestly gift of the Pārthavas.

VI.28 (469) The Cows and Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
8 verses: triṣṭubh, except jagatī 2–4, anuṣṭubh 8

Although this hymn is found right in the middle of the Indra cycle, the Anukramaṇī assigns most of the verses in this hymn to the cows (1, 3–8c), with a few (2, 8d) to the cows or Indra. The hymn was later used as a blessing for cows as they return home, but it may originally have been intended to bless the cows given as a dakṣiṇā (priestly gift) as they enter the home of their new owner. According to the Vaitāna Śrauta Sūtra 21.24, the sacrificer awaited the cows intended for the dakṣiṇā with the hymn Atharvaveda IV.21 (=R̥V VI.28.1–7). It is worth noting that almost the last word of the preceding hymn (VI.27.8d) is dákṣiṇā, and this may have invited the placement of this hymn here.

The safety of the cows of the pious man as they graze is the subject of much of the hymn, and the various dangers that could befall them are detailed: being stolen by a thief or in a cattle raid, getting lost, going to the slaughterhouse. They are also given rather grandiose identifications in verse 5, including with Indra: 5c is a clear echo, almost to parody, of the famous hymn II.12 with its refrain: "he, o peoples, is Indra."

The final verse is in a different meter, and as it is not part of the Atharvaveda version of this hymn, it was probably originally separate. In form it is a magical exhortation and makes use of the only slightly euphemistic verb upa-√pr̥c "mix sexually." The verse obviously expresses the wish that the cows become impregnated, and thus picks up the adjective "bearing offspring" in verses 2 and 7. The use of the near deictic "right here" modifying "the inseminator" suggests that the performance of the spell has a physical component in addition to the verbal, as is regularly found in the Atharvaveda.

1. The cows have come here and have made (the house) blessed. Let them find a place in the cow-stall; let them find enjoyment among us.
   Here should those of many colors be, bearing offspring, as through many dawns they give milk for Indra.
2. Indra does his best for the man who sacrifices and delivers in full. He gives more; he does not steal what belongs to him.
   Making wealth increase more and more just for him, he establishes the man devoted to the gods in undivided virgin land.
3. These will not be lost, and no thief will take them by deception. No enemy will venture against their meandering course.
   Those (cows) with which he sacrifices and gives to the gods, he keeps company with them as their cowherd for a very long time.
4. No dusty-necked steed gets to them (in a cattle raid), nor do they go to the place for dressing [=slaughterhouse].
   The cows of the mortal who sacrifices wander far across wide-ranging (space) free of fear.

5. Fortune has appeared to me as cows; Indra as cows. The draught of the first soma is cows.
   These cows here—they, o peoples, are Indra. I am just searching, with my heart and mind, for Indra.
6. You fatten even the thin man, o cows. You make even one without beauty to have a lovely face.
   You make the house blessed, o you of blessed speech. Your vigor is declared loftily in the assemblies.
7. Bearing offspring, cropping good pasturage, drinking pure waters at a good watering hole—let not a thief be master of you, nor one who utters evil. Might the lance of Rudra avoid you.
8. Right here is the inseminator: let there be inseminating right here in these cows, right here when the semen of the bull (is here), right here when your virility (is here), o Indra.

VI.29 (470) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
6 verses: triṣṭubh

The most notable feature in this hymn is the theme of "attachment," which is played with semantically and syntactically in verses 2–4. In verse 2 it is Indra's own powers that are attached to him, or rather to his hand (see also the mace in hand in vs. 1), but in the following two verses ritual elements offered by men are the attachments. Since the final verse (6) is a summary verse, introduced as often by evā́ "in this way," verses 2–4 constitute an omphalos defined by the attachment theme. Interestingly, the only one of Indra's great deeds mentioned in this hymn is his forceful separation of heaven and earth (vs. 5b), which provides a conceptual opposite to the attachment elsewhere.

The larger concern of the hymn is the reciprocal relation between men, who offer Indra sacrifice and praise poetry, and Indra, who places his power in the service of men and offers them gifts. This relationship is announced in the first verse, especially in the word "partnership, comradeship" in the first pāda, and is also conveyed iconically by the "attachment" of the words "Indra" and "men," which occur next to each other initial in the opening pāda of the hymn, and again in 4c (índraṃ [vo] náraḥ). The relationship between the god and his worshipers is here modeled on that between the poet-sacrificer and his patron. Indra is in fact called a "patron" in verse 5 and described as providing the priestly gift (dakṣiṇā) in verse 3, which is the task and prerogative of a patron.

1. The men serve Indra for you [=patrons or priests] for the sake of his partnership and benevolence, as they go on finding pleasure in the great one, for he whose hand holds the mace is the giver of a great (thing). Sacrifice to the great and delightful one for help.
2. To which hand manly powers are firmly attached, (as) a chariot driver is to his golden chariot,
   (as) reins are to the two brawny fists, (as) bullish horses yoked together are to the road.
3. For your glory do our friendly services firmly attach themselves to your two feet [=do homage]. As the bold mace-bearer, (you) provide the priestly gift; wearing a fragrant cloak, (lovely) to be seen like the sun, you have become vigorous, o dancer.
4. (But) the pressed soma has become the most firmly attached (to him), in whose (presence) the cooked food is cooked and there are roasted grains, while the men who create the sacred formulations are praising Indra and reciting their hymns as the men most cherished by the gods.
5. No limit has been set for this vast power of yours. He forced apart the two world-halves with his greatness.
   With his help our patron [=Indra] brings these things to fulfillment as he keeps thrusting, as if driving his herds together to the waters.
6. Just in this way let lofty Indra be easily called—the warrior with golden lips, with his help that needs no help, for in this way was he born with unequalled, surpassing might. He will strike down many obstacles [/Vr̥tras] and Dasyus.

VI.30 (471) Indra

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya
5 verses: triṣṭubh

This hymn is entirely a celebration of Indra's cosmogonic and cosmos-maintaining deeds and powers. The only possible indications of a human dimension in the hymn are the oblique reference to the soma sacrifice in the first pāda of the hymn, the granting of good things in the second pāda, and the ruminative "I think" at the beginning of the second verse. The pace of the hymn is brisk, but this straightforward recital of the high points of Indra's career has a pleasing balance and variety in its expressions.

1. He has been strengthened even more for the heroic deed; he alone, the unaging, apportions good things.

Indra projects beyond heaven and earth: the two worlds are equivalent to just half of him.

2. Therefore I think his lordly power to be lofty. Those things that he upholds, no one alters.
   Day after day the sun becomes visible. The strong-willed one distributed the seats widely.
3. Even today, even now, this is the labor of the rivers, since you dug out a way for them, Indra.
   The mountains settled down like (flies) settling on food. By you were the airy realms fixed fast, o you of strong will.
4. This is really true: there exists no other like you. Indra, no god nor mortal is greater.
   You smashed the serpent that lay around the flood; you sent the waters surging toward the sea.
5. You (sent) forth the waters, (opened) wide the doors in every direction. Indra, you broke the fastness of the mountain.
   You became the king of the moving world and of the settled domains, begetting at once the sun, heaven, and dawn.

VI.31 (472) Indra

Suhotra Bhāradvāja
5 verses: triṣṭubh, except śakvarī 4

This hymn begins by proclaiming Indra's power over all peoples and all the cosmic and earthly realms (vss. 1–2), before focusing on several of his famous battles and the mortals he aided in them (vss. 3–4). The final verse exhorts Indra to perform the same martial services for us.

The most interesting verse is the first, where at first glance the logical connections among the three clauses are not clear. But the contrast between the singleness and unification of the first half of the verse and the division in the second seems to be the point. Indra is the single lord of wealth because he can gather all peoples just in his two hands—peoples who were otherwise disunited and quarreling over the various goods of existence. Indra's act of unification in this verse seems to be a kind of wishful thinking on the poet's part, however, for the battles depicted in verses 3 and 4 are the result of disunity, and in verse 5 we call on Indra for aid in the same sorts of disputations found in 1cd. The "separate peoples" (carṣaṇí) of verse 1 also return in verse 5; the poet wishes to see them as a sort of universal audience for the fame of himself and his people, brought about by Indra's intervention on their behalf.

1. You, o wealth-lord, have become the single (lord) of wealth: you have taken (all) the communities in your hands, Indra.

The separate peoples, disputants, were disputing with each other over progeny and posterity, the waters, and the sun.

2. Through fear of you, Indra, all the earthly realms, though unshakeable, are brought to shaking.
Heaven and earth, the mountains, and the forests—all that is firmly fixed takes fright at your drive.
3. You, Indra—fight along with Kutsa against the insatiable Śuṣṇa, the demon of bad harvest, in the quest for cattle, and against his ten before the (ritual) mealtime. Then you steal the wheel of the sun. You have toiled at your labors.
4. You smashed down hundreds of impregnable fortresses of the Dasyu Śambara, when, able one, with your ability you did your best for Divodāsa the presser and for Bharadvāja the singer, for (them to obtain) goods, o you who can be bought with the pressing.
5. Mount your fearsome chariot, you real "real thing," powerfully manly, for the great battle.
O you in the vanguard, drive here toward me with your help, and proclaim our fame, famous one, to the separate peoples.

VI.32 (473) Indra

Suhotra Bhāradvāja
5 verses: triṣṭubh

Unlike the common practice, whereby the final verse of the hymn constitutes the poet's summing up of his hymn, in this hymn the first verse serves this purpose, in meta-relationship with what follows. The remaining verses, each of which begins with the pronoun sá "he," constitute the praise the poet announced in verse 1. Verses 2–3 refer to the Vala myth, with special attention paid to Indra's companions in this enterprise, the unnamed Aṅgirases, and verse 5 may be an oblique account of the aftermath of the Vr̥tra slaying. In verse 4 Indra is exhorted to grant the singer powers and riches.

1. For him I have fashioned with my mouth these words, unprecedented, best of many, most wealful—for the great hero, powerful and precipitous, conferring abundance, bearing the mace, stalwart.
2. He made the two mothers of the poets shine with the sun; he broke the rock as he was being hymned.
Bellowing [/being eager] along with the very attentive versifiers, he let loose the binding of the ruddy cows.

3. He, the doer of many deeds, triumphed every time when cattle were at stake, in company with the conveyors (of songs), the versifiers with their knees fixed.
   Acting as comrade along with his comrades, the smasher of fortresses broke the firmly fixed fortresses, being a poet along with poets.
4. As great one, drive here to the singer with (riches) to clothe (him), with prizes, and with your great unbridled powers, with (riches) bringing many heroes, o bull of the settlements, you who long for songs—for good faring.
